No return from this precinct is found among the records of the county. The evidence shows that the Democratic inspectors failed to appear at the polling place, nor did any of the Democrats of the beat appear during the day. It was the intention to have no election here, but the colored inspector was on hand, as was the United States supervisor. An election board was organized according to law, the election held, and 197 votes cast for McDuffie. Returns were made out according to the vote; what became of the returns designed for the county board does not appear, but the supervisors made returns to the chief supervisor (p. 763). The voters are not to be disfranchised by any neglect of the officers after the election if the correct vote can be ascertained. In this case it is duly proved.

The minority report contends that poll was illegally and incompetently held. The law of Alabama provided:

SEC. 285. Counting out votes.—It is the duty of all inspectors of elections in the election precincts, immediately on the closing of the polls, to count out the ballots so polled.

As to the precinct of Pence, in Dallas County, the majority rule:

All the inspectors and clerks were Democrats. When the polls were closed one of the inspectors took the ballot box to his home, some 200 yards away, and when the supervisor would not go to that house to witness the count the box was brought back and handed to the colored Democratic inspector and carried away, and the count was not made until the following day. This violation of the law so invalidates the returns as to require proof of their correctness. Witness says that there are only three colored Democrats in the beat, one of whom was an inspector. He estimates the colored vote of the beat at 190, it being only an estimate.

Instead of calling the officers of the election, contestee calls one William Bell (p. 646), who testifies to the effect that Isaacs could not have seen the window when the tickets were taken in. He made a bad guess at population, and only estimates 30 or 40 white voters in the beat.

Remarks upon the character of the evidence and the reversal of returns in other beats will apply to this one as well. We count it according to notice of contest.

As a result of their conclusions, the majority of the committee found a majority of 4,481 for contestant in the district, and reported resolutions providing that he be seated.

The minority found that sitting Member was entitled to 9,104 majority.

The report was debated at length on June 3 and 4,[1] and on the latter day the question was taken on substituting the minority proposition, confirming the title of sitting Member, for the majority resolutions; and the motion was disagreed to—yeas 114, nays 130.

Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to—yeas 130, nays 113.

Thereupon Mr. McDuffie appeared and took the oath.

1032. The Virginia election case of Langston v. Venable, in the Fifty-first Congress.

A succession of unexplained irregularities on the part of intelligent election officers destroys the presumption in favor of the returns.

The House counted returns rejected by State canvassers for mere informalities.

The election officers being irregularly chosen and of suspicious conduct, an excess of ballots over the poll list was held to justify rejection of the box.

[1] Record, pp. 5542, 5598—5601; Journal, pp. 699, 700.

Returns not being signed by the election officers and not being sustained by evidence, they were rejected.

On June 16, 1890,[1] Mr. Nils P. Haugen, of Wisconsin, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Virginia case of Langston v. Venable. The report says:

The official returns from the Fourth Congressional district of Virginia of the election of Representative in Congress, on the 6th of November, 1888, give E. C. Venable 13,298, John M. Langston 12,657, and R. W. Arnold 3,207 votes, a plurality of 641 votes for Venable over Langston.

The contestant, Mr. Langston, claims that this is not the true vote of the district, but is the result of fraud and corruption on the part of the election officers in certain counties and at certain precincts specified in his notice of contest, and that had the vote been honestly received and honestly returned in accordance with the laws of Virginia, a clear plurality over Mr. Venable would have appeared for him Langston.

The committee has selected from the voluminous record (which contains some 1,200 pages of closely printed matter, much of it irrelevant and tedious cross-examination) a few precincts which appear to the committee to sustain the charges of the contestant and completely overcome the plurality for contestee on the face of the returns.

Mere irregularities in the conduct of the election, where it does not appear that the legally expressed will of the voter has been suppressed or changed, is insufficient to impeach officially declared votes and have been disregarded. But a succession of unexplained irregularities and disregard of law on the part of intelligent officials removes from the ballot box and the official returns that sacred character with which the law clothes them, and makes less conclusive evidence sufficient to change the burden upon the party who maintains the legality of the official count.

Paine on Elections, section 596, says:

"While it is well settled that mere neglect to perform directory requirements of law, or performance in a mistaken manner where there is no bad faith and no harm has accrued, will not justify the rejection of an entire poll, it is equally well settled that when the proceedings are so tarnished by fraudulent, negligent, or improper conduct on the part of the officers that the result of the election is rendered unreliable the entire returns will be rejected and the parties left to make such proof as they may of the votes legally cast for them."

The laws of Virginia recognize the weaknesses of human nature and the necessity of having friends of the candidates representing different views upon the election boards to guard against the temptation to which a board whose members all affiliate with one political party might be subject.

After quoting the law of Virginia as to elections; the report goes on:

There are numerous instances in the record of unwarranted changes in judges of election, made without reason or excuse only a few days before the election. These are suspicious circumstances, but standing alone and not supported by evidence of fraud at the polls, affecting the result of the election, they have been disregarded, and the certified returns permitted to stand as made. In arriving at results, specific acts at certain designated precincts are alone considered, without unnecessarily dwelling on the general political and race features of the district.

As the case was examined the decision turned on the disposition of a few precincts.

(1) In an election district known as "Porch and Ross" the following ruling is made by the majority:

At this precinct 69 votes were cast for Venable and 141 for Langston, a plurality of 72 for Langston. This vote was regularly returned to the county commissioners, but not counted for the alleged reason that the same returns showed certain votes cast for candidates for President and Vice-President instead of for electors of President and Vice-President. For this mistake of the judges not only the electoral vote of this precinct was thrown out, but the vote for every other candidate upon the ticket was rejected by the county commissioners. This fraud now stands confessed.

[1] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 2462; Rowell, p. 437.

The minority say:

We find that these returns were rejected because they were not made in accordance with the directory provisions of the election statute of Virginia; and in the absence of any suspicions of fraud, or evidence tending to impeach their correctness, we think they should be counted.

(2) In Lewiston precinct the report discloses:

The regularly appointed judges at this precinct, appointed January 27, 1888, were W. P. Austin, B. H. May, and T. C. Fowlkes. Austin and May were present at the opening of the polls, but did not serve as judges. Mr. May acted as one of the clerks. The acting judges were E. G. Bayne, T. F. Robertson, and E. C. Goodwin. All the judges and clerks and the United States supervisor present were political opponents of contestant. With the exception of Mr. Austin, who testifies that on account of illness it was impossible for him to serve, no explanation is given for this sudden change of judges on the very morning of election; but that it was in pursuance of prearranged plans is apparent from the presence of Mr. Robertson at sunrise on the morning of election to serve as judge, he living some 8 or 9 miles distant from the polls.

The judges excluded the clerks of election and everyone else when the ballots were counted, and when the count was over there was found an excess of ballots over the names on the poll list. The report says:

The excess of ballots appears by the return of the judges to have been 26. Mr. Smith also testifies to the fact that the polls were held in an unusual place. The customary place for holding the election at this precinct had been the court room of the court-house. At this particular election it was found advisable to occupy a small jury room and exclude all witnesses, not excepting the clerks of election, which would have been impracticable in the large and commodious court room.

Only one judge was sworn as to their acts, and he testified that the election was fair and honest "so far as I saw." He also testified that he was inexperienced in election matters. The report says:

The clerks were not called as witnesses.

The only United States supervisor serving, W. J. Bragg, left immediately after the closing of the polls, not to return, and was consequently ignorant of any of the illegal acts of the judges charged. The committee is of the opinion that the excess of 26 ballots in a total vote of about 200 could not have occurred without the connivance of the judges of election, and is such evidence of fraud as must necessarily exclude this box. Contestee does not in his briefs even mention the excess of ballots. The returns awarded Venable 119, Langston 48, and Arnold 46 votes. The returns are impeached and rejected. No competent evidence was offered as to the true vote cast.

The law as to appointment of judges provided:

Should any judge of election fail to attend at any place of voting for one hour after the time prescribed by law for opening the polls at such election, it shall be lawful for the judge or judges in attendance to select from among the bystanders one or more persons possessing the qualifications of judges of election, who shall act as judge or judges of such election and who shall have all the powers and authority of judges appointed by said electoral board.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Charles T. O'Ferrall, of Virginia, agreed that the judges were not appointed according to the statute, but held that the statute was not mandatory, and that the judges were at least de facto officers, and that the voters should not be made to suffer for the irregularity. The other points dwelt on by the majority did not appear to the minority to suggest fraud, and they concluded:

These excessive ballots could not affect the result. How they got into the box no one, so far as the record shows, can tell. Suppose they were put there by one of the judges. Should that disfranchise more than 200 voters?

There is no evidence that the Democratic vote at this precinct was unusually large or the Republican vote unusually small. In the draw Venable suffered more than Langston or Arnold, they losing, respectively, 13, 8, and 4 votes. Langston's supporter and witness (J. W. Smith) testified that he believed Langston received 66 votes (Record, 814, question 45); the return gave him 48 votes, or 18 less than his friend and worker believed he received.

Would it not be more in consonance with justice to give Langston 18 votes more and deduct them proportionately from Venable and Arnold, or even take all from Venable, than reject the entire returns? Would not that course be more equitable than depriving Venable of the entire advantage he had at this precinct? Could Langston complain?

While adhering firmly to our position that the vote at this precinct should be counted as returned, yet if it is not to stand we insist that the contestant should not have more than his worker and witness claims for him, or Venable made to lose everything.

(3) The majority thus dispose of Mannboro returns:

The electoral commissioners of Amelia County reported this precinct as having given votes for Venable and 111 for Langston. The regularity of this return was challenged by contestant in his notice of contest. The only thing in the record bearing upon this question is found on page 173, giving the following unsigned statement:

FOR CONGRESS.

E. C. Venable rec'd (122) one hundred and twenty-two votes.

John Mercer Langston rec'd (111) one hundred and eleven votes.

R. W. Arnold rec'd (73) seventy-three votes.

After the names, etc., are all set down, and at the foot of the list, a certificate in the following form is required to be given:

We hereby certify that———had———votes for———; and———had———votes for———that had———votes for———, &c.

_____ _____ _____ _____

Clerks. Judges.

If this is the act of the officers of election, it is difficult to see why the contestee did not introduce some evidence to show that fact. As it is, the plurality of 11 returned for contestee must be deducted from his former vote.

The minority say:

It is true the returns from this precinct were not signed by the officers of election, and if the question had been raised in the notice of contest and no evidence taken to show their correctness, we would agree with the majority that they should be rejected. But the notice of contest will be examined in vain for any charge or reference to this precinct.

But in the debate [1] it was pointed out that the contestant did in fact raise this question in his notice of contest.

Friends of contestant having been excluded from the count and contestee's agents having prevented the best testimony, the House excluded the return on secondary evidence.

Instance wherein returns were impeached on evidence of a person who saw and listed the ballot of each voter as he deposited it.

An election board being unfairly constituted, the returns were successfully impeached by the testimony of individual voters as to their ballots and qualifications.

[1] Record, p. 10155.

In order to justify counting votes of voters standing in line to vote, but not voting, each voter should be called as a witness.

The fact that a decisive number of voters stand in line to vote and are prevented justifies a declaration that the seat is vacant.

Where a poll has been rejected and proof aliunde is resorted to, only the vote proven should be allowed.

(4) In the city of Petersburg fraud was expected by contestant, and he instructed his followers how to meet it. The report says:

At the Republican Langston clubs in the city of Petersburg it was agreed that every supporter of Langston should vote an open ticket; that he should show his ticket to some reliable friend of Langston selected for the purpose of registering the names of the Langston voters and witnessing the deposit of their ballots in the box. This plan was very generally followed by the enthusiastic supporters of contestant, and the results promptly reported to him after election.

And as to the Third Ward:

The returns from this ward give Venable 518, Langston 174, and Arnold 105 votes.

M. N. Lewis, the witness referred to above, testifies that he was at the polls all day, from the opening of the same until long after they closed, and kept tally of the Republicans voting for Langston an Harrison, in pursuance of the instructions of his party.

The judges and clerks of election were all Democrats and bitterly opposed to contestant. Only one United States supervisor served, and he a Democrat.

The report quotes the testimony of Lewis, who gave an account of how he took his evidence of the vote for contestant. The following quotations of testimony, with comments of the report, disclose its nature:

"72. Q. Please examine the ticket I hand you and state whether or not the ballot you saw in the hands of each voter of the Third Ward on election day, November 6, 1888, and which was delivered to and received by the judge of election, was identically like the ballot I hand you, and did you or did you not enter upon your said books the name of each colored voter who cast a ballot identically like the one here presented to you?—A. This is the identical ballot voted by each voter whose name I put upon my book."

The ballot here filed is a straight Republican ballot, with Langston for Congress.

"73. Q. You have stated that you stood at the polls of the Third Ward all the day of election from the opening to the closing of the same, excepting about thirty minutes, and that you were immediately at the polling place of the Third Ward in this city; that then and there you took down in the four books which you have here identified and handed to the notary public the name of every colored voter, showing you a ticket identical with the one you have just examined, and which is filed with these depositions, marked "Exhibit M," after said ticket had been delivered to and received by the judge of election at said ward on election day, November 6, 18M. Now please give the name of each voter whom you so entered in said books as you have stated."

The witness here gave the names of 286 voters recorded by him as all (except two indicated) having voted for contestant, and filed the four books containing the names with the notary taking the evidence, and they are in the possession of the committee. The names appear in the record. The word "Langston" is written after each name in these books, except the names numbered 222 and 227, which are marked "Dem."

"74. Q. You have stated that you occupied the position immediately at the window of the polling place in the Third Ward, on the side at which the colored people voted, all the day of election except about thirty minutes. Please state how many names were entered upon the books you kept during your absence, if any were so entered.—A. Sixteen."

These 16 names were fully identified by William J. Smith, who entered them in the absence of Mr. Lewis.

"78. Q. You have stated that on election day W. J. Smith, during your temporary absence from the polls, entered the names of 16 colored voters upon the four books which you kept. Please state, if you remember, how many names you recorded upon the said books on that day at the time and under the circumstances already testified to.—A. I recorded 201 names. The others, with the exception of 16 names, were recorded in my presence and by my instructions by William J. Smith and S. B. McE. Jones.

"79. Q. Have you, since the 6th day of November, 1888, compared the four books as to which you have been testifying with the poll books of the Third Ward on deposit in the clerk's office of this city, or with either one of said poll books, or with a certified copy thereof?—A. I have compared the four books with one of the poll books.

"80. Q. State what object you had in making such comparisons, and state the result of it.—A. I compared the books to ascertain if they agreed. I found that a great many of the names were misspelled, and some few whose names I took and whose ballot I saw deposited, their names do not appear on the poll book which I examined."

The majority call attention to the fact that not one of the 286 voters to whom Mr. Lewis referred was called by sitting Member to disprove the testimony, although in another voting precinct such a course had been rewarded with success.

The majority report concludes:

With the friends of contestant studiously excluded from witnessing the count, and with 284 votes proved to have been cast for him, while the returns gave him only 174, this box stands impeached and must be rejected.

In the case of Washburn v. Voorhees (3 Congressional Election Cases, 62) it was held that "where in one precinct but 143 votes were returned, while 173 were cast for contestant (a difference of only 30 votes), and in another 20 less were returned than were proved, and the officers were shown to be violent partisans of the party in whose favor the frauds were, the whole vote of the precinct was rejected."

In the case of Bisbee v. Finley (6 Congressional Election Cases, 177), where 259 votes were cast at one precinct for a candidate and only 69 were returned for him, it was said in the report: "That any considerable number of votes proven for one candidate in excess of the number returned for him has always been regarded as evidence of fraud and a legitimate method of impeaching the returns. We think it is sufficient to exclude the return from the count without further evidence."

The majority give to contestant the 284 votes proven aliunde and to sitting Member none, as he proved none.

The minority say:

The case of the contestant stands upon the testimony of Lewis alone (for if it falls Smith's testimony must fall), which is overwhelmingly rebutted and contradicted by no less than four witnesses.

We have, then, the sworn returns of three judges and two clerks and one Federal supervisor and the testimony of four witnesses on the one hand and the uncorroborated and contradicted testimony of one witness (Lewis) on the other.

They endeavor to impeach the character of Lewis also.

The majority comment on the fact that no one of the election officers was called to testify as to the correctness of his work, and that only the United States supervisor gave testimony, which the majority consider inconclusive.

The majority admitted, especially in debate,[1] that ordinarily the testimony of two witnesses would not be sufficient to overturn the presumption that the officers had done their duty; but the sitting Member had suppressed further testimony. Moreover, the affidavits of the voters had been taken, but as they were taken after the time for taking testimony had expired and were somewhat irregular, they had not been brought into the record, although they were in the committee room. The majority thus describes the suppression of testimony:

On Saturday, the 9th day of February, contestant began taking depositions as to Third Ward of the city of Petersburg, in pursuance of notice which contained a list of 292 names of Republicans, every one of whom it is claimed would have testified that he was a qualified voter, and voted for Langston in Third Ward. (Record, pp. 514–516.) The first witness sworn, M. N. Lewis, was asked by the contestee's counsel 809 questions on cross-examination, and was kept on the witness stand from February 9 (p. 523) until February 25 (p. 588), both inclusive, a period of seventeen days. The second witness, W. J. Smith, was sworn Monday, February 25 (p. 588), was asked 148 cross-questions, and was kept on the witness stand until Saturday, the 2d day of March, 11 o'clock at night, a period of six days (p. 599), when the time limited by law for the contestant to take testimony expired, and the notary closed the depositions. (Record, pp. 588–599.) By such wanton waste of time contestant was robbed of the opportunity of examining a large number of witnesses who he claims voted for him. And contestee is estopped from claiming that the evidence of these two witnesses is insufficient, having by his own acts prevented the taking of further evidence in this ward.

The minority say:

The majority of the committee decide a great and important question upon the assumption that the contestant might have proved his case if he had not been interfered with by the contestee; they decide upon what might have been in the record, not upon what is in it. With all due deference we submit that this is hardly in the line of legal procedure and even-handed justice.

(5) As to the Sixth Ward of Petersburg the report says:

The returns in this ward give Venable 352, Arnold 160, and Langston 139 votes, a plurality in favor of Venable over Langston of 213. In this ward the negroes have a large majority and the evidence shows that they were active and united supporters of contestant. The contestant placed upon the stand 283 witnesses, each of whom swears that he is a qualified and duly registered voter of the Sixth Ward, and that he voted for contestant on November 6, 1888. Each one was cross-examined by counsel for contestee. This dearly shows that the poll must be rejected and the parties left to other evidence than the falsified returns to establish their vote. The judges appointed in May for this ward were all political opponents of contestant, and all served.

Not a vote was challenged on either side during the day of election. Although the colored voters at this precinct stood to the white voters in the ratio of nearly three to one, Mr. Akers and his associates thought it fair to put up in front of the polls a barrier to separate the negroes from the whites in two lines, one upon the right hand and the other on the left hand, and then to receive the ballots from each side alternately, a white man's ballot and then a negro's ballot, and so on throughout the day, unless some colored man who wished to vote the white men's ticket could get permission to fall in in the line of whites. The plain consequence of enforcing such a rule is evidenced by the fact that out of 265 registered white voters all voted except 14, and out of 709 registered colored voters there were 308 (nearly half) who did not vote. (Aker's deposition, Record, 831 et seq.) Consequently when the polls were closed at sunset there stood in line at the door of the polling place 124 Republican voters with Langston ballots open in their hands anxious to vote and denied their right of suffrage.

After quoting testimony the majority continue:

A cross-examination commencing on February 14 and continuing until February 22, and consuming all the time allowed by law to contestant to take evidence in this ward, and containing 323 questions, confirms the above, and shows that 377 voters were seen by witness to deposit ballots for contestant. Their names were filled with the notary and are found on pages 280 and 281 of the record. This evidence is further corroborated by that of Richard Townes (p. 282) and J. York Harris, member of the common council and chairman of the ward (p. 291).

The only officer of election called to sustain the returns is Mr. Akers, one of the judges. He excuses the delay charged upon the officers by claiming difficulty in finding names of colored men. He says the man least familiar with the work was given charge of colored registration book; why this particular man he does not say. He is unable to find on the book more than two colored men in the ward of the same name, but swears that because of the similarity of their names it is more difficult to find colored than white voters.

It is attempted by the testimony of the witness Akers to contradict and break down the facts established by seven witnesses called by contestant, who were present at the polls and whom he disputes in detail, and at least 213 individual voters in excess of those returned for Langston, each of whom swears he voted for Langston.

Coming to this poll with 141 plurality, contestant's count must be increased by the plurality returned against him, which is equivalent to throwing out the poll. This adds to his total:

Vote brought forward	141
Plurality in Sixth Ward returned for Venable	213
Add to this vote proved for Langston	377
Makes a total plurality for Langston of	731

Besides the votes cast, 124 colored men were by the delay of the officers prevented from casting their ballots.

The majority also say:

It appears by the record (p. 191) that the contestant gave notice that on the 31st day of January, 1889, he would commence to take the depositions of 149 witnesses in addition to the 283 above referred to as having been called and having sworn that they voted for him, whose name were given, mostly negroes, who were expected to testify that they were qualified voters, and that they cast their ballots for John M. Langston. The first of these witnesses, called and sworn January 31 at 12 o'clock m., was F. N. Robinson (p. 192). His direct examination was completed by eight questions. The cross examination began the same day, January 31 (p. 197), and was prolonged until late in the day of the 5th of February (p. 223)—six days—by the asking of 316 questions, nine-tenths of which were useless, irrelevant, and frivolous, and intended without disguise or motive only to consume time.

And then occurred an outrage without a parallel in the history of election cases. Just as the witness answered the three hundred and sixteenth cross-question (p. 223) he was arrested and taken into custody by a deputy United States marshal by virtue of a warrant or capias falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause sued out against him by two persons, attorneys-at-law, who had, as counsel for the contestee, appeared and participated in said cross-examination, upon their complaint on oath that the witness refused to testify in this case.

An examination of the record shows the absolute falsity of this charge. The witness maintained under the most provoking and insulting cross-examination remarkable self-possession and dignified courtesy, and the only explanation of this outrageous conduct on the part of contestee's counsel must be that they hoped by their perjury to intimidate other witnesses from taking the stand to expose the frauds by which their client obtained the certificate of election.

Having themselves stopped the cross-examination by the arrest of the witness they impudently objected to the consideration of his testimony for the reason that they had not had the opportunity to cross-examine him, and for the further reason that his deposition was not signed.

The majority did not, however, count the votes which were not deposited. After quoting evidence, they say:

It appears from the above that by the intended delay 124 voters were prevented from casting their ballots, and that in all human probability 121 of them would have voted for contestant and 3 for Mr. Arnold. The committee has not counted these votes for contestant, distinguishing between this case and the case of Waddill v. Wise, decided at this session of Congress, where a somewhat similar state of affairs was presented in certain wards of the city of Richmond. But in Waddill v. Wise each voter counted for contestant by the committee had been called as a witness by contestant, and had sworn to his right to vote, and that he would have voted for contestant had he been permitted to cast his ballot. This supplemental proof was not furnished in this case.

The committee is, however, of the opinion that if these 124 votes equaled or exceeded the plurality returned for the contestee, so that the legality of the election depended upon them, it would invalidate his election with no further proof and make a new election necessary, and to that extent the committee agrees with the reasoning of the report of the minority in Waddill v. Wise.

Taking this view of the case, the 124 voters prevented from casting their ballots must be considered for the purpose of unseating the contestee only, but can not be considered in favor of contestant's right to his seat. The contestee's lack of a plurality would then be the plurality found for contestant, viz, 731 plus 124 equals 855.

The minority dissent entirely from the proposition of the majority as to the rejection of the returns, holding the evidence faulty in character and insufficient in law.

(6) The majority discuss the question of what votes to count in proceedings aliunde when a poll has been rejected. Their approved plan, which they state first, is to allow only the votes proven. A second plan, by which sitting Member would be allowed the votes not accounted for, did not meet approval:

> The committee adheres to the first of the above statements as being the legal method of ascertaining the true vote, and uses the latter illustrations simply for the purpose of demonstrating that in any view of the case the contestant is elected and entitled to his seat. It is evident that giving to contestee the vote not accounted for would be a direct encouragement to election frauds, as it would give him the benefit of every fraudulent vote which his friends had made it impossible for the opposition to expose, even after the proof clearly established fraud to such an extent as to destroy absolutely the integrity of the official returns. In no case has such a rule been adopted.

The majority, in accordance with their reasoning, found a plurality of 731 for contestant, and recommended these resolutions:

> Resolved, That E. C. Venable was not elected a Representative of the Fifty-first Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Virginia, and is not entitled to a seat therein.
> Resolved, That John M. Langston was elected a Representative of Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Virginia, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The minority considered that sitting Member had at least 183 votes more than contestant, and recommended:

> Resolved, That John M. Langston was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Virginia, and is not entitled to a seat therein.
> Resolved, That Edward C. Venable was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Virginia, and is entitled to retain the seat he holds.

The report was called up September 9, but dilatory proceedings on the part of the majority delayed the decision until September 23. It was debated on September 17,[1] On September 19[2] the first resolution of the minority was rejected, ayes 9, noes 159, and then the second resolution was also rejected, ayes 4, noes 155.

On September 23[3] the first resolution reported by the majority was agreed to, yeas 151, nays 1, the Speaker noting the presence of a quorum.

The second resolution was then agreed to without division, the yeas and nays being refused.

So the House seated the contestant.

1034. The South Carolina election case of Miller v. Elliott in the Fifty-first Congress.

Instance wherein the general outlines and population of a district were considered as bearing on an election contest.

A shifting of numerous ballot boxes, done to deceive the voter, was held to be unlawful, although not forbidden by law.

Ballots placed by the voter in the wrong box through deceptive acts of election officers were counted by the House.

The returns being rejected, the House counted for sitting Member, apparently somewhat as a matter of grace, the votes conceded to him by contestant's brief.

Returns being rejected and the boxes impeached, the vote was proven aliunde by calling the voters whose names appeared on the poll list.

Instance wherein the minority party in the course of obstruction left the Hall in a body.

On June 20, 1890,[1] Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of that committee in the South Carolina case of Miller v. Elliott.

Sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 1,355 over contestant. Contestant alleged fraud, irregularities, etc., as reasons for overturning this majority.

The majority report considers first the general outline of the district, and its population, which was largely colored, and therefore supposed to be of contestant's political party.

Then the registration law of the State is examined and pronounced unconstitutional by the report, which concludes, however:

> By means detailed by these witnesses, thousands of Republicans of the Seventh district were deprived of such certificates of registration as the managers would recognize. Hundreds of them went to the polls and presented their old certificates, only to find their names stricken from the books. Many of them were voters who had not changed their residence, even within the precinct of their residence. Some who, after much trouble, had secured transfer certificates, went to the polls and found that the description copied into the precinct registry did not agree with the description in their certificates, and so were unable to vote.
> We do not make any account of the number of these voters who failed to get certificates and who tendered their votes, because in this case it would not affect the result further than to increase contestant's majority; but we hold that all such persons, otherwise qualified, were legal voters.

The majority thus preface their examination of the first question on which they base a ruling as to votes:

> The election machinery of the State, while not so bad as its registration laws, is still of a character which can not well be overlooked. All the machinery of elections is in the hands of the Democratic party. The governor appoints commissioners of election for each county, without provision for minority representation, there being two sets of these commissioners, one for State and the other for Federal elections. These in turn appoint precinct managers. To these commissioners the returns of the precinct managers are returned, to be by them canvassed and certified to a State returning board, composed of certain State officers. Both the county and State returning boards have quasi-judicial powers, instead of being limited to the canvass and certification of the vote as cast.
> From seven to nine ballot boxes are required to hold an election; one for governor and lieutenant governor, one for other State officers, one for circuit solicitor, one for state senator, one for member of the State house of representatives, one for county officers, one for Representative in Congress, one for Presidential elector, and a ninth box if any special question is to be voted on at that election.
> These boxes are to be labeled according to the officers, the two Federal boxes to be presided over by one set of managers, and the six or seven State boxes by another set. Polls for Federal and State elections may be widely separated. All the tickets are to be of a specified description, and none others can be counted. The voter is required to deposit his own ticket, and find out for himself the right box, the managers on demand only being required to read the names on the boxes, but there is no requirement that they shall designate the boxes while pronouncing the names, or read the names in any particular order. No other person is permitted to speak to the voter while in the polling place. No tickets found in the wrong box are to be counted.

This, in fact, makes an educational test, in direct violation of the constitution of the State. Its practical operation will be seen when we come to consider the details of this case.

In the Seventh district, except in one county, all the supervisors of registration, all the commissioners of election, and all the precinct managers, were Democrats, the Republicans being denied representation on any of the boards. The only way to have watchfulness at the election, by persons not politically hostile to contestant, was to secure the appointment of United States supervisors, one of each party, who, under the present law, are required to serve without compensation.

The majority found from the testimony that the boxes were so shifted and ballots were so mixed thereby that contestant lost a thousand votes, because these votes, being found in the wrong boxes, were destroyed by the election managers. The report says:

It was gravely argued before the committee by an eminent lawyer that there was nothing wrong in this shifting of boxes, and that contestee was entitled to all the benefits accruing to him by reason of such action. An act may not expressly be forbidden by law, but if it is done with an unlawful purpose, and succeeds in accomplishing that purpose, the act is thereby made unlawful.

At this election, in a large number of precincts, this shifting of boxes was resorted to. The facts and the motive are proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

And after citing from the testimony descriptive of the way the voters were deceived the report continues:

This resulted in a net loss to contestant of over a thousand votes. This account excludes from consideration all votes in those precincts where the voters deposited the same kind of a ballot in each box, so as to make sure that one of them would be counted, and only takes into consideration those ballots which are shown by the number voting, the number of ballots in the box, or by corresponding electoral ballots in the wrong box, to have been placed in the wrong box by mistake and against the intention of the voter.

In every instance but one the shifting of the boxes is shown. The purpose was unlawful, the result was the failure to have counted and the destruction of over 1,000 ballots cast for contestant by duly qualified voters.

The managers of election took no account of these ballots, immediately destroyed them under a claim that the law so directed (a claim not sustained by the statute), and as witnesses almost universally show a remarkable forgetfulness as to their number. The United States supervisors, present at all the polls when this destruction occurred, kept an account of the number, and by that means we are able to ascertain with reasonable certainty the whole number lost.

An enumeration of the precincts showed 1,049 votes lost to contestant in excess of what were lost to sitting Member by reason of voters mistaking the boxes. The report continues:

Making large allowance for any mistake in numbers, we add 1,000 to the returned vote for Miller, making his vote 8,003 after this addition and leaving Elliott's majority 355.

It will hardly be claimed by anyone that this unlawful attempt by the partisan friends of contestee, acting as managers of election, to disfranchise a thousand voters ought to be permitted to succeed in a contest. Both law and justice forbid.

"If the intention of the elector can be ascertained, it is not to be defeated merely because the inspector, through mistake or fraud, deposits his ballot in the wrong box; nor because the elector himself, by mistake without fraud, places it in the wrong box." (People v. Bates, 11 Mich., 368.)

Here the elector placed his ballot in the wrong box by mistake, the result of the unlawful and fraudulent acts of the managers of the election. It is no answer to say that the counting of such ballots is prohibited by statute (even admitting that the statute is a reasonable regulation, which, under the peculiar circumstances in South Carolina, we do not), when the mistaken deposit has resulted from the active deception of the managers. It is a crime at common law to enter into a conspiracy to commit any offense against the purity and fairness of a public election. (Paine on Elections, sec. 496, and authorities cited.)

The minority hold the law to be constitutional, and that the ballots were properly rejected.

The majority report next proceeds to the examination of eight precincts where proof was offered to show that there had been frauds in favor of sitting Member. As a result of this investigation the majority find for contestant a majority of 757 in the entire district, or 1,448 under strict rule as to proof aliunde.

In dealing with these frauds, which were generally in the nature of ballot-box stuffing, the majority rejected the returns and proceeded to proof aliunde. As an illustration of their method the following extracts from their report are cited:

As to Jonesboro precinct:

The validity of the count and return having been destroyed each party is left to prove his own vote, so far as he is able. Contestant proves by calling the voters (pp. 97–124) that 67 of them, whose names all appear on the poll list, voted for him. Under a strict rule of law the whole return would be rejected and 67 votes allowed to contestant on the proof. In his original brief filed with the committee contestant conceded to contestee 46 votes, the remainder of the 113 not proven to have voted for contestant, and for that reason, and because it is now only a question of the amount of contestant's majority, we state the vote as in this brief:

Elliott's vote by last statement	8,045
Deduct difference between vote as returned and as stated in brief	22
And we have for Elliott	8,023
Add 22 to Miller (8,183+22)	8,205
Miller's majority	182

Counting the vote according to the strict rule of law, under the evidence, would make Miller's majority 228.

Also as to Eastover precinct, where no returns were made and of which the vote was not included in the official returns:

One hundred and ninety-seven colored voters testify to having voted for Miller (pp. 478–570). Forty-two affidavits of other voters were filed with the committee to the same effect. These voters' names are all on the poll list kept by the supervisor, showing 385 votes cast, 298 by colored men, 11 of which were Democratic. Aside from the testimony of the supervisor, which shows painstaking care, there is positive testimony taken in due process of law of 197 voters who cast their ballots for Miller. As we have said, no return for this precinct ever reached the county board.

J. C. Eason (332), the Democratic supervisor, confirms Johnson as to the managers shifting the boxes, as to the whole number of votes cast, and as to Johnson's keeping a poll list, and as to his being present all the time and in a position to see each vote when deposited. He also says that the colored voters in this district largely preponderate, at least two to one, and that when the colored men vote they mostly vote the Republican ticket. He did not keep a tally when the vote was counted, did not keep a poll list, did not watch the tally nor notice the names on the tickets when they were being counted; in other words, did nothing that was required of him as a supervisor, but after the managers had made up their return he took the tally and made his return from that, without any knowledge whether it was right or wrong. According to his report the vote was:

Miller	87

The majority report concludes:

Other allegations are made and proof taken in regard to them, such as failing to hold election at large Republican precincts, etc., but we do not deem it necessary to make further comment on the record. The frauds, false returns, and ballot-box stuffing which we have detailed are so conclusively proven, and the true vote so well established in the various precincts noticed, that there is left no room to doubt that Thomas E. Miller was legally elected, and was, through the crimes of election managers in the seventh district of South Carolina, deprived of a certificate of election. We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That William Elliott was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina and is not entitled to retain a seat therein.

Resolved, That Thomas E. Miller was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina and is entitled to his seat as such Representative.

The minority views, presented by Mr. R. P. C. Wilson, of Missouri, discuss the evidence fully, and conclude:

We have considered all the cases in which the majority has made any change in the vote as returned and have given our views thereon, together with the testimony. We do not agree with the majority in their conclusion, but conceding, for the purpose of the argument, that they are correct in all respects excepting as to the 1,000 votes alleged to be found in the wrong box and given contestant, still the contestee would have a majority of 243.

We would therefore offer the following substitute for the resolutions of the majority:

Resolved, That Thomas E. Miller was not elected a Representative from the seventh district of South Carolina to the Fifty-first Congress.

Resolved, That William Elliott was duly elected and is entitled to retain his seat.

On September 23[1] the House, without debate, agreed to the resolutions proposed by the majority by a vote of ayes 157, noes 1.[2]

So contestant was seated.

1035. The Mississippi election case of Chalmers v. Morgan, in the Fifty-first Congress.

Although glaring frauds and intimidation have existed, yet conceded fairness in a portion of the district and the legal presumption in favor of other portions have saved the seat to contestee.

Where the examination so far as made showed fraud, but not sufficient to change the result, the House declined to presume fraud also as to other boxes which might change the result.

After an election case is reported on by the committee, the House is reluctant to recommit for further examination.

On June 20, 1890,[3] Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, presented the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Mississippi case of Chalmers v. Morgan.

Sitting Member had been returned by a plurality of 8,161 votes, which the report speaks of as "four times as great as his legal plurality." The report also says:

The Second Congressional district of Mississippi consists of nine counties, Benton, De Soto, Lafayette, Marshall, Panola, Tallahatchie, Tate, Tippah, and Union. No question is made as to the honesty of the election in the two last named, and no reason has been shown why the honest voters thereof should be disfranchised.

With respect to the other seven counties, there is a number of boxes as to which no testimony was taken, but it may safely be affirmed that in not one of these counties, taken as a whole, was the election an honest one. Fraud in various forms, including intimidation of voters, corrupt manipulation of registration, stuffing and stealing of ballot boxes, and illegal voting, finds ample illustration in all of them.

If we may judge from the evidence, this state of things is to be accounted for by the existence in that district of a different standard of morals from that which is generally accepted as the correct one by communities recognized as moral.

The report quotes evidence which it summarizes as follows:

Not to indulge in further comment on this subject, it will be manifest to any fair-minded man who will read the testimony in this case, that measures were resorted to in many places in the Second Congressional district of Mississippi at the election in question, to terrorize the colored voters and to keep them from the polls, and the record abounds in proof that many of the colored men were prevented by fear from attempting to exercise their right of suffrage. Nor is evidence wanting that this is a favorite method of long standing of "shutting down upon "the Republican voters of this district, which up until 1876, and prior to the inauguration of the "shotgun policy," was a Republican district by a large majority.

The claim that the military company at Hernando was organized to promote the peace is, of course, too transparent to fool even the most credulous. The possibility that such company, openly proclaimed to be constituted of the adherents of one political party only, and styling themselves "unterrified" and "determined," could exist under authority of, and be armed by, the State of Mississippi is a disgrace to that State.

Your committee find that there were other methods pursued in the Second Congressional district of Mississippi "to shut down" upon the Republican voters, which were in contravention of law. Among these were—

The constitution of partisan election boards having no members other than Democrats.

The appointment in many cases of parties on such boards to represent the Republicans who, by reason of ignorance and illiteracy, were not "competent and suitable men."

The unlawful removal of ballot boxes from the polling places and from the view of the United States supervisors.

The illegal erasure from the registration list of duly qualified and registered voters, and the refusal to permit them to vote.

The stealing of ballot boxes.

After elaborating more fully the irregularities and frauds, the report concludes:

Sufficient has been shown to make certain that the election methods of the Second Congressional district of Mississippi include such as, if continued, must prove destructive of popular government. Their existence calls loudly for relief by law, of such a kind as shall secure to every citizen, without distinction of race or color, his constitutional right of suffrage.

Notwithstanding these frauds, your committee are of opinion that upon the case as presented to them on the record, the proof does not sustain the contestant's claim to an election, nor does it prove that the contestee was not elected.

Applying to the evidence the well-recognized rules of law heretofore recognized by your committee, they have in all cases, where satisfied that the integrity of the returns had been successfully impeached, set aside the returns and recounted the vote in accordance with the evidence.

Pursuing this method, your committee find that the contestant was not elected.

In two counties of the nine constituting this Congressional district, in which counties there are 23 polling places, the election is conceded to have been fair and honest. In the remaining seven counties there are 97 polling places. The validity of the election is assailed at 55 of these, but not successfully, in the opinion of your committee, at to exceed 22 or 23.

In Benton County, for example, consisting of 11 polling places, only two are assailed, to wit, Michigan City and Lamar. No evidence has been offered which affects the legal presumption of honesty attaching to the 9 unassailed boxes. So, again, in Tallahatchie County there are 14 boxes, only two of which were assailed. This is sufficient to show that the evidence as to the assailed boxes can not affect those unassailed.

In the opinion of your committee, following the rules of law to which they have already given adherence, the conceded fairness of the election in Tippah and Union counties, and the legal presumption in favor of the unassailed boxes, must save to the sitting Member his seat, notwithstanding the fact that glaring and reprehensible frauds were committed in connection with his election.

Upon the case as presented, therefore, your committee feel themselves constrained to recommend the passage of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Second Congressional district of Mississippi, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That James B. Morgan was elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Second Congressional district of Mississippi, and is entitled to retain his seat therein.

Mr. L. C. Houk, of Tennessee, submitted his views in opposition to the conclusions of the majority, saying:

This statement shows that at 23 boxes out of 97 the committee find fraud enough to reduce the plurality returned for the contestee at least three-fourths, or, to put it in figures, from 8,161 to 2,040. So that by an examination of one-fourth of the boxes three-fourths of the returned plurality is wiped out.

I have examined 38 boxes, where I think the validity of the election is successfully assailed and which wipe out the total returned majority for the contestee, and give a majority to the contestant.

After quoting from the conclusions of the majority, Mr. Houk further says:

This contains two startling conclusions, from which I am compelled to dissent.

First. I can never agree that there can be any "legal presumption in favor of the unassailed boxes" in the seven counties, where the committee say: "It may be safely affirmed that in not one of these counties, taken as a whole, was the election an honest one."

Second. I can never agree that two little counties, casting only one-fifth of the vote, shall control seven other counties casting four-fifths of the vote. There were cast at this election 19,795 votes for these two candidates, and of these 3,520 were cast in the two counties of Tippah and Union 16,275 were cast in the other seven counties.

In these seven western counties, where the contest is made, the contestee was returned a plurality of 6,465. Take from this three-fourths of the returned plurality, to wit, 6,121, which the majority report says were fraudulently returned, and it leaves to the contestee in these seven counties a plurality of only 344, where he was returned 6,465. This practically wipes out those seven counties and gives them no voice in the election.

The minority would be willing right here to submit this case to any court in the country with a full assurance of obtaining a judgment on the facts on which there is a substantial agreement. There is substantial agreement that the contestee was returned as elected by a plurality of 6,465 votes in the seven western counties, which, in a fair election, are largely Republican; that at 23 boxes in these counties 6,121 of this plurality was found to be fraudulent; that this reduces the total returned plurality to 2,040; that in these seven counties "there is a number of boxes as to which no testimony was taken, but it may be safely affirmed that in not one of these counties, taken as a whole, was the election an honest one;" that at these unexamined boxes the returned plurality for the contestee is 2,266; that, if they be rejected, it leaves a plurality for the contestee of 226; that there was a general terrorizing of Republican voters in this district; that counsel for contestant stopped taking testimony at Hernando to avoid bloodshed; that his counsel at Oxford, on account of the great excitement there, did not deem it prudent to take testimony at that place; that the taking of testimony at Holly Springs was prevented by the refusal of the Democratic mayor to proceed, after he had agreed to take the testimony; that the contestant exhausted his time and took a large amount of testimony, but was delayed by dilatory cross examinations by counsel for contestee. On this statement of facts, on which there is a substantial agreement, we confidently ask the judgment of the House in favor of the contestant.

The principle upon which the majority report gives verity to the unexamined boxes is that the precinct is the unit and each must stand or fall by itself. While this is true in Pennsylvania, it is not true in Mississippi, where the proof shows a complete election machine.

The State board of election appoints the commissioners of each county. The commissioners can and do disfranchise voters at their will by erasing their names from the poll books without notice. The commissioners appoint the inspectors; the inspectors appoint the clerks. The clerks are the tools of the inspectors, the inspectors of the commissioners, and the commissioners of the State board, and each does the bidding of his master.

In conclusion, after examining the case minutely, Mr. Houk concludes:

From this it will be seen that if the unexamined boxes be rejected and the rejected voters outside of Lafayette County be counted for contestant, it will give him 606 plurality upon the count as admitted to be made by the majority report. If they be added to the count, as made by this report, it gives to the contestant 2,427 plurality by the count leaving out Tallahatchie County, and 2,644 if Charleston box, in Tallahatchie County, be counted according to the rule, so frequently held by this committee, of rejecting the vote when fraud is proved, and counting only the vote as proved by the ticket distributors to have been issued and voted. We have given our count in detail, and we append a tabulated recapitulation for easy reference, and we challenge anyone to show that in making it we have departed at any box from the rules laid down in Featherstone v. Cate, Threet v. Clarke, or McDuffy v. Turpin. The committee acted on these rules in all these cases, and we see no reason why we should depart from them in this case.

When the majority of the committee found fraud enough at 23 boxes to reduce the returned plurality 6,122 votes, can it be possible that a further examination would not have shown further fraud at the unexamined boxes sufficient to give contestant even a greater majority than is here counted for him?

For this House to declare the contestee legally elected, after all the fraud shown in this report and the first sixteen pages of the majority report, with which we agree, will be to uphold and maintain a state of things disgraceful to our civilization and to encourage its continuance and repetition so that it will grow with their growth and strengthen with their strength until it becomes embedded in the politics of that section, never to be eradicated except by revolution.

Therefore, in consideration of the premises, the minority recommended the following resolutions:

Resolved, That James B. Morgan was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the second Congressional district of Mississippi, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Second Congressional district of Mississippi, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The report was debated on August 18,[1] and after debate the question was first taken on a motion to recommit the case for further examination. This motion was disagreed to, yeas 31, nays 136.

Then the question recurred on the first minority resolution, which was disagreed to, ayes 11, noes 102, the yeas and nays being refused. The second minority resolution was then disagreed to, ayes 15, noes 115.

Then the resolutions proposed by the majority were agreed to without division.

1036. The West Virginia election case of McGinnis v. Alderson in the Fifty-first Congress.

Criticism of a governor who issued a certificate on a canvass omitting decisive county returns because of legal proceedings to secure a recount.

Opinion of the Elections Committee that prima facie right wrongfully conferred should not relieve returned Member of the burden of proof.

It is a dangerous step to disfranchise a precinct because elections officers have failed to take the required oath.

[1] Record, pp. 8758–8767; Journal, pp. 965, 966.

On July 23, 1890,[1] Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the West Virginia case of McGinnis v. Alderson.

Sitting Member had received his certificate from the governor of West Virginia, on the basis of a tabulation which left out the entire vote of Kanawha County. With that county left out, the plurality for sitting Member was 1,313 votes.

The reason for leaving out the returns of Kanawha County were set forth by the governor in an executive order:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, February 28, 1889.

The governor having received from the commissioners of the county courts of the several counties of the Third and Fourth Congressional districts of the State of West Virginia, excepting the county of Kanawha, certificates of the result of the vote cast at the election held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1888, for Representative in the Congress of the United States, and it being apparent, for the reasons hereinafter stated, that the returns from Kanawha County can not now be made before the beginning of the Congressional term on March 4, 1889, this day proceeded to ascertain and declare the result of said election in said Congressional districts.

The county commissioners declared the result of the election in Kanawha County December 15, 1888. The certificate was mailed in this city on the 17th of said month and received in this office late in the afternoon.

On the same day a writ of certiorari was awarded by the circuit court of Kanawha County on the petition of John D. Alderson, who claimed to be elected to said office, against the said commissioners, and against James H. McGinnis, who also claimed to be elected to said office. The order awarding the certiorari provided for a supersedeas to the judgment and decision of said commissioners upon the execution of bond, as required by statute. The bond was forthwith executed, and said judgment and decision suspended. A certified copy of the record in the certiorari proceedings shows that said commissioners, in declaring the result of the election in said county, excluded from the recount, had, under the statute, on the demand of said Alderson, a sufficient number of ballots in his favor to have secured his election to said office.

I have time and again personally urged counsel on both sides of this controversy to insist upon a prompt decision by the circuit court, in order that a final conclusion might be reached before the 4th of March next, the beginning of the Congressional term. I can see no reason why it should not have been done. The circuit court aforesaid on the 23d inst. entered judgment reversing the entire proceedings and finding of said commissioners, and remanding the cause. Upon inquiry, I find that no steps have yet been taken for the reassembling of said commissioners to ascertain the election result, and it is evident that such result can not now be ascertained before the beginning of the Congressional term.

Therefore I believe it to be my duty to certify an election on the returns now in this office.

E. W. WILSON.

By the governor:

HENRY S. WALKER,
Secretary of State.

The majority report says:

It thus appears affirmatively from the record before the committee that because of the legal proceedings referred to above the governor certified the "election on the returns now in this office" on the 28th of February, 1889, although the governor had ineffectually urged "both sides" to secure a prompt decision from the courts.

The fact that the contestee, Mr. Alderson, had attempted to supersede the returns by the legal proceedings gave him no right to have the certificate, based upon a count of the district omitting the most important county therein. The county of Kanawha cast a vote larger than the average of three of the other counties in the district. That county cast an undisputed majority of over 1,300 in favor of the contestant.

[1] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 2806; Rowell, p. 633.

A certificate of election showing upon its face that nearly 8,000 votes were wholly ignored in the count can have no binding force and effect in a contest of this character. It is true that it has been sufficient to entitle the contestee to sit in the House, to take part in its organization, and to perform all the duties of a Member of Congress, whether elected or not. But when his title is smiled in a direct proceeding by way of a contest we think that a certificate showing the above facts gives the contestee no superior standing over the contestant as to burden of proof. For the purposes of the contest a certificate which, on its face, shows that a large vote for the contestee was wholly ignored, and giving no data from which the true results could be ascertained, ought not to be considered as binding upon anybody

As the governor did not decide the result and issue the certificate upon the returns from the whole district, the first duty devolving upon the committee was to take the returns and make a statement of the same.

The committee then show that in the district outside of Kanawha County Alderson had a plurality of 1,313. In Kanawha County McGinnis had, by the first count, a majority of 1,329, and therefore had in the district a majority of 16. The correction of an error in the county of Boone would increase this to 25 votes.

The majority say:

If these returns remain unimpeached the tables are turned and the burden is cast upon the contestee to overcome the prima facie right which the returns give to the contestant.

To meet this question the contestee asserts that under the laws of West Virginia he was entitled to a recount of the ballots, and that upon such recount in Kanawha County this result was changed and that the contestee gained 12 votes and the contestant lost 20, making a change of 32 votes, which would give him a majority of 7 upon the basis above set out.

As to the recount the majority report says:

The law of West Virginia is as follows:

"They shall, upon the demand of any candidate voted for at such election, open and examine any one or more of the sealed packages of ballots and recount the same, but in such case they shall seal up the same again, along with the original envelope, in another envelope, and the clerk of the county court shall write his name across the place or places where it is sealed, and indorse on the outside: 'Ballots of the election held at ———, the district of ———, and county of ———,' etc."

The law also provides that the original packages shall be sealed up at the place of voting, as follows:

"When the said certificates are signed, the ballots shall be inclosed by the commissioners in an envelope, which they shall seal up, and write their names across the place or places where it is sealed, and indorse on the outside of the said envelope as follows: 'Ballots of the election held at ———, in the district of ———, and county of ———, the ——— day of ———,' etc."

In order to justify a recount it ought to appear that these requirements have been complied with, or clearly shown that the failure to comply therewith has resulted in no injury. We are constrained to find that in the present case there was not that care of the ballots contemplated by this statute, nor such care of the same as would justify us in overturning the count made at the time by the judges of the election.

The ballots of Alum Creek precinct were put in a paper package, and the package placed in a bag and carried to the court-house, where the bag was thrown up over a storm door at the clerk's office.

When the recount was commenced this package was found broken open, or else it had never been sealed.

In a conflict between the first and second count it is evident that the one or the other does not show the true result.

If every opportunity to change the ballots has been prevented, and if the law in relation to a recount has been complied with, the recount becomes entitled to the greater credit and should prevail. But if, on the other hand, the ballots have been so kept that they may be readily changed, our observation upon this committee would hardly justify us in indulging in the conclusion presumptive that no one had been found wicked enough to make the change.

The report points out that in other precincts there was evidence that the ballots had been tampered with, and concludes:

We think the recount should not be considered and that the examination of the case should therefore proceed upon the assumption that contestant was entitled to the certificate of election, and that he should be seated, and that he should retain his seat unless his plurality of 25 votes shall be overcome by the investigation of the alleged illegal votes cast for the contestant.

The majority also say as to Coalburg precinct, in Kanawha County:

At Coalburg precinct, contestant claims that the officers were not sworn. Section 8, chapter 3, of the code of West Virginia, provides as follows:

"The said oath shall appear properly certified on one of the poll books of every election, and in no case shall the vote taken at any place of voting be counted unless said oath so appears, or unless it be proved to the satisfaction of the commissioners of the county court, convened at the court-house as hereinafter required, that said oath was taken before said commissioners, canvassers, and clerks entered upon the discharge of the duties of their appointment."

Contestee claims that this law, which in terms is mandatory, should be held unconstitutional.

If the commissioners of the county court had counted this precinct it would be presumed that the proof of the oath was made to their satisfaction, as provided in the statute. (See Smith v. Jackson, 51 Cong.) It may well be doubted whether such a statute could be held to be other than merely directory in any event. As the general result arrived at would not be changed by excluding the Coalburg vote we refrain from directly passing upon the question.

Whilst it might be very proper to punish the officers in some way for violating a duty imposed by statute, it would be manifestly a dangerous thing to disfranchise a precinct because the officers of the law through accident, oversight, or design fail to take the prescribed oath of office.

Such a construction would place it in the power of the officers to have their return rejected at will if the majority should be contrary to their political preferences.

There is some evidence to show that a part of the officers were sworn and we do not feel willing to so construe this law as to disfranchise the voters of Coalburg, where Mr. Alderson had a majority of 20. The supreme court of the State has never passed upon the question.

The report then says:

Having thus reported our views upon the election and as to the right of the contestant to the seat upon the face of the returns, we will next review the question as to illegal voters challenged on both sides. This is a laborious and difficult task and we have endeavored to consider the evidence as to each particular vote.

The report proceeds to examine the alleged illegal votes, discussing at length questions of fact. As a result they find for contestant a majority of 30 votes, and report these resolutions:

Resolved, That John D. Alderson was not elected to the office of Representative in Congress for the Third Congressional district of West Virginia.

Resolved, That James R. McGinnis was duly elected as Representative in the Fifty-first Congress for the said district and is entitled to his seat as such Representative.

The minority views, presented by Mr. J. H. Outhwaite, of Ohio, contend that the governor properly omitted the Kanawha vote, that the recount was valid, and that sitting Member had a clear plurality of 174 votes.

The report in this case was not considered by the House.

1037. The Florida election case of Goodrich v. Bullock, in the Fifty-first Congress.

Voters complying with all other requirements of the law should not be disfranchised by the neglect of public officials to register them.

A small star placed on the ballot as the result of a conspiracy of the printer with election officers is not a distinguishing mark justifying its rejection.

A printer's dash between the names of candidates is not such a distinguishing mark as to justify rejection of a ballot.

Pencil marks made by election officers on ballots in pushing them into the box were held not to be distinguishing marks.

Very small specks on a ballot, perhaps ink mark, were held not to be a distinguishing mark.

On August 4, 1890,[1] Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Florida case of Goodrich v. Bullock.

Sitting Member had been returned by an official plurality of 3,195, which contestant attacked, alleging in general refusal to receive legal votes tendered, false counting, false returns, destruction of ballot boxes, and the commission of various other frauds by the election officers.

The report says:

Much of the evidence in this case is directed to the misconduct of supervisors of registration and of district registering officers. Other portions of the evidence are directed to the misinterpretation of the law by managers of election. The misconduct of registering officers consisted in unlawfully striking from the books large numbers of duly registered voters, in refusing or neglecting to restore the names ordered to be restored by county commissioners, in keeping their offices closed on days of registration, in unreasonably delaying applicants, in unlawfully requiring colored applicants to prove their places of residence by white witnesses known to the registering officers, in unlawfully refusing or neglecting to make transfers on due application, in furnishing unequal facilities for registration, as between their party friends and their party opponents, and in fraudulently registering persons not qualified.

Complaint is made, in some instances, against county commissioners for failing to meet to revise the work of the supervisors, and to order restored those names that had been unlawfully stricken from the books.

Managers of election unlawfully refused to receive the ballots of colored Republican voters who were duly registered, and whose names were on the registry books in the hands of the managers, because they did not present their registration certificates. They also refused to accept such certificates as proof of the right to vote of voters whose names had been unlawfully stricken from the rolls.

They also refused to accept the tendered votes of Republicans who were marked as having moved within the precinct in which they were registered. In many instances this removal had not, in fact, taken place, and when it had it did not disqualify the voter, under the law, from voting. While the law provides for issuing a new registration certificate to a voter who has changed his residence, either within the precinct or to another one, it does not require such a new certificate as a condition precedent to voting when the change of residence is within the precinct or voting district. On the contrary, it expressly provides that a new certificate shall be necessary if the change of residence is from one voting district to another, thus implying that it shall not be necessary if the change is not from one voting district to another. Inclusio unius, exclusio alterius.

(1) In examining the case the majority ruled on a number of questions of law:

The vote in Dade County was: Bullock 95, Goodrich 45. It is claimed by contestant that this whole vote should be rejected, because no registration was had in the county under the statute. It appears that no supervisor of registration was appointed in this county until after the election. This was not the fault of the voters, and we do not think they should be disfranchised because of the failure of the governor to commission a supervisor of registration, as required by law. The old registration was in existence, and the election was held under it in full compliance with the law, with the exception noted.

[1] First session Fifty-first Congress, House Report No. 2899; Rowell, p. 583.

The committee are clearly of opinion that voters complying with all other requirements of the law can not be disfranchised by the neglect of public officials to furnish them opportunity to register.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Levi Maish, of Pennsylvania, hold:

There was no charge of fraud in this county, and it appears that the vote returned was about the usual vote as cast in preceding elections. We concur with the majority that the vote as returned from this county should be counted.

(2) In one district of Orange County 31 ballots cast for contestant were not counted, "on the ground that there was a distinguishing mark upon them. On the lower right-hand corner of these ballots was a printed star (*), so small as not to attract attention. Careful voters, on examining their tickets, would scarcely notice it. The ballots were printed in a Democratic newspaper office, and the star was undoubtedly placed there for the purpose of deception and to secure the rejection of these ballots by the precinct inspectors. This was not such a distinguishing mark as, under the circumstances, authorized the inspectors to refuse to count these ballots."

The minority views concurred in this.

Also the majority say as to district No. 2, in Hamilton County:

One hundred and four votes cast for contestant and 2 for contestee were not counted on the ground that there was a printer's dash under the names of some of the candidates on the tickets. We do not think that this was such a distinguishing mark as authorized the rejection of these ballots. One Hundred and four votes should be added to contestant's vote and 2 to contestee's.

Also as to district No. 7 of this county:

Forty-eight votes for contestant were not counted because of a printer's dash (—) separating each name on the ticket. These votes should be counted. (See McCrary on Elections, 2d ed., see. 104.)

The minority say:

We also concur with the majority in holding that the 104 votes cast for contestant and the 2 votes cast for contestee in district No. 2, which were thrown out because there was a printer's dash under the names of some of the candidates on the tickets, should be counted. We do not believe that this was such a distinguishing mark as justified the rejection of these ballots.

The same remark may be made as to the 48 votes claimed for contestant in district No. 7.

In district No. 12, Duval County, the majority hold:

Twelve votes cast for contestant were illegally not counted, on the ground that they were marked. There were pencil marks on the tickets made by the judges pushing them into the box with a pencil.

The minority agree to this.

In district No. 21 the majority rule:

District No. 21.—Eight out of the 14 claimed legal voters who tendered their votes for contestant should be counted, and 9 votes for contestant not counted under pretense that they were marked should be counted for him. The rejection of these 9 ballots was on the ground that there was a printer's dash on the ticket in a place where no person was named for a particular office.

The minority concur in this.

As to district No. 8, also of Duval County, the majority hold:

Twelve of the 14 claimed legal voters were duly qualified, tendered their votes for contestant and were rejected, and 13 ballots for contestant were illegally rejected on the claim that they had some specks on them. One Democratic ticket was rejected in the same way. One witness testified that he could discover nothing on them, another that there appeared to be small ink spots. These tickets ought not to have been rejected.

A mandatory law providing that writing on a ballot should be in black ink; may colored ink be used by an honest voter who can obtain no other?

Discussion as to the counting of ballots cast at outside polls by voters fraudulently prevented from voting at the regular polls.

Discussion as to counting votes cast at an election adjourned by the officers, for fear of outrage, from the legal place to another.

As to evidence on which votes may be proven aliunde when the ballot box has been taken by armed force and witnesses are intimidated.

As to proving a vote aliunde by testimony of a United States inspector who distributed tickets and saw them voted.

(3) As to color of ink used in writing names on the ballot, the majority held:

In Fauntville precinct, Marion County, 83 ballots for contestant were thrown out on the ground that names on the ticket for justice of the peace and constable were scratched off and other names written on in red or purple ink. Persons desiring to vote for these officers applied at the only store in the place for ink and could only get the kind of ink used in scratching these tickets, and hence the use of the red or purple ink. The committee do not think that under the circumstances these voters should be disfranchised, notwithstanding the terms of the statute, as the marking was not done for any improper or unlawful purpose and the use of this ink was, in a manner, compulsory. The committee count the 83 votes for contestant. (See McCrary on Elections, secs. 400, 401, 404.)

The minority dissent from this.

We differ from the majority in holding that the 83 ballots for contestant at Fauntville precinct, thrown out because certain names were written in red ink, should be counted. It appears from the testimony that the inspectors were unanimous in the rejection of those ballots; that it was not known at the time of their rejection whether they had on them the names of the Democratic or Republican candidates, and they were rejected solely for the reason that they were written in red ink. Section 23 of the Florida election laws of 1887 provides as follows:

"The voting shall be by ballot, which ballot shall be plain white paper, clear and even cut, without ornaments, designation, mutilation, symbol, or mark of any kind whatever, except the name or names of the person or persons voted for and the office to which such person or persons are intended to be chosen, which name or names and office or officers shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, thereon in black ink or with black pencil, and such ballot shall be so folded as to conceal the name or names thereon, and so folded shall be deposited in a box to be constructed, kept, and disposed of as hereinafter provided, and no ballot of any other description found in any election box shall be counted."

(4) As to "side boxes" the majority say:

In Marion County large numbers of duly registered voters were unlawfully stricken from the registration lists by E. M. Gregg, supervisor of registration, in reckless disregard of the law, and, as your committee believe, with the deliberate and criminal purpose of depriving the Republican voters of the county of their rights.

After enumerating the numbers of those stricken from the registration lists, the majority continue:

These 466 rejected voters in Marion County had all been duly registered. Some 366 of the number had their names stricken from the registry rolls just previous to the election. The supervisor of registration refused to allow the Republican campaign committee to have a copy of the registration list, or to inspect the list. He also refused to restore names that he had stricken from the rolls, after having been ordered by the county commissioners to restore them. He closed his office on the day before election, and thus prevented a large number of applicants from obtaining transfer certificates. He refused to submit his registration books to the county commissioners, as the law required.

These 466 duly qualified voters appeared at their proper polling places and tendered their votes for contestant, which votes were rejected. The names of 100 of them were still on the registry lists, and yet the precinct inspectors rejected the votes, either saying that they could not find the name on the registry, or setting up some frivolous pretext for rejection. Voters duly registered were required, in violation of law, to present their registration certificates. Others, who presented registration certificates, were rejected because their names had been stricken from the registry. The illegal action of Supervisor Gregg can not be permitted to disfranchise these voters.

Most of the tickets in these various precincts were preserved in Republican side boxes, and the names of the various voters so disfranchised, with the pages of the record establishing their right to vote, and the tender of their ballots, will be found on pages 15 to 28 of contestant's brief.

These 466 rejected votes, added to the 83 votes not counted in Fauntville, make 549 votes to be added to contestant's vote in Marion County.

The minority say:

As to the "side boxes" referred to in the testimony of Monroe, Tidwell, and Robinson, we submit that they were used without any authority of law, and that the so-called returns made from them are entirely worthless for the purpose of setting aside the official returns made from the ballot boxes provided by law and by the sworn officers of the election. We call attention to the testimony of E. M. Gregg, supervisor of registration, as a complete refutation of the charges preferred against him, and as showing that he made no discrimination whatever between Republicans and Democrats in the discharge of his official duties.

In Columbia County ballots tendered by qualified voters who were duly registered were refused. In one precinct these rejected ballots were received and preserved by the county judge, and in another case by the United States inspector. The majority of the committee decided to count these ballots.

(5) At Cherry Lake district, in Madison County, the regularly appointed inspectors of election (all of sitting Member's party) appeared at the polling place but declined to hold an election, having in some way received warning of an intended raid on the ballot box. Thereupon the voters present proceeded to elect a board of inspectors. These inspectors refused to hold the election at the place, fearing danger, and so adjourned the election to a point three-quarters of a mile distant. The members of sitting Member's party refused to participate, although they had due notice of it. The majority say:

One hundred and thirty-one votes were cast for contestant, canvassed, and duly returned to the supervisor of elections for the county, but the canvassing board of the county refused to consider the return. It was the fault, first, of the Democratic election inspectors, and, second of the Democratic voters themselves, that the few Democratic votes there were in the precinct were not cast. The committee count for contestant the 131 votes cast for him in this precinct.

Whatever may be thought of the reasonableness of the apprehension of personal danger, which they evidently felt, and their failure to perform the duties required of them by law, we submit that the vote claimed for the contestant at this precinct can not properly be counted for him. There was no election held in this precinct. The persons who undertook to conduct an election had no authority whatever to open polls at a place different from that appointed by law, and the Democratic voters, well knowing that fact, declined to recognize or to participate at all in the so-called election. The provisions of law which fix the time or place of holding elections are to be construed as mandatory and not as merely directory. The reason for this is obvious. Every voter is presumed to know the law, and to be thereby informed as to the time when and the place where he may deposit his ballot; but if that time or place be changed without proper authority and due notice, no voter can be held as legally bound to take notice of the change. (See McCrary on American Law of Elections, sec. 114.)

(6) At Madison precinct, in Madison County, it appeared that an election was duly, held as provided by law, and 615 votes were cast. At the close of the polls, apparently with the connivance of the election officers, who were of sitting Member's party, the ballot box was forcibly taken away by armed men. No count was made and no return. It appeared that there was a side election, held at the same poll by members of sitting Member's party only, to take the sense of the party as to whom the governor should appoint county commissioner. A total of 210 votes were cast at this side election. The majority say:

Presumably all, or nearly all, of the Democrats voting in the precinct voted at this side box. There is evidence that some four did not. Inasmuch as the party friends of contestee destroyed the evidence of the result of the election at this precinct, and because of the disturbed condition in the county at the time this contest was pending, making it dangerous to attempt to take testimony in the county, the committee take the result at the side box and the other evidence in regard to the vote as the best evidence attainable as to the result at this precinct. Accordingly, they count 210 votes for contestee and 405 votes for contestant.

The minority say:

As to Madison district No. 1, the testimony shows that the ballot box and ballots were taken and carried away about 10 o'clock at night while the inspectors were in the act of canvassing the votes. No return whatever has been made from this district, and yet the contestant's attorney claims that of the 615 votes said to have been cast, 206 should be counted for contestee and 409 for contestant. The best evidence would of course be that of the voters themselves, but instead of producing that, an effort is made to show the Democratic vote by proving the number of votes cast for county commissioners at an informal election held on the same day. We submit that according to contestant's own testimony the vote given for the county commissioners can not be accepted as a fair test of the Democratic strength in that precinct, while the testimony of contestee shows that very little interest was felt by the Democrats in that matter, and that a great many of them would not vote because they regarded it as a farce.

At Hamburg district, also, there occurred a similar raid, of which the majority report says:

At this district an election was held in an orderly manner, but just before the closing of the polls an armed body of mounted men, variously estimated at from 44 to 90, rode down upon the polls and seized and carried away the ballot box. They were white men and friends of contestee. The evidence shows that 259 Republicans voted there that day. There is no evidence as to what the Democratic vote was. The committee accordingly count 259 for contestant.

(7) The majority also adopted a rule, as follows, in determining the votes cast at two polls:

Elaville district No. 2.—The returns from this district gave contestant only 29 votes. J. H. Stripling, United States supervisor, was refused admission to the polling place by the precinct inspectors, which refusal discredits the return. Being refused permission to act as United States supervisor, he took his place outside of the polling place, distributed Republican tickets, and kept account of the number voted. From his evidence it appears that 97 instead of 29 Republican votes were cast for contestant. No attempt is made to refute or discredit this testimony and the unlawful action of the inspectors of election leaves it as the only valid evidence of the vote. Counting the vote, however, as claimed in contestant's brief, which is the method most liberal to contestee, the committee add 68 to contestant's vote and deduct a like number from the vote of contestee.

Macedonia district.—In Macedonia district No. 11, 29 votes only are returned for contestant. The proof shows that he received at least 65 votes at this poll. The committee add 36 to contestant's vote and deduct a like number from that of contestee, following the liberal method of counting conceded in contestant's brief.

(8) Certain questions of fact were also discussed.

In accordance with their reasonings the majority found for contestant a majority of 337 votes in the district and recommended resolutions seating him.

The minority found a majority of 2,808 for sitting Member and recommended resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

This report was not considered by the House.

1039. The Mississippi election case of EIM v. Catchings in the Fifty-first Congress.

The Elections Committee held that wherever a United States inspector was prevented from performing his legal duties at the poll the return should be rejected.

Ex parte affidavits are not considered in an election case, although they would be decisive if admitted.

In a district shown to be permeated by fraud and intimidation the contestant must still show sufficient effects to change the result.

Should participation of returned Member in a scheme of intimidation relating to the election cause the seat to be vacated?

On February 25, 1891,[1] Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, submitted the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Mississippi case of Hill v. Catchings.

Sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 7,011.

After stating that the district was naturally Rebublican, the report goes on to say:

> The committee, however, are of opinion, from the evidence presented to them, that T. C. Catchings was elected by a majority of all the legal votes cast, but by a much less majority than was returned for him. He was popular with his party, was believed to be especially efficient in representing the interests of his district, and to be able to do more in the way of securing Government aid in protecting the lands of the district from the ravages of the Mississippi River than was his opponent. He was stronger than his party and was supported in some parts of the district by influential colored Republicans. In addition his party was well organized and more fully registered than the opposition.
> Mr. Hill was popular with the colored Republicans in most of the district, but failed to secure the active support of the white Republicans. In a portion of the district his adherents were not organized and in only a small portion of the whole district did he have that kind of effective organization which would enable his followers to poll anything like a full vote.
> In reporting that contestee was duly elected, as shown by the evidence, we by no means mean to be understood as saying that the election as a whole was free and fair. On the contrary, we are satisfied that preparation was made to commit fraud if necessary to secure the election of contestee and that in some instances the preparation ripened into action. By the statutes of Mississippi the election machinery of the State is primarily in the hands of the governor, lieutenant-governor, and secretary of state. Previous to each general election these State officers are required to appoint three commissioners of election for each county, not all of whom shall be of the same political party. These commissioners appoint the precinct inspectors, with a like limitation as to party affiliation.
> Such a statutory provision for allowing opposing parties to have representation on all election boards having charge of the conduct of elections is usually deemed necessary to secure honest results, and when fairly executed in letter and spirit may as a rule be relied on, at least so far as counting and returning the vote is involved. A general and willful disregard by the appointing power either of the letter or spirit of the law raises a strong presumption of an intent on the part of the appointing officers to afford opportunity for fraud. In this case it clearly appears that the State officers in appointing county commissioners intentionally disregarded the spirit of the law, and in some instances violated its letter. In like manner the county commissioners quite generally violated the letter and spirit of the law in appointing precinct inspectors, Republican committees were ignored, their wishes disregarded, and their recommendations rejected.

While the statute does not direct how these appointing bodies shall make selections, its spirit clearly requires that in selecting representatives of the different parties the wishes of those representing the party organization shall be considered, and that the appointees shall be men having the confidence of their political associates. The selection of men to represent a political party on an election board who habitually vote the opposite ticket, who are not trusted in their party, or who are notoriously incompetent, is not a compliance either with the letter or the spirit of the statute. We are glad to note some honorable exceptions to the general rule in this district, in the selection of precinct inspectors, and to commend the effect in producing confidence in the returns from such boards.

In a majority of the precincts, about which evidence was taken, we find that the precinct inspectors appointed to represent the Republicans were either Democrats in fact, or were incompetent and untrustworthy. While suspicion attaches to all such precincts, such suspicion is not sufficient to invalidate the return, in the absence of other evidence, but it does have the effect of requiring less evidence to overturn the prima facie correctness of the returns. In regard to a few of the precincts this evidence is not wanting, while in others there is an entire absence of evidence tending to impeach the validity of the returns. In some instances there is affirmative proof sustaining the correctness of the returns.

In several large Republican precincts no elections were held, and it is manifest that the neglect to hold elections was intentional and for the purpose of depriving contestant of the votes which he otherwise would have received. In one instance the poll books were carried off to prevent the holding of an election. While there is some conflict in the evidence, we are convinced that the whole matter was arranged at a Democratic meeting the night before the election.

In district No. 2, Sharkey County, Hill received 129 votes and Catchings 25. When the returns came in the vote was found to be reversed. All the inspectors of the election testify to the correct returns, and are at a loss to explain how the change took place. The error is conceded. The committee have no doubt that the change was intentionally made by some one connected with the election. In five or six instances United States supervisors were prevented from discharging their duties according to law, either by being refused admission to the polling place, or by being prevented from witnessing the count, or by the removal of the ballot box from their presence.

In every instance where a United States supervisor is prevented from discharging his duties, as provided by statute, the committee hold that such fact destroys the validity of the return and requires its rejection, leaving the parties to prove the vote by other competent evidence.

After allowing such correction of the vote as the evidence requires, and after rejecting all the returns which have been proved to be untrustworthy, and even conceding to contestant such majority as he might have received in the districts where no election was held, there is still left to contestee a good majority.

After quoting instructions issued by the chairman of the district committee in relation to treatment of Federal supervisors, the report goes on:

This was not only a direction to violate the United States statute, but was in other respects calculated to cause a breach of the peace and prevent an orderly election. Had this advice been generally followed the committee would reject all returns of elections held under such circumstances.

Ex parte affidavits were filed in the case by contestant, which, if considered by the committee, would materially change the result; but the committee find nothing in the record to justify the resort to this kind of proof, and reject all the affidavits as not being legitimately in the record.

After the election and pending the contest General Catchings, the contestee, wrote a letter to Chairman McNeily, in which occurs the following language:

"After his (Hill's) time is out we have so many days in which to take testimony, and will have to give him similar notice. I do not think it would hurt at all if one or two of them should disappear. It might have a very happy effect on Hill, his witnesses, and lawyers."

General Catchings filed the following written acknowledgment with the committee, submitting the above quotation from his letter:

"The following extract from a letter written to J. S. McNeily, chairman Congressional committee, Third Mississippi district, by Hon. T. C. Catchings, contestee, under date December 28,1888, is admitted as having been written and delivered to J. S. McNeily, chairman Democratic Congressional committee, Third Mississippi district, and is admitted in evidence in this case by agreement.

"T. C. CATCHINGS,
"JAMES HILL,
"PER DUDLEY & THOMAS,
"Attorneys for Contestant."

The language speaks for itself. It was a suggestion to hinder unlawfully the taking of testimony in the case. Had the advice been acted upon the committee would have had more difficulty in reaching the conclusion that contestee was elected. But so far as appears in the evidence the suggestions of the letter were not acted upon in any instance, and it is a reasonable conclusion that they were not approved by Chairman McNeily. Such suggestions, coming from a reputable source, but emphasize the truth of the charge that the public sentiment of the dominant race in this district is hostile to the exercise by the colored voter of the rights granted him by the Constitution, and looks with leniency upon crimes against the purity of the ballot box.

So the majority conclude that after making all legitimate deductions required by the evidence, sitting Member still had a majority of the votes, and they recommended resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, submitted the following minority views:

The report of the majority of the committee concedes that the district has a large Republican majority. The majority report further concedes that there were gross frauds, and that when these frauds are eliminated from the count the majority of the contestee would be greatly reduced. I will not recite these frauds fully, as they are for the purpose of this report sufficiently set out in the report of the majority.

It appears, however, that in selecting the officers to hold the election neither the letter nor spirit of the law was complied with, and the Republican party had no fair representation upon the election boards. In some precincts where there was a Republican majority no election was held. The returns showing a majority for Hill were fraudulently reversed, showing a like majority for the Democratic nominee. Federal supervisors were interfered with in the discharge of their duties. In short, there were frauds of various kinds, materially affecting the result, but the evidence does not show enough in detail to change the result and give a majority for the contestant.

Mr. Hill contended that the occurrence of certain political murders and outrages in other localities justified him in not incurring the danger of taking further testimony in his case, and that if the evidence had been fully taken his election would have been clearly shown. That his fears were not groundless is shown by well-known bloody occurrences which have startled the whole country. But I agree with the majority in their conclusion that the contestant has not introduced enough testimony to show that he did in fact receive a majority of the legal votes cast. This, however, leaves for discussion the question as to whether enough has been shown to require that the election should be held void.

I think that the law ought to be held as follows:

Where the friends of a successful candidate, without collusion or combination with such candidate engage in fraud, bribery, intimidation, or other violation of law to influence the election, and the number of votes affected thereby is insufficient to change the result, the election will not be invalidated thereby; but if such candidate takes part in such wrongs, or confederates with those engaged therein, and it does not appear that the election has been changed in its results thereby, the election should be held void, and a new election ordered.

The question as to the effect of connivance with or participation in such wrongful acts by a candidate is one in which the law ought to be clearly laid down and unhesitatingly enforced.

I concede that the preponderance of the authorities hold to the effect that such acts upon the part of the contestee will not render the election void unless it appears affirmatively that such unlawful acts changed the result. The effect of bribery in parliamentary elections has been settled by statute in Great Britain, and renders the election void although the votes affected were insufficient to change the result. The interests of good government and the importance of purity of elections require that the rule should be laid down and enforced against every candidate that he should not participate in or incite any violations of the laws under which the election is held.

Whilst a candidate should not be held accountable for the acts of his partisans, committed in the heat of a political campaign, yet he should be held to instigate or participate in such acts at his peril. He should understand that in case of his instigation of violations of the law or of his participation in such violation he shall not be permitted to hold his seat. A contestant should not be compelled to prove just how many votes were affected by such wrongful acts of the contestee in order to have the election declared void. The full effect of such wrongs may often be hard to prove. The sitting Member should have his skirts clear of all participation.

In order to give the seat to the contestant, it should be necessary to prove that the results were changed by the transactions in question, but to unseat the participant a less amount of proof should be sufficient.

A vigorous contest was made in this district, which was naturally a Republican stronghold. The contestant and the contestee took, an active interest and participated in the campaign pending the election. It is not probable that any widespread and obviously preconcerted violation of the election law, such as is shown, should have occurred against the wishes of the contestee.

But after the election, and while the contest was in progress, it appears that the contestee wrote the chairman of his party a letter in which appears the following language:

"After his (Hill's) time is out we have so many days in which to take testimony, and will have to give him similar notice. I do not think it would hurt at all if one or two of them should disappear. It might have a very happy effect on Hill, his witnesses, and lawyers."

In the light of the deplorable events which have occurred in some parts of Mississippi in connection with elections and election contests, it is unnecessary to discuss the full scope and meaning of this letter. The language is of contestee's own choosing and speaks for itself. General Catchings had a full opportunity to explain this letter before the committee, but wholly failed to avail himself of that opportunity. He argued his own case in person, and when the letter was read to the committee an opportunity was given him to contradict or explain, but he did not see fit to do so.

Does the fact of writing such a letter, under the circumstances, sufficiently connect the contestee with the various frauds described in the majority report? I think it does. Where the recipient of the benefits of such a fraud not only accepts its advantages, but attempts to suppress the testimony of the crime, such attempted suppression, or attempted suppression when unexplained and uncontradicted, ought to be regarded as sufficient to show the contestee's original connection with these various wrongs. The frauds are general and widespread, the party of the contestee were acting in concert, and a just suspicion will always attach to a leader where his followers are so generally guilty of offenses against fair elections. But when such acts are followed by active attempts at suppression of the evidence, such as appears in the letter to McNeily, the inference is irresistible. Taking the letter of the contestee into consideration, in the light of all the surrounding circumstances, the conclusion follows that the contestee is responsible in some degree for the acts of his party and partisans, as set out in the majority report.

The seat ought, therefore, to be declared vacant and an election stained with so much fraud and corruption ought to be set aside. I recommend the adoption of the following substitute for the resolution reported by the majority:

Resolved, That T. C. Catchings was not elected as Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Third Congressional district of Mississippi, and that the seat is hereby declared vacant.

This report was not considered by the House.

1040. The Mississippi election case of Kernaghan v. Hooker, in the Fifty-first Congress.

Although widespread frauds are shown in a district, yet contestant must show that they affect enough votes to change the result.

On February 25, 1891,[1] Mr. J. H. Rowell, of Illinois, submitted the report of the Committee on Elections in the Mississippi case of Kernaghan v. Hooker.

The report begins:

At the election held in the Seventh Congressional district of Mississippi on November 6, 1888, Henry Kernaghan and Charles E. Hooker were the Republican and Democratic candidates, respectively, for the office of Representative in Congress. According to the declared result of the election, Hooker received 8,491 majority.

In due time, and in accordance with law, Kernaghan filed his notice of contest, alleging, in substance, that the commissioners of election in the several counties of the district were not appointed, as provided by law, by the governor, lieutenant-governor, and secretary of state, but were, in fact, appointed by one D. P. Porter, deputy secretary of state and chairman of the Democratic executive committee of the Seventh Congressional district; that in making such appointments the recommendations of the Republican executive committees were ignored and boards were appointed either composed entirely of Democrats or with a Republican minority member who could be controlled by his Democratic associates; that in appointing precinct judges the county commissioners of election, in violation of law, either appointed boards composed entirely of Democrats or with one illiterate Republican; that in holding the election fraudulent registrations were made, false counting resorted to, ballot boxes stuffed, United States supervisors prevented from discharging their duty, violence and intimidation resorted to keep voters from the polls, and that other like frauds were prevalent, with the result of changing a majority for contestant into a minority.

Answer was duly filed by Hooker denying the charges, and testimony was taken by both parties upon the issues joined.

While the committee have reached the conclusion that upon consideration of the whole evidence, and restating the result so far as the evidence enables us to do so, contestee has remaining a majority of the votes cast, yet the facts developed in the evidence are such as to require more than a formal report.

After reviewing questions of fact as to irregularities in various counties, the report concludes:

Irregularities of a similar character took place in other precincts of this county. Precinct inspectors asked for by the Republican commissioner of elections to represent the Republicans on the election boards were refused, and taking into consideration all the evidence the committee are convinced that frauds sufficient to invalidate the returns were committed in the precincts noted and some others in this county, but, inasmuch as these frauds do not affect a sufficient number of votes to overcome the majority returned for contestee, the committee do not attempt to restate the vote in full, and determine what reductions ought to be made from contestee's returned majority.

Taken altogether the record discloses a deplorable condition of affairs in the Seventh Mississippi district, such as can neither be excused nor palliated. For the reason that the frauds developed in the evidence and described in this report are insufficient in amount to overcome all the majority returned for contestee, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Henry Kernaghan was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of Mississippi, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That Charles E. Hooker was elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of Mississippi, and is entitled to retain his seat therein.

This report was not acted on by the House.

Chapter XXXVII.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES 1892 TO 1894.

1041. The Pennsylvania election case of Craig v. Stewart in the Fifty-second Congress.

Where nonregistered voters were required to file affidavits on voting and these affidavits did not appear on file, the House rejected the votes.

As to the mandatory or directory nature of a law requiring nonregistered voters to file affidavits when they vote.

As to the duty of the House in an election case to follow the judgment of a State court rather than their own precedents.

Affidavits of nonregistered voters not being found in the depository specified by law, it was held that the burden of proof shifted to the party benefited by the votes.

On February 16, 1892,[2] Mr. Jason B. Brown, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority of that committee[3] on the contested election case of Craig v. Stewart, from Pennsylvania. The sitting Member was returned by a plurality of 162 votes, which the contestant attacked. The report says:

> The contestant has stated many reasons why he should be declared elected to the Fifty-second Congress, but the principal one and the only one the committee deems it necessary to report on is: That there were a large number of ballots cast at the election of November 4, 1890, for the contestee by persons whose names were not on the registry list, and who did not furnish the affidavits required by the laws of Pennsylvania to entitle them to vote. That a sufficient number of such ballots were cast to change the result of the election.

The response of the minority defines the single issue involved in the case:

> The minority concede that the contestant has shown a sufficient number of votes to have been cast by nonregistered persons for the contestee and counted for him by the election officers to overcome his plurality, but they strenuously deny that the contestant has proved that these persons failed to make and procure affidavits required of nonresident voters and they doubt whether he is entitled to be seated even if he has.

The constitution of the State defines the qualifications of voters; and the laws of the State prescribe a registration of voters as a prerequisite to the exercise of the franchise, with the additional provision that a person otherwise qualified to vote shall not be debarred by a failure to register if he conform to certain requirements thus set forth:

On the day of the election any person whose name shall not appear on the registry of voters, and who claims the right to vote at said election, shall produce at least one qualified voter of the district as a witness to the residence of the claimant in the district in which he claims to be a voter, for the period of at least two months immediately preceding said election, which witness shall be sworn or affirmed, and subscribe a written or partly written and partly printed affidavit to the facts stated by him, which affidavit shall define clearly where the residence is of the person so claiming to be a voter.

The person presenting himself to vote must also make out an affidavit setting forth his qualifications.

The law of Pennsylvania also provided, as related to the above requirements:

And no man shall be permitted to vote at the election on that day whose name is not on said list, unless he shall make proof of his right to vote as hereinafter required.

The majority of the committee say as to the above requirement:

The courts of Pennsylvania have ruled that a compliance with the law in this regard is absolutely indispensable. (58 Pa. St., 338; 59 Pa. St., 109; 1 Brewst., 103; 2 Stew., 239; 71 Pa. St., 302; 11 Phila., 631; 10 Phila., 213; 5 W. N. C., 9; 2 S. and R., 267; 1 Brewst., 102, 103; 135 Pa. St., 459.)

Under the act of January 30, 1874 (P. L., 31), it is the duty of the elector, whose name is not on the registry list, to produce the required affidavits at the time he offers his vote. Election officers can not waive such production. A vote received without such affidavit is illegal, and can not be made legal at a subsequent investigation in the courts. (McDonough's election, 105 P. S., 488; Lower Oxford contest, 2 C. C., 323; In re contested election, 42 L. 1., 304; Marks v. Park, 2 Leg. Rec., 62; Fowler v. Felthoff, Ibid, 403; Commonwealth v. Cornelius, 8 W. N. C., 215; In re contested election, 4 Kulp, 196.)

The contestant claims that a large number of votes were received at certain polling places from men whose names were not on the registry lists, and who failed to make affidavits and produce witnesses as required by law.

The law of Pennsylvania also had this requirement:

The said affidavits of all persons making such claims and the affidavits of the witnesses to their residence shall be preserved by the election board, and at the close of the election they shall be inclosed with the list of voters, tally list, and other papers required by law to be filed by the return judge with the prothonotary, and shall remain on file therewith in the prothonotary's office subject to examination as other election papers are.

The majority then continue:

On this point the committee is unanimous in the opinion that more than a sufficient number of votes from unregistered voters whose affidavits are not on file as required by law were cast for the contestee to change the result and give the seat in contest to the contestant. But a minority of the committee contend that there is no sufficient evidence in the record that the affidavits required of all the unregistered voters were not duly executed.

The evidence shows that when the papers filed by the return judge with the prothonotary were delivered up by him for use in this contest, the affidavits in question were not with them. The contestant offered no other or further evidence to show that they were not taken than this failure to find them on file in the office of the prothonotary. He contends that the absence from the prothonotary's office of a large number of such affidavits which were required to be there, especially when a large number were found there, is sufficient proof to raise the prima facie conclusion that they never were taken.

The majority of the committee agree in this view. We insist that the presumption is that if these affidavits had been executed they would have been found where the law provides they should be filed, and that on failure of the officer to produce them the burden of proof was cast on the contestee to show that they were in fact executed. He offered no evidence on this point, and by this failure of the contestee the prima facie case of the contestant becomes conclusive.

The minority consider two general propositions in opposition to the views of the majority.

(1) The first proposition is thus stated:

It has not been expressly decided in any case that has fallen under the observation of the minority that the failure of a nonregistered person to make an affidavit required by law as a prerequisite to voting renders his vote illegal after it had been cast and counted. The supreme courts of Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, however, have held that such was the effect where the nonregistered voters made and furnished affidavits which were defective in material particulars, and in so deciding they stated that laws requiring affidavits of nonregistered voters were mandatory rather than directory. It is a plain inference, however, that if in these cases there had been no affidavits whatever made by the nonregistered voters the holding would have been the same way. (See In re contested election of Martin McDonough, 105 Pa., p. 488; contested election of Owen Cusick, 136 Pa., p. 459; State on complaint of Doerflinger v. Helmantel, 21 Wis., p. 574; State ex rel. Bancroft v. Stumpf, 23 Wis., p. 630.)

The supreme court of Illinois, on the other hand, has twice held that a law of the kind referred to was simply directory, and that the vote of a nonregistered person, cast upon affidavits materially defective at an election where affidavits were by law required to be made by a nonregistered person before voting, was valid. (78 Ill., p. 170; 88 Ill., p. 498.)

In the case of Campbell v. Weaver, a contested election of the Forty-ninth Congress from one of the Congressional districts of the State of Iowa, reported at page 455, volume 7, of the House Contested-Election Cases, the contest turned on the construction of the election law of that State which required of all nonregistered persons the making of certain affidavits before they could vote. The persons whose right to vote was in controversy had made affidavits defective in very material particulars. The majority of the Elections Committee reported that the law should be held to be directory and not mandatory, and that the votes of such persons were legal and should be counted. The House adopted this report and retained Mr. Weaver in his seat.

In the contested election case of Curtin against Yocum, from a Congressional district of Pennsylvania in the Forty-ninth Congress, reported at page 416, volume 5, of the House Contested-Election Cases, the construction of the very election law of that State under which the election in the case now under consideration was held is discussed in the report of the minority of the Committee on Elections, and it was therein declared that the provision of the law requiring affidavits of nonregistered voters was purely directory. This report was adopted by the House.

In so much, however, as the report was clearly right upon other grounds it can not fairly be said that by adopting it and retaining Mr. Yocum in his seat the House necessarily held with the minority in their view that the provision of the law referred to was directory.

In the course of the debate, speakers sustaining the minority views combated [1] the theory that the House must follow the holdings of the State courts, and declared in favor of the authority of the House's own precedents, made in the performance of a constitutional duty. But in conclusion of this branch of the question, the minority say:

In view of the conflict in the authorities on this question, as hereinbefore pointed out, and in so much as there are weighty reasons in support of each view, which reasons will be found fully set forth in the decision of the courts and in the reports adopted by the House of Representatives, your minority feel that if the rule that the statutes requiring nonregistered voters to make affidavits before voting is to be held mandatory by this House, and the voter thereby cut off from the privilege of proving, after the election, that he possessed the constitutional qualifications of an elector at the time he cast his ballot, the House should require of all contestants proof of a clear and satisfactory character that the nonregistered electors really did not make and produce the necessary affidavits.

(2) The minority, proceeding to the next proposition, contend that the burden of establishing his contention rests upon the contestant at all stages of the case, and insist that he has not sufficiently proven that no affidavits were made and produced by the nonregistered voters. The minority say:

"When a person offering to vote is challenged at the polls no presumptions are indulged in favor of his right to vote. He is then and there called upon to furnish evidence of his qualifications as an elector. But when he has once voted unchallenged and his ballot has been deposited in the ballot box and counted and canvassed and a certificate of election issued upon it, quite a different rule prevails. Every reasonable intendment should then be indulged in his favor and his vote should not be rejected upon technical presumptions and because some degree of doubt may be thrown upon it. Particularly is this the case where a contestant upon whom rests the burden of proof and who asks that the vote shall be rejected refuses to make positive proof of the voter's disqualification, which it appears it is easily within his power to do if the voter, in point of fact, had not the right of suffrage.

The minority go on to cite authorities in support of this proposition, and then comment on the failure of the contestant to produce the testimony of the officers of election as to whether or not they allowed nonregistered persons to vote without making the affidavits. Party challengers at the polls, as well as citizens, would also be knowing to these facts.

The sufficiency of the evidence furnished by the prothonotary two months after election as to affidavits on file in his office is thus discussed by the minority:

Now, the minority submit whether the certificate of the prothonotary that certain affidavits appeared on record in his office, a public one to which all persons had access, on January 27, 1891, and the oral testimony of his deputy that these were all the affidavits on file in the office at that time, satisfactorily establishes the fact that they were all the affidavits originally filed by the return judge. But, assuming that it does, the minority earnestly insist that this fact simply rebuts the presumption of the regularity of the action of the return judge in the filing of all the affidavits of the nonregistered voters, and does not reach back, as claimed by the contestant, and prove either that the nonregistered voters did not actually make or that the officers of the election did not actually take the affidavits. The making of the affidavits by the voters was one thing, the action of the election officers in taking another, the delivering of the affidavits by the election officers to the return judge another, and the action of the return judge in filing them still another. The act of taking by the board and the act of filing by the return judge were separable and distinct acts. The taking of the affidavits may well have been done by the election officers, and yet the filing of them by the return judge may have been neglected. That the acts are separable and that the first may have been performed but the second neglected holds good whether the board and the return judge are considered as one official or as different officials. The affidavits may have been lost, mislaid, or deposited in the wrong place by the return judge. Indeed, this would be the legal inference on its being shown that he had not filed them. To infer this would be to put upon him no additional presumption of having failed to perform his duty than already attaches to him by the certificate of the prothonotary that the affidavits were not filed by him.

The contestee is not required to prove that this improper disposition of the affidavits was actually made by the return judge, for the reason that the contestant has the burden of proving that the affidavits were not taken, and his having merely shown that they were not filed in the prothonotary's office does not establish the fact that they were not taken, does not discharge the burden of proof resting upon him, but only rebuts the presumption that the judge complied with the laws by filing all the affidavits. In support of this position there is ample authority. The very point was discussed in the minority report in the Forty-ninth Congress in the contested-election case of Curtin v. Yocum, hereinbefore referred to. In this case there were three reports made; one by the majority, one by the minority, and one by certain members of the Elections Committee. The House adopted the report of the minority and retained Mr. Yocum in his seat.

The minority therefore insisted that the title of sitting Member to the seat should be confirmed.

The report was fully and ably debated in the House on February 25 and 26, 1892, and on the latter day the resolutions proposing the views of the minority were disagreed to, yeas 57, nays 152. Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to without division, and Mr. Craig appeared and took the oath.

1042. The Michigan election case of Belknap v. Richardson, in the Fifty-second Congress.

Instance wherein, after a delayed decision as to the prima facie right, the House itself fixed the time for instituting proceedings to contest.

Inmates of a Soldiers' Home do not gain a residence in a precinct from the mere fact that they are quartered in the Home.

Discussion as to the binding effect on the House of the decision of a State court as to a State law.

Examples of what were held to be distinguishing marks on an Australian ballot.

On September 9, 1893,[1] Mr. T. H. Paynter, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report recommending the adoption of the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas in the Fifth district of the State of Michigan two certificates of election were issued, one to Hon. George F. Richardson, after which, upon proceedings in the supreme court of the said State, a new canvass was ordered in certain portions of said district, upon which a new certificate was issued to Hon. Charles E. Belknap; and

Whereas each of said parties claimed to hold the proper certificate entitling him to a seat in the House; and

Whereas either party by commencing a contest would have been deemed to have waived his claim under his certificate; and

Whereas the prima facie legality and sufficiency of such certificates could not be lawfully or finally determined except by the action of this House; and

Whereas this House have decided that the said Hon. George F. Richardson's certificate entitles him prima facie to the said Seat;[2] and

Whereas by reason of the peculiarity of the said facts a contest could not be commenced in the usual form and in the usual time; and

Whereas said Hon. Charles E. Belknap desires to contest the right to said seat: Therefore be it

Resolved, That said Hon. Charles E. Belknap is authorized and empowered to file his notice of contest and institute proceedings to contest said election. That in making said contest the general statutes and the rules of contest of this House shall apply, the time fixed by the statutes being hereby extended and the right of contest being declared to have commenced at the date of the adoption of this report.

On the same day the resolution was agreed to by the House.

On February 27,1895,[3] Mr. Daniel N. Lockwood, of New York, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report on the merits of the above contest. The original returns from the precincts of each county gave a pluralty of 18 votes for the contestant, Mr. Belknap, at the election of 1892.

[2] This was decided August 8, 1893 (Journal, pp. 8–10). See also section 56 of Volume I of this work.

[3] Third session Fifty-third Congress. House Report No. 1946; Rowell's Digest, p. 494; Journal, p. 162.

The examination of this contest is divided into two branches:

1. The report shows that—

In the county of Kent the number of votes cast for Mr. Richardson was 12,779, and the number cast for Mr. Belknap was 12,392, showing a plurality of 387 in that county for Mr. Richardson by the original returns as canvassed by the local boards. But there was included in the original canvass, as shown by the record, 199 votes cast in the first precinct of the township of Grand Rapids by inmates of the Soldiers' Home who were not residents of that precinct and were not qualified electors under the laws and constitution of the State. Of these votes 152 were cast and counted for Mr. Belknap, and 41 were cast and counted for Mr. Richardson.

The supreme court of the State of Michigan has, since the election in 1892, passed upon the legality of the votes of inmates of the Soldiers' Home, and decided that those who were not legal residents of the precinct in which the Home is located at the time they were admitted to the Home can not gain a legal residence while quartered in the Home, and consequently were not legal voters.

The report, after quoting this decision at length, deducts the votes thus decided to be illegal, with result of destroying the plurality of 18 votes for contestant in the district, and giving a plurality of 93 votes to sitting Member.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. Henry F. Thomas, of Michigan, held to this view:

It is clearly the duty of this House to accept the soldiers' vote, if in its judgment they have a right to vote while domiciled at the Soldiers' Home.

The fact that three of the five judges decided against them is no reason why this House should follow their decision.

The Constitution says: "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members."

I might cite numerous precedents, but I will call attention to only one, that of Noyes v. Rockwell, from the Twenty-eighth district of New York, which was decided by the Fifty-second Congress. In this case Noyes asked the supreme court for a mandamus, which was granted, and after the vote was retabulated by the board of canvassers under the order of the court, Noyes had a majority of 16 votes in the district. But notwithstanding this, the House of Representatives of the Fifty-second Congress gave the seat to Rockwell.

There is no dispute as to whom these men in the Soldiers' Home voted for. It is admitted that they voted for Mr. Belknap; therefore, what a wonderful responsibility this House assumes in attempting to set aside the will of 42,000 voters in the Fifth Michigan district, by reason of a contention between five men, who differ as to the language of a statute regarding the place at which a man may exercise the right of suffrage. The Congress of the United States has no higher obligation resting upon it, or a more sacred duty to perform, than to see that the will of the majority is allowed to have its full course and operation in all public affairs, for by this are we assured of the safety of our institutions.

Mr. Thomas furthermore showed that since the decision of the court the constitution of Michigan had been amended so as to allow the inmates of the Soldiers' Home to vote in the precinct in which it is situated.

2. The second question is thus stated by the report of the committee:

The Michigan statute (Public Acts, No. 190) of the session of 1891, page 269, under which this election was held, provides for the introduction of the so-called "Australian" system of voting, and provides that any ballot which shall have any distinguishing mark or mutilation shall be void, and shall not be counted. A distinguishing mark may be defined as "any mark by which a ballot may be identified when it is counted, and by which parties making an agreement before voting can show by the ballot that they have carried out the agreement;" no such vote should have been counted by the inspectors, and the supreme court of the State, in a very recent decision, has so decided (see Attorney-General ex rel., Scott v. Glaser at the October term, 1894), reported in 61 N. W. Reporter, page 648.

The committee found 49 ballots in Kent County which had distinguishing marks and which had been improperly counted for contestant. The committee give an enumeration of these distinguishing marks, of which the following are samples:

One vote in the township of Solon was counted for Mr. Belknap with two crosses at the head of the Republican ticket, and two crosses at the upper left-hand comer on the face of the ballot.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the township of Plainfield marked with a double cross at the head of the Republican ticket and the letter "H" over Mr. Belknap's name in his space.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the township of Cascade marked regularly for the Republican ticket, with two crosses on the right-hand upper corner of the ballot.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the first precinct of the Second Ward of the city of Grand Rapids marked with a cross each side, and one below the voting square on the Republican ticket.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the third precinct of the Third Ward, Grand Rapids, having the words "This I vote for" written in the space containing the vignette on the Republican ticket.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the first precinct of the Eighth Ward marked regularly for the Republican ticket; the ballot being about three-fourths of an inch narrower than the regular ballot, a strip having been cut from the right-hand margin.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the second precinct, Fourth Ward, marked regularly for the Democratic ticket with a cross in the space in front of Mr. Belknap's name, Mr. Richardson's name not being erased, but having a line drawn under it.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the first precinct, Twelfth Ward, Hubbell's name being erased and the words "For Ben Harrison" written in.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the second precinct of the Twelfth Ward marked regularly for the Republican ticket with a diagonal line running through the voting space on the Democratic ticket, below which was written, "No good."

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the township of Oakfield with three crosses at the head of the Republican ticket.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the third precinct, Eleventh Ward, marked with voting stamp after the names "Hubbell, Aaron Clark, Swensburg, and Rich," and over the name "Diekma," and partially over and partly on the name "Wilson," with no other marks on the ballot.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the township of Vergennes not having the initials of the inspector.

One vote was counted for Mr. Belknap in the township of Caledonia marked at the head of the Republican ticket with a circle each side the voting square, having no other marks upon the ballot.

Deducting from contestant these 49 ballots, and crediting sitting Member with 8 ballots to which he was indisputably entitled in one precinct, the majority find a plurality of 150 for sitting Member in the district. Therefore they reported resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

No action was taken by the House on this report, sitting Member thereby retaining the seat.

1043. The Alabama election case of McDuffie v. Turpin, in the Fifty-second Congress.

The House did not permit the returns of election officers to be impeached by testimony of partisan workers who tallied the ballots cast.

Discussion as to the status of the ballots as evidence when the honesty of the election officers is impeached.

The returns being stolen after they were made out by the election officer, their contents was proven orally by one witness.

The evidence failing to establish as legal an election whence no returns were received, the House declined to take it into account.

On January 17, 1893,[1] Mr. Daniel N. Lockwood, of New York, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the majority[2] of the committee in the Alabama case of McDuffie v. Turpin. The state of the returns is described:

By the returns of such election as filed with the secretary of state of Alabama, Louis W. Turpin received 9,595 votes, John V. McDuffie received 4,931, and G. T. McCall received 3,899, the majority for Turpin over McDuffie being 4,664. The certificate of election was issued by the governor of the State to Louis W. Turpin.

The contestant claimed his election on the general ground that the election officers of the district, by what amounted to a fraudulent conspiracy, had failed to count and return the votes cast for him. The minority of the committee, sustaining the contention of the contestant, notice the previous history of the district, the census returns, and the circumstances attending this election, to show that the voters of the district were overwhelmingly colored; that these colored voters were Republicans and supporters of contestant, and that they despised McCall, the third candidate, who was alleged to have become a candidate in pursuance of a corrupt arrangement with the Democratic managers, in order that they might count for him enough of contestant's votes to leave a plurality to sitting Member. The minority further set forth that in pursuance of the conspiracy, the party supporting sitting Member manipulated the election machinery:

The entire machinery of election was in their hands. The board of county supervisors of each county, whose duty it was to appoint the inspectors of elections for the various election precincts therein, and to canvass the votes as returned therefrom, was composed of the sheriff, clerk, and probate judge of the county, and all of these were white Democrats.

In some few instances this board of county supervisors appointed all three of the local inspectors of election from their own party, contrary to the law of the State, which required one inspector to be of opposite politics to the other two. In a few other instances they appointed as the Republican inspectors colored men who were strongly under Democratic influence and who did not enjoy the confidence of the colored Republican voters of the precinct. But in a very great majority of instances they selected for the Republican inspectors ignorant colored Republicans who could neither read nor write and whose presence upon the election boards in nowise interfered with the perpetration of fraud upon the voters, for the reason that they were too dull and illiterate to detect or expose it. This course was pursued right in the face of the well-known fact that in every voting precinct of the district where such appointments were made were some colored Republicans of fair intelligence, who could read and write, and who were qualified to discharge the duties of inspectors.

That these incompetent Republicans were so appointed inspectors of election is not only proven by the uncontradicted testimony of credible witnesses, but is also shown by an inspection of the returns of the election inspectors set out in the record in this case. They show that the Republican inspectors were, with scarcely an exception, unable to write, and that they signed the certificate by making their marks.

The law of Alabama also provided for the appointment by the board of county supervisors of a returning officer in each precinct, whose duty it was to receive the ballot box containing the returns of the election from the inspectors of the precinct and convey it to the sheriff of the county, to be by him submitted to the board of county supervisors for canvass, and it also provided that the inspectors of election in each precinct should appoint two persons to act as clerks at the election.

In not a single instance in the entire district was a Republican appointed either returning officer or clerk of election, the white Democrats invariably being appointed to these places. In some precincts no United States supervisors appear to have been present at the election, while in others these officers were refused admittance, and in still others were, after being admitted, not allowed to see the ballots while they were being counted. Having thus obtained complete control of the entire machinery of election in the district, and having also procured the candidacy of McCall that they might rob the contestant of many of his votes by counting them for the former under the pretense that they had actually been cast for him, and with an ignorant and helpless population to operate upon, the Democratic managers deliberately and systematically went to work to consummate their scheme of electing contestee to Congress from the district against the wishes of the majority as expressed at the ballot box.

To thwart this alleged conspiracy the supporters of contestant arranged in each precinct of the district to have several of their number at the polling places to issue contestant's tickets to the voters and keep a list of those whom they saw vote these tickets. The persons who thus kept the lists were produced and swore to these facts, and produced and identified the lists, which were incorporated in the evidence. In only one precinct did the sitting Member offer evidence that any of the voters thus enrolled did not vote for contestant.

The minority went into the evidence, precinct by precinct, showing the working of the plan to get evidence. They also showed that in some precincts the election officers refused to open the polls, forcing the friends of contestant to organize an election themselves. that in some cases the returning officers failed or refused to make the returns, and that in other cases the returns were not canvassed as returned.

The majority members of the committee in debate denied the pertinency of considerations as to the past history of the district, and denied also that the colored voters belonged entirely or even to an overwhelming extent to contestant's party. In their report they assail the testimony:

About the only well-substantiated facts as appear in the case are the returns made to the boards of supervisors and their returns to the secretary of state. The contestant could not hope or expect to make a successful contest by declarations in notice of contest and secondary evidence for proof.

It is a well-established rule of law that the best evidence shall be produced if possible to produce the same. In this case it was within the power of the contestant to have produced from each of the precincts the ballot boxes with the ballots in each of the election precincts, with the exceptions herein before stated, and the ballots, together with a list of all the voters, could have been placed in evidence, as there is no proof of their loss or destruction, and if a fraudulent count of the ballots by the inspectors and a fraudulent return of the votes for the several candidates had been made the same would have fully and satisfactorily appeared by a recount and an examination of the ballots. The contestant in this case makes the grave charge that the inspectors made fraudulent return of the votes actually voted and put in the ballot boxes. To establish this charge he produced from the election precincts not the ballot boxes containing the ballots as voted and deposited in the box, all of which had to be and were preserved and were accessible to contestant, and which he admits were correct, but called witnesses who had been stationed at the several precincts who testified that on election day they were at the beat or precinct in dispute and distributed McDuffie ballots, and that witness kept or had kept a list of names of those voters to whom they passed out McDuffie ballots and that the persons receiving such ballots voted the same.

It would appear from the statute governing elections in Alabama, and from the evidence, that the witnesses who handed out the McDuffie ballots were at least from 30 to 100 feet from the ballot boxes. The majority of the witnesses were ignorant, and some of them could not read or write. The proposition sought to be established, and which must be established by the contestant in order that he should succeed in this contest, is that persons working in his interest, who kept a list or had a list kept of those to whom they gave ballots, that their return should be taken and counted as the correct return instead of the sworn statement of the inspectors, clerks, and the officers of the election districts. It would be an exceedingly dangerous precedent to permit the actual returns, as made by the inspectors and sworn officers of the election, to be disregarded and impeached by returns made out by irresponsible partisan workers at the polls.

The minority urge, on the other hand:

Contestee has argued in this case that the returns of the election officers are prima facie evidence of the result of the election, and are also the best evidence thereof. While this is doubtless true, it is also undoubtedly true that these returns may be and have been shown to be false in this case. Having been thus impeached by the evidence, they are no longer of any value either in law or fact. The contestee, however, insists that even if the integrity of the returns is thus overthrown, the best evidence of the number of the voters at the election, and of the way in which they voted, is the poll lists of the voters and the ballots which they cast. It is claimed that these poll lists and ballots are expressly required by the Alabama election laws to be preserved as evidence, and that they should either have been produced or proven to have been unattainable before evidence of the kind offered by contestant as to the number of votes cast for him could be received.

It is insisted that at least the voters should have been produced and should have testified in person as to how they voted. In other words, the contestee seeks to shelter himself behind the well-known rule of evidence that the best attainable evidence of a fact must always be produced, and that until this is shown to be unattainable secondary evidence of the fact is not admissible. In reply to this proposition we have to say that under the plenary powers conferred upon the House by the Federal Constitution to determine the election of its own Members it possesses the undoubted power to determine this contest in favor of contestant on any evidence which in its opinion establishes fraud in this election. Not only does the House possess this power, but in view of all the circumstances of this case every consideration of justice and right require that it should be exercised in contestant's favor, unfettered by this rule which the contestee invokes. But the contestant does not have. to rely upon this position. The rule of evidence invoked by contestee has been complied with.

The testimony which he has introduced in this case, and which is set forth herein, not only impeaches the returns of the inspectors of election, but it goes further. It impeaches the inspectors and returning officers themselves. It shows them to have been utterly unscrupulous and dishonest in conducting the election from beginning to end. It taints every step they took with fraud and chicanery. It attaches to the poll lists and ballots which passed through their disreputable hands and were intrusted to their disloyal custody, and impeaches the integrity of these as well as that of the returns. Having been subjected to such influences, it is very apparent that as instruments of evidence these poll lists and ballots are utterly without value or reliability in this case.

This being the case, their primary character as evidence is lost, and contestant's evidence is clearly admissible. It would be a remarkable requirement that contestant should produce the very records made by these election officers in order to show the names and number of the voters, or that he should produce the ballots which he might find in their possession long after the election to show for whom the electors voted, when he has clearly established the fact that these officers conducted the entire election with the grossest dishonesty, and practiced thereat all manner of fraud and cunning in order to prevent a fair election.

The majority ruled as follows on other questions:

(a) In three precincts the returns were properly made out, and, with the ballots, were sealed and delivered to the returning officer, but did not reach the board of supervisors, whose duty it was to canvass the returns. One of the returning officers alleged that the package given to him was stolen. In each precinct one witness, who was uncontradicted, testified as to the vote received by contestant, and this vote was allowed. In another precinct, under similar circumstances, the testimony of the witness was supplemented by a copy of the certificate of the election inspectors, and the vote was allowed.

(b) In Leaderville precinct the duly appointed inspectors failed to attend, and polls were opened by the organization of a new board of inspectors. Votes were cast and received, but no returns reached the board of supervisors when they met to make the canvass. Therefore the majority refused contestant's claim to votes., for the reason that the evidence failed to establish that a legal election was held.

The majority concluded, in accordance with the above reasoning, that the official returns should be modified by adding to sitting Member's vote 13 votes, to contestant's 684 votes, and to McCall's 1 vote. Thus the plurality would still remain with sitting Member, and resolutions confirming his title were reported.

The minority found from their examination that contestant had a plurality of at least 604 votes.

The report was debated in the House on February 28, and on that day the motion made on behalf of the minority to substitute resolutions seating contestant was decided in the negative, yeas 64, nays 190.

The resolutions of the majority were then agreed to without division, and sitting Member retained the seat.

1044. The Pennsylvania election case of Greevy v. Scull in the Fifty-second Congress.

Where ballots are numbered in connection with the voter's name, the ballots themselves are the best evidence, and the testimony of the voter should not be taken.

The ballots are among the papers of which the officer taking testimony in an election case may demand the production.

The State law requiring the voters to vote in the precinct in which they reside, the House insists on absolute and technical adherence thereto.

Voters who have performed fully their own duty as to registration are not to be disfranchised because of defects in the lists caused by establishment of new voting places.

Votes received before the election board was legally organized were rejected.

Although a sticker for one candidate left the name of the other exposed, the House considered the voter's intent evident and counted the sticker.

On January 19, 1893,[1] Mr. Charles T. O'Ferrall, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the Pennsylvania case of Greevy v. Scull. The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 524, which contestant sought to overcome, on grounds described in the report:

> In the notice of contest it was charged that a large number of illegal votes were cast for the contestee—illegal because the voters were not registered, or had not made the proof on the day of election, or had not paid a tax as required by the constitution and statute of Pennsylvania, or were nonresidents of the State, county, or election district, or had voted in boroughs, when they resided in townships, or had voted in wards of cities or townships, when they had not lived in the me the time prescribed by law. All of these allegations were denied in the answer of the contestee, and countercharges were made that many illegal votes were cast for the contestant, alleging the same grounds of illegality as those just recited.

The case involved the investigation of the illegality of over 1,300 votes, and the committee in this connection laid down the following rule:

> It is proper here to state that the contestant relied upon the testimony of the voters themselves to show for whom they cast their ballots. Upon an examination of the statutes of Pennsylvania it was found that the ballot of every voter is required to be numbered by the election officers, the number to correspond with the number opposite the voter's name on the poll list, and that all the ballots cast at an election are required to be preserved "to answer the call of any person or tribunal authorized to try the merits of such election."

It is a well-established principle that the ballot of a voter which has been safely preserved by some authorized custodian is the best evidence as to how or for whom he voted and must be produced, and that the testimony of the voter himself is secondary and inadmissible.

In this case, however, the language of the statute "to answer the call of any person or tribunal authorized to try the merits of such election "seems to have led the contestant to believe that he could not call for the ballots, and acting apparently upon this belief he introduced the voters themselves.

In the opinion of the committee the contestant would have found ample authority for the production of the ballots in sections 122 and 123 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. In section 123 full power is given the officer engaged in taking depositions in a contested election case in the House of Representatives "to require the production of papers," and if "any person refuse or neglect to produce and deliver up any paper or papers in his possession pertaining to the election," he is made liable to heavy penalties.

The ballots were papers pertaining to the election; they were numbered so that each one of them could be identified as the ballot cast by the particular voter whose vote was in controversy; they were the best evidence; they were mute witnesses, yet told their own story and were unimpeachable; they could not be bribed nor corrupted. In most instances, according to the testimony, they had been safely preserved and no corrupt fingers had handled them.

But while the committee adhere to the opinion that the evidence of the voters was inadmissible, and to the uniform current of decisions that where the ballots cast at an election are required to be so numbered as to enable them to be identified, and they have been safely preserved by some legal custodian, they must be produced as the best evidence, and the testimony of the voters is secondary and inadmissible, yet it has been considered proper to report the names of such voters who cast illegal votes, and who, as shown by their own testimony, voted for the contestee.

It is also proper, in this connection, to state that in the counties of Blair and Bedford the contestee resorted to the same character of proof as that to which reference has just been made, but in the counties of Cambria and Somerset he introduced the ballots, after first showing that they had been securely kept, except in certain instances which were disregarded by the committee and are not included in the illegal lists herein reported, but allowed to stand in the contestant's column.

Several other questions arose in the determination of this case as follows:

1. The constitution of Pennsylvania provided that a voter "shall have resided in the election district where he shall offer to vote at least two months immediately preceding the election." The evidence showed certain violations of this provision:

(a) In the township of Somerset the electors voted for many years at a precinct which, when the borough of Somerset was created, was taken into the borough, and became the borough precinct. No precinct was established for that part of the township left outside the borough, and at the election in question the township voters cast their ballots in the old precinct, as usual.

(b) At Elk Lick Township there was a precinct within the township, but on the day of election the owner of the house in which the elections had been held for some years refused to allow the polls to be opened in it, and the officers of the election crossed a narrow alley into the borough of Salisbury and there opened the polls and received the ballots of the township voters.

(c) In six townships in Bedford County the electors voted in neighboring boroughs, as had been done for many years, and because no voting places had been established in the townships.

In regard to these cases the committee conclude:

While the committee regard it as a hardship upon the electors in these different townships to reject their votes, yet the constitution and laws of Pennsylvania must be obeyed. The provision of the constitution of that State requiring, without qualification, the electors to vote in the districts in which they had resided for at least two months immediately preceding the election must be enforced. A mistaken idea of the law upon the part of the electors, however honest, or a neglect or refuel upon the part of the lower courts to establish voting places within the townships, can not render void the plain provisions of the constitution. The power to fix the qualifications of voters is vested in the State, subject only to the limitation contained in the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Each State fixes for itself these qualifications, and the United States must adopt and has uniformly adopted the State law upon the subject, and the House of Representatives should not in any case fail to act in conformity with it.

2. As to the voting of electors alleged to be unregistered, question arose from the following conditions: Prior to October 1, 1890, the township of Somerset was divided into two election districts, the northern end being designated as No. 1 and the southern as No. 2. On October 1, 1890, Lincoln Township was formed, and included all of district No. 2 and a small portion of district No. 1, and the old No. 2 voting place was made the precinct of the new township. The committee thus describe the resulting difficulties:

There was no new registration made or ordered for the new township, but the old registration of district No. 2, which embraced all the voters in the new township except about 20 who resided in that part of district No. I which was annexed to district No. 2 in the formation of Lincoln Township, was used at the polls, and the voters of the former district No. 2 and the annexed part as aforesaid voted.

In the opinion of the committee there can be no question as to the legality of all of these votes except, perhaps, those cast by voters who resided in the territory taken from district No. 1, about 20, as already stated. They had not in any manner changed their location; they still resided in the territory in which they were registered and cast their ballots at the identical place at which they had formerly voted.

All that had been done was to annex a wall strip of territory to the territory in which they lived, and change the name of district No. 2 to Lincoln Township. If there had been no change, there is no pretense they would not have been legal voters. The registration list had been made a very short time prior to the election as required by law, and the registering officer could with propriety have taken it and changed the caption of it from district No. 2 to Lincoln Township. Nothing was done, in our opinion, to change the legal status of these voters, nor to deprive them of the right to vote in said township in the territory in which they had resided at least the two months required by the constitution of their State. They were guilty of no wrong; no fault could be laid at their door; no negligence on their part could be charged; they had done all that they could do to qualify themselves to vote, and to hold that they could be deprived of their right of suffrage by an order of the court over which they had no control, on the eve of an election, and when they had no time for redress, is a doctrine to which the committee can not subscribe.

The intention of the legislatures in all of the States in providing for registration lists is to guard against fraudulent voting, to prevent colonizing, and men without fixed habitations from depositing their ballots wherever they may chance to be on an election day, and to require residence sufficiently long in a community that the voter may become known and regarded as a bona fide resident and not a mere floater or bird of passage. The registration list as used in the township of Lincoln was as effective in these respects and filled the purposes of the law as completely as if it had been used in district No. 2 before the township was formed.

As to the 20 voters in the annexed territory, it will be found that their names were on the registry list of district No. 1, and this list was at the polls in Lincoln Township on the day of election, and the committee think this was a substantial compliance with the law under all the surrounding circumstances; but, in any event, there is no evidence for whom they voted, and if their votes were illegal and affected the result they would, under the authorities, have to be deducted proportionately from both candidates, according to the entire vote returned for each.

The committee quote McCrary and Paine in support of this view, and say:

In the cases of these voters, they had registered in the districts wherein they lived at the time the registry lists for the November, 1990, election were made as required by law; they remained in the very territory sad at the very spots wherein and whereon they lived when these registry lists were prepared; they were guilty of no wrong and neglected no duty, impliedly or otherwise; they could not register again after the changes were made, as the time for registration had passed; they could not control the action of the court and were not responsible for it, and "it would seem a very unjust thing to deny them the right to vote."

In every instance the record shows that the registry lists of the original precincts or districts were at the polls, in the bands of the election officers, and the mere failure upon their part to perform the clerical work of transferring should not deprive the voters of the right to cast their ballots." We should look at the substance and not the formality."

The township of Fairhope and a portion of Altoona were in the same condition as Lincoln, and were considered with it by the committee.

3. As to votes received before the organization of the board, the committee concluded:

The committee also find that 29 votes were received and deposited in the First Ward of Tyrone, Blair County, before the election board was organized or complete as required by law. Twenty-six of these votes were cast for the contestee and should be deducted from the contestee's column, if the testimony of the voters themselves is received as proper evidence.

4. As to the force of the voter's intent they found:

In the first precinct of the First Ward of Altoona a ballot was counted for the contestee which had on it a paster bearing the name of the contestant, but leaving the name of the contestee exposed; it was a Republican ticket. The committee think that the placing of the sticker on the ballot indicated the intention of the voter to vote for the contestant, and that one vote should be deducted in the contestee and one added to the contestant.

The committee found that after the deductions had been made in accordance with the above reasoning, and adhering to the principle that the testimony of the elector as to how he voted should not be received when the ballots themselves were accessible, the sitting Member had a majority of 687 votes. Therefore the committee (no minority filing views in dissent) recommended resolutions confirming sitting Member's title to his seat.

This report was not acted on by the House, and so sitting Member remained in the seat.

1045. The South Carolina election case of Miller v. Elliott in the Fifty-second Congress.

Discussion as to the degree of variations permissible from size and style of printing of ballots prescribed by a mandatory law.

Use of the word "for" before the designation of the office condemned as a distinguishing mark on a ballot.

The size and impression of the type, permitting a ballot to be read on the back, was held to be a distinguishing mark.

Instance wherein a variation of one-sixteenth of an inch from the legal size contributed to condemnation of a ballot.

The color of a ballot is considered in determining as to distinguishing marks.

On February 25, 1893,[1] Mr. Thomas H. Paynter, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority[2] on the South Carolina case of Miller v. Elliott. The issues as to this case arose under the following provisions of the South Carolina law:

SEC. 115. The voting shall be by ballot, which ballot shall be of plain white paper of two and a half inches wide by five inches long, clear and even cut, without ornament, designation, mutilation, symbol, or mark of any kind whatsoever, except the name or names of the person or persons voted for, and the office to which such person or persons are intended to be chosen, which name or names and office or offices shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, thereon, in black ink; and such ballot shall be so folded as to conceal the name or names thereon, and so folded shall be deposited in a box to be constructed, kept, and disposed of as hereafter provided; and no ballot of any other description found in any election box shall be counted.

The contest arose over acts of South Carolina election officers, which are described fully in the minority views:

The boards of precinct managers, or local election officers, of which there were a large number in the district, were, in a great majority of instances, made up entirely of Democrats, and in the remaining instances the Republicans had only a minority representation. When the vote had been polled at the election, the precinct managers at Port Royal, in Beaufort County, and Muster House, in Berkeley County, rejected in the aggregate 324 ballots that had been cast for Miller, being all the ballots he had received at these precincts, and returned to the boards of county canvassers in all 46 votes for Elliott and 4 votes for Brayton, being the total votes polled for these candidates.

In no other precinct in the district were there any ballots rejected by the boards of precinct managers, but the entire vote as cast was certified by these local boards to the boards of county canvassers. The vote so certified showed Miller to have received 7,026 votes, Elliott 3,793 votes, and Brayton 1,413 votes in the district, and that Miller had therefore been elected to Congress over Elliott by a plurality of 3,233 votes. Every board of county canvassers in the district was Democratic, and Elliott appeared before each one of them either in person or by counsel, and moved that the entire vote cast for Mr. Miller in the county be thrown out and rejected on four grounds, to wit:

First, that his ballots were one-sixteenth of an inch shorter than required by the statute of the State; second, that the word "for "appeared on his ballots just preceding the word "Congress; "third, that the ballots were not printed on plain white paper as the statute directed, and, fourth, that the name of Thomas E. Miller was so printed upon the ballots as to be seen through their backs when folded.

The boards of county canvassers in the counties of Beaufort, Berkeley, Colleton, and Orangeburg sustained this motion of Elliott, rejected all of the ballots cast for Miller in these counties, and certified to the board of State canvassers simply the vote cast for Elliott and Brayton. The county canvassers in the counties of Georgetown, Williamsburg, Charleston, Richland, and Sumter, however, overruled Elliott's motion, refused to throw out the Miller ballots, and certified to the State board the vote as certified to them by the local election officers. The effect of the action of the boards of county canvasses in the fast-named counties in rejecting the Miller ballots was such that Elliott appeared to have been elected to Congress over him in the district by a plurality of 478 votes. From the decision of each of these county boards an appeal was taken to the board of State canvassers, Miller appealing from the action of the first-named boards and Elliott from the decision of those last named.

The board of State canvassers was composed of the attorney-general, the secretary of state, the treasurer of state, the comptroller of state, the adjutant and inspector-general of state, and the chairman of the committee on privileges and elections of the house of representatives of the State legislature, all of whom were Democrats. On the questions involved in the appeals these members of the State board divided evenly, the attorney-general being one of the members who voted in favor of counting the rejected Miller ballots. Thereupon, the board of State canvassers being unable to come to any conclusion in the matter on the application of Elliott and his friends, the supreme court of South Carolina issued a writ of mandamus against the members of the board commanding them to make out a statement of the vote as returned to them by the boards of county canvassers, and to certify it and the election of Elliott, and deliver the same to the secretary of state.

At the outset the majority of the committee assert that—

The evidence shows in the case that the contestant designed in the method of having his ballots printed to destroy the secrecy of the ballot; that his purpose was to procure the kind of material on which they were printed, and have the printing so executed that it could be told by himself and friends how an elector was voting, thus attempting to disregard utterly the wise purpose of the law, which was to enable an elector to vote as he desired, without intimidation and in secrecy. Contestant in 1890 gave his printer one of the ballots, the like of which was used by him in the election of 1888, and ordered his ballots printed like that one; that instead of having them printed on "plain white paper," he had them printed on "dirty white paper; "that he had the printing on the tickets spread out, and his name dropped a little lower down than on the ticket of 1888, for no purpose except the name Thomas E. Miller would not be so likely to be in the crease when the ticket was folded, thus enabling the name to be easier seen. In the language of his printer, he wanted "his name in bold black type which he selected himself."

The minority attempt to discredit the testimony attributing such a motive to contestant, and express the opinion that such a charge is unwarranted.

The majority upheld the action of the election officers on the ground that the law was mandatory:

It will be observed that the law prescribes—

The size of the ballot.

That it shall be of "plain white paper."

That it shall be clear and even cut.

It shall be without ornamentation, designation, mutilation, symbol, or mark of any kind whatsoever, except the name or names of the persons voted for and the office to which such person or persons are intended to be chosen.

The ballot can be either written or printed or partly written or partly printed in black ink.

The ballot shall be so folded as to conceal the name or names thereon and so folded shall be deposited in a box.

It provides further: "No ballot of any other description found in any election box shall be counted."

That the statute is mandatory there can be no question.

The object of the law was to so far as possible prevent bribery and intimidation of the voters; that for whom the elector voted should alone be his secret, thus preventing anyone from knowing or questioning him as to the ticket which he voted.

The purpose was to make the elector a freeman in the exercise of the election franchise.

The legislature intended that there should be uniformity in size, so that the ballots could not be distinguished by a difference in size. That "plain white paper" should be used, so that neither the voter, the candidate, their friends, nor the officers conducting the election could tell from the texture or tint of the paper for whom the elector voted.

So exact was the ballot to be that it was required to be "clear and even cut."

It was intended that no ornamentation, mark, etc., should be on the ballot as another safeguard against the knowledge of anyone as to how the elector voted.

As an additional precaution to secure secrecy the law requires the ballots shall be "printed or written in black ink."

After taking all these precautions, so as to secure secrecy in voting, the law requires that "the ballot shall be so folded as to conceal the name or names thereon."

The law-making power knew that a statute of this kind was of no value without a penalty; that if the candidates for office, their friends, the electors, or the managers of elections could disregard the law and defeat its beneficent purposes its enactment was folly; therefore, notice was given to the electors that if you do not comply with the provisions of this law, by voting that kind of ballot which is prescribed by law, then the penalty shall be incurred, to wit: "No ballot of any other description found in any box shall be counted."

In support of their position the majority cite Nichols v. Board of Canvassers (129 N. Y.), Reynolds v. Snow (67 Cal., 497), Talcott v. Philbrick (59 Ann., 477), Oglesby v. Legman (58 Miss., 511), and Steel v. Calhoun (61 Miss., 563), and say:

If the legislature had merely prescribed the form of the ballot, without declaring those in any other form illegal or commanding their rejection, then it might be a question whether the statute was directory or mandatory. But here the law makes a ballot not in the prescribed form illegal, and declares it shall not be counted; there is no place for the question as to whether the statute is mandatory or directory. The ballot not in the prescribed form is illegal and must be rejected, because the law in terms declares that it shall not be counted.

No court in South Carolina, so far as the committee is aware, has passed upon this law.

The minority opposed the contention of the majority, and argued that the authorities cited had no exact bearing on the case in issue:

(a) As to the shortness of the ballots, the minority show that some, not all, of the rejected ballots varied from the required size by one-sixteenth of an inch in length, and that this was occasioned by accident in printing, and not from wrongful intent. The minority say:

Nor can it be claimed that this shortness in some of the ballots operated as a distinguishing mark, or that any living soul was deceived or otherwise injured thereby.

But it is claimed that the statute is mandatory in its terms and that, this being the case, there is no room for construction, and that any deviation from its requirements as to the length of the ballot, however occasioned or however trifling, renders the ballot void and necessitates its rejection. The minority submit that such a view as this is absurd. It abandons reason and throws common sense to the winds. The object of this statute is to give the elector the right to vote and to aid and protect him in the enjoyment of this right. The rule contended for by the contestee would invariably defeat this very object. There can not, in the very nature of things, ever be absolute perfection in conforming to the requirements of election statutes. Slight deviations here or there will necessarily occur.

The legislature which enacted this statute evidently did not intend to entrap the elector or to hold him responsible for defects so trivial that he could not reasonably observe them. It did not proceed upon the theory either that workmen were infallible or that printing machinery was perfect, nor intend to require that each voter should carry a rule with him to the polls in order to accertain by actual measurement whether his ticket varied the tithe of a hair in length or breadth from the legal requirement. There is ample scope in this case for the application to these ballots of the legal maxim, de minimis non curat lex. The minority also insist that the statute is question is in no wise exempt from the rule of construction laid down by the supreme court of one of the leading States of the Union that "all statutes tending to limit the citizen in the exercise of this right (the right of suffrage) should be liberally construed in his favor."

The minority further refer to the case of Campbell v. Morey, and to acts of South Carolina election officers in a late election.

(b) As to the use of the word "For" the minority say:

It is not pretended that there was any unlawful purpose in having the ballots printed in this way, nor that the word "For" constituted in any manner a distinguishing mark, for all of Mr. Miller's ballots were printed alike in this particular; nor is it claimed that anyone was deceived or injured by this word appearing on the ballots, or that the result of the election was in anywise affected by it; but it is contended here, as in the case of the shortness of the ballots, that the South Carolina statute is mandatory and requires that for this alleged defect the ballots shall be rejected. We have no desire to repeat in this connection what we have already said with respect to the construction of the statute. It is worthy of note that in only two precincts in the entire Congressional district were any of Miller's ballots rejected by the local officers of election.

The minority further discuss authorities bearing on this question.

(c) The minority reply to the third objection:

The minority assert that no ballot can be rejected, even under the terms of this mandatory statute, which is printed upon what is known and recognized as plain white paper, even though, owing to a difference in shade, it can be distinguished at the election from the ballots of other candidates printed on paper of the same general description.

These rejected ballots of Mr. Miller are unquestionably within the words "plain white paper" as employed in this statute, whether these words are construed in their usual and ordinary acceptation or as understood by expert printers and paper dealers. Four such experts, one of whom resided in Charleston, S. C., examined these very ballots and swore that they were of plain white paper, and that the paper on which they were printed was usually and commonly known by that designation among those of their profession. These witnesses were not contradicted. A number of persons, not experts, also testify in this case that these ballots are of plain white paper. As heretofore stated, every one of these ballots claimed to have been illegal are in evidence in this case and are now in the custody of the committee, and are easily accessible to the House. That they fully answer the requirements of the statute as to color is apparent at a glance.

(d) The minority do not admit the fact as alleged in the fourth objection, and also deny that the conclusions of the majority were in fact true:

It was evidently contemplated by those who framed this South Carolina statute that it might sometimes happen in the printing of tickets, because of the thinness of the paper, the amount of ink used, the force of the impression in printing, or some other cause, that the name of a candidate would show through the back of the ticket. It is also apparent that it was not the intention of the legislature to declare such a ballot illegal solely for this reason; nor does the statute, in point of fact, declare such a ballot void.

It was foreseen that a ballot so printed might still be folded and voted by the elector in such a manner as to conceal the name entirely from view. The statute was not designed to render such a ballot so voted illegal, but to protect it, and its language was so framed as to accomplish this purpose, for the statute provides "and such ballot shall be so folded as to conceal the name or names thereon, and so folded shall be deposited." Even if Miller's ballots were so printed, then, as to disclose his name through the back, still, if so folded and voted as to conceal the name from observation, the minority believe that such ballots would be legal.

The majority of the committee reported resolutions declaring contestant not elected, and confirming sitting Member's title to the seat. The minority insisted that contestant should be seated. The House did not act on the report, sitting Member of course retaining his seat.

1046. The Alabama election case of Whatley v. Cobb in the Fifty-third Congress.

The common-law rules of evidence which govern in the courts of law obtain in the trial of election cases in the House.

It is a rule of law that public officers are supposed to do their duty, and this presumption becomes conclusive if not rebutted.

On January 19, 1894,[1] Mr. Alfred A. Taylor, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report in the Alabama case of Whatley v. Cobb. The contestant made numerous charges of irregularities and fraud, but so far as the evidence went the only claim seemed to be that certain returns were not transmitted from the inspectors of election to the boards of county canvassers. Admitting the legality and regularity of the evidence on this point, a majority of 515 votes would still be left to sitting Member. But the committee do not admit the validity of this testimony, and say:

It is well established that the common-law rules of evidence which govern in the courts of law obtain in the trial of cases of contested elections in this House. Tested by these rules the whole of the evidence produced by the contestant, except only the official returns made by the secretary of state of Alabama to this House, is inadmissible. It is either secondary when the primary was obtainable, or mere hearsay. It is also incomplete for the attainment of the results sought by the contestant.

Without going into detailed argument on these points one instance will suffice. After proving, as he claims, that regular elections were held at certain precincts and the results properly and legally ascertained, and the official returns duly given to the returning officers, whose sworn duty it was to transmit them to the county returning officer, whose duty, in turn, was to deliver them to the county boards to be counted, the contestant made no effort to show that the returning officers, either for the precincts or the counties, failed to discharge their sworn duty. To this statement there is perhaps one exception.

The inference is plain. It is a rule of law that public officers are presumed to do their duty, and this presumption becomes conclusive if not rebutted. In this case it is conclusive.

It is needless to protract this report. There is nothing in the case fairly considered to disturb the officially ascertained majority in favor of the contestee.

In his brief the contestant supposes many things, and proceeds to argue on these suppositions, but in this course the committee must decline to follow him.

We see nothing in the record to justify the charges in the notice of contest or the strictures made by the contestant in his brief. The latter could well have been pretermitted. We are bound to presume that if legal evidence existed to sustain the charges made, it would have been produced, and as it has not been produced we presume it was not to be had, and that, therefore, the contestant suffered a fair defeat.

Therefore the committee unanimously recommended resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

On March 23 these resolutions were agreed to by the House without debate or division.

1047. The Missouri election case of O'Neill v. Joy in the Fifty-third Congress.

It being assumed that a State law required the rejection of ballots not properly indorsed or numbered by election officers, the House corrected the poll in accordance therewith.

Discussion as to whether a voter should be disfranchised for failure of election officers to obey a law requiring indorsement and numbering of the ballot.

On January 19, 1894,[1] Mr. Josiah Patterson, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of a majority of the committee in the Missouri case of O'Neill v. Joy. The contestant claimed the seat on the ground that he received a majority of the legal votes.

The majority consider only one aspect of the case, which they consider decisive. Preliminarily they give this description of the essential features of the Australian ballot law of Missouri:

When a citizen presents himself as a voter and asks for a ballot, the judges can see at a glance whether he appears on the registration list, and if so the distributing judges take one ballot, and after writing their respective signatures or initials on the back of the ballot, they deliver it to the voter. The voter then retires to a booth where, unmolested and unobserved, he prepares his ballot to suit himself.

[1] Second session Fifty-third Congress, House Report No. 268; Rowell's Digest, p. 497; Journal, pp. 304, 305; Record, pp. 3420–3424.

If by accident or carelessness he so mutilates his ballot as to render it useless he can return it to the distributing judges and receive another, indorsed in like manner. In this way the distributing judges are required to keep track of every ballot.

When the voter has prepared his ballot and folded the same, he is prepared to vote, and it is offered by him to two other judges who also belong to opposing political parties, called the receiving judges. The ballot is by them examined to see if it is indorsed by the signatures or the initials of the distributing judges. It is proper to observe in this connection that the requirement of the law is that both judges shall write their signatures or initials on the ballot, otherwise one of the judges might collude with fraudulent voters. The requirement is that judges opposed to each other politically shall concur in issuing the ballot.

If the ballot is legally indorsed by the distributing judges, it is received by the receiving judges, who are required to call out in an audible voice the name of the voter. Then the receiving judges indorse on the back of the ballot the voting number, or the number of the ballot in the order in which it is offered, this being the only writing which the law permits them to indorse on the ballot; and at the same time the voting number is entered on the registration list opposite the name of the voter with the word "voted." Then the receiving judges, or one of them. call out the voting number in a voice sufficiently loud to be heard by the bystanders and the ballot is placed in the box.

The majority thus state and apply the law in regard to deviations from the prescribed method of voting:

In section 4785, Revised Statutes, 1889, as amended by section 11 of the act of April 4, 1891, it is expressly provided that—

"Every ballot shall be numbered in the order in which it shall be received. No judge of election shall deposit any ballot upon which the names or initials of the judges as hereinbefore provided for does not appear."

In section 1005, Revised Statutes, 1889, it is provided that—

"No ballot not numbered as herein provided shall be counted."

In section 4671, Revised Statutes, 1889, chapter 60, it is further enacted—

"Any ballot not conforming to the provisions of this chapter shall be considered fraudulent and void."

Section 4780, Revised Statutes, 1889, chapter 60, as amended by section 8 of the act of April 4, 1891, reads as follows:

"On any day of election of public officers in any election district, each qualified elector shall be entitled to receive from the judges of election one ballot. It shall be the duty of such judges of election to deliver such ballot to the elector. Before delivering any ballot to the elector the two judges of election having charge of the ballots shall write their names or initials upon the back of the ballot with ink or indelible pencil, and no other writing shall be on the back of the ballot, except the number of the ballot."

Now, these provisions of the law of Missouri are plainly and emphatically mandatory. This is too clear for discussion, and we refrain from citing authorities or quoting decisions in support of a proposition so free from doubt. It may be said that to enforce these statutes according to their plain intent and purpose will work injustice to the voter, and that he ought not to be held responsible for the failure of the distributing judges to write their signatures or initials on his ballot, or the failure of the receiving judges to number it.

But it must be borne in mind that no man has the natural or inherent right to vote. The voter is an agency of the State, clothed by the State with the elective franchise, and the same power which prescribes who shall have the franchise can also prescribe the manner of its exercise and throw such safeguards around the ballot as will protect it from fraud and dishonesty. Again, the voter is presumed to know something of the law which secures to him the elective franchise and prescribes the conditions on which it is to be exercised. When he receives his ballot, he can plainly see whether it bears the names or initials of the distributing judges. The receiving judges are required to announce the number of his ballot in a voice sufficiently audible as to be heard by the bystanders.

As the voter is the nearest bystander it may well be presumed he will hear the announcement of his number, and as the numbering is required to be consecutive there is neither temptation or opportunity to write other than the proper number and announce it to the bystanders. The opportunity of the voter to inform himself and to guard against the loss of his ballot by complying with the law is ample. Especially is this true in view of the fact that at least one of the judges is his political associate and friend and is there to protect him. But aside from all this we have nothing to do with the severity or the hardships of the law. It is plainly mandatory, and precedent and sound public policy alike demand that it should be enforced and obeyed.

(See Ledbetter v. Hall, 62 Mo., 422; State ex rel. v. Cook, 41 Mo., 693; West v. Ross, 53 Mo., 350; Gumm v. Hubbard, 97 Mo., 311; McCrary on Elections, sec. 126.)

The majority found 607 ballots counted for sitting Member invalid because some were not numbered, or had no initials of the distributing judges, or had the initials of only one judge. They also found that 330 ballots counted for contestant should be rejected for the same reasons. As sitting Member had been returned by a majority of only 67, the effect of this was to show the election of contestant by a majority of 210.

There were other questions in this case which the majority briefly notice, but say:

However, it is not deemed necessary to go into an analysis of the evidence as to these matters, as it is conceded by all parties that if the ballots not numbered or initialed as required by law axe to be thrown out the contestant was duly elected

The minority contended that the provisions of law in section 1471, Revised Statutes, quoted above, providing that ballots not conforming to the law should be considered fraudulent and void, related to elections as they were before the passage of the new law of 1891, and say:

And where one system of law is enacted as a substitute for a preceding law the rule of construction is that the preceding law is repealed, although there may be no express declaration of that intention contained in the later act.

The minority further say:

Neither the act forming article 3, of chapter 60, of the revised statutes of the State of Missouri, nor the amendatory act of 1891, in any manner sanctions the construction that the ballot of the elector shall be rejected for the omission to place the voting number upon it. Nor does it forbid the ballot without this number, as it probably would have done in terms if that had been intended, to be placed in the ballot box. And it was to this ballot alone that the language of the statutes of 1889 and 1891 were expressly directed, and the preceding law had no possible reference to this ballot, for it was not then a ballot which could be used under the laws of the State of Missouri. This new system for the first time provided that the ballot should be indorsed with the names or initials of the two judges before its delivery to the voter. No such provision was contained in any form in the preceding law, and therefore the preceding law could not act upon this direction in any form whatever. It is by the law providing for the Australian ballot alone that the direction for the indorsement of the initials of the judges has been given, and they have been forbidden to deposit a ballot in the box not containing the or initials of the two judges.

The prohibition, it will be seen from the language of the section, is directed to the judges themselves, and not to the voter. When he passed back his ballot to the judges as the ballot he intended to vote, all had been done by him which the statute required from him to have his vote deposited and counted. The law does not attempt to deprive him of this right, as it probably could not under the language of the constitution of the State, which defines the qualifications of the voter, and then declares that the person possessing these qualifications shall be entitled to vote. By no construction of this language can it be said that it was intended by the legislature that the disability should be imposed upon the voter, or that his vote when prepared by him to his own satisfaction, and returned to the judges, should be rejected because of any default on the part of the judges in complying with the language of the statute. Neither do these statutes declare that an unnumbered ballot shall not be deposited in the box.

Cases have frequently arisen where the validity or legality of the ballot has been brought in controversy, but no case has been discovered sanctioning the conclusion that the voter shall be deprived of his vote by the omission of the election officers to discharge a duty imposed upon them by law. It is only when a statute has declared the ballot to be void, or forbade it to be counted, that the courts have felt obliged to sanction its exclusion. As the preceding law did not apply to these ballots, but applied solely and wholly to the ballot furnished by the voter himself, it could not consistently be invoked to deprive the voter of his vote, on account of the omission on the part of the judges to initial or number the ballot. It has been assumed by the majority that section 4671 of that law justified the exclusion of the ballots indorsed with but one initial. But it will be seen by a reference to that section, which has already been made, that it is restricted expressly to the ballots voted under the provisions of that law, and it contains no such flexibility of language as will permit it to be applied to the ballots voted under article 3 of chapter 60, and the law of 1891, amending and extending that article.

The minority further call attention to the fact that the evidence proves the ballots to have been honestly voted and received, and condemn the harsh construction of law which would thus unseat sitting Member.

This case was the occasion of prolonged dilatory proceedings, but on April 3, 1894, the House finally came to a vote on the resolution of the majority declaring sitting Member not elected, and it was agreed to, yeas 156, nays 24. The resolution seating contestant was next agreed to, yeas 155, nays 28.

1048. The North Carolina election case of Williams v. Settle in the Fifty-third Congress.

The House should be governed by the construction given to a State law by the supreme court of the State.

The burden is on the party objecting to the vote to show that the elector objected to for illegal registration was illegally registered and for whom he voted.

The registration and poll books are the primary evidence of registration and fact of voting, and when in existence should be produced.

As to proving the act of voting by the elector or by another as well as by the poll book.

The color of the voter should be sustained by other conclusive evidence in order to establish a presumption as to how he voted.

The fact that registration officers register the voter raises the presumption that the latter gave proper answers to questions necessary to the act.

On January 31, 1894,[1] Mr. Thomas H. Paynter, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Elections,[2] submitted a report in the case of Williams v. Settle, from North Carolina. The state of the vote is described:

The certified plurality of contestee, by the board of State canvassers, was 329. The precinct returns gave him a plurality of 623. The board of county canvassers, in the county of Granville, rejected the returns from Dement precinct which gave the contestee a plurality of 36; from Wilton precinct, which gave contestee a plurality of 107; from Buchannon, which gave contestee a plurality of 70; from Royster, which gave contestee a plurality of 8. In the county of Guilford the board of county canvassers rejected the returns from one precinct which gave contestee a plurality of 73. Adding these pluralities to that given contestee by the State board of canvassers it will be seen that contestee's plurality in the district is 623.

[2] The minority views were submitted by Mr. F. A. Woodard, of North Carolina.

Contestant attacked this plurality principally because of alleged illegal registration of many electors who voted for sitting Member, registration being a requirement of the State constitution. He also urged that the returns of certain precincts be rejected for the following reasons:

First. Certain judges or inspectors of election were not sworn.
Second. Registration books were not kept open thirty days.
Third. Some of the officers absented themselves from the polling place for a brief time during the election.
Fourth. Because parties other than the officers handled the ballots.
Fifth. The officers of election began to count some of the ballots before the polls closed.
Sixth. An inspector or judge of the election was candidate.

(a) As to the votes attacked because of alleged illegal registration. The law of North Carolina provided:

SEC. 2676. No registration shall be valid unless it specifies, as near as may be, the age, occupation, place of birth, and place of residence of the elector, as well as the township or county from whence the elector has removed, in the event of removal, and the full name by which the voter is known.

The majority in their report say:

Contestant seeks to overcome this plurality by showing that certain electors were not properly registered and not entitled to exercise the elective franchise. Certain electors were registered, giving name of State or country only as place of birth. Several hundred Republicans and several hundred Democrats were thus registered and voted. It is contended under the interpretation given to the North Carolina statute by the supreme court of that State, in Harris v. Scarborough (110 N. C.), by a divided court, that all persons who were thus registered were not entitled to vote. The effect of this opinion is to sustain the claim.

The committee believes that it was the duty of the registrar, when the elector presented himself for registration and was asked where he was born, and his answer was too indefinite by saying he was born in a State, to have asked him the further question as to the locality in the State where he was born. It was made the duty of the registrar under the statute to record his place of birth. To obtain the necessary information to make this record he should have propounded reasonable inquiries to elicit such responses as would have enabled him to discharge his duties properly. It may have been that the elector could not have been more definite as to the place of his birth. However, the highest court in the State has construed the statute, and the committee feels it should follow where that conclusion leads.

The minority dwell at greater length on this point:

That a State has a right to make registration a prerequisite to voting, and that an elector who does not comply with the requirements of the registry laws is not entitled to vote, is now too well settled to admit of discussion.

And it is equally well settled that in adjudicating any matter affecting the election of Members of this body it is the duty of this House to follow the law of the State from which a contest may come, in order to arrive at a proper determination of the controversy. Judge McCrary, in his learned treatise on the law of elections, second edition, page 277, says:

"The House of Representatives of the United States in construing a State law will follow the construction given it by the authorities of the State whose duty it is to construe and execute it. When a construction has been adopted and acted upon by the State authorities, the Federal Government should abide by and follow it."

The minority quote the cases of Wright v. Fuller, Holmes v. Wilson, Miller v. Elliott, and Grevy v. Scull in further support of this contention, and make the claim that the majority of the committee had in several instances during its examination of the case disregarded this principle. The principle announced by the majority as to the duty of registrars was from the opinion of a dissenting judge, and the majority are criticised for giving it a quasi indorsement:

The supreme court also held that if the registrar read the headings calculated to elicit the requisite answers, he certainly did all that the law required of him, and that the failure to enter upon the registration books such facts connected with his history as the statute requires must be considered due to the carelessness or inexcusable ignorance of the elector. But at the same time the court held that if the failure to register properly was due to the neglect or willful act of the registrar, then the voter should not be disfranchised. It is upon this point that the report of the majority of the committee fails to follow the supreme court. * * *

The act of the legislature on the subject of registration, which has governed us in considering this contest, is mandatory. Its intent and meaning have been clearly defined by the highest court in the State.

The majority of the committee, passing to another phase of the question, say:

The burden is on the contestant to show the illegal registration of the elector, that the elector voted, and that he voted for contestee before he can ask to have the vote excluded from the count. The facts should be shown by competent testimony. Unless the board of county commissioners made an order for new registration the statute legalized the previous registration, and the burden being upon the contestant to show that electors were illegally registered and failing to do so he has not placed himself in a position to have any returns excluded. If this is a correct view of the statute then there is a failure of proof to sustain the claim that there were illegal registrations. In the case of Boyer v. Teague (106 N. C., 579) it was expressly decided, head note 18:

"When an elector is allowed to deposit his ballot, the burden is on one who questions its validity to show, by a preponderance of testimony, the truth of such facts or circumstances as are relied on to establish the disqualification."

Neither the poll nor registration books have been presented in this case as evidence; neither has a transcript of either been presented as evidence from any county in the Congressional district except in Granville, where transcript of certain registration books has been presented, but not of the poll books. These are the primary evidence of the elector's registration and as to the fact of his voting. The record shows that the poll and registration books were in existence when the testimony was taken. If this conclusion be correct, it settles the case for contestee, because there would be no competent evidence as to the registration of any elector except in Granville County. It is not, however, necessary to take this view of the case, nor the one that there was a failure of proof that there were illegal registrations in order to reach the conclusion that the contestee is entitled to hold his seat.

In another portion of the report the majority also argue this question:

Section 2678 provides that the poll books shall be kept in which shall be entered the name of every person who shall vote; and that at the close of the election the judges of election shall certify same over their proper signatures, and shall deposit them with the register of deeds. It would seem by this that the register of deeds is the custodian of the poll books; and it was further provided in this section that "said poll books shall in any trial for illegal or fraudulent voting be received as evidence."

Section 2686 provides that the registration books shall be deposited with the register of deeds in their respective counties. The register of deeds is the legal custodian of both the registration and poll books.

Neither in the counties of Rockingham, Stokes, Durham, or Caswell is the transcript made of the registration or poll books and presented as evidence in this case; nor is there anything purporting to be a transcript of the poll books presented in this case for any precinct or county.

In the county of Rockingham there is a certificate of the register of deeds stating that certain names are those of certain colored and white electors appearing on the registration books. The certificate simply certifies to the facts which the books purport to show. The registration books are the primary evidence as to who was registered. The poll books are the primary evidence as to the fact that the elector voted. (Paine on Elections, secs. 756, 759; McCrary on Elections, see. 472.) It is certainly not competent to prove the contents of the poll books or registration books except they are lost or destroyed. Such a certificate of the register of deeds could not be received as evidence under any circumstances. If this conclusion is correct, then there is no competent testimony in this record as to how any elector was registered or as to whether or not he voted either in the counties of Rockingham, Stokes, Durham, or Caswell.

The minority take issue with this proposition:

On page 3 of the majority report objection is made that the entire registration and poll books were not produced. This was not necessary, nor was such an issue made while taking evidence.

Section 2678 of the code of North Carolina, a portion of which is in these words, "They shall keep poll books, in which shall be entered the name of every person who shall vote, and at the close of the election the judges of election shall certify the same over their proper signatures and deposit them with the register of deeds for safekeeping. And said poll books shall, in any trial for illegal or fraudulent voting, be received as evidence," is quoted in the majority report, and much stress is laid on the fact that copies of the poll book of each precinct at which illegal votes were cast were not made and presented as evidence in this case.

While it is provided that "said poll books shall, in any trial for illegal or fraudulent voting, be received as evidence,[2] nowhere is it stated that they shall be the only evidence. Voting is a fact that can be proved, not only by the poll book, but by the evidence of the elector himself, or any other person who may have witnessed the act. And it will be noted just here that the statute refers to the "poll," not the registration book, that "shall in any trial for illegal or fraudulent voting be received as evidence.

The votes alleged to be void were cast in various precincts in Rockingham, Caswell, Stokes, Durham, and Granville counties. The majority, waiving their technical objection as to proof of this illegal registration, entered into an examination, precinct by precinct. In this examination the majority and minority disagree as to questions of fact. Neither deny that many voters, both white and black, appear to be registered illegally, but the majority do not admit that the proof justifies striking the black voters from sitting Member's vote, on the ground that the blacks all voted for sitting Member; and the minority do not admit that because an illegal voter was white he should therefore be stricken from contestant's vote. The voters themselves were not called on to give testimony as to how they voted, but contestant introduced the testimony of election officers, deputy sheriffs, party leaders, etc., to prove from seeing the ballots thrown or from general knowledge that the negroes voted the Republican ticket. The majority denied the conclusiveness of this testimony. The majority also, in the case of Berea precinct, raised this objection:

It is claimed that 33 votes should be taken from contestee at this precinct. J. G. Shotwell was registrar at this precinct and kept registration books. The law provides that the party who seeks to register shall give his place of birth. The registrar was not introduced to say what answers were made by these electors to the inquiry as to the place of birth. There is no evidence that he asked in what county, township, or State they were born, or, if so, what answers were made by the electors. They may have stated the county and State and the registrar failed to make record of it. They may have stated they were unable to state where they were born. If they were unable to do this, they certainly stated as nearly as may be the place of their birth.

In other words, suppose the elector was ignorant as to the place of his birth, he would so state; then he, being unable to be more definite, would certainly not be deprived of the right to exercise the elective franchise. The fact that the registrar placed the name upon the registration books should create the presumption that he gave the proper answers to all questions that were put to him by the registrar. The legal presumption would be in the absence of proof, where the registration book failed to show that his place of birth was stated, that the elector was unable to state his place of birth. This presumption should be indulged, because the other presumption should be that the registrar did his duty. We do not think that these votes should be rejected because of the reasons claimed.

From all these considerations the majority deny contestant's claim that the illegally registered voters should be rejected.

The sole objection that election officers are not sworn does not justify rejection of the poll.

Failure to keep the registration books open the required time does not justify rejection of the return if harm is not shown to have resulted.

No fraud being alleged, absence of election officers from the poll for dinner or other reason does not justify rejection of the poll.

Handling of the ballots by parties other than the officers does not necessarily cause rejection of the poll.

Although the law requires ballots to be counted only after close of the voting, a partial count earlier does not necessarily vitiate the poll.

When the law forbids a candidate to be an election officer, is a poll for Congressman void because a candidate for a local office is such officer?

Where a minor may not hold an office, may such minor as a notary take testimony in an election case?

(b) As to the objections to counting the returns of certain precincts:

(1) Because certain judges or inspectors of election were not sworn.

The law of North Carolina provided:

> The said judges of election shall attend at the places for which they are severally appointed on the day of election, and they, together with the registrars for such precinct or township, who shall attend with the registration books, after being sworn by some justice of the peace, or other person authorized to administer oaths, to conduct the election fairly and impartially according to the constitution and laws of the State, shall open the polls and superintend the same until the close of the election.

The report, after citing Payne and McCrary, refers to the case of De Berry v. Nicholson (102 N. C.), which in turn cites People v. Cook (8 N. Y., 67), and concludes that the court of North Carolina has recognized the principle which should prevail when it held that—

> The neglect of the inspectors or clerks to take an oath would not have vitiated the election. It might have subjected the officers to indictment if the neglect was willful.

In Buchanan precinct it was claimed that the registrar was not sworn, in Royster several were not sworn, and in Delmont one of the judges, who was a justice of the peace, swore his associates, but was not himself sworn. In none of these precincts was fraud alleged, but in Buchanan and Royster other irregularities were alleged. But the committee did not consider that the omission of the oath was sufficient to justify the county canvassers in rejecting the Delmont return, where that was the only objection, or the returns of Buchanan and Royster, where other objections were urged, as appears below.

(2) Because registration books were not kept open thirty days under this provision of the State law:

> SEC. 2675. Registrars shall be furnished with a registration book, and it shall be their duty to revise the existing registration books of their precinct or township in such manner that said books shall show an accurate list of electors previously registered in such precinct or township, and still residing therein, without requiring such electors to be registered anew; and such registrars shall also, between the hours of sunrise and sunset on each day (Sundays excepted), for thirty days preceding the day for closing the registration books as hereinafter provided, keep open said books for the registration of any electors residing in such precinct or township, and entitled to registration, whose names have never before been registered in such precinct or township, or do not appear in the revised list.

This objection had been one of the contributing reasons which caused the county canvassers to reject the return of Wilton precinct. But the committee do not admit the fact, and then state that even were it so, as stated in the objection, it would not invalidate the election.

The registration books were kept open for the thirty days preceding the election, as required by law. Besides, there is no proof in this record showing that a single elector failed to register who was entitled to exercise that right under the constitution and laws of North Carolina. Indeed, there is no pretense by a single witness, so far as we have been able to find from this record, who claims that he could not register because there was no registrar or registration books.

But even had there been a failure to keep the books open for the time required by law, certainly, unless some elector was prevented from registering and was thus prevented from the exercise of the elective franchise at that election, would there be room for just complaint. The purpose of the statute was to afford ample opportunity to all electors to register.

They quote De Berry v. Nicholson in support of this position.

(3) Because some of the officers absented themselves from the polling place for a brief time during the election. Under the law above quoted the judges are required to "open the polls and superintend the same until the close of the election." At Buchanan precinct one judge absented himself during the counting, and at Alleys the board of officers went 200 yards to dinner, taking the boxes with them and leaving them in an adjoining room under charge of the daughter of one of their number. No fraud was alleged in either of these cases, and the committee finding everything regular and proper as to the votes, held that the objection did not constitute a reason for rejecting the returns, although in each case other mere irregularities were alleged.

(4) Because parties other than the officers handled the ballots. The committee quote Roberts v. Calvert (98 N. C., 580) to the effect that "if the ballots were truly counted, it would not of itself destroy the election at the particular voting place," although the practice was irregular and ought not to be encouraged. The committee find that in Buchanan precinct a person not an officer assisted in counting the ballots in some of the boxes, but not the Congressional box, and they did not think the returns should be rejected for this reason. At Wilton persons other than judges officiated for brief periods, but a majority of sworn judges were always present, and no wrong was found.

(5) The officers of election began to count some of the ballots before the polls closed at Royster and Covington precincts. The report cites Frederick v. Wilson and Hurd v. Romeis, and concludes:

This manner of counting the vote is no reason for rejecting it, notwithstanding the statute of North Carolina provides that the registrar and judges of election shall open the books and count the ballot after the close of the election. While we think this practice of thus opening the boxes and counting the ballots should be condemned, yet its having been done and the result having been correctly certified, we think the returns should not be rejected on that account. If the statute in express terms declared that the vote should not be counted except after the close of the polls, and if they were so counted that the returns from that precinct should be rejected, then the statute would be mandatory, and would be compelled to follow its provisions and reject the returns; but as the statute is simply directory we feel that no injury should result to the public in consequence of this error upon the part of the election officers.

(6) An inspector or judge of election was a candidate in Buchanan and Royster precincts, and over this a sharp division of opinion occurs between the majority and minority. Of Buchanan the report says:

It appears that some votes were cast for R. A. Chandler, one of the judges of election, for the office of constable. He was not a candidate for Congress. His candidacy for constable did not imply or even create a suspicion that it was to his interest to do anything wrong in the conduct of the election for Congress. His acting as poll holder could not in any way affect the rights of the parties to this contest. The evidence in this record establishes the fact that the election was honestly and fairly conducted and the correct result certified.

Of Royster:

At this precinct ballots were cast for James A. Bullock for the office of county surveyor. He was one of the judges of election, but told the electors on election day that he was not a candidate and would not accept the office if elected. The proof in the case shows that the fact that he was one of the judges of the election did not have any effect whatever on the result of the Congressional election. The proof is overwhelming that the election was properly conducted and the result honestly certified.

The report further intimates that had he been a candidate for Congress and also acted as judge, and had there been no proof that the election was fairly and honestly conducted, the rejection of the vote would have been justified.

The minority quote the law:

"And no person who is a candidate for any office shall be a registrar, or judge, or inspector of an election."

Here is a law plain and mandatory. The constitution and statutes of the State had thrown every safeguard that could be suggested around the ballot box; they had prescribed the qualifications of voters and made registration a prerequisite to the exercise of the elective franchise; they had compelled the elector to use due diligence in complying with the requirements, and then, to protect him from any possible interference on the part of interested persons who might be tempted to deprive him of his rights, they enacted the above statute. The laws of North Carolina disqualify any man who has a suit pending and at issue from sitting on a jury, either petit or grand, and renders any bill of indictment found by a grand jury, with even one such juror on it, liable to be quashed on motion, no matter though it may be shown that said juror did not vote on said bill when found.

How much stronger is this case where a man is sitting as judge, not only on his own case, but in that of all his political partisans and friends. It will not do to say that "no harm was done; the judge of election was not a candidate for Congress." That makes no difference; it is begging the question The law recognizes the frailty of human nature and provides that it shall not be subjected to such strong temptation.

This law of the State prohibiting candidates from acting as judges of election, if it were only directory, being so clearly in the interest of pure elections, should be respected and enforced, but we can conceive of no law more distinct in its terms or one which is from necessity more mandatory than this, and in our opinion the action of the Granville County canvassing board was right and should be sustained.

A question which the majority disregarded, because they considered that the case was decided without the aid of the testimony which it affected, arose as to the competency of the notary before whom testimony was taken in Rockingham County. It appeared that he was an infant, less than 21 years of age, and the minority discuss at length his incompetency.

The constitution of North Carolina, Article VI, section 1, declares the qualifications for an elector in the State as follows:

"Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized, twenty-one years old or upward, who shall have resided in the State twelve months next preceding the election, and ninety days in the county in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed an elector."

While section 4 of the same article declares that "every voter, except as hereinafter provided, shall be eligible to office."

Section 3304 of the code of North Carolina is in these words:

"The governor may, from time to time, at his discretion, appoint one or more fit persons in every county to act as notaries, who shall hold their office for two years from and after the date of their appointment, and, on exhibiting their commission to the clerk of the supreme court of the county in which they are to act, shall be duly qualified by taking before said clerk an oath of office and the oaths furnished for officers."

It will not be questioned that the constitution prohibits a minor from holding office in the State.

It cannot be questioned that a notary is an officer. The fact that he is required to take the oath of office is alone sufficient to establish that fact. In Worthy v. Barrett (63 N. C., 199) it is declared that the oath to support the constitution is a test on this question. And in Piland v. Taylor (113 N. C., 18 S. E. Report, 70), "the office of deputy clerk is an officer provided for by law who is required to take the oath of office." In Mecham, section 47, notaries public are declared to be public officers.

In most of the States minors are prohibited from holding office.

In North Carolina the plain prohibition of the constitution has been always recognized by the supreme court. In the case of Railroad v. Fischer (of recent date, 109 N. C), the court declared that the qualification as to all officers is imperative that they should be 21 years of age.

In case of Golden petition (57 N. H., p. 146) the court says:

"Offices, where judgment, discretion, and experience are essentially necessary to the proper discharge of the duties they impose, can not be executed by an infant."

To the same effect we might cite any number of cases from different States. The only exception is a case from Indiana, where a minor was recognized, and in that case Judge Gresham, who delivered the opinion, says:

"Unlike most of the States, Indiana has not declared in her constitution or statutes that only those who have attained the age of 21 years are eligible to any public office."

There is no analogy between that case and the one we are considering.

The minority show that the contestee protested against the notary the first day testimony was taken, and continued to protest. The notary had never acted before this case, and it could not be claimed that he was an officer de facto.

The majority report found sitting Member entitled to the seat.

The report in this case was never debated in the House, it being postponed in the second session to the third. On February 28, 1895, an attempt was made to call it up, but the House refused to consider it.

Therefore Mr. Settle retained the seat.

1050. The California election case of English v. Hilborn in the Fifty-third Congress.

Before considering an election case the Elections Committee corrected the official plurality by including a precinct return omitted from the State canvass.

The returns being rejected and contestant having proven his vote aliunde, the returned Member, who had not proven his vote, was not allowed the residue of the poll.

Under the Australian ballot, where an officer marks the ballot for an illiterate voter, is the ballot higher evidence than the testimony of the voter?

Ballots must be shown affirmatively to have been kept inviolate in order that a recount may be of effect.

The conduct of election officers being impeached by a return shown to be false ballots in their custody are thereby discredited.

Where election officers are discredited by a falsified return, their testimony as to their own votes is valueless as proof aliunde.

On March 22, 1894,[1] Mr. Jason B. Brown, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections,[2] submitted a report in the California case of English v. Hilborn. The official election returns made to the secretary of state showed a plurality of 25 votes for sitting Member.

But connected with this official return a question arose:

> The testimony shows that at Clarksburg precinct, Yolo County, the contestant received 40 votes and the contestee received 48 votes; that the member of the election board whose duty it was to take the returns to the county clerk and retain the duplicate tally list and list of voters in his possession, as by the laws of California he was required to do, by accident retained both tally lists and did not return the original tally list to the county clerk of Yolo County until after the board of supervisors had adjourned.
> The board of supervisors of Yolo County met at the county seat on Monday, November 14, 1892, to canvass the precinct returns. At that meeting it was found that the tally list from Clarksburg had not been received, and word was sent to that precinct. The board, not having finished canvassing the returns on November 14, adjourned to the next day, the 15th. On that day the board finished the canvassing of the returns, with the exception of Clarksburg, which made no return of the tally sheet. Thereupon the board adjourned until 1 o'clock p.m. of that day to wait for the Clarksburg tally list. At 1 o'clock, November 15, the board convened, and the Clarksburg tally list not having been returned, the board declared the result of the canvass of the other precincts, and the vote of Clarksburg precinct was not included in the official count of Yolo County certified to the secretary of state. On that day, after the adjournment of the board, the tally sheet of the Clarksburg precinct was returned and filed with the county clerk of Yolo County.
> The statute of California on the subject of failing to return tally sheets in time is as follows:
> "If, at the time of meeting, the returns from each precinct in the county in which polls were opened have been received, the board must then and there proceed to canvass the returns; but if all the returns have not been received, the canvass must be postponed from day to day until all of the returns are received, or until six postponements have been had." (California Election Laws, sec. 1280.)
> There being no question but that the Clarksburg precinct gave the contestee 8 majority, and that majority was not included in the returns made to the secretary of state, and that the foregoing provision of the statute was not complied with, the committee believes that the 8 majority given to the contestee by the Clarksburg precinct ought to be allowed to and be counted for him. This being so, the contestee's majority is increased from 25 to 33, which majority of 33 the contestant must overcome before he can maintain his contest and secure the office he seeks.

The contestant attacked this majority of 33 votes, alleging fraud in Altamont precinct, from which had been officially returned 37 votes for sitting Member and 15 votes for contestant. Suspicion was directed to this return from the fact that it was out of harmony with the previous political inclinations of the precinct, which had a population of farmers, not likely to be unsteady in their preferences. [2] The minority views were presented by Mr. Dan Waugh, of Indiana.

inquiry was made. Thirty-five electors of the precinct made affidavit that they had voted for contestant. The report says:

> Thereupon this contest was commenced and the testimony was taken. Forty-seven of the electors who voted at Altamont testified. Thirty-seven of them testified that they had voted for the contestant, 6 for J. L. Lyons, People's candidate, 2 for L. B. Scranton, Prohibition candidate, and 2 for no candidate at all. This left but 23 of the 70 voters of the precinct unaccounted for, and whether they voted for contestant is unknown.

This would leave contestant a plurality of 3 votes in the district if the 23 unaccounted for votes should be allowed to sitting Member. But the committee, relying on the cases of Langston v. Venable and Featherstone v. Cate, declare that votes should only be allowed as proven when returns are rejected. Therefore, counting for Altamont precinct only the proven votes, contestant would have a plurality of 26 votes in the district.

But sitting Member did not propose to allow the case to rest here and demanded a recount of the ballots, which showed 29 votes for contestant and 22 votes for sitting Member. The sitting Member admitted that the returns were unreliable, but contended that the ballots were the primary and controlling evidence, and on the strength of what they showed claimed a plurality of 4 votes in the district.

On the question as to whether or not the ballots were the primary and controlling evidence in this case, the majority and minority have the following observations. The minority say:

> When the ballots have been safely preserved, as required by law, they become the best and primary evidence as to how the elector voted, and the testimony of the voter is secondary and inadmissible. The ballots are not only a part of the election returns, but are of a higher grade of evidence than the tally papers or a summary made from them. To permit voters to come up after an election, as in this case, and swear they voted differently from what the ballots show, would open up a field of unending perjuries and frauds. If such should be the rule, every election might be tried over a second time by the oath of the voter instead of the ballots deposited in the ballot box. A mistake in the count or in tallying the vote or an impeachment of the returns or tally papers, even for fraud, do not of themselves discredit the ballots. To them the law points as the source to correct all such errors and mistakes. They commit no perjury and can not be bribed. These general principles, to which we have called attention, are fundamental, and are fully recognized and followed by the law and the decisions of the supreme court of California.

The majority of the committee suggest that the rule enunciated above ought to be relaxed under the new system of voting:

> The rule, whatever it is, on the subject of the ballots being the primary and best evidence in contested election cases, grew up and was established long before the adoption of the Australian or reform ballot law by any State of the Union. Formerly the ballots were furnished by the respective parties and distributed to the voters outside of the polling places. The illiterate voter received his ballot away from the polls, and took it to some person or persons in whom he had confidence, persons of his own selection, and had it made out according to his own direction. This was his own voluntary act. Even after his ballot had been prepared for him at his own solicitation, if he had any doubt in his mind as to it being according to his wish, he could expose it to some one else to more fully satisfy himself that it was as he desired. He took his ballot to the polling place and saw that it was deposited in the box. All this was his own voluntary action. Nothing compulsory about it. Upon such a state of facts and under such circumstances, it could be well said that he had voluntarily reduced his intention and his action to writing, and that his written expression of what he did and intended the ballot was the best evidence. It was under this system of voting that the rule of the ballot being the best evidence grew up.
> A different system of voting exists now almost everywhere and especially in California. The political parties no longer furnish their own ballots. An official ballot is furnished. It is retained inside the polling place; none are allowed outside. The voter must pass inside of the polling place and obtain his ballot from an official of the election board. If he is illiterate, or from any cause he is unable to make out his ballot, some member of the election board makes it out for him. He may, or he may not, have confidence in the official who prepares his ballot. The preparation of his ballot is not his free and voluntary act. It is compulsory. He must submit to having some one not of his own selection—some person who may be a stranger to him—prepare his ballot for him or he can not vote. This is especially so in California.

On this subject the law of California, at the time this election was held, was—

"Any elector who declares, under oath, to the presiding election officer that he can not read, and that by reason thereof or by reason of his physical disability he is unable to ark his ballot, shall, upon request, receive the assistance of anyone of the officers of election that he may choose in the marking thereof."

The election board from whom he selects the person to mark his ballot is not of his choosing. The law has selected it and he must choose from it or not vote.

Before he can receive this assistance he must take an oath that he can not read, or by reason of physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot. The officer who marks his ballot for him may be unknown to him. He is thrust upon him by the law. The illiterate voter in California is not a free agent in having his ballot prepared, for he has no opportunity whatever, and can have none, to ascertain whether his ballot was correctly prepared or not. He must depend entirely upon the election officer who marks it for him. Such was the condition of the illiterate voters who voted at Altamont precinct which was presided over by an election board that the proof shows and the contestee confesses made a false return.

Admitting, however, that the ballots are primary evidence, the committee say:

But it is equally well settled that before resort can be had to the ballots, as means of proof, absolute proof must be made that the ballots offered are the identical ballots cast at the election; that they had been safely kept as required by law; that they are in the same condition they were when cast; that they had not been tampered with, and that no opportunity had been had to tamper with them. (Payne on Elections, sees. 776–787; Atkisson v. Pendleton, Contested Election Cases of the Fifty-first Congress, p. 47.)

The burden of making this preliminary proof rests on the party who seeks to use the ballots as evidence. In this case it rests on the contestee. It is fundamental that a party desiring the introduction of certain proof, the admissibility of which depends upon some preexisting fact, must prove the existence of such fact before he can introduce his desired proof.

The issue between the majority and minority is joined on the issue as to whether or not the identity of the ballots is proven. The minority showed that the election officers at Altamont were respectable citizens, four belonging to the party of contestant, two to the party of sitting Member, and two to other parties—Independent and Prohibition. The counting of the votes, making of the returns, and signing and sealing of the ballots were done by officers other than the two belonging to sitting Member's party, and the sealed package of ballots was delivered to the county clerk by a judge who belonged to contestant's party. The minority views then relate that:

When the envelope from Altamont precinct was produced in court, it was shown that it had been securely guarded and preserved, the seals undisturbed, and in the same condition as when first sealed up. When the envelope was opened, 70 ballots were found strung upon a string. The inspectors and judges of the election at Altamont precinct—Gunn, Shaffer, Thomas, and Campbell—testified they were the same ballots cast by the electors of that precinct. Gunn and Shaffer identified their signatures or initials on the back of each ballot. The ballots were then counted in the presence of each party and their attorneys, and there were found to be 29 votes for English and 22 votes for Hilbom, which would still leave Hilborn a majority of 4. The minority are clearly of the opinion that the evidence conclusively shows that the ballots recounted were the identical ballots cast by the voters at Altamont precinct on the day of the election. The contention that the ballots were tampered with or changed has no support other than a sheer suspicion.

The majority doubt both the integrity of the election officers and the custody of the ballots. They show that there was an election for a portion of an unexpired term to the Fifty-second Congress on the same day the same persons being candidates, and that the returns of the short term showed the same discrepancies as those for the term under consideration. And it is reasoned that if election officers would falsify the return they might also tamper with the ballots. Furthermore, the law provided for no safe custody of the ballots by the county clerk:

All the county clerk is required to do is to file the sealed cover and keep it unopened and unaltered. Where he is to keep it, or how safely and securely he is to keep it, are matters wholly within his own discretion. The law fails to direct him on this subject. In this case the sealed cover containing the ballots cast at Altamont precinct was delivered to the county clerk, and by him permitted to be carelessly thrown upon the floor, with others like it, of one of the rooms of his office. And there it remained on the floor of a room open to the public during the day and to a number of deputy clerks during the night. This is not the safe and secure keeping of such a package as is required, to allow its contents to become primary, controlling, and conclusive evidence upon the important question as to who has been elected to the House of Representatives.

There was evidence that the ballots in the open room were guarded, but the majority do not credit it entirely.

Therefore the majority rely on the testimony of the electors, assuming that the officers had falsified the return. In the debate it was pointed out by Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, that the same four officers of contestant's party, who were charged with falsifying the return were admitted to testify that they voted for contestant, and that their votes so proven were counted. In reply it was admitted that their votes should be deducted from the number proven by oath of the electors.

The majority quoted Payne and McCrary, and the cases of McDuffie v. Turpin, McGinnis v. Anderson, and Clayton v. Breckinridge to show that if election officers falsify a return no credit can be placed in the contents of the ballot boxes left in their hands after the election.

Therefore the majority recommended resolutions declaring sitting Member not elected, and contestant entitled to the seat.

The report was debated on April 3, and on April 4 the resolution declaring sitting Member not elected was agreed to, yeas 170, nays 13, the members of the minority party evidently not voting, to break a quorum if possible. The resolution declaring contestant elected was then agreed to, yeas 165, nays 17.

Mr. English thereupon appeared and took the oath.

1051. The Tennessee election case of Thrasher v. Enloe in the Fifty-third Congress.

Clerical errors whereby names of candidates are spelled wrong in the returns do not invalidate correct ballots.

The law requiring ballots to be rejected unless of certain dimensions, the House sustained election officers in rejecting ballots for slight variations.

The words "For President, Benjamin Harrison," over the names of electors were held to be a distinguishing mark.

Where election officers received votes without the required evidence that a poll tax had been paid, the House rejected the votes, although the tax had, in fact, been paid.

Although a State law prescribed a qualification obnoxious to the State constitution, the House held the law constitutional in deference to the decision of the State court.

The law requiring voters to be registered in order to vote, a poll whereat there was no registration was rejected.

On May 7, 1894,[1] Mr. Josiah Patterson, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee[2] in the Tennessee case of Thrasher v. Enloe. The contestant made no allegation of fraud, but based his case on alleged irregularities under the law and constitution of Tennessee. These alleged irregularities were of several classes:

1. The election returns from one district in Decatur County showed 36 ballots as cast for "Benjamin B. Enloe" instead of "Benjamin A. Enloe," the sitting Member, and the contestant claimed that they should be rejected. The proof, however, showed that on the ballots themselves the name was correctly printed and that they were actually cast for sitting Member. As this was a mere clerical error in making the returns, the committee held that sitting Member should not be deprived of the votes. The sitting Member alleged that similarly 199 ballots returned for "P. H. Thresher," instead of "P. H. Thrasher," had been erroneously cast for contestant. The proof also showed that this was another clerical error in the returns, and the committee say:

> These clerical errors could not affect the validity of the ballots.

2. Certain ballots cast for contestant were excluded, because they were not of the dimensions prescribed by law, and it was urged that they were improperly excluded. The committee, after noticing the necessity of an undistinguishable ballot of uniform dimensions, quotes the law of Tennessee:

> The ballots to be voted shall be of plain, white paper, 7 inches long and 3 inches wide, upon which the office to be filled, with name or names to be voted for, shall be plainly written or printed.
> That it shall not be lawful to print or place any picture, sign, color, mark, index, or insignia thereon, and any ballot of less or greater dimensions than as provided in the first section of this act, or any ballot upon which said picture, sign, color, mark, index, or insignia may be placed, if found in the ballot box, shall not be counted by the judges holding said election, but shall be treated as invalid.
> That any officer holding said election who shall knowingly receive, or the judges thereof who shall count, any ballot other than as provided in the first section of this act, shall be also guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in the third section of this act.

And says:

> This statute is, without question, mandatory. No language could be employed that would be more emphatic. There is no room for construction. We must follow the plain mandate of the law or refuse outright to obey it. It is insisted by counsel for contestant that while the statute may be mandatory, yet the difference between the dimensions of the ballots in question and the ballots prescribed by law is so slight that it ought not to be recognized in determining their validity. One-eighth or one-sixteenth of an inch difference in width or length, he insists, is too slight to be noticeable. The fact is the difference was material and was readily noticed by the judges.

The statute does not prescribe how nearly the ballot shall approach the dimensions of the prescribed ballot, but expressly says that "any ballot of less or greater dimensions shall not be counted." The extent of the variance is not material; it is the fact of substantial variance the law deals with. It may be conceded that the law did not contemplate a literal compliance with its mandate, but any difference which could be easily observed on comparison with the prescribed ballot would clearly fall within its meaning.

The committee say that the difference of an eighth of an inch was sufficient to enable fraud to be perpetrated, and comment on the fact that the election judges, irrespective of party, united in the rejection of the ballots.

The minority took issue with the reasoning of the majority:

The object of this provision doubtless was to preserve the secrecy of the ballot and to prevent a ballot being cast of which the size would be a distinguishing mark. But if it is to be held that the ballot must be of precisely the dimensions prescribed by the statute, then it would be a practical impossibility to secure a legal ballot with the ordinary appliances used in printing. Fine mathematical instruments would always show some infinitesimal deviation from the exact dimensions prescribed by law. We can not believe that the statute was ever intended to have such a construction. A deviation of from one-sixteenth to one-eighth of an inch would not be noticeable and would not serve to mark the ballot. The report of the majority disregards these ballots. We believe that they were substantially in compliance with the statute, that they were cast by legal voters, and that they clearly express the intention of the voter to vote for the contestant. They should therefore be counted for him.

3. The majority also justified the rejection of certain ballots cast at a precinct for contestant, when the words, "For President, Benjamin Harrison;" "For Vice-President, Whitelaw Reid," appeared on the face of the ballot. The judges of election, irrespective of party, united in rejecting these votes on the ground "that said words amounted to a sign, mark, or insignia, whereby they could be distinguished," and therefore that the votes were not allowable under the law quoted above."The ballot," say the committee, "would have been perfect without the words in question. They could only serve to distinguish these ballots from the others, and they plainly fall within the reason of the rule under which the ballots were excluded, which did not come up to the prescribed dimensions." The further point was made that such words might be used to deceive the voter by being placed over the names of electors of the opposite party.

The minority say of these ballots:

They should have been counted for the contestant. They bore his name and were cast by legally qualified voters. They bore the names of the candidates for the two highest officers for which, in effect, said voter was voting. We do not believe that the statute can fairly bear so technical a construction as would make the words named a "picture, sign, color, mark, index, or insignia." These ballots should be counted for the contestant.

4. The laws and constitution of Tennessee made certain provisions as to polltax payments.

Section 1 of Article IV of the constitution of Tennessee provides:

"There shall be no qualification attached to the right of suffrage, except that each voter shall give to the judges of election, where he appears to vote, satisfactory evidence that he has paid the poll taxes assessed against him for such preceding period as the legislature shall prescribe, and at such times as may be prescribed by law, without which his vote can not be received."

Section 1 of chapter 23 of the acts of the extra session of the legislature of 1891 provides:

"That the satisfactory evidence to be furnished by the voter to the judges of the election, whether general or special, whether national, State, county, or municipal, that he has paid the poll tax contemplated by the constitution, assessed against him, if any, for the year next preceding said election, shall consist of the original poll-tax receipt, or a duly certified duplicate and copy of the same, or the duly authenticated certificate set out in section 8 when said tax has been paid to a constable and not to said trustee, properly certified by the trustee, or shall make affidavit in writing and signed by the voter that he has paid his poll tax and that his receipt is lost or misplaced, which affidavit shall be filed with the said judges and by them attached and made an exhibit to the returns of said election."

The law also enacts:

That any person voting, or any judge of any election permitting knowingly any person to vote in the same, without first having complied with the provisions of section 1 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $50 and imprisoned in the county jail or workhouse ninety days.

The majority of the committee therefore conclude:

The recital of the provisions of the constitution and the laws enacted in pursuance of the name obviates the necessity of elaboration. The constitution is mandatory, and the statute is especially so. There is no room for doubt. Unless the evidence required by the constitution and specially prescribed by the statute is furnished to the judges the elector, liable to a poll tax, has no right to vote. It is illegal to receive his ballot and illegal to count it if it is received. The contestee has shown conclusively that the 141 electors, subject to the payment of the poll tax, who voted for him at the Conyersville precinct, in point of fact paid the tax.

The trustee certifies to a list of all persons liable to the tax in the precinct, and shows who of them paid the tax to him. The delinquents were placed on another list, which was turned over to the constable of the district. The constable himself was one of the judges of election. He had his book with him. Those who were delinquent at the trustee's office had paid him, and his book showed the fact. The judges assumed that all who were not delinquent had paid the trustee, while the constable, who was one of their number, knew the delinquents had paid him. But this was not the evidence required by law. No poll-tax receipts were exhibited to the judges, no certificates to copies, or affidavits of loss. The statute was not complied with at all, but, on the contrary, was ignored. The whole policy of the law was subverted. While it is conceded that the judges in this instance were honest, and to enforce the law will work a hardship on the contestee and deprive electors who, in point of fact, paid their poll taxes, of their ballots, yet it is better to do this than to subvert the safeguards which the State has thrown around the ballot box to prevent fraud and the evasion of the law.

To permit the judges thus to set aside the mandates of the statute with impunity opens the gate to fraudulent devices and makes elections uncertain, unfair, and dishonest. Every elector subject to a poll tax must as a condition precedent furnish the evidence prescribed, and if he fails to do it his ballot ought never to reach the ballot box, and if it does it ought never to be counted. When this is well understood, the electors will readily comply with the law, the poll taxes will be collected, and the purity and security of the elective franchise will be promoted. The contestee received 141 illegal votes at the Conyersville precinct, and the contestant 9. It follows therefore that the difference of 132 votes must be deducted from the vote of contestee.

The minority do not agree to this reasoning:

The requirements of the constitution and of the statute, taken together, would appear to be of a mandatory character, and would certainly come far within the rule followed by the House in the case of O'Neill v. Joy. There the contestee's majority was taken away by statutory provisions that were claimed to be mandatory. But the undersigned protested against such a strict rule of construction in that case and we protest against it now. The difficulty is that in the pending case the constitution and statutes taken together are more mandatory in character.

The essential part of the provision of the constitution is that the voters shall have paid a poll tax, of which payment the judges of election shall be satisfied. At the precinct referred to no question was raised that the voters presenting the ballots had not paid their tax. They were not asked by the officers or by anyone at the polls to produce the evidence that they had paid it. They might have had this evidence in their pockets. They were permitted to cast their ballots unchallenged. The judges could, of their own motion, have declined to receive them—in fact, it was their duty to do so—or they would have been compelled to decline to receive them if anyone had objected.

In either case an opportunity would have been afforded the voter to produce the receipt or certified copy, or to make the affidavit provided by law. * * * The contestant claims that the legal voters should not be disfranchised and the whole poll thrown out because some of the votes were claimed to be illegal. On the whole we incline to the opinion that these ballots should be counted. * * * The fault was, primarily, with the election officers in receiving the ballots without requiring the evidence.

5. A law of Tennessee known as the "Dortsch law" prescribed an Australian ballot for cities of a certain population, one of the provisions being that the elector should have no assistance in making out his ticket, except in case of physical infirmity. Contestant insisted that the election held in the city of Jackson under this law was illegal, because the city was not in the class prescribed by law; and because the law was unconstitutional in that it prescribed an educational qualification, which the constitution forbade. The first objection was readily answered by the census, and the second by the decision of the supreme court of Tennessee, which upheld the law in the case of Cook v. The State. The majority consider the construction bv the State court of last resort as sufficient.

The minority say:

The constitution of Tennessee, in effect, prohibits the enactment of any statute requiring that a man shall be able to read and write in order to vote. It is clear that the Dortsch law imposes such a requirement, and it would appear to be clearly repugnant to the principles of the constitution. But the supreme court of Tennessee has decided this law to be constitutional, and we feel constrained to follow that decision in the present case, in accordance with the general rule. We are clear in our opinion, however, that this law disfranchises men who possess all the constitutional requirements of voters.

6. The law of Tennessee provided that in counties of a certain population:

Each and every voter, in addition to the regulations now required by law to entitle him to vote, shall be registered as a voter, as hereinafter provided, before he shall be allowed to exercise the elective franchise.

Sitting Member insisted that in a district of Hardin County the election was illegal and should be disregarded, because the voters were not registered as required by law. The committee say: "It is evident that a failure to open registration books under this law will defeat an election," and this was not denied by contestant or the minority. Therefore the vote in question was rejected.

The majority of the committee conclude that in view of the principles stated above sitting Member should be credited with a majority of 110 votes. Therefore they reported resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

The minority concede that he was elected by a plurality of 25 votes instead of the 118 by which he was returned.

On July 10, 1894, without debate or division, the resolutions of the majority were agreed to by the House;

1052. The Kansas election case of Moore v. Funston in the Fifty-third Congress.

Where contestant offered evidence not specified in notice of contest and the answer was not served within the legal time, the Rouse still considered all the evidence.

Discussion as to the evidence required to prove a conspiracy to commit election frauds.

Discussion as to the validity of the testimony of canvassers who have failed to find persons suspected of illegal registration.

Discussion as to the evidence required to show that persons alleged to be disqualified actually voted.

On June 26, 1894,[1] Mr. William A. Jones, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report[2] of the majority in the Kansas case of Moore v. Funston. At the outset of this case two preliminary questions arose:

(a) Sitting Member objected that the notice of contest did not specify certain matters, upon which much testimony was afterwards offered, and therefore demanded that the said testimony be excluded from the case. The majority report does not deny this, but meets it in the conclusion reached as to the other preliminary question. The minority views criticise the notice as indefinite, but do not make an issue on it.

(b) Contestant claimed:

> That the copy of the answer and countercharge of contestee was not served within the time required by law, and that, therefore, none of the testimony offered by contestee, and printed also in the record, should be considered.
> The law requires that the notice of contest shall be served within thirty days after the determination of the result of the election by the officer or board of canvassers, authorized by law to determine the same, and shall state specifically the grounds upon which contestant relies in the contest. It is also required by the law that a copy of the answer of contestee shall be served upon contestant within thirty clays after service of the notice of contest. (Rev. Stat., secs. 105, 106.)
> It is not denied that the notice of contest was served within the time specified. The record shows (Rec., p. 6) that a true copy of the notice of contest was left at the residence of contestee in Allen County, Kans., with his wife, on December 26, 1892. It further shows (Rec., pp. 7, 985) that a copy of the notice of contest was delivered to contestee in person in the city of Washington, D.C., December 28, 1892. And a copy of contestee's answer and countercharge was left at the residence of contestant in Lawrence, Douglas County, Kans., with his wife, on January 27, 1893; and on January 28, 1893, a copy was delivered to contestant in person. (Rec., pp. 1053–54.)
> It will be seen, therefore, that the copy of notice of contest was left at the residence of contestee on December 26, 1892, and a copy of the answer and countercharge at the residence of contestant on January 27, 1893; and that a copy of the notice of contest was delivered to contestee on December 28, 1892, and a copy of the answer and countercharge was delivered to contestant on January 28, 1893. If service by copy, left at the residence of the person to be served, is to be regarded as the service contemplated by the statute, then the notice of contest was served on December 26, 1892, and the answer and countercharge thirty-two days later, on the 27th day of the following January. Or, if personal service be required it is found that such service of the notice of contest was made on December 28, 1892, and such service of the answer and countercharge thirty-one days later, on the 28th day of January, 1893. So, in either case, the answer was out of time.
> If, then, we should closely apply to the notice of contest the rule of pleading upon which contestee insists, and should apply to the answer the requirement of the law, we should find contestee without an answer, and would have but to ascertain whether, upon the grounds of contest undoubtedly specified in the notice, contestant has made good his contention that he, and not contestee, was really elected a Representative in Congress from the Second district of Kansas. If we should take this view of the matter our labors would be greatly lessened, a considerable portion of the huge record in the case would be eliminated, and the finding would necessarily be in favor of contestant. We believe, however, that the real question to be determined is not so much whether this or that bit of evidence offered by contestant certainly relates to something clearly specified in his notice of contest as a ground upon which he relies, nor yet whether contestee's answer and countercharge were made in due time, but rather which of the two claimants, according to the record, was really elected and is really entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives.

As to the merits of the case the official returns gave sitting Member a plurality of 81 votes. Contestant attacked this, alleging fraud and irregularities. An examination of these allegations naturally divides itself into three branches:

1. Contestant charged that in that portion of Kansas City lying within Wyandotte County, Kans., a conspiracy was entered into on the part of members of sitting Member's party to put on the registration lists names of persons not entitled to vote, or entirely fictitious, and to stuff the ballot boxes by the use of repeaters. It was further alleged that there were about 1,991 of such fraudulent registrations, and that about 400 votes were cast for the Republican candidate. The majority of the committee, however, did not claim that there was absolute proof of over 68 votes cast for sitting Member illegally as the result of this conspiracy, but considered that 128 such votes might be established by fairly satisfactory proof.[1] The majority admit the difficulty of proving conspiracy:

All text writers and other law authorities treating of the subject recognize the difficulty of proving conspiracy by direct evidence; and, as in the case of fraud, in general, recognize also the propriety, as well as the necessity, of proving distinct facts, many of them insignificant in themselves, from all of which, however, when sufficient, a firm belief in the existence of the conspiracy or fraud may safely be deduced and the conclusion may be as safely acted upon. In many cases circumstantial evidence is the only evidence which can be obtained, and it is also not infrequently of the most satisfactory and convincing character.

In this case the officials of contestant's party, as well as officers of a club belonging to a faction of sitting Member's party, took measures to thwart a suspected conspiracy on the part of the regular organization of sitting Member's party to make fraudulent registration. Canvassers were sent out before the election, and brought in lists of names supposed to be wrongfully registered. The report says of this testimony:

A number of witnesses testify to the result of their efforts, both just before and just after the election, to find registered persons by calling and inquiring at and about the places from which they were registered. Several of those who thus testify were well acquainted in the precincts in which they severally canvassed, and as to many of the persons registered they testify that they know no such persons, never heard of their being or living in the neighborhoods from which they were registered, and upon diligent inquiry could find no one who knew of them. The testimony of these witnesses fills many pages of the record, and a perusal must convince anyone that the investigation set on foot to ascertain who had been registered improperly was honest and carried forward in a most painstaking manner. While much testimony as to what these canvassers learned or did not learn by inquiring at and about the places from which voters were registered may be regarded as hearsay, considered with reference to the actual fact of whether the persons inquired about really lived at the numbers from which they were registered, it is very easy to see how it affected persons managing the campaign for the Democratic party and the Anti-Buchan Club, and how they were led to the placing of challengers at the polls to check and prevent the voting of the registrations believed to be fraudulent.

The report further justifies the use of such testimony by quoting from McCrary:

For the purpose of showing that nonresidents have voted, witnesses are often called to testify that persons whose names appear upon the roll as having voted are not known to them as residents of the county or voting precinct, as the case may be. This kind of evidence is admissible for what it is worth, but it is manifest that its value must depend upon circumstances. If the district or territory within which the voter must reside is large or very populous and the witness has not an intimate and extensive acquaintance with the inhabitants, the evidence will be of little value, and standing alone will avail nothing. But on the other hand, if such district or territory is not large or populous, and if the witness shows that his acquaintance with the inhabitants is such that he could scarcely fail to know any person who may have resided therein long enough to become a voter, his evidence may be quite satisfactory, especially if it further appears that soon after the election the alleged nonresident voter could not be found in the district, within the limits of which all voters must reside. Proof of this character must at least be regarded sufficient to shift the burden upon the party claiming that the vote of such alleged nonresident be counted and require him to show affirmatively that he is a bona fide resident.

The minority criticised this evidence, characterizing the rule as extreme, and pointing out that it did not cover the present case, since the residents themselves were not called to testify as to people registered from their neighborhood, but the testimony of a person who went to inquire of them was taken.[1]

An issue also arose as to the proof of votes cast under this illegal registration. The law of Kansas required that when a voter was challenged his ballot should be numbered to correspond with the voter's name on the poll book, and the word "sworn" should be written at the end of his name, so that ballot could be identified as cast by him.

Persons were stationed at the polls to challenge those attempting to vote on names supposed to be registered fraudulently. The majority report the evidence as showing that when the law of procedure as to challenges was respected, so the ticket could be identified, it was found almost invariably that he had voted for sitting Member.

One challenger testified that the election judge (it appeared that election machinery was largely in the hands of sitting Member's party) who was a member of contestant's party disregarded from 40 to 45 challenges at one precinct. The majority report further finds:

The return of the officer upon the subpoenas issued at the instance of contestant for witnesses shows that he could not find these persons whose names are alleged to have been put on the registration lists fraudulently, and in whose names illegal ballots are charged to have been cast for contestee.

It is in evidence (Rec., p. 681) that the chairman of the Republican committee of Wyandotte County offered one of the challengers for the opposition $50 if he would leave the polls at which he was stationed to challenge illegal voters and prevent the voting of persons not entitled to vote.

In addition to the foregoing, the record contains enough evidence, concerning the competency of which no reasonable doubt can exist, to show that a considerable number of votes were actually cast in Kansas City, Wyandotte County, Kans., in the names of persons not entitled to register or to vote. Some of these persons were registered from vacant lots; some from churches; some were under voting age; some were in the penitentiary; some had gone away before election day; some, it would seem, never lived there.

The minority doubt the credibility and competency of the witnesses by which the majority reached its conclusions on this branch of the case, and also raise a question as to the method by which contestant sought to prove illegal votes:

The law of Kansas requires that one of the judges of elections shall, as each registered person votes, enter on a copy of the voting list opposite the name of such person the word "voted." Such certified copy is to be returned to the city clerk after the election and to be by him preserved. The contestant has failed to produce this legal evidence or record.

Although usurpers had acted with the election officers and the ballots were stolen, the committee declined to reject the return on the ground that it would increase the harm to the injured party.

County returns informally signed and the accuracy of which was impeached by evidence were rejected by the House.

Although evidence showed that some votes were affected by intimidating acts of a policeman the House declined to reject the precinct returns.

Discussion as to the votes of certain students at college.

2. In the third precinct of Kansas City, where there was evidence of illegal registration, and where challenges were in several instances disregarded by the election officers, the report finds this state of affairs:

The law of Kansas provides for three judges at each polling place, but at this precinct there were four persons who acted in the capacity of judges of election. One of them, Mark Cromwell, who seems to have passed sometimes under another name, which the witnesses testifying about it do not recollect, was not appointed to serve as such judge, but appeared on election day and put himself on the board. It also appears from the evidence that he was a sleight-of-hand performer and juggler. During part of the time of the counting Cromwell took tickets from the box and called off from the tickets.

The evidence also shows that before the count was completed one of the clerks at this precinct became so much intoxicated that he was unable to continue at work, and an outsider—the witness Bigger, before mentioned—took his place and acted as clerk, though it does not appear that he was sworn or had any more right to so act than any other unauthorized person. During the count, too, it happened several times that the two clerks were as many as four or five votes apart in their tallies, and would get together by one arbitrarily taking the count of the other, without going to the ballots to see which was correct, or whether either was correct.

Craddock also testifies as to the number of ballots cast at this precinct with the name of contestee erased and the name of contestant written in, putting the number of such changes at from 35 to 40.

Brooks, another of the judges of election at this third precinct, testifies to the erasure of the name of contestee and the insertion of the name of contestant upon tickets voted at that precinct, putting the number at from 40 to 50.

Faust, also one of the election judges at the same precinct, called by contestee, guesses the number of such scratches at not to exceed 10. This same election judge, Faust, disregarded the challenges of voters by Rooney, and put the tickets of persons challenged into the box without marking them, thereby disregarding the law and rendering it impossible to determine by an inspection of the ballots themselves how the several challenged persons voted. Faust, it will be remembered, would dismiss a challenge by saying: "I know him; he's all right."

The return from this election is thus described:

Mr. Craddock, one of the judges of election at this precinct, testifies that he duly returned these ballots, and the pool books and tally sheets to the county clerk's office, and was paid by check from the county clerk; and he is not contradicted or impeached. The county clerk testified that if the poll books without the ballots had been returned to him he would probably have noticed it.

When testimony was being taken, these ballots were demanded of the county clerk, but he failed to find them. Later, as the clerk testified, they were found by a citizen of Kansas City at his front gate, loosely tied together and directed to the county clerk. These ballots showed but eight scratched tickets, and corresponded substantially with the original returns, which give sitting Member 310 votes and contestant 335, each one's vote being very nearly the vote of his party in the precinct.

The majority report says that the entire returns from this precinct should be rejected if the ends of justice would be promoted by so doing; but the returns gave contestant a plurality of 25 votes, and it is evident that by the actual vote this was much larger. The report does not, however, assign any definite increase to contestant in this precinct, but intimates that about 100 is the usual majority of his party in the district. Taking the whole county of Wyandotte together, which means the phases of the case included in the first and second branches, the majority arrive at this conclusion:

> That the apparent plurality in Wyandotte County of 179 votes in favor of contestee is not his real plurality, after excluding illegal votes and counting correctly votes erroneously counted for one candidate when actually cast for the other; but that the true and legal plurality of contestee in said county over contestant is very small, if, in fact, anything.

The minority do not admit the majority's position, and take the view that the alleged theft of the ballots was in the interest of contestant.

3. In Allen County the majority report advises the rejection of the official returns because of violation of the following requirement of the law of Kansas:

> SEC. 2687. On the Friday next following the election the county clerk and the commissioners of the county, or a majority of said commissioners, at ten o'clock a.m. of said day, shall meet at the office of said county clerk, and shall proceed to open the several returns which shall have been made to that office; and said commissioners shall determine the persons who have received the greatest number of votes in the county for the several county, district, and State offices and members of the senate and house of representatives, Representatives in Congress, and electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, * * * and such determination shall be reduced to writing, signed by said commissioners and attested by the clerk, and shall be annexed to the abstract of the votes given for such officers, respectively, hereinafter provided for in section forty-one of this act.

The only signature to the return was the following:

> In testimony, I have hereunto set my hand and caused this abstract to be attested by the county clerk of said county, the 11th day of November, 1892.
> D. D. SPICER,
> Chairman, Board of County Commissioners of Allen County, > and ex-officio Board of County Commissioners.
> BY E. M. ECKLEY,
> Clerk, Board of Canvassers.

One of the commissioners testified that so far as he was aware, and he was present at the entire session, the canvassing board did not reduce the result to writing or sign it, and that he would not have signed it, because it was not completed that night after making the canvass, because they did not compare the certificates of the county clerk with the different tally sheets of the various townships, and also:

> Because of the mutilated condition of the tally sheet of Iola Township; that the board did not make any footing, purporting to be the number of votes cast for the various candidates; that witness did not give his consent to the county clerk to sign any instrument purporting to be an abstract of the votes cast in Allen County on November 8, 1892.

Also E. M. Eckley, county clerk, testified:

That he was county clerk of Allen County, Kans.; that on November 11, 1892, the board of canvassers met to canvass the vote cast at the general election of November 8, 1892; that they reduced the result to writing, but did not sign the same; that witness signed the name of the chairman of the canvassing board to the abstract of the vote; that he made out the abstract from the names and figures given him by the board; that the board did not give him authority to sign their names; that the board did not personally inspect the work nor compare it with the returns as shown by the poll books; that the members of the board could not see the names and figures witness made from where they sat; that witness did not know whether the members of the board were present when he signed the chairman's name to the abstract or not.

Witness D. D. Spicer testified (Record, p. 955) that he was chairman of the board of county commissioners and that he had authorized the county clerk to sign his name to whatever papers were necessary in making his return to the State board; that he can not state what papers they were; that he does not know when he first learned that the county clerk had signed his name to the instrument as chairman of the board of county canvassers.

The committee, after citing text writers and precedents, say:

The committee are of the opinion that in view of the explicit and mandatory provisions of the Kansas statute, already quoted, which requires that the commissioners of the county, or a majority of them shall determine the persons who have received the greatest number of votes in the county, and that such determination shall be reduced to writing, signed by said commissioners and attested by the clerk, and in deference to the well-settled rule laid down in a long line of decisions, some of which have been cited herein, the canvass of the vote of Allen County and the certification of the returns were not in accordance with the plain requirement of law, but in flagrant violation thereof, and that said returns should therefore be rejected.

The contestant asks that the vote of the whole county be rejected because each member of the board did not sign this return. There is no question but that the returns to which the clerk signed the name of the chairman were the correct returns as received from the various precincts. If no return had been made of the county as a whole, it would be competent for the committee to inquire as to what the original precinct returns were, and thus make up the vote of the county.

It is no ground for the disfranchisement of the voters of a whole county that the returning officers, on a day subsequent to the election, are guilty of an informality in attesting the returns, when the result is not in any way affected by such informality. It has even been held that a person elected to the House of Representatives should be admitted to his seat, although no return thereof was made to the secretary of state. A Representative is not to be deprived of his seat because the returning officers have neglected their duties. (McCrary on Elections, 2d ed., par. 554; Justices' Opinion, 68 Maine, 587.)

The minority also called attention during debate to the law of Kansas which provided that in an election the person having "the highest number of votes for any office" shall "receive the certificate of election, notwithstanding the provisions of law which may not have been fully complied with in noticing and conducting the election, so that the real will of the people may not be defeated by any informality of any officer," but it was answered that it had never been made to appear in a manner "satisfactory" (quoting from the statute) what the vote of Allen County was.

The returns of Allen County gave sitting Member 93 plurality, and as his plurality in the district was 81 the rejection of this return would of itself be decisive.

In addition to the three main branches of this case, minor questions arose. Contestant claimed that a colored policeman intimidated voters in the fifth precinct of Kansas City, and several witnesses swore that he threatened with arrest members of his race who were distributing tickets in the interest of contestant, and that he forcibly took and tore up such tickets. One witness testified that he was satisfied that the presence of this policeman and his acts prevented not less than a hundred of his race from voting for contestant. The majority say that in other contests precinct returns have been thrown out on such evidence, but they do not feel warranted in following such precedents.

The minority also raise this question as to Douglas County:

> Five grounds for rejecting certain votes counted for the contestee in this county are given, the principal one being that illegal votes were cast by the students at a seminary of learning at Baldwin, Kans. There is no testimony that many of the students in question voted for Mr. Funston, unless, indeed, the fact that they were connected with a high institution of learning raises a presumption that they voted the Republican ticket. But it appears in all of the cases the student was of age, in some of the cases he was a member of the faculty; that he was not dependent upon his parents, but supported himself, and that he had no fixed determination as to the future place of his abode, unless he was intending to remain at Baldwin. All the cases come safely within the rule laid down by Mr. O'Ferrall in the case of Worthington, v. Wright, as follows:
> "Where young men had entirely severed their connection with the home of their parents and were relying on their own efforts, exertions, and means, and had no fixed determination as to their future place of abode, they were legal voters at the point where these colleges were located. To hold differently would be to deprive many worthy young men of the right to vote and disfranchise them during the years they might be engaged in their laudable efforts to secure an education."

It does not appear, however, that the majority took issue on this question.

The report was debated at length on August 1, and the House rejected the propositions of the minority, declaring that contestant was not elected and that sitting Member was elected, the first by 90 yeas and 127 nays, and the second by 31 yeas and 126 nays, 13 being noted as present to make a quorum.

On August 2 the resolutions of the majority, unseating sitting Member and seating contestant, were agreed to, yeas 147, nays 86.

1054. The Georgia election case of Watson v. Black in the Fifty-third Congress.

Where the State law does not make it the duty of an officer to make a report of the votes cast, a report from that officer is not accepted as evidence of the vote.

No law preventing the use of more than one ballot box at a precinct, the use of three did not justify rejection of the poll in the absence of proof of harm therefrom.

Handling of the ballots by an unauthorized person does not invalidate the poll in the absence of evidence showing harm therefrom

Temporary absence of election officers from the poll does not invalidate the vote, no harm resulting therefrom.

Threats of an overseer to discharge employees must be supplemented by testimony of employees thus intimidated, if the House is to correct or reject the return.

On July 23, 1894,[1] Mr. Thomas G. Lawson, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Watson v. Black, from Georgia. The committee, at the conclusion of their report, present a preliminary question of importance:

The committee has preferred to report on every point of contention in the case and upon the evidence relating to each one, though it need not have done so, for the record does not show what vote was received by either candidate in the city of Augusta, to which chief objection is made, nor does it show the number of votes received by either candidate in the district. To have allowed every contention of the contestant, the result would have been the same that we have reached.

The attorneys for contestant in the argument of the case asked the committee to accept the report of the comptroller general of the State to show the number of votes cast, and for whom cast, in this Congressional district. The law of the State, however, does not require the comptroller-general to embrace such information in his reports, nor does it make his reports competent and legal evidence in a judicial investigation without further authentication.

The consideration of the case involves a number of subjects, of which the following may be said to present fairly definite determinations of law by the committee:

1. The contestant alleged that at each of the several precincts of the city of Augusta three ballot boxes were used for the reception of ballots, whereas the law of the State permitted the use of one box only at each precinct. The committee find that it had long been the custom in the city, under the conviction that it was lawful, to use one or more ballot boxes at each precinct. The number of precincts in the city was limited by law, and additional facilities for casting votes could be obtained by using more than one ballot box. The law of Georgia provided:

No election shall be defeated for noncompliance with the requirements of the laws, if held at the proper time and place by persons qualified to hold them, if it is not shown that by that noncompliance the result is different from what it would have been had there been proper compliance.

Therefore the committee conclude:

The use of three ballot boxes at an election precinct is certainly not expressly prohibited by the laws of Georgia, nor do we think that their use is inferentially or impliedly prohibited. But on the assumption that their use is impliedly prohibited a noncompliance with the prohibition would not, under section 1334 of the code of the State, above quoted, render the election void, unless it was shown by evidence that their use did, in fact, produce a different result. That is not shown nor attempted to be shown in this case.

2. The report thus discusses an objection:

At one precinct only some unauthorized persons, who seem to have been clerks assisting in holding the election, were permitted to receive the ballots from the voter and transmit them to the superintendents. One was seen to open, unfold, and refold ballots, but his purpose in doing so is not apparent. We can not approve of such practice, but in this instance it was done in the presence of the superintendents and supervisors and we can not discover that any harm accrued.

3. Another objection is thus treated:

Three instances of this character occurred. One superintendent went into the street and received the ballot of a sick person brought there in a buggy and immediately returned to his post, and two others once or twice during the day, and for a brief period, retired to the rear of the room in which the election was held, and were seen to drink from a bottle what was thought to be beer or whisky. One said that he was advised by his physician to take whisky. The two then acting were not presiding at the same polls, were absent but a few minutes each, and were not intoxicated or affected by the stimulant. No ballots meanwhile were received at the boxes presided over by them, and the affair appears, on the whole, to be too trivial to deserve rebuke.

4. It was charged by contestant that employees in a cotton mill were intimidated by an overseer, who threatened to discharge them if they voted for contestant. There was evidence to show that such a threat was made. Of twelve members of contestant's party employed under this overseer it appeared that two or three probably voted for contestant, and there was no evidence to show how the others voted. Nor did it positively appear that anyone was discharged in consequence of the threat. The committee think "that if any of the employees of industrial institutions of the city were discharged on account of their political opinions or actions, or intimidated by threats to discharge them, the fact could have been clearly proven by the employees themselves. But none of these, if there were any, were summoned to testify." Therefore the committee do not entertain the objection.

Bribery being proven, the House deducted the tainted votes but did not reject the poll.

General evidence that repeaters voted is not effective unless supplemented by specific evidence as to who they were, and where and for whom they voted.

In the absence of evidence of the contrary, the election officers are presumed to have acted correctly in denying the claims of certain persons who attempted to vote.

A return not signed by the election officers as required by law is properly rejected.

A State law providing that an election shall not be defeated for mere irregularities, the House overruled the rejection of returns informal but evidently true.

5. There was testimony showing some bribery of voters, from which the committee concluded:

> With the exception of two ballots, one of which was not cast, it is not perfectly clear for whom the votes of the persons thus bribed were cast, but we assume from certain parts of the evidence that they were cast for contestee. Allowing, therefore, all that is proven, and disregarding the cumulative character of the evidence, it appears that 20 votes should be deducted from the majority of the contestee. The instances of bribery occurring at two precincts only, being participated in by different persons, and being so few in numbers compared with the very large vote polled, we are persuaded that they were not committed in pursuance of any prearranged and organized plan, but were rather the excesses of overzealous partisans.

6. There was evidence that people supposed to be repeaters voted at various wards in the city, but no one gave any definite testimony as to their number, names, or for whom they voted. The committee say:

> Why have not the alleged illegal voters been prosecuted? Why have not the ballots and the poll books been examined and both purged of the illegal votes? There was no difficulty in doing that. The law of the State expressly provides for such a contingency. In providing that the name of the voter shall be numbered on the poll book and that the same number shall be written on his ballot before it is placed in the box, and in requiring that poll books and ballots shall be preserved a sufficient time to be used as evidence in any contest, the law of Georgia makes ample provision for the detection of frauds in elections and for rejecting every illegal ballot.
> But it was not attempted in this case to purge either the poll books or the ballot boxes. The best method of determining whether there were repeaters was neglected. There was no effort made to show by the tax receiver's books whether or not anyone who voted was not a taxpayer or resident of the county. Your committee is therefore utterly unable to determine how many repeaters and illegal voters there were, beyond the number whose names are given by the witnesses, or how many of these votes should be deducted from the majority of the contestee. Between the minimum and maximum number testified to there is a very wide margin, and we don't know whether to accept either or some intermediate number.

7. Another objection is thus disposed of:

Some 70 or more persons offering to vote for contestant at Jewells were not permitted to do so by the superintendents of the election. It does not appear why their votes were refused, except that their names did not appear on a list in the possession of the superintendents. Tax defaulters are not qualified voters in Georgia; but whether the list mentioned was a list of those who had paid their taxes and qualified themselves to vote, we do not know. The superintendents of the election were sworn officers, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary we presumed that they discharged their duty in a lawful manner.

8. The law of Georgia provided that—when the votes are all counted out there must be a certificate, signed by all the superintendents, stating the number of votes each person voted for received; and each list of voters and tally sheet must have placed thereon the signature of the superintendents.

The committee say:

In the ninety-eighth election district of the county the tally sheets, list of voters, and election returns were not signed by the superintendents as required by law, nor did it appear in what capacity the superintendents acted. We think that the return from this precinct was properly rejected.

In certain other precincts certain of the papers were signed, while others were not, but there was enough to show that the election was legally held and to show the number of votes cast and for whom cast. Therefore the committee overrule the action of the local canvassers in rejecting these returns and credit the contestant with his majorities, on the ground that under the Georgia statute relating to informalities, quoted above, the returns must be held sufficient.

There were other objections raised by contestant which the committee dismissed as not sustained by definite evidence, and in conclusion the committee recommended resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

On June 29, 1894, without debate and by a rising vote, the resolutions were agreed to, ayes 106, noes 10.

1056. The Illinois election case of Steward v. Childs, in the Fifty-third Congress.

In construing State election laws not construed by the State courts the Elections Committee should recommend such construction as to give full effect to the clear intent of the legislature.

The State law providing that ballots shall not be counted unless marked in a certain way, ballots otherwise marked should be rejected by the House.

The State law requiring rejection of the vote in the case of voters assisted in marking ballots without making an affidavit of disability, the House overruled the election officers who counted such ballots.

The State law requiring rejection of ballots not marked with initials of election officers, the House overruled the election officers who had counted such ballots.

On February, 1895,[1] Mr. Jason B. Brown, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the Illinois case of Steward v. Childs. The official returns had given sitting Member a plurality of 17 votes, which the contestant had attacked because of alleged irregularities in the application of the then newly enacted Australian ballot law of Indiana. The committee say in a preliminary way:

> The first general election held under this law was the election of November 8, 1892, out of which this controversy grows, and so far as we know its provisions have not yet been construed by the courts of Illinois. In the light of the power reserved to the Members of the House of Representatives, by the Constitution of the United States, to be the judges of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and in the light of the power to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections of Members to the House of Representatives reserved by the same instrument to the State legislatures, it is deemed the duty of the committee to recommend to the House such construction of these laws as will give force and effect to the clear intention of the legislature which enacted them.

In general the law provided that there should be a grouping of candidates by parties on the ballot, with spaces so that the voter might at one mark vote the whole party ticket, or might by several marks vote for candidates individually. The specific provision of the law was that the voter—> shall prepare his ballot by marking in the appropriate margin or place a cross (X) opposite the name of the candidate of his choice for each office to be filled, or by writing in the name of the candidate of his choice in a blank space on said ticket, making a cross (X) opposite thereto.

The law further provided that "any voter who may declare upon oath that he can not read the English language, or that by reason of any physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot, shall upon request be assisted in marking his ballot by two of the election officers," etc.; and also that—

> * * * No ballot without the official indorsement shall be allowed to be deposited in the ballot box, and none but ballots provided in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be counted. * * *

The committee, in view of these provisions of law, and in view of the decisions of various State courts which are cited, concluded:

> The committee find it to be the law that ballots on which the voter undertook to express his choice by marks other than the cross placed in the circle or square, as provided by the statute, are not legal and should not be counted; that ballots voted by electors who were assisted in marking their ballots without having first made the affidavit of disability, as provided by said statute, axe not legal and should not be counted; that the initials of that one of the judges of election who delivered the ballots to the voters are a part of the "official indorsement" required by the statute, and ballots not bearing such initials are not legal and should not be counted.

Applying the law as thus stated they found a net loss to contestant of 259 votes, and a net loss to sitting Member of 26 votes. Thus the plurality of sitting Member was increased, and the committee reported resolutions confirming his title to the seat.

There was no action by the House on this report, and sitting Member of course retained the seat.

1057. The Virginia election case of Goode v. Epes, in the Fifty-third Congress.

Discussion as to what is the best evidence when objection is made to the action of county canvassers in rejecting precinct returns.

Although service of notice of taking testimony be irregular, if the party yet is informed and appears and cross-examines, the House may consider the evidence.

Ex parte affidavits are not considered in an election case.

Where canvassing officers reject returns transmitted unsealed when the law requires them to be sealed, what evidence should the House require to overrule the canvassers?

On February 28, 1895,[1] Mr. Thomas G. Lawson, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, presented the report of the majority of the committee on the Virginia election case of Goode v. Epes. The report thus states the vote and the returns:

> The board of canvassers of the State of Virginia awarded the certificate of election to the contestee upon evidence before them that he had received a majority of 868 votes. But it appears from the record that the commissioners of election in the counties of Brunswick, Amelia, Prince Edward, Mecklenburg, Greeneville, Lunenburg, and Sussex, respectively, rejected the returns from 21 precincts and refused to canvass and count their votes, at which the contestant received a majority of 1,509 votes, or 641 votes in excess of the majority by which the contestee was declared elected.

Contestant objected to the rejection of these returns, and the case turns on this feature alone.

At the outset certain preliminary questions are discussed:

(a) The majority say in regard to the evidence:

> The law presumes that the board of commissioners of election in the respective counties acted in accordance with the law and the facts of each case when they rejected the returns, and in order to overthrow that presumption the best evidence relating to the invalidity of their conduct ought to be adduced. If the party who impeaches its validity does not furnish the best evidence within his reach in favor of his contention he is open to the suspicion that he is cognizant that such evidence would not avail him. Inasmuch as the action of the commissioners is impeached they are the best witnesses to the facts; they above all other persons must have known the grounds on which these returns were thrown out; they were the only persons who had any agency in their rejection, and the only persons upon whom the law imposed the duty of canvassing and counting them. All other evidence is probably hearsay.
> The evidence in the record relates to the conduct of the commissioners of election in seven counties, in which there were 24 of these officers, yet they were examined in only two counties, and no reason is assigned why one or more of them was not examined in each county. The evidence is therefore primarily defective in quality, and after a close analysis a great deal of it fails to throw any light upon the vital issues in the case. We have, however, rejected none of it. We have labored to the extent of our power to extract the truth from it.

An example of this evidence is afforded in Amelia County where the county clerk testified, and in Mecklenburg County, where the deputy clerk testified as to the action of the commissioners. In the latter county the clerk was sent from the room before the commissioners came to their decision, and when he returned they announced to him their conclusions but not their reasons. The commissioners themselves were not called to explain their acts.

[1] Third session Fifty-third Congress, House Report No. 1952; Rowell's Digest, p. 496; Journal, p. 169.

The minority say:

There is such a presumption in favor of public officers that they do perform their legal duties as that is required by the laws enjoining those duties.

But it is only a presumption at the most, which must yield to proof of the facts affecting the correctness of the presumption. When the facts are fairly supported by legal evidence and they appear to be in conflict with the presumption, then the presumption will, as it should, be completely overthrown. And such will appear to be the condition of this contest, which should be disposed of upon the effect of the evidence, disclosing the real state of the facts upon which the county commissioners have proceeded in rejecting the votes of a large number of precincts or districts, within the Fourth Congressional district of the State of Virginia, to which the present contest relates.

The district contained 98 precincts, besides wards of the city of Petersburg, and in the canvass made by the boards of county commissioners of eight different counties in the Fourth Congressional district of the State, they are claimed to have unlawfully rejected the entire vote of 32 districts or precincts. That circumstance of itself, so far as it has been supported, is sufficient to reasonably suggest the suspicion that these boards were, in their conduct, actuated by a motive not in consonance with an honest or legal discharge of their duties. The evidence as to the conduct of the election in the rejected precincts was largely obtained from reputable local officials, politically acting with the Democratic party, friendly to and supporting the contestee, and opposed to the contestant, who was supported by what are called third-party voters and Republicans. From the evidence of these witnesses the facts have been established to the approval of the counsel for the contestee, that the elections in the rejected precincts were orderly and carefully conducted, and the votes of none but lawful voters were received, and that in the returns made of the votes by the election officers to the county commissioners they endeavored to conform to the requirements of the laws of the State of Virginia to the best of their understanding.

The votes in all the rejected precincts, except one which gave a very small plurality for the sitting Member, were so favorable to the contestant as to wholly overcome the plurality of 868 counted in the district for the contestee, if they had been accepted and canvassed by the boards of county commissioners. And these circumstances very materially advance the presumption that there could be no proper or legal foundation for rejecting the votes of so large a part of this Congressional district as was rejected by the boards of county commissioners. Whether this presumption is in itself accurate or not, must in the end be disclosed by ascertaining from the evidence the reasons leading to the exclusion of these votes, and an examination of the evidence for that object will be made.

In Prince Edward County objection was taken on behalf of the contestee to the taking of evidence on the part of the contestant, for the reason that the notice was served by leaving it at the residence of the contestee on the 10th of February, 1893. This service could only be regularly made in case of inability to serve it on the contestee himself, or on his agent or attorney. The contestee was absent from the district and in attendance on the House of Representatives, but he had an attorney acting in the proceedings, and regularly the service should have been made on him. (Rev. Stat., sec. 108.)

But while the service was irregular, the counsel appears to have had timely information of it, for he appeared before the notary and stated his objection to the service, and then fully cross-examined the witnesses who were sworn on behalf of the contestant. The object of the notice was, therefore, fully accomplished, and the depositions so taken can not be excluded from consideration.

The majority do not mention this objection and evidently did not heed it, since they consider the evidence from this county.

(c) Testimony relating to the stealing of ballots in two precincts of Greeneville County and to the rejection of returns of two precincts of Prince George County, was in the nature of ex parte affidavits, which the majority evidently disregarded. The minority specifically state that this is not the evidence prescribed by the act of Congress, and do not insist on giving it effect.

The examination of the case so far as the merits go divides itself naturally into several branches:

1. The law of Virginia had the following provision:

After canvassing the votes in the manner aforesaid, the judges, before they adjourn, shall put under cover the poll books, seal the same, and direct them to the clerk of the court of the county or corporation (as the case may be) in which the election is held; and the poll books, thus sealed and directed (together with the ballots strung as aforesaid, inclosed, and sealed), shall be conveyed by one of the judges—to be determined by lot if they can not otherwise agree—to the clerk to whom they are directed, on the day following the election, there to remain for the use of the persons who may choose to inspect the same.

It appeared from the evidence that both the poll books and ballots from Rock Stone precinct were returned unsealed, and that the commissioners rejected them for this reason. The majority of the committee say:

Witnesses who were examined as to the condition of poll books and ballots that came from this precinct differ in their depositions as to the sealing of them, but one testifies as to their condition at one period of time and the other at another period of time, and this, no doubt, accounts for the discrepancy. Accepting the deposition of Lewis who describes their condition when received by the commissioners of elections, we are reluctant to say that the returns were not properly rejected. They were certainly not in the condition that the statutes of Virginia prescribe.

But as the voters at this precinct had no agency in sealing the books and ballots, and as their insecure condition can not be imputed to them, we think that they ought not to be deprived of the elective franchise without imperative reasons. We think that the poll books and ballots ought to have been examined by the commissioners of election, and, in the event nothing was found to discredit them, they ought to have been canvassed and counted.

The minority say that the returns were rejected "for what can be certainly said to be no more than a harmless deficiency."

At Wilkinson Shop precinct the poll book was not sealed, and apparently the ballots were not returned with it. The commissioners rejected the return, and the majority of the committee, "in the absence of further or explanatory evidence," conclude that they were warranted in so doing. The minority do not think the evidence proves that the ballots were not sent, and condemn the commissioners for rejecting the returns:

And the only point in this manner presented is whether the omission to seal justified the refusal to canvass the votes of this precinct. The election laws of the State of Virginia have not declared that to be a result of the omission. Section 132 does require that the books and the ballots shall be put under cover and sealed and directed to the clerk of the court of the county in which the election is held, and that they shall be conveyed by one of the judges selected for that service to the clerk to whom they are directed. It does not expressly, or by implication, forbid the clerk from receiving them or the commissioners from canvassing them if they are not sealed. It can not be seen that any actual uncertainty arose out of the omission to seal these books and votes.

It is not pretended that any change was made in the returns or the votes in their transit from the judges and clerks to the clerk of the court or that they had in any respect been interfered with. But they appear by the transcripts in the record to have been before the commissioners as they left the hands of the election officers. And under this state of the facts and the statute of the State, the commissioners could not rightly decline, as they did, to canvass these votes. The rule upon this subject, settled by well-considered authority, is that if the act omitted or the irregularity appearing is not of such a nature as to cast uncertainty on the result or to interfere with the legal expression of the will of the elector, and it has not been made essential to the validity of the election or the statute has not declared that the vote in consequence of the act or omission shall be void or shall not be counted, there the fault or failure of the officers charged with the duty shall not be followed by an exclusion of the vote. (Bowers v. Smith, 111 Missouri, 45, 61–62; McCrary, on Elections, 3d ed., see. 192.)

And conformably with this principle, the vote of this precinct ought to have been accepted and canvassed by the county commissioners.

The returns from Bridgforth's Mill were rejected by the commissioners because the poll book was not sealed, but there being testimony that it was in safe custody, the majority concluded:

In point of fact, the poll book was not sealed, but it was practically protected against alteration, and was securely kept without alteration until it was delivered to the clerk or the court, who was their lawful custodian. For reasons expressed in our comments upon Rock Store precinct we think that the votes at this precinct ought to have been canvassed and counted.

In Mecklenburg County the commissioners rejected the returns of four precincts, three because the returns, while sealed, were so wrapped that they might have been taken from the wrapper at the ends. The returns of the fourth precinct were properly sealed, but in taking them to the county clerk the judge was out in the rain and the moisture partially uncealed them. The majority conclude as to the four precincts:

The evidence is of such character to raise a suspicion that these returns were improperly rejected, but we can not assume, in the absence of evidence sufficiently clear and strong to bring conviction to a mind reasonably unbiased, that the commissioners of election transcended their duty, especially as it appears (rec., p. 116) that unauthorized persons may have had access to the returns.

The minority, after reviewing the testimony, conclude that there was no evidence to show that the returns had been tampered with, and express the opinion that they were improperly rejected.

When an election is moved from the prescribed place to another, should the poll be rejected or corrected with reference to the voters who did not attend?

Participation of a United States marshal in the duties of election officers, no harm being shown, did not justify rejection of the return.

Mere failure of election officers to take the oath prescribed by law does not vitiate the return.

Where the State law gives canvassing officers the authority to correct irregularities, they may not reject returns for lack of clearness.

Canvassing officers, having judicial power, may not reject the poll book as a return for the reason that theft of the ballots has prevented its verification.

2. The commissioners rejected the returns from Trotter's store, in Brunswick County, where contestant had a majority, because the election was held 1 mile from the voting place established by law. The majority justify this rejection, quoting McCrary and Brightley. The new place of election was not visible from the lawful one, and although two men were requested to remain and notify electors of the change of place, there was no evidence that they executed the trust. The majority say:

It is true that the number of votes cast at this precinct was within 20 of the number registered, and the contestant and contestee might both be benefited by crediting them to the latter. To do so would not alter the result we have reached. But, imsmuch as the election was void, we do not think it can be thus validated. It is not known for whom these votes would have been cast, and to establish such a precedent would be mischievous.

The minority do not concur in this. They say it can not be accurately ascertained how the 20 voters who were registered but did not vote would have voted. One witness estimated that 13 would have voted for contestant and 7 for sitting Member. But the minority hold that to avoid injustice to sitting Member the whole 20 should be counted for him:

But to avoid all possible injustice to the contestee, they should all be added to his vote, which will leave a plurality in favor of the contestant of 41 votes. What the law endeavors to do is to give its appropriate effect to the will of the electors, as that may be expressed by their ballots, and not to defeat the expression of their will by giving undue prominence to irregularities productive of neither actual injury nor uncertainty. The officers did the best thing they could under the circumstances, and to still hold the election to be invalid because of the change in the building for holding the election would place the right of the electors on the contingency that the person on whose premises it should be held would permit that to be done. That surely ought not to be allowed, for it would empower one person in many cases to prevent an election from being held at all.

Reviewing the testimony of witnesses, the minority further say:

And they disclose no more than a harmless irregularity, intrenching in no degree upon the right of the voters to have due effect given to their votes and to the registered voters of the precinct. The legal principle is "that irregularities which do not tend to affect the result are not to defeat the will of the majority. The will of the majority is to be respected even when irregularity is expressed." (McCrary on Elections, 3d ed., sec. 193.)

3. The returns of Butter's precinct were rejected by the commissioners because a United States marshal, not sworn as a judge of election, had performed the duties of one of the judges for a part of the day. The majority of the committee found, however, from the testimony of one of the judges of election, that the marshal was merely permitted to hold the registration book during the voting. He did not touch the ballots in any way. Considering the testimony showing the "trifling character" of this interference, the committee conclude that the returns were wrongfully rejected.

4. The returns of Rice's precinct were rejected because the judges and clerks of election were not sworn, so far as was shown. The majority of the committee say:

The failure of the judges and clerks of election at Rice's to take the oath prescribed by law, if such was the case, did not invalidate the election. The vote can not be affected by the failure of an election officer to perform a duty that is purely ministerial and directory.

The minority say the evidence shows that the judges and clerks were sworn, "but the written oaths subscribed by judges and clerks had no signature to the jurats." This the minority consider an inadvertence merely, and say:

As long as it did not appear that these persons were not sworn, the presumption is that they were.

5. At Namozine and Spring Creek precincts the commissioners rejected the returns for the alleged reason that they did not clearly show the state of the vote.

The committee overrule this action, holding that the law of Virginia gave the commissioners authority to correct such irregularities.

6. As to Trotter's Store, in Greenville County, the majority say:

> The ballots from Trotter's Store had also been stolen. The commissioners rejected the poll book for the reason that, the ballots being stolen, they could not compare the two and verify their agreement. We think that the commissioners erred. It was evident that the ballots were stolen to prevent a fair ascertainment of the result of the election. The purpose of the spoliators should have been frustrated if possible; the poll book, though not in the condition required by law, should have been examined, and if found unaltered should have been allowed. To determine whether or not it had been altered, the commissioners were authorized by section 134 of the election laws of Virginia to summon and examine witnesses. We allow the contestant his majority at this precinct.

Various other precincts are discussed by the majority and minority, but questions of fact rather than law are involved.

The majority of the committee, correcting the returns in the light of the above decisions, found that contestant received a majority of 653 votes in precincts wrongfully rejected, and that after this was deducted from sitting Member's returned majority, the latter would have still a majority of 215 votes, and thus should retain the seat.

The minority contended that contestant was shown to have a plurality of 442, and that he should be seated.

The report was never considered in the House, having been submitted within a few days of final adjournment.

1059. The Senate election case of Ady v. Martiin, from Kansas, in the Fifty-third Congress.

A question as to what constitutes an "organization" of a State legislature within the meaning of the law providing for the election of United States Senators.

In 1893 [1] the Senate considered the case of Joseph W. Ady v. John Martin, of Kansas.

The credentials of Mr. Martin as a Senator from the State of Kansas being in due form, he was admitted to a seat in the Senate at the beginning of the special session of the Senate, March 4, 1893. Subsequently a memorial signed by 77 members of the Kansas legislature was presented in the Senate relating to the election of a United States Senator from the State of Kansas to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Preston B. Plumb. The memorial set out the facts from which it was claimed that the proceedings in the election of Mr. Martin to fill the vacancy aforesaid were irregular and illegal, and also set forth the subsequent election of Joseph W. Ady in a legal and formal manner. The grounds on which it was claimed that the proceedings of the legislature of Kansas in the election of Mr. Martin were illegal, are set forth in the remarks of Mr. William E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, who said in debate:

> A Kansas legislature was chosen November 8, 1892—40 senators, 125 representatives, 63 being a majority in the house and 83 a majority of the whole 165.

[1] Election Cases, Senate Doc. No. 11, special session Fifty-eighth Congress, p. 812.

On Tuesday, January 10, 1893, the members assembled at Topeka. The senate was duly organized as one body without controversy; but two houses were organized, each claiming to be lawful.

The Douglass house had 64 members holding certificates from the secretary of state. Three other members, holding certificates, afterwards appeared, making 67 members.

The Dunsmore house had 58 members holding certificates and 10 persons without certificates. These 10 claimed the places of 10 certified members who were in the Douglass house, asserting that of the latter 4 were ineligible because they were postmasters when elected, and that the rest had not been legally elected.

The senate recognized the Dunsmore house and refused to recognize the Douglass house, and so did the governor of the State.

On February 25, 1893, the Kansas supreme court decided that the Douglass house was the lawful body, and on February 28 the members of the Dunsmore house joined the lawful body and the Dunsmore house ceased to exist, none of the 10 unlawful members of that house either being admitted or claiming seats in the lawful body at any time.

On Tuesday, January 24, 1893, the senate voted for United States Senator, no person receiving a majority. The Douglass and Dunsmore houses each voted for United State Senator, Joseph W. Ady receiving a majority in the first and John Martin receiving a majority in the second body.

On Wednesday, January 25, there was a joint assembly, Lieutenant-Governor Daniels presiding. The senate roll was called; 15 senators did not vote; 24 voted for John Martin and I for M. W. Cobun.

The lieutenant-governor then directed B. C. Rich, clerk of the Dunsmore house, to call the roll. Fifty-six members of the Dunsmore house who had held certificates from the secretary of state voted for John Martin, 3 for Cobun, 1 for Mr. Close, 1 for Mr. Snyder, 1 was absent, and 1 did not vote, makin the 58.

Ten members of the Dunsmore house who did not have certificates from the secretary of state voted 9 for Martin and 1 for Hanna.

"After the call thus made had been completed 2 members of the Douglass house, Wilson and Rosenthal, asked to vote; were allowed to do so and voted for Martin."

The vote then stood: Martin, 86; Cobun, 4 Hanna; Close, 1; Snyder, 1; Hanna, 1; making 93.

Before the result of the vote was announced Senator Lucien Baker arcee, and in behalf of 15 senators and 65 representatives asked the right to vote. The lieutenant-governor refused to allow them to vote, declared the result to be as above stated, and that John Martin was elected, and then he left the chair.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question. I have been following the Senator's remarks. Does he mean to say that in the joint convention, where there were rival bodies, two houses of representatives, both present, that the presiding officer, after the roll call of one house had been completed, in order to get votes enough to make a quorum allowed two members of the other house, which he had not recognized, to vote, and that then, after doing that, when other members of that house requested the privilege of voting, he excluded them?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator correctly understands the case. That is exactly what took place, as the language I have read very clearly indicates.

Mr. HALE. Is that an undisputed fact; and if so, what followed upon that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will show the Senator if he will listen a moment. The fact is undisputed that 24 senators voted for Martin; 1 for Cobun; that the roll was then called, and only members of the Dunsmore house voted. I again read:

"After the roll call thus made had been completed two members of the Douglass house, Wilson and Rosenthal, asked to vote; were allowed to do so, and voted for Martin."

The Senator is correct in the suggestion that it took these two votes to make in joint assembly up to that time 83, being a majority of the whole legislature. I proceed:

"The excluded senators and members continued in session, elected George L. Douglass presiding officer, and proceeded to cast their votes as follows:

"Joseph W. Ady, 77; present and not voting, 3."

And thereupon Mr. Douglass declared that there had been no election of United States Senator, and the assembly adjourned.

The total votes cast, which justify the conclusion that there was no choice, appear below, as follows:

	Votes
John Martin	86
Cobun	4
Close	1
Snyder	1
Hanna	1
J. W. Ady	77
	170
Deduct the surplus and illegal votes, being	10
Total legal votes	160
Necessary for a choice	81
Martin received	86
Deduct his illegal votes, being	9
Total legal votes cast for Martin	77

Or 4 less than were necessary for an election.

An attempt has been made to show that Martin in the assembly as cut short by the lieutenant-governor was elected without counting the 10 illegal votes, as follows:

	Votes
John Martin	77
Cobun	4
Giving in all	83

votes cast by legal members, and being exactly a majority of the whole 165 legal members of the legislature.

But to make this calculation it is necessary to count the 2 votes of Wilson and Rosenthal from the Douglass house, while excluding the 65 other members of that house and the 15 senators.

To justify taking in the 2 while excluding the 80 is impossible.

From the foregoing facts it is not difficult to reach two conclusions: First, the time had not arrived when the legislature of Kansas could lawfully elect a United States Senator. The legislature had not been organized within the meaning of the United States law, which is as follows:

"SEC. 14. The legislature of each State * * * shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress."

It is true that there was a lawful senate, and it is true, as appears from the subsequent decision of the supreme court of Kansas, that there was a lawful house. But it is also true that there was, in addition to the lawful house, an unlawful house, and that unlawful house was recognized by the senate and by the governor, while the lawful house received no recognition as such, either from the senate or from the governor.

Manifestly there was no organization of a legislature within the meaning of the national statute, so that the time began to ran at the end of which, by the national law, it was the right and the duty of the members of the legislature to elect a United States Senator. In no just sense could the legislature be said to be organized under the conditions above described. It is not contended that in all cases where a lawful senate and a lawful house are organized it must be shown that they communicate with each other and recognize each other. That fact is to be presumed in the absence of counter proof; but as soon as such counter proof appears and the anomalous condition is shown that the lawful house has made no connection with the senate, but that the senate, on the other hand; is in connection with an unlawful house, there can not be said to be in any proper sense an organization of the legislature within the meaning of the United States statute. This point I do not intend to enlarge upon. I am thoroughly convinced of its validity.

But, conceding that there was an organized legislature on Tuesday, January 10, 1893, entitled on the second Tuesday thereafter, namely, on January 24, and on the day after, the 25th, to elect a United States Senator, it seems clear that there was no lawful election. Review the facts. The members of the three houses met in one room. The voting began. A part of the senators voted, the other part omitting to vote. The members of the unlawful house voted, the members of the lawful house omitting to vote when the roll was called by the clerk of the unlawful house, whom they did not recognize as clerk. Then two members of the legal house asked to vote, and their votes were received. Next, the senators who had not voted and the members of the legal house asked to vote, but the lieutenant-governor refused to receive their votes, although he had received the two votes from the members of the legal house, and then he declared Mr. Martin elected.

Can it be by any possibility contended that the lieutenant-governor had any right so to deal with the joint assembly; to receive the votes of the members of the illegal house; to receive at his discretion the votes of two members of the legal house, and then to exclude the remaining 62 members of the legal house and 15 senators? The idea is preposterous. The case is clear. Either there was no lawful joint assembly on that day, because the legislature was not organized, or it was the duty of the lieutenant-governor to receive the votes of all the members of the two houses. To base the right of a Senator to a seat upon this floor, as Senator Martin's right is based, solely upon the assumed authority of the lieutenant-governor, as exercised in this case, to receive votes enough to elect Mr. Martin and make a majority of the legal votes of the whole legislature, and then to arbitrarily stop the balloting and declare Mr. Martin to be elected, is as dangerous and vicious a proceeding as has ever been heard of in the history of fraudulent elections.

While the matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, no report was made and no action was taken by the Senate.

1060. The Senate election case of Davidson v. Call, from Florida, in the Fifty-second Congress.

For the election of a United States Senator the joint meeting of the legislature is a distinct and separate body with a quorum of its own.

In 1892[1] the Senate investigated the case of R. H. M. Davidson v. Wilkinson W, of Florida.

In April, 1891, the legislature of the State of Florida met and was duly organized at the time and place appointed by law. On the second Tuesday after such organization, being the 21st day of April, 1891, the two chambers of which it was composed held a session and voted, each separately, for the election of a United States Senator. No one was chosen at this election, and it was so declared and entered upon the journals of the respective houses. On the following day, being Wednesday, the 22d of April aforesaid, the legislature met at noon in joint assembly, and one vote was taken for Senator, which resulted in no election. And on every succeeding day, except Sundays, until the 26th day of May, 1891, they met and took one vote in the same manner, with the same result. On the 26th day of May, 1891, the joint assembly met as before, and upon a vote being taken for United States Senator it was found that Wilkinson Call had received a majority of the votes of those present and voting, the same being also a majority of all the members elected to both houses of the legislature. Thereupon Mr. Call was declared duly elected.

The validity of this election was questioned upon the ground that there was not a quorum of the State senate present and voting at the time it occurred. This objection was based upon the proposition that the joint convention or assembly in such cases is composed of the two houses as such, and that therefore a quorum of each must attend to properly form such convention.

The governor being of the opinion that this position was sound appointed Robert H. M. Davidson to be Senator from the State of Florida until the next meeting of the legislature, and issued credentials in the usual form under date of September 22, 1891, to which the secretary of state affixed the great seal of the State in obedience to a peremptory writ of mandamus issued by the supreme court of Florida, November 17, 1891.[1] The credentials of both claimants were presented to the Senate December 7, 1891. On the following day Mr. Call was sworn and his credentials, as well as those of Mr. Davidson, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee reported, February 1, 1892, finding the facts set forth in the preceding paragraph, and holding that "This act [of July 25, 1866] provides that 'the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly,' etc. The joint assembly is thus composed not of the two houses, but of the members thereof. The joint assembly is not a junction or union of the two houses as such; it is not a merger of the two houses into one of either, but it is a body distinct and separate from either as such, and has by the words of the enactment a quorum of its own prescribed and defined, to wit, 'a majority of all the members elected to both houses,' without any reference to a quorum either of the senate or the house. * * * The term legislature in this clause is not to be construed technically with reference to the separate chambers which may exist within it, but as designating the collective number of all the persons composing it? and that therefore Mr. Call was duly elected.

February 4, 1892, the Senate considered the report of the committee and declared Mr. Call "lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate."

1061. The Senate election case of Clagett v. Dubois, of Idaho, in the Fifty-second Congress.

As to what constitutes the "organization" of a legislature under the terms of the law relating to the election of United States Senators.

In 1892[2] the Senate investigated the case of William H. Clagett v. Fred. T. Dubois, of Idaho. The first legislature of the State of Idaho met, pursuant to proclamation by the governor, Monday, December 8, 1890. The house of representatives effected a permanent organization on that day. The senate, the lieutenant-governor being ex officio presiding officer, after prayer, elected a clerk pro tempore, after which the senators were sworn, a committee on rules selected, choice of seats provided for, a set of temporary rules adopted, and, finally, a committee on organization appointed. Tuesday, December 9, the permanent organization was perfected by the choice of a secretary and other officers. Tuesday, December 16, being the second Tuesday after Monday, December 8, each branch of the legislature took one ballot, acting under joint resolution, "to elect, as provided by law, United States Senators." The following day the two houses met in joint convention, and, the result of the previous day's balloting showing no choice of a Senator, proceeded to ballot. No person was elected on this day. On the following day, Thursday, December 18, the joint convention elected Messrs. Shoup and McConnell Senators to fill the existing vacancies, and Mr. Dubois for the term beginning March 4, 1891. Mr. Dubois's credentials were issued under date of December 18, 1890. February 6, 1891, the legislature of Idaho voted that there was "at least grave doubt" as to the validity of the election of Fred. T. Dubois and to proceed to a new election. In pursuance of this resolution a new election was held, and Mr. Clagett was declared elected February 11, 1891. The governor issued credentials, certifying that fact, under date of February 14, 1891. On the assembling of the Fifty-second Congress Mr. Dubois presented himself to take the oath as Senator. Objection was made, and the matter went over until the following day, when Mr. Dubois was sworn, and his credentials, together with a memorial of William H. Clagett, claiming the seat, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The majority of the committee reported that "both on construction and precedent the legislature of Idaho was organized on Monday, December 8, A. D. 1890, within the meaning of the term 'organization' as used in the constitution of the State of Idaho, in the act of admission, and in the Revised Statutes" (R.S., sec. 14); that "Tuesday, the 16th day of December, was, in the judgment of [the] committee, the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the legislature of the State of Idaho," and that therefore Mr. Dubois was duly elected and entitled to retain his seat. Two of the committee dissented, contending that according to precedent the word "organization "meant permanent organization" that the permanent organization was not effected until Tuesday, December 9; that the proceedings which culminated in the election of Mr. Dubois did not take place on the second Tuesday thereafter, but were premature, and that therefore he was not entitled to the seat as Senator from Idaho. February 25, pending the discussion of the report of the committee, Mr. Clagett was given the right to speak in his own behalf for two hours, and on the following day the limit of time was removed. March 3 Mr. Dubois was declared entitled to retain his seat by vote of 55 yeas to 5 nays.

Chapter XXXVIII.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1895 TO 1897.

1062. The Missouri election case of Van Horn v. Tarsney, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The returns and ballots of several precincts being tainted by a general conspiracy of election officers, the House rejected the entire returns of those precincts.

Discussion as to the wisdom of attempting to purge a poll whereof both returns and ballots axe discredited by fraud of election officers.

Instance wherein a returned Member presented as a question of privilege a proposition to reopen his election case for further testimony.

When contestee submits an affidavit to justify his request that his election case be reopened, the affidavit must be definite and specific.

Where a State law does not provide for reinspection of ballots, may they be examined under authority of the law for taking testimony in election cases?

Evidence of voters as to their votes is of doubtful validity if taken several months after election.

On December 28, 1895,[2] Mr. John C. Tarsney, of Missouri, presented as a question of privilege a resolution authorizing the reopening of the contested-election case of Van Horn v. Tarsney, so that additional testimony might be taken and made a part of the record in the case. Mr. Tarsney presented to the House, to show the materiality of the additional testimony, an affidavit, which was read.

Then, after debate, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 2.

The committee did not report directly on this resolution, but on February 13, 1896,[1] Mr. Henry U. Johnson, of Indiana, reported on the whole case, and at the same time minority views were presented by Messrs. R. W. Tayler, of Ohio, and James G. Maguire, of California, wherein the real issue of the case was presented—whether or not additional testimony should be taken.

Mr. Tarsney had been returned by an official plurality of 745 votes, which the contestant attacked on the ground of fraud and illegality.

The majority of the committee analyzed the vote of only four precincts of Kansas City, finding it so tainted with fraud that it should be rejected entirely, thereby eliminating the plurality of the sitting Member and giving to the contestant a plurality of 375 votes in the district. The minority of the committee admitted fraud and conspiracy in three of the four precincts and acknowledged that if the vote of these precincts should be rejected the contestant would be shown to be elected. But the minority urged that the case should be reopened, and presented resolutions recommitting the case with imstructions—that additional evidence be taken in said case, under such rules and in such manner as shall be adopted and prescribed therefor by the said committee, such additional evidence to be confined to the condition and custody of the ballots cast in the second, fifth, sixth, seventh, twenty-seventh, and fifty-second precincts[2] of Kansas City * * *; to the segregation of the illegal from the legal ballots in such precincts, and to the recount of the legal ballots cast in such precincts for Representative in Congress, and to include also duly certified copies of all poll books of such precincts not now in evidence.

Therefore the issue was joined on the question whether the vote of the four precincts should be entirely rejected or whether the ballots should be examined and the vote purged.

As bearing upon this issue the committee give details of an evident and acknowledged conspiracy to commit frauds led by an official known as the recorder of votes and participated in by election officials. In pursuance of this conspiracy the registration lists were padded with fraudulent names; the recommendations of contestant's party for representation on the election boards were disregarded so as to nullify the law guaranteeing representation; the challengers and witnesses which the law allowed to contestant's party were excluded from the polls. By precincts the details of the conspiracy were worked out as follows:

Fifty-second precinct: Here the returns gave Mr. Tarsney 363 votes and Mr. Van Horn 183. The testimony showed that the windows of the polling place were soaped to screen the manipulations of the election officers; that 115 ballots that had been cast for contestant's party were withdrawn and their registration and voting numbers were given to straight tickets of sitting Member's party, which were counted; that other ballots were taken from the box, and that others were burned. The names of 90 persons were found on the poll books who could not be found in the precinct, and many of the names were registered from vacant lots. A witness who cast his ballot early in the morning nevertheless found that its consecutive number was 300. Another, who got a view through a clear space in the window, saw one of the judges putting votes into the ballot box when no one was voting. The committee find that—

[2] As reported in the minority views, this resolution included only the four precincts discussed in the report of the majority. The additional precincts were included afterwards. (Record, pp. 2131, 2234.)

> The poll was perfectly saturated with corruption. As a consequence of this the returns and also the ballots, which passed through corrupt hands, are so tainted with it as to be inadmissible as evidence and unworthy of credit. They can not be looked to for the purpose of purging the poll and ascertaining the honest vote cast. Indeed, the ballots are not in the record at all, nor is there before the committee any satisfactory testimony to which they can resort in order to find out the true result. They therefore cast the entire precinct out of the count.

Seventh precinct: In this precinct 270 registered persons, who were marked as having voted, could not be found, and many were registered from vacant lots, vacant houses, etc. The total vote also was swelled beyond reasonable limits. Testimony showed that ballots cast by voters were withheld by Judges and others substituted and placed in the box. The law required each voter to be numbered on the poll book in the order in which he voted, and the first 200 voters appeared to have performed the astonishing feat of coming to the polls in the alphabetical order of their names; and three men who voted immediately after the polls were opened found themselves numbered, respectively, 205, 206, 207. Of these frauds the committee say:

> Their extent baffles inquiry. It is not known at what point the corrupt officers of election stopped short in their dishonest practices. * * * The returns are tainted, the ballots are not in the record, and even if they were could not be received as evidence entitled to credit; nor is there any kind of evidence before the committee by which the poll can be purged and the honest vote be ascertained. It must therefore be thrown out entirely.

Sixth precinct: The testimony showed that 341 persons registered and marked on the poll book as voting could not be found, and many were registered from vacant lots. Persons who were marked as voting testified that they did not vote; the first 200 voters appeared as voting in alphabetical order, and the total vote of the precinct was swelled beyond reasonable limits. There was nothing in the record whereby the precinct could be purged.

Fifth precinct: The testimony showed that 400 of the persons registered as voters could not be found, many being registered from impossible places. Persons were recorded as voting in alphabetical order. There was testimony to show that large numbers of fraudulent ballots were put in the box on the night before election. The majority of the committee in this as in other cases favor throwing out the entire vote.

The entire committee substantially admitted the facts as to the frauds, but not the conclusion that the entire votes should be rejected.

The application of sitting Member for authorization to reopen the case, and the status of the ballots as evidence should the request be granted, were questions producing division.

The majority found that the affidavits of the sitting Member were too indefinite and insufficient to authorize the reopening of the case. As to the request that the ballots be inspected, the majority find that it was made too late, and that the excuse as to lack of a law of Missouri authorizing such inspection, the provisions of State law being confined simply to inspection of ballots in contests for local offices, was not well founded. "He also cites," say the committee, "decision of the State court that even the grand jury could not inspect them in the investigation of election frauds." The Constitution of the United States, however, provides that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and to enable the House of Representatives the more readily to exercise this prerogative Congress passed a statute prescribing the methods to be observed in contests for a seat therein, under which statute this contest was being conducted. The Constitution and this statute enacted pursuant thereto are by the very provisions of the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State are bound thereby, anything in the constitution or the laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. The minority of the committee do not agree to this reasoning, and hold that the ballots might not have been exhibited "to any officer or commissioner other than a duly authorized representative of either of the Houses of Congress."

The majority of the committee, construing Mr. Tarsney's application for a recount to apply to 100 of the 200 alphabetical ballots in the Fifth precinct, show that the result could not be changed whatever might be shown by this limited recount. The minority deny that the application was so limited, and declare that it contemplated a general purging.

As to the admissibility of the ballots as evidence, the majority of the committee say:

> The proposition is to offer these alphabetical ballots in evidence, or what is practically the same thing, prove their contents and condition by witnesses who saw them at the time of this recount, in October, 1895. Of course it is expected that such evidence will be received and considered by the committee and the House when so taken. It is submitted, however, that such evidence is not competent and credible, and ought not to be regarded, as hereinbefore stated in this report.
> The ballots, like the returns, are tainted. They have passed through the hands of fraudulent and corrupt officers of election, and thus their credibility and integrity are destroyed.
> This principle is one laid down in all the text-books on the subject, and has found frequent recognition in the determination of contested-election cases by the House, some of which authorities have been heretofore cited in this report. Being founded in reason and experience, this principle ought not to be disregarded in this instance.

The majority further find that in addition to the original taint, the ballots had been tampered with in the office of the corrupt recorder of votes. The minority did not agree to this, but contended that the testimony failed to show that the ballots preserved by the proper officer were not the identical ballots cast and counted.

Mr. R. W. Tayler, of Ohio, who submitted individual views, showed that by the law of Missouri the ballots were all preserved, each marked with the voting number of the voter. An examination of the poll book would reveal his voting number and his ballot would be found with the corresponding number. [The majority combatted this in debate by showing that the ballot offered by the voter was sometimes changed for a different ballot, which took its number and went into the box.] But Mr. Tayler contended that the precincts could be purged satisfactorily, saying:

> We can thus, with reasonable definiteness, appraise the fraud and be relieved from the necessity of invoking the dangerous and mischievous doctrine that a poll, tainted with fraud and not purged, must be entirely disregarded. This drastic method is never to be resorted to except in case of absolute and unavoidable necessity. The disfranchisement of honest voters thereby wrought is too grave a wrong to be permitted if, by any possibility, it can be averted. * * *

I am therefore convinced that, under these circumstances, it was the duty of the committee to take the testimony of the ballots and thereby, if the contestant was honestly elected, to say so with certainty. His title would no longer rest upon conjecture and inference, and the committee and the House would be forever relieved from the imputation of having acted in a partisan spirit.

The doctrine of throwing out entire returns by reason of fraud, while tolerable in theory and sometimes essential in practice, is, nevertheless, most vicious and unhappy in its application.

I doubt if a single instance will be found in a legislative contested-election case where a proposition to strike out an entire return, if of the substance of the case, was decided on any other than party lines.

A principle thus fostered and thus abused is not a principle to be invoked, except where the exigencies of the case absolutely demand it.

The minority report presented by Mr. Maguire conceded that the returns were discredited; but contended that the ballots were preserved as they were cast; that it was possible to separate the legal from the illegal, and purge instead of reject the votes of the precincts.

The majority of the committee also disapproved a proposition to take the testimony of voters. It might have been done immediately after the election, but "now, after the lapse of sixteen months, under changed circumstances, in a population shown to be shifting and migratory, when the facts have faded from the memory of the people, under the opportunity to commit perjury with immunity," the committee considered it useless and unwise.

On February 25, 26, and 27 [1] the report was debated at length, the issue being joined principally on the question of a recount of the ballots. On the latter day, by a vote of yeas 110, nays 163, the House disagreed to the resolution of the minority proposing a reexamination of the case; and then, without division, the resolutions of the majority declaring contestee not entitled to the seat and that contestant was elected were agreed to. Mr. Van Horn, the contestant, was then sworn in.

Testimony which merely raises a presumption that money was used for bribery is not sufficient to affect the determination of an election case.

The Elections Committee declined to recommend the reopening of a case for further testimony on facts not set forth in the notice or substantiated by testimony.

The ordinary provisions of the Australian ballot system for placing names of candidates on the ticket is hardly a violation of section 1, Article XIV of the Constitution., relating to equal protection of the laws.

On January 22, 1896,[2] Mr. Henry U. Johnson, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted a report on the case of Campbell v. Miner, from New York.

The sitting Member received by the official returns a plurality of 954 votes, and the contestant sought to attack this plurality, alleging bribery and intimidation.

[2] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 106; Rowell's Digest, p. 514.

The committee, after a careful examination of the evidence by which contestant sought to sustain the charges, found that while the testimony "raises a presumption that money was illegally used at this election to bribe the voters at one of the precincts, yet there is not sufficient evidence in the record to enable the committee to determine that it was actually so applied, or the extent to which it affected the result, and they are of the clear opinion that the contestant has wholly failed to establish any of the grounds of contest which were set out in the notice in the case."

After the reference of the case to the committee, and before the final hearing, the contestant moved the committee, under oath, for leave to reopen the case and to take further testimony therein to prove the matters alleged in his contest, and also to prove that by the act of the police commissioners of New York supplemented by a mandamus from Judge McAdams, his name had wrongfully been kept off the official ballot, and he was thereby deprived of 5,214 votes which were cast for John Simpson, whose name was placed on the ticket, and that he was prevented from proving these facts while he was taking his testimony in the case by reason of the misconduct of his attorney and his own arrest for contempt by Judge McAdams, on account of things said by him while testifying on his own behalf. This motion of the contestant was resisted by the sitting Member, who filed his affidavit in opposition thereto. The committee overruled this request, as the alleged facts were not set forth in the notice of contest; they were not substantiated by the testimony, which showed on the contrary that contestant had not improved the time allowed him by the law, and that his arrest was at a time not calculated to interfere with the preparation of his case.

One other feature of the case is thus set forth by the committee:

> The committee also report that on the final hearing of the case before them the contestant urged that the election law of New York under which said election was held was unconstitutional and void, for the reason that the provision requiring the candidate for Representative in Congress to be nominated for the office by a party convention, or petitioned for by a certain per cent of the voters before his name can be placed upon the ticket to be voted for, constitutes an abridgment of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and is a denial by the State to persons within its jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws, as guaranteed in section I of Article XIV of the Federal Constitution. For this reason he insisted that the election was a nullity, and that the seat in controversy in this contest should be declared vacant.
> This provision of the New York election law, whose unconstitutionality is urged, is a conspicuous feature of what is known as the Australian ballot system, which system has been in force in a number of States of the Union for a considerable period of time, and the constitutionality of this feature has never, to the knowledge of your committee, been questioned in the courts. It is to them incredible that it should have gone so long without having been challenged if it is in contravention of the Constitution. If it is really open to this objection a large per cent of the Members now holding seats in this body are not entitled to retain the same. The committee themselves entertain no doubt of the constitutionality of the provision, but do not deem it advisable to prolong this report by giving the arguments in support of their views.

On January 21 [1] the question was considered in the House, and the resolutions declaring contestant not elected and the sitting Member entitled to the seat were agreed to without division.

1064. The Alabama election case of Aldrich v. Robbins in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The specifications, of a notice of contest are required to give a reasonable degree of information but not to have the precision of pleadings in the courts.

A notary taking testimony in an election case under the Federal law has jurisdiction within the district, although State law may restrict his functions to a county.

On February 20, 1896,[1] the Committee on Elections No. 1 reported in the case of Aldrich v. Robbins, of Alabama. Besides the merits of the case two preliminary questions were involved:

(1) The sitting Member objected that the notice of contest given by the contestant was not a sufficient compliance with the law of 1851, and the minority of the committee supported this objection on the ground that the notice was too general, there not being "the same precision in averments as is required in other proceedings in which courts decide as to law and the facts." It did not state how many votes the contestant received nor how many the contestee received, and was deficient in allegations as to conduct of election officers.

The majority of the committee considered the allegations in the notice sufficient, citing the following as a fair sample of all:

> At precinct No. 12 in said county, commonly called "Old Town," there were actually cast at said election 35 votes. You were credited with and allowed 278 votes, and myself with none. Of the 278 votes allowed you at least 243 votes were in fact never cast, and of the 35 votes actually cast I claim and charge that I received a large portion thereof.

The majority consider that this notice did "specify particularly the grounds" even more amply than the statute required. What the law requires," says the report, "is a reasonable degree of information; and that, as to this and the other precincts, was given."

(2) The sitting Member also objected to the competency of the notary who took the testimony in Dallas and Calhoun counties, claiming that, as he was authorized by the laws of Alabama to act only in Shelby County, he had no authority to act in any other county. The minority of the committee argued in favor of this objection, denying the authority of the precedent in the case of Washburn v. Voorhees, and quoting decisions: American Land Company v. People et al. (102 Alabama), United States v. Curtis (107 U. S.), United States v. Hall (15 U. S.).

The minority conclude:

> The true test to apply to this question is: If a witness who had been sworn before this notary public were indicted for perjury or false swearing before him in this case where the oath was administered and the testimony given in Dallas or Calhoun counties, could he be convicted? He could not, in either State or Federal court.

The majority of the committee held as follows:

> It was also objected for the contestee that the notary before whom the evidence was taken was without authority to take that obtained out of the county for which he had been appointed to act under the laws of the State. But he was not acting within the restrictions imposed upon him by the laws of the State of Alabama in taking this evidence. The laws of the United States prescribed a special mode of proceeding for this class of cases, and aside from this authority no evidence in a contested election could be taken before the officers enumerated in the statute.

An object of the statute was to point out the persons who should be empowered to take the evidence, not to exercise their functions as State, city, or county officers, but to execute the full authority created for this purpose by Congress. The notary is one of these officers, selected, however, to act under Federal, not under State, authority, and the power to act has been given to him commensurate with the object to be attained.

By the language of the statute the contestant is empowered to apply for a subpoena to any notary, etc., who may reside within the Congressional district in which the election to be contested was held. The officer is also required to issue subpoena directed to all such persons as shall be named to him, requiring their attendance at some time and place mentioned in the subpoena. And the only restriction imposed is that the witness shall not be required to attend out of the county of his residence.

As to the power of the officer, he may act anywhere within the Congressional district. His authority has been restricted to no subdivision of it whatever. He may issue subpoenas for all such witnesses as shall be named to him, and the subpoenas must be returnable before himself. As that is the mode of proceeding which has been indicated, any officer mentioned in the statute may act, and in acting has been given complete authority to act wholly and effectually. The law further provides that the witnesses who attend shall be examined on oath by the officer who issued the subpoena, unless he may be absent, etc.

From the generality of these regulations it is clear that a single officer has been empowered to issue all the subpoenas and take all the evidence. They are quite explicit, and create a system in and of themselves in no measure dependent on the laws of the State (U.S. Rev. Stat., 19, 20, secs. 110, 115, 120), and this effect was accorded to the statute in the contest of Washburn against Voorhees (2 Bartlett, 54).

Instance wherein the color of the voters was taken into account as creating a presumption in relation to their votes.

Where testimony showed that fewer persons went to the polls than the total of returned votes, the excess of votes was deducted from the party profiting.

Discussion as to whether a poll should be purged or rejected when the returns give the total of votes far beyond the number of voters attending.

It not being shown that the ballots had been tampered with and State law requiring their preservation, secondary evidence of the vote was not considered.

Instance wherein evidence of declarations of voters and their affidavits; as to their votes were not accepted as showing the state of the poll.

The presumption in favor of the truthfulness of official returns disappears on proof that the election officers violated the law.

As to the merits of the case, it appeared from the official returns that the sitting Member received 10,492 votes and the contestant 6,756, a majority of 3,736 for the sitting Member.

The minority of the committee conceded frauds enough proven to reduce sitting Member's majority to 559 votes. A portion of the majority, differing from their associates as to the amount to be deducted in cases of fraud, found a majority of 601 votes for the contestant, while a second portion of the majority conceived that the contestant should be credited with a majority of 1,131 as a result of the purging of the polls.

There were six counties in the district, of which the contestant carried four. A fifth county, Calhoun, was carried by the sitting Member by less than 400 majority, far below the number necessary to overcome contestant's majority in the other counties. But the sixth county, Dallas, returned for sitting Member 5,462 votes, and for contestant 72, thus giving sitting Member a majority of 3,736 in the district.

The voting population of Dallas County was shown to be about 10,000, of which 7,500 were colored and 2,500 white. With rare exceptions the colored voters were Republicans. The white voters were divided among Democratic factions, which were not unanimous in support of the sitting Member. The county contained 28 precincts. Of these, 13 returned 221 votes for Robbins and 42 for Aldrich. So it appeared that Mr. Robbins's returned vote of 5,462 from Dallas County came largely from the other 15 precincts; and it was only in relation to these precincts that evidence was taken in this county.

The supporters of contestant, who was a Republican, had feared that their votes in this county would be counted for the Democratic party, so they generally remained away from the polls. They generally kept watch on the polls, however, and were able to afford testimony as to the total number of voters who went to the polls in the various precincts.

Thus, at the Summerfield precinct, where the official return gave Robbins 160 votes and Aldrich 2, the testimony showed that only 31 persons went to the polls. This generally was the method adopted to show the fraudulent nature of the return. As to the conclusions to be derived from such a state of fact, there was a difference among the majority members of the committee. The larger portion of them say:

> The certificate of the inspectors, therefore, can not be relied on, and since there is no evidence as to whether these persons voted after entering the polling place, or for whom the votes were cast, we are unable to count any for either candidate.

But two members considered it the safer practice to deduct from the sitting Member only 129 votes, the surplus of the returned poll over the actual number of voters who went to the polls.

This question of the amount of deduction is more fully considered in connection with the vote of the city of Selma, which was polled at one precinct. The official return gave Robbins 2,014 votes, Aldrich 5. The testimony showed that less than 800 voters went into the voting place during the election, and that there were not over 700 names on the poll list that represented qualified voters of Selma. Four members of the committee considered the return of Selma so saturated with fraud that they should throw it all out except the votes of 4 men who swore how they voted. It was urged that, although it might be shown that over 700 men entered the voting place, there was no testimony to show how many of them voted; and even if it should be assumed that all of them voted, there was no testimony to show for whom they voted. But five members of the committee considered that 767 votes should be allowed as cast, and that the surplus of 1,247 votes, evidently unlawfully added to the honest vote, should be deducted from the vote returned for the sitting Member.

As to the precincts of the Third Ward of Anniston and Montevallo, contestant made an effort to correct the official returns by introducing the testimony of citizens who swore that they voted for Aldrich. In Montevallo the return gave Robbins 208 and Aldrich 199. A witness swore that 273 persons publicly declared that they voted for Aldrich, and the affidavits of 283 persons who swore that they voted for Aldrich were read. In the Third Ward of Anniston 14 votes were returned for Aldrich and 42 for Robbins. A witness swore that there were 85 colored voters in the ward, and that he recognized 23 of them on the poll list, all of whom were Republicans but 1. A majority of the committee held that, as the State laws required the preservation of the ballots, they should be resorted to in the first instance, and that secondary evidence could not be offered of the contents of the ballot boxes until it should be shown that they had been so tampered with as not to speak the truth. Two members of the committee, including the chairman, favored counting for the contestant the votes sworn to by uncontradicted testimony.

The sitting Member relied for his defense only on the presumption in favor of the truthfulness of the official returns. The majority say that this is only a presumption and disappears at once on proof that the election officers violated the law.

In the debate further facts in the record of the case were referred to—that the requirements of the Alabama law in relation to registration were violated; and that the contestant's party had not been treated fairly in the appointment of election inspectors.

The majority of the committee concurred in presenting resolutions declaring sitting Member not elected and the contestant elected and entitled to the seat.

On March 12 and 13,[1] the report was debated at length in the House, and on the latter day a vote was taken on a proposition of the minority to substitute resolutions declaring the sitting Member elected and entitled to the seat. This substitute was decided in the negative, yeas 58, nays 173. Then the resolutions of the committee were agreed to without division, and Mr. Aldrich was sworn in.

1066. The South Carolina election case of Moorman v. Latimer in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

A ballot is not invalidated by reason of an abbreviated designation of the office which omits the number of the Congress and the name of the State.

Where many persons are disfranchised by an unconstitutional election law, the House will not bring them into the account on the mere opinion of witnesses as to the number.

On March 4, 1896[2] Mr. Charles K. Bell, of Texas, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the report in the case of Moorman v. Latimer, from South Carolina.

In the first place contestant alleged that the ballots cast for Mr. Latimer were invalid. The committee say:

"The tickets voted for Latimer were printed thus: "Representative in Congress, third district, A.C. Latimer," and contestant claims that they should not have been counted for him, because they did not state that they were voted for a candidate for the third district of the State of South Carolina, nor for a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress. In the case of Blair v. Barrett a ballot headed "For Congress, Francis P. Blair," was held to have been properly counted for him. We think the ballots complained of were clearly sufficient, and that they were properly counted for contestee.

Contestant alleged that at the various precincts in the district the managers of election refused to allow from 6,000 to 7,000 voters of contestant's party to cast their ballots because they did not have registration certificates, as required by the laws of South Carolina, which laws, he contended, were unconstitutional, because in conflict with the Constitution of the United States and of said State. The contestant also alleged that a number of properly registered voters, who would have voted for him, were denied the privilege by the managers of election for various reasons.

Adopting the most liberal construction of the evidence and conceding the registration laws to be invalid the committee could find only 4,578 votes lost to the contestant for the above reasons, and the addition of these to his poll would still leave the sitting Member a plurality of 215 votes.

The committee do not, however, approve the proof by which contestant attempted to establish some of his allegations, and say:

> Contestant has sought to introduce the testimony of witnesses who give their opinion as to the number of persons who would have voted for him at certain places without stating who they were or giving any other particulars, but the committee is of opinion that testimony of this character is not admissible.

The committee therefore recommended resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat, and on April 15, 1896,[1] the House concurred in the report.

1067. The Maryland election case of Booze v. Rusk, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The House counted the votes of persons who swore that they intended and tried to vote for contestant but were prevented because other persons had voted on their names.

The House declined to reject the poll of a precinct whereof the registration was impeached by a police census of doubtful weight.

On March 18, 1896,[2] Mr. George W. Prince, of Illinois, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Booze v. Rusk, of Maryland. On the face of the returns the sitting Member had a majority of 518.

The contestant, seeking to attack this majority, charged first that he was deprived of a large number of ballots cast for him at the election and that a number of ballots were improperly counted for sitting Member. The committee found, by a recount, a gain of 131 votes for contestant.

Secondly, contestant charged that a number of legal bona fide voters of the district who intended to vote for him at the election were refused the right by officers of the election. The committee found from the evidence of witnesses who testified that they were denied the right to vote at their respective precincts simply because some one had already voted on their names; that 40 persons were thus excluded and that they would have voted the ticket of contestant's party. So the committee credited 40 votes to him.

The committee, in respect to the third contention of the contestant, that illegal and fraudulent votes were cast for the sitting Member, found 161 such votes, and deducted them from his vote.

In respect to other charges of fraud and intimidation the committee found the evidence too slight to sustain them.

As to the fact that there was a difference between the registration in the fifth precinct of the Second Ward of Baltimore and the police census, the committee found that under the law of Maryland the voter, in order to be registered, had to appear before the registration board, consisting of three members, two of the majority party and one of the minority party, and make oath that he had been a resident of the State for one year and of the voting district for six months, and that he had attained the age of 21 years. There was ample opportunity, under the law, to purge the registration list by applying, first, to the board of registration; should they refuse, then to the Maryland court of appeals. This court, in the case of Langhammer v. Munter, had decided:

> The fact that a man's name does not appear upon the police census of registered voters is too uncertain to be entitled to much weight.

The court declined to strike names from the registration list because they did not appear on the police census returns. The committee did not consider that the vote of this precinct (against which other allegations were made but not sustained by the evidence) should be thrown out.

On March 18[1] the House concurred with the committee that the sitting Member was entitled to the seat, contestant not having proved enough to overcome the returned majority.

1068. The Alabama election case of Robinson v. Harrison in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The House counted returns received by the State canvassers too late to be included in their summary.

Disorder before the opening of the polls and for the purpose of affecting the choice of election officers and not affecting the poll itself Was disregarded by the House.

Participation by an election judge in bribery did not justify rejection of the poll when the contaminated votes could be separated.

Friends of contestant not being represented on an election board and there being evidence of fraud in the registration and voting, the poll was rejected.

Although the boards of election officers may be constituted unfairly, the House will yet give full effect to legal votes.

On April 4, 1896,[2] Mr. Fred C. Leonard, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a report in the case of Robinson v. Harrison, of Alabama. On the face of the official returns Mr. Harrison had a majority of 5,006. The contestant, Mr. Robinson, claimed that this majority was secured by intimidation of voters, bribery, illegality, and fraud; and attempted to overcome the sitting Member's majority by claiming the vote of Geneva County, which had not been included in the official canvass; and by demanding that the vote of certain precincts in other counties should be in whole or in part rejected.

[2] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 1121; Rowell's Digest, p. 505.

As to Geneva County, it was not disputed that the returns were not included in the official return of the Congressional district, for the reason that they were received too late to be canvassed. From the certificate of the probate judge the committee found that the county gave contestant 687 votes, and the sitting Member 285, a majority of 402 votes for the contestant. The committee determined that these votes should be allowed.

As to the precincts attacked by contestant, they were 10 in number, generally in the counties where colored voters predominated.

Intimidation and bribery were alleged in Opelika precinct, where 505 votes were returned for the sitting Member and 318 for the contestant. It was proved that there had been disorder at the polls, but the evidence proved—that this occurred in the morning before the voting commenced, and the object of the disorderly demonstrations was to secure the proportionate appointment of election officers suggested in behalf of the conteste in place of those which had been selected under the authority of and by the friends of the contestant. That was finally conceded, and the disorder ceased, and the polls were opened and the election proceeded.

Therefore the committee did not find a case of loss of votes by intimidation. It was proven in this precinct, however, that one of the election officers so selected was engaged during part of the day in bribing colored voters, by handing to each a slip of paper showing that the bearer had voted as desired, and which, on presentation to a confederate outside, insured a sum of money to the bearer. The evidence showed about 25 votes bought in this way. The committee say:

It was a criminal proceeding, publicly and shamelessly carried on by the friends of the contestee. But the votes of legal voters, uninfluenced by mercenary motives, can not be lawfully sacrificed in consequence of this misconduct. It had no effect upon them, and is in no respect in conflict with their integrity. Their votes can be readily separated from those that were purchased, and land where that can be done the law demands that it shall be done.

The ballots appearing to have been counted as cast, the committee deducted from the sitting Member's vote the 25 votes obtained by bribery. With this correction the poll was counted.

In four precincts—Girard, Union Springs, Suspension, and Midway—the friends of the contestant had no representation on the election board. In two of them there was evidence of fraud, both in the registration and the poll, so that no dependence could be placed on the returns. Therefore, as no proof of votes actually given for the sitting Member was produced, the committee rejected the returns from these two precincts. In the other two precincts where the election officers were wholly of sitting Member's party, a certain number of votes appeared to have been legally thrown out, and the sitting Member was credited with his proportion of the legal votes.

The other impeached precincts were purged to the extent of the frauds shown by the testimony. But with all the purging made by the committee, there still remained a majority for the sitting Member. "It is true," say the committee, "that the conduct of the election in the controverted counties can not be otherwise than condemned, for frauds were committed, arising probably out of the discrimination in the personality of the election boards. That was a grave cause for complaint, but as the legal votes can be separated from the frauds, they are entitled to their full weight and effect."

Therefore the committee unanimously reported resolutions declaring contestant not elected and the sitting Member entitled to the seat.

On April 4 [1] the report was agreed to by the House without division or debate.

1069. The Illinois election case of Rinaker v. Downing in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Following the supreme court of the State the House counted a ballot marked as to two party columns, one of which did not contain the name of a candidate for Congress.

In construing a State ballot law the House followed the principle enunciated by the State supreme court as to giving effect to the voter's intent.

The House declined to count as cast the vote of a person kept from the polls by a bogus telegram sent by persons unknown.

On April 21, 1896,[2] Mr. Edward D. Cooke, of Illinois, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, reported in the case of Rinaker v. Downing, from Illinois. In this case the sitting Member had a plurality of 40 votes. The contestant alleged errors in interpreting, counting, refusing and rejecting ballots, and illegal votes.

In examining the case the committee passed on nine questions of law and fact. On the conclusions as to six of these questions the minority of the committee made no issue. On three questions, however, the minority report, presented by Mr. William H. Moody, of Massachusetts, joined issue with the majority, and to these three questions the first hearing in the House was devoted.

For convenience the controverted questions will be examined first:

(1) The testimony showed that 30 of the Australian ballots (which had party columns) were each marked with a cross in the Republican and Independent Republican circles at the head of the party column. Upon the latter ballot was the name of only one candidate, a candidate for the office of State treasurer. The committee allowed these 30 votes to the contestant, following the decision of the supreme court of Illinois in the case of Parker v. Orr, wherein it was expressly decided that in such cases it was proper and lawful under the election law of Illinois "to count the ballots so cast for the person or candidate against whom no candidate appears on the opposite ticket, thereby giving effect to the obvious intention of the voters so marking their ballots."

(2) The disposition of irregularly marked ballots: The committee in performing this duty followed the precedents laid down in the case of Parker v. Orr, wherein the supreme court of Illinois affirmed the principle "that if the intention of the voter can be fairly ascertained from his ballot, though not in strict conformity with law, effect will be given to that intention." In cases where the principles of Parker v. Orr did not apply, the committee say that "the language of the statute is followed where its terms are clear and unmistakable, and in all cases of doubt the ballots have been rejected entirely, either as being probably marked contrary to law or as being cases in which the intention of the voter could not be clearly ascertained."

(3) The committee rejected certain votes ascertained to have been cast illegally.

(4) Sitting Member demanded that he be credited with the vote of a supporter who had been prevented from casting his vote by the receipt of a false or bogus telegram which summoned him to a distant place. The delivery of the telegram was proven, but as there was no testimony or circumstances to connect the act with the contestant or either political party, and as testimony to show the true purpose of the delivery of the telegram might easily have been obtained, the committee did not consider the claim of sitting Member sustained.

(5) The sitting Member claimed that 14 votes should be credited to his poll in Greene County, an error of that amount being alleged in the official return. The testimony did not satisfy the committee that such an error had been made.

No fraud or harm being shown, the House, following the spirit of a decision of the State court, declined to reject ballots irregularly printed, although the law seemed mandatory.

May a notary, acting under the authority of the law of 1851, require the production of ballots against the injunction of the State court?

In a case wherein an unofficial and ex parte recount was relied on, because the ballots themselves could be reached officially only by the House itself, the House reopened the case for examination of the ballots.

The House declined to overrule the election officers who counted votes of electors assisted in marking without taking the required preliminary oath.

Form of resolution by which the House ordered the production of ballots as evidence in an election case.

(6) The law of Illinois provided that on the ballots "the party appelation or title shall be printed in capital letters not less than one-fourth of an inch in height," and also that "none but ballots provided in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be counted." In Cass and Pike counties the word "Independent" in the party designation "Independent Republican" was printed in letters about an eighth of an inch in height, instead of the required quarter of an inch. The throwing out of these counties would deprive sitting Member of a total plurality of 340, and give the seat to contestant; but the committee conclude, after examining the cases of Clark v. Robinson (88 Ill., 500) and Parker v. Orr, that while the law seemed not merely directory but rather mandatory, yet the court of Illinois had laid down such a liberal rule of construction of the statute as to lead the committee to conclude that—

> The supreme court of Illinois, if called upon to construe the misprinted ballots in Cass and Pike counties, would inquire whether the evidence disclosed any intention to commit a fraud upon the electors, and whether any fraudulent result would or did necessarily ensue from the misprinting of the ballots contrary to the express provision of the statute; and finding from the record in this case, as the undersigned have done, that there is no reason to infer or believe that the ballots in Cass and Pike counties were, by the officials, printed and provided with any intent whatever to perpetrate a fraud or deception upon the voters, or that any considerable number of Republican voters in this instance, by mistaking, the heading of the ballot, made the cross in the "Independent Republican" circle instead of in the "Republican" circle, that court would conclude, as the undersigned have concluded, that the votes on all those ballots were properly counted as cast, and should not now be rejected or thrown out. To now hold to the contrary would operate to disfranchise all of the voters of Cass and Pike counties, through no fault of theirs, but through the mere oversight and error of the officials whose duty it was to follow the law exactly or substantially in printing the ballots.

The correction of the returns in accordance with the decisions in the six questions just considered, did not result in any such changes as to overcome the plurality of the sitting Member; and the essential points on which the decision of the case turned, were involved in three additional questions:

(1) The law of Illinois had this provision:

In all cases of contested election the parties contesting the same shall have the right to have the package of ballots cast at such election opened, and to have all errors of the judges in counting or refusing to count any ballot corrected by the court or body trying such contest; but such ballots shall be opened only in open court, or in open session of such body, and in the presence of the officer having the custody thereof.

When subpoenas were served on behalf of the contestant on the county clerks of the counties in the district, requiring the production of the ballots voted, the clerks disobeyed the subpoenas because at the instance of the sitting Member the Illinois court had issued an injunction restraining the clerks—from opening said ballots or permitting the same to be opened or recounted, or from removing or permitting said ballots to be removed from the place where they are now kept by the defendants until the same is ordered to be opened and recounted by a court of competent jurisdiction of the State of Illinois, or of the United States or by the House of Representatives in Congress of the United States after the 3d day of March, A. D. 1895.

As the time for taking testimony under the laws of the United States expired for the contestant on February 25, 1895, it is evident that the injunction procured by the sitting Member prevented an examination of the best possible evidence by the contestant.

Whether the subpoena of the notary acting under authority of a law of Congress might be rendered futile by the law and court of Illinois is a question discussed at length in this case. The minority of the committee, while not deeming it material to pass on the merits of the injunction, nevertheless quote Ex parte Siebolt (100 U. S., 371) as authority for the position that—the power of Congress is paramount in respect of the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives where its power is exercised by legislation, yet it is clear that under the Constitution where national legislation is silent the State has the right to regulate such elections at will. It may well be argued that as Congress has not seen fit to pass any law with respect to the character of the ballot, its custody and preservation, the whole subject is left within the control of the States, and if the House of Representatives sees fit to seek the evidence of ballots cast under the authority of the State, it can only do so in accordance with the conditions prescribed in the laws of the State. Unquestionably the State has a great interest in the ballots, because they are the evidence not only of the election of Representatives in Congress, but of many State officers.

The committee cite the case of Steward v. Childs where in a similar case the refusal of an Illinois county clerk to produce the ballots had not been referred to. The minority denied that the injunction had suppressed the ballots as evidence, but that they were preserved intact and the House might have had them months ago. The right of the contestant to go to them was postponed, not denied.

The majority of the committee took the following view of the relations of the injunction to the Federal law:

The contestee, by his bill in chancery seeking the injunction, by direct language insists upon such a construction of the statute of Illinois regulating and restraining the opening and counting of the ballots as shall bring that statute in direct conflict with the statute of the United States, and which latter statute plainly and clearly gives to both parties to an election contest over the seat of a Member of the House of Representatives the right to select any one of the officers mentioned in the Federal statute before whom to take the testimony, and clothes that officer, when so selected, with the full power to require the production of any paper or papers pertaining to the election, or to produce and deliver up certified or sworn copies of the same in case they may be official papers.

In view of the plenary and clear terms of the Federal statute it is the opinion of the undersigned that the statute of Illinois should be construed to mean that where the ballots cast at any election for Member of the House of Representatives are called for by a subpoena duces tecum issued by a notary public selected under sections 110, 111, and 123 of the act of Congress regulating the contests of seats in the House of Representatives the notary so selected fully represents the House of Representatives and constitutes a tribunal or body for the purpose and with the power of procuring and reducing to written form such evidence as the ballots may contain, so as to comply with the obvious intention of the State statute, inasmuch as it is obviously impossible for the ballots in a contested election case in the House of Representatives to be opened "in open session of such body and in the presence of the officer having the custody thereof."

The powers conferred by the Federal statute upon the notary public or other officers mentioned to call for and enforce the production of all the papers pertaining to the election are full and complete and render such officer to that extent a "body trying such contest," to the extent of his obtaining and recording the evidence in the case. That is plainly and clearly the meaning and effect of the act of Congress, and the State statute should be construed so as to be in harmony rather than in conflict therewith.

To construe the State statute so as to prohibit the notary or other officers taking the testimony in a Congressional election contest from obtaining the evidence contained in the ballots would be to give to the State statute the effect of repealing or nullifying the Federal law regulating Congressional election contests. Congress has the power to regulate the taking of testimony in case of the contest of the election of any Member of the House of Representatives. That power has been exercised by the enactment of the statute above quoted, and when in conflict with its provisions all conflicting State statutes or decisions to the extent to which they do conflict must be held to be nugatory and void. * * *

In the opinion of the undersigned, Congress has by statute made ample provision for an inspection, examination, and recount of the ballots far in advance of the meeting of Congress, and that it is not intended or to be tolerated that the time of the members of the Election Committee shall be consumed in the recounting of ballots covering an entire Congressional district during a session of Congress when each Member has a duty to perform in the everyday course of its proceedings; nor is it to be permitted that a device, such as that of obtaining an injunction, contrary to the act of Congress, shall operate to prolong a contest practically until near the end of the term for which the Member was elected.

The conclusion and finding of the undersigned, therefore, is that the injunction procured by the contestee prohibiting the opening and counting of the ballots in this case was illegal and wrongful, and that, as a consequence thereof, the contestant was at liberty to offer such secondary evidence of the contents of the ballots and of the facts shown by the evidence suppressed as would in a court of law be allowed in a case in which one of the parties had concealed or refused to produce legal and material evidence within his possession or control.

(2) The contestant, being kept from the best possible evidence by the injunction, proceeded to take secondary evidence in the form of a recount of the votes in Macoupin and Cass counties. In those counties contests had arisen over county officers and incident to those contests there was a recount of the votes before the county courts. During this recount Mr. L. C. Murphy, representing the contestant, was present unofficially and from a high seat overlooked the table at which the official recount for county officers was made. In Cass County Mr. E. M. Dale kept a similar tally of the Congressional vote. This unofficial count was not complete for all the precincts in either county, but showed as far as it went a deduction of 17 votes for the sitting Member in Macoupin and Cass counties and an addition of 22 votes for contestant in Macoupin County.

Both in the report and in the debate on the floor this unofficial count was assailed by those representing the minority views. It was contended that the result of the injunction did not authorize the reception of this unofficial count; that the circumstances attending the count showed that it could not have been accurate; that the ballots were shown to be in existence and carefully preserved for the whole district; that the unofficial count related to only two of the eight counties of the district, and was ex parte, the sitting Member not being represented. The minority quoted McCrary on elections to the effect that "the official acts of sworn officers are presumed to be honest and correct until the contrary is made to appear. It has accordingly been held that a return can not be set aside upon proof that a recount made by unauthorized persons, sometime after the official count has been made, showed a different result from the official count," etc.

(3) A sharp difference also arose between the minority and majority on the question of assisted voters. The law of Illinois provided:

> Chapter 46, paragraph 311, section 14, Every voter who may declare upon oath that he can not read the English language, or that by reason of any physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot, shall, upon request, be assisted in marking his ballot by two of the election officers of different political parties to be selected from the judges and clerks of the precincts in which they are to act, to be designated by the judges of election of each precinct at the opening of the polls.

It appeared that 38 Republican votes and 6 Democratic votes were cast by voters who were assisted without being sworn as the law provides. The majority of the committee considered that the election officers had acted correctly in counting these votes, thereby construing the statute as directory merely, and not mandatory. The committee say that these assisted voters were qualified voters, and it had not been attempted to be shown that any fraud was perpetrated or attempted in this regard. The minority of the committee held that the law was mandatory and that the case was res adjudicata so far as the House was concerned. Little light was thrown on the question by the older decisions, since the recently introduced Australian ballot system not only permitted but enforced secrecy. The minority then quoted decisions on similar provisions of law: People v. Canvassers (129 N. Y., 345); Attorney-General v. May (99 Mich., 538); State v. Gay (60 N. W. Rep. 676); Parker v. Orr (Illinois). The minority also cite as a case directly in point the decision of the House in the case of Steward v. Childs.

The majority of the committee denied the authority of these decisions as bearing on the case under discussion.

The minority recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

> Resolved, That the contested election case of John I. Rinaker v. Finis E. Downing be recommitted to the committee on Elections No. 1, with instructions either to recount such part of the vote for Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Sixteenth Congressional district of Illinois as they shall deem fairly in dispute, or to permit the parties to this contest, under such rules as the committee may prescribe, to recount such vote, and to take any action in the premises, by way of resolution or resolutions, to be reported to the House or otherwise, as they may deem necessary and proper.

On May 12 and 13 [1] the report was debated at length in the House, the two points, as to the unofficial recount and as to the assisted voters, being the only subjects. If the majority of the committee was overruled as to either of these points, the contestant would fail to overcome the sitting Member's plurality.

The question being taken to substitute the resolution of the minority for those of the majority declaring the election of the contestant, the substitute was agreed to, yeas 139, nays 35. Then the resolutions of the majority as amended by the substitute were agreed to, yeas 137, nays 13, and 33 present and not voting being noted by the Speaker to form a quorum.

On May 19, 1896,[1] the Committee on Elections No. 1 unanimously reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That F. J. Robinson, county clerk of the county of Cass, State of Illinois [here follows names of the other county clerks], be, and they are hereby, each ordered to be and appear before Elections Committee No. 1, of this House forthwith, then and there to testify before said committee, or such commission as shall be appointed, and the truth to speak touching any matters then to be inquired of them by said committee in the contested election case of John I. Rinaker V. Finis E. Downing, now before said committee for investigation and report; and that they, and each of them, respectively, as such county clerks, bring with them all the ballots and packages of ballots cast in each of said counties at the general election held in said counties on the 6th day of November, A. D. 1894, for the election, among other officers, a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Sixteenth district of Illinois, now in their custody, respectively; and that they each also bring with them, respectively, in addition to said packages of ballots, all poll books and tally sheets, and such other books and papers as relate to said election in their respective counties now in their custody or under the control of either of them, respectively; that said ballots be brought in the packages in which the same now are; that said ballots, poll books, and tally sheets be examined, and said ballots counted by or under the authority of said committee on elections in said case; and to that end, that subpoenas be issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, commanding him to summon said persons to appear with said papers as witnesses in said case, and that the expenses of executing such process, including necessary subsistence and mileage of said witnesses and all other expenses of this proceeding, be paid out of the contingent fund of this House; and that said committee be, and hereby is, empowered to send for all other persons and papers as it may find necessary to the proper determination of said controversy; and also be, and it is, empowered to select one or more competent committees to take the evidence and count said ballots or votes, and report the same to this committee on elections, under such regulations as shall be prescribed for that purpose; and that the aforesaid expenses be paid on the requisition of the chairman of said committee after the auditing and allowance thereof by the said Elections Committee No. 1.

On June 4[2] the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a report showing that the ballots of all the counties of the district had been recounted, except the county of Morgan." "In that county" say the committee, "although the custody of the ballots has been such as to prevent any unauthorized handling, they were returned and kept in so slovenly a manner that the committee deemed it wise in that county to accept the official returns instead of the recount, although the latter differed only slightly from the returns, and not enough to affect the result."

The recount showed such gains for the contestant as to give him a plurality of five votes, if the ballots of those voters, who were assisted without taking the oath, should be counted. The report submitted by Mr. Moody, who had submitted the minority views of the first report, says:

The minority of the committee, while still adhering to the opinion that the law requires the rejection of these ballots, which was fully expressed in a former report to the House, yet believe that the House would not adopt their opinion in that respect in the absence of a controlling decision by the court of final resort in the State of Illinois.

The majority of the committee, in this report as in the preceding report, contended that the ballots of the assisted voters should be counted.

1071. The Virginia election case of Cornet v. Swanson in the Fifty-Fourth Congress.

Where the notice of contest does not claim sufficient to change the returns, the House does not think it necessary to examine the testimony.

Ordinarily a decision of the State supreme court that the State election law is constitutional is held conclusive by the House.

An argument that an election held under an unconstitutional State law might yet be considered by the House as an election de facto.

An argument that under certain conditions the House might be justified in overruling a State court's decision that a State election law is constitutional.

The committee did not consider it necessary to pass on the form of a notice of contest which did not relate to issues sufficient to change the result

On April 24, 1896,[1] Aft. William A. Jones, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Cornet v. Swanson, of Virginia. The sitting Member was returned by an official majority of 2,333 votes over the contestant.

Of the 144 precincts in the district the contestant took testimony in only 12, and the report of the majority says:

> If the contestant is given the full benefit of every claim that can be made from the testimony in this case, as well as the benefit of every doubt that can arise therefrom, and if every claim that he makes or that may be made for him by the committee is conceded to him, he will still lack more than 1,600 votes with which to overcome the returned majority of the sitting Member. If he is given every vote concerning which there is a particle of testimony, contradicted or uncontradicted, in the record tending to prove that he received, or that he would have received but for the alleged unjust law under which the election was held, or that he was deprived of by reason of the alleged improper or illegal conduct of the managers of the election or the friends of the contestee, he will still fall far short of the requisite number to overcome the contestee's majority.

Therefore it is unnecessary to go into the examination of the 12 precints, which the committee made perfunctorily. The minority of the committee in their views make no mention of these precincts, confining their arguments entirely to other questions.

These other questions were (1) as to the constitutionality of the election law of Virginia, and (2) as to the sufficiency of the notice of contest.

(1) As to the constitutionality of the election law:

The majority of the committee, after stating the fact that the supreme court of Virginia had, by a unanimous decision, affirmed the constitutionality of the law in every particular, declared that it was not necessary to pass on the question in order to reach a just conclusion in the case

> But it is not deemed necessary, for the reason stated, to enter upon any extended discussion of these legal and constitutional questions, or to inquire to what extent the decisions of a State court should be regarded by the House of Representatives or by this committee. It would not necessarily follow, in the opinion of the committee, were it conceded that the Walton election law was unconstitutional, and therefore inoperative as to the particular features of that law here assailed, that no valid election had been held in the Fifth Congressional district of Virginia. The sections which are assailed by reason of their alleged unconstitutionality are not so essential to the operation of the law under which this election was held, or so inseparably connected with its other provisions and requirements, that even should they be thought to be inoperative this committee would be justified upon that ground in declaring that there had been no legal election.

In the course of the debate it was urged [1] that the election having been de facto, even conceding the law to be unconstitutional, the contestant must still make out a case to enable the House to seat him; and that to unseat the sitting Member would bring the House face to face with the proposition that all the Virginia Members, including at least one seated by the House, owed their seats to elections held under that law. Mr. Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts, in debating the case, admitted the power of the House to disregard the decision of the Virginia court as to the constitutionality of the law, but questioned the right of the House to do so.

The minority of the committee, in views presented by Mr. Henry F. Thomas, of Michigan, and subscribed to by Messrs. James A. Walker, of Virginia, and Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana, announced the following principle:

The House of Representatives having original jurisdiction as to the right of a person to a seat in its Chamber, and being a tribunal of last resort, it undoubtedly has the power to pass upon any question that it deems relevant to the issue. It has never been claimed by any political party in the history of the Republic that the power to act carries with it the right to act. On the other hand, it has been the uniform practice of the House of Representatives to base its action in all cases upon certain fundamental principles, and those principles have, and ought to have, the binding force of law. Among those principles is this:

That the decision of the supreme court of a State ought to govern in all cases, unless the constitutional rights of the citizen are clearly invaded. And it may be said that in all cases where the question is local to the State and relates purely to its domestic affairs the House of Representatives will always abide by the decision of its court of last resort. But it is clear that questions might arise in which not only the rights of the citizen but the interests of the nation at large would be involved, and in such case the House of Representatives would most certainly exercise its original jurisdiction.

For instance, suppose a State should, by its constitution, give to all illiterate persons over 21 years of age the right to vote; and suppose the legislature should provide that no elector should be permitted to know, by all customary means, the contents of his ballot (and that after it was handed to him no man should come near him, and that if any one gave him any information, either by word or sign or signal, it would be a crime), and that thereby all illiterate electors were disfranchised; and suppose the supreme court of the State should decide that such a law was constitutional, it would not, we think, be denied by any one that it would be the duty of the House of Representatives to declare such an election void, and to refuse to seat the man who had been elected by those only who could read their ballots. This would be a case of disfranchisement where an appeal would lie, so to speak, from the supreme court of a State to the House of Representatives.

The minority then proceeded to an examination of the law, concluding first that the decision of the supreme court of Virginia, not an entirely valid judgment, there being evidence that the case in issue had been collusive, and that the question of constitutionality had been incidental, and finally that the law itself was unconstitutional, for reasons summarized as follows:

Your committee is therefore of the opinion that this law is unreasonable, and therefore unconstitutional, because it withholds from the voter a timely and necessary knowledge of the arrangement of the names of candidates on a mixed and consolidated ballot. It is void because it withholds from the voter all ordinary and customary means of knowledge.

Therefore the minority recommended a resolution declaring the seat vacant.

(2) As to the sufficiency of the notice:

The majority of the committee say:

The next question which presents itself for consideration is the objection raised by the contestee to the notice of contest. Without specifying the particulars in which it is insisted that this notice is defective, and without expressing any opinion as to whether or not it is wanting, as is alleged, in that particularity which is required by statute, the committee think it is not necessary, in view of the conclusion reached by them upon the merits of the case, to decide the question.

The minority give in full the portions of the notice objected to at length, and conclude that they were sufficient, saying:

While your committee recognize the rule of law that changes of fraud should be specific and certain, yet they are not of the opinion that any greater degree of certainty should be required than the nature of the case will admit, and that where the evidence of the alleged fraud is to be sought from those whose interests are adverse to the contestant a much less degree of certainty should be insisted upon than in other cases.

The case was debated at length in the House on February 3, 1897.[1] On the question of substituting the minority proposition that the seat be declared vacant, the substitute was rejected on viva voice vote, not enough Members rising to order the yeas and nays.

The resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat were then agreed to without division.

1072. The Virginia election case of Thorp v. McKenney, in the Fifty-Fourth Congress.

A general conspiracy of election officers to violate a merely directory law, combined with fraudulent acts in individual precincts, justified rejection of a series of polls.

A general disregard of a directory law as to party representation among election officers was held to constitute a reason for rejection of a series of polls.

Ballots printed in unusual style confusing to the voter may contribute to destroy confidence in the officers responsible therefore.

Instance wherein the returned Member in an election case took no testimony.

On April 29, 1896,[2] Mr. James A. Walker, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Thorp v. McKenney, of Virginia.

The sitting Member had received an official plurality of 864 votes; but he admitted that one precinct improperly rejected should be counted, and that the plurality should because of that be reduced to 785 votes.

In this case sitting Member took no testimony and the case was decided by the evidence produced by the contestant.

[2] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 1531; Rowell's Digest, p. 537.

The majority of the committee decided that the vote of ten election precincts in the district should be rejected because of a conspiracy "clearly and fully made out" to deprive contestant of his rights. In eight other precincts strong suspicion was raised.

The law of Virginia provided for an electoral board for each county and city, and these boards had complete, entire, and unlimited control of the elections and the election machinery in their respective counties and cities. These boards had the appointment of three judges of election for each voting precinct in their respective counties and cities. The law of Virginia has only the limitation that the judges thus appointed shall be competent citizens and qualified voters, who "shall be chosen for each voting place from persons known to belong to different political parties, each of whom shall be able to read and write." As to this provision the committee say:

> The provision of law requiring judges of election to be able to read and write and selected from voters known to belong to different political parties is wise and salutary, as evidenced by its being recognized and incorporated in the election laws of all the States which claim to have honest election laws. It is a provision intended as a safeguard against fraud, and is in Virginia especially important to that end, because in this State the judges of election, after the polls are closed, and before any representatives of opposing candidates are admitted into the election room, open the ballot boxes, count the ballots to see whether they correspond with the number of names on the poll books, and if they exceed the number of electors on the poll books, withdraw enough ballots to reduce the number of ballots to the number of electors, which affords to partisan and unscrupulous judges the opportunity to substitute false ballots for true ballots.
> This provision might ordinarily be considered as mandatory—it is such an important safeguard against fraud—but the Virginia statute further provides that "no election shall be deemed invalid when the judges shall not belong to different political parties, or who shall not possess the above qualifications;" i.e., as we understand it, an election fairly conducted without any charge or taint of fraud shall be valid though the judges do not belong to different political parties, etc. It was intended to cover the cases of a few isolated precincts where, by accident or otherwise, all the judges happened to belong to the same political party, or a judge happened to be appointed who did not possess the necessary qualificatons, but the will of the voter was nevertheless fairly expressed and correctly and honestly returned. In such a case, there being no bad faith or intentional wrong on the part of the appointing power or the judges, the election ought to stand and the return be accepted.
> But this statute was not intended to apply to a case like the one before the committee. It never was intended as a shield for fraud.
> The charge here is that the election held at these 18 precincts by judges all of the same party was dishonestly conducted, and the returns made by these judges are false and utterly unreliable as evidence of what was the true vote cast.
> The Virginia statute does not say that the returns of an election where the judges do not belong to different political parties, etc., shall be accepted, nor does it say what weight shall be given to this failure to appoint such judges in considering the question of fraud; but the report of the committee in the case of McDuffie v. Turpin (Fifty-first Congress), quoted in the brief, does say that in itself it raises a strong suspicion, if it does not fully prove, a conspiracy to falsify the returns.
> The failure to comply with the law in this respect was not in a few isolated precincts.

It appeared that in 10 precincts the judges appointed were all partisans of sitting Member, although perfectly competent partisans of contestant were available to equalize the representation. In 8 other precincts the election board appointed to represent contestant's party were educationally, morally, and physically unfit to represent it or men not regarded as representative of the party, when proper men were available.

The law and decisions of Virginia further provide for a secret ballot, printed officially, which is to contain the names of all the candidates, printed in black ink, and is to be kept under seal and secret as to form, style, arrangement, etc., until opened by the judges at the voting place. But in the 18 precincts in question the tickets were printed in an unusual style, some of them in script type and others in type of different sizes and styles, so as to confuse the voter.

The majority of the committee quote authorities to show that they would be justified in holding that the election officers by these acts had destroyed all confidence in their official acts. Such a view of the case would cause the rejection of the 18 precincts and leave to contestant a plurality of 1, 115.

The committee, however, defer to the possible contention "that more specific actual fraud and further acts of illegality on the part of election officers must be shown," and review the precincts individually, showing in each of 10 of them specific acts of fraud, such as ejection of tally keepers and discrepancies in the count of votes; fraudulent manipulation of ballots by a judge of election; illegal entries on the poll books; names of persons proved to have voted for contestant omitted from poll book; refusal of election officers to assist illiterate voters, etc.

The committee therefore determined to reject entirely the vote of 10 precincts, where the election officers were all of sitting Member's party, where the ballots were printed in a style apparently intended to mislead, and where other specific acts of fraud occurred. These rejections resulted in a plurality of 571 for contestant.

The committee reviewed other precincts which in their opinion might be thrown out, but considered such action unnecessary.

In conclusion they say:

> The refusal of the electoral boards in the several counties and cities in this district to appoint Republican judges at precincts where it was possible to do so; the alternation of the names of the candidates upon the tickets, printing them in unusual type and in type of different sizes and styles; the appointment of Democratic officeholders as judges, constables, and clerks at many precincts; the appointment of illiterate, incompetent Republican judges at other precincts; the refusal of the special constables to assist illiterate voters, as the law required them to do; the illegal and arbitrary action of the judges and officers of election in driving away Republican tally keepers from the vicinity of the polls with threats of violence and imprisonment; refusing to permit a Republican to be present at the counting of the votes, and placing the name of an illiterate and obscure negro upon the tickets as a pretended candidate for Congress furnish conclusive evidence of a conspiracy on the part of the election officers to defraud the voters, which destroys the integrity of their act and taints the returns so as to render them wholly unreliable, and devolves upon the contestee the duty of proving what was the true state of the poll, which, as we have seen, he has not attempted to do.
> Add to these evidences of fraud and conspiracy the many proofs of error, fraud, and irregularity at the various precincts, as above set forth in this report, and it is clear that the contestant was duly elected by a majority of the legal voters cast at said election, and that the contestee was not elected.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. David A. De Armond, of Missouri, concur in the conclusion that contestant was elected, but that what is considered wrong in the conduct of the election officers may be attributed to erroneous views as to the requirements of the election law.

On May 2 [1] the House concurred in the report, and Mr. Thorp, the contestant, took the oath.

1073. The Colorado election case of Pearce v. Bell in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

A contestant giving no notice of contest as required by law and taking no testimony, the House without further examination confirmed returned Member's title.

On April 29, 1896,[1] Mr. James A. Walker, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted a brief report in the case of Pearce v. Bell, from Colorado, accompanied by resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat. The resolutions were agreed to by the House on the same day.[2] The report describes the case fully:

> In this case the contestant gave no notice of contest, as required by law, and has taken no evidence to sustain the allegations of fraud and intimidation claimed by him to have been committed.
> The official returns show that the contestee received 47,703 votes, that Thomas M. Bowen received 42,369 votes, that W. A. Rice received 2,032 votes, and the contestant received 157 votes.

1074. The South Carolina election case of Murray v. Elliott in the) Fifty-fourth Congress.

Specifications in the notice of contest being deemed sufficiently clear and direct to put the sitting Member on a proper defense and prevent surprise were upheld.

Voters may not be deprived of their ballots by the neglect of regularly qualified managers to qualify and act.

Where a true expression of the intention of qualified voters is had at an improvised poll the votes will be counted by the House.

A general conspiracy of registration and election officers to prevent a class of electors from voting was held to justify rejection of returns in a series of precincts.

Instance wherein the color of voters contributed to a presumption as to their votes.

Conduct of unauthorized challengers supplemented by the acts of partisan election officers may contribute to taint a return.

On May 1, 1896,[3] Mr. Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Murray v. Elliott, of South Carolina. The sitting Member in this case was returned by an official majority of 1,737 votes. The contestant enumerated 19 specific claims and charges, by which he sought to attack this plurality.

At the outset the sitting Member objected to certain of these specifications because of uncertainty and insufficiency. But the committee, referring to McCrary on elections, say:

> It is the opinion of the committee that the objections to certain specifications in the notice made by contestee are not well founded, inasmuch as they are sufficiently clear and direct to put the sitting Member upon a proper defense and prevent any surprise being practiced upon him.

In considering the merits of the case the committee discuss only the city of Charleston and a precinct called "Haut Gap."

(1) As to Haut Gap the report of the majority says:

It is admitted that at Haut Gap, Berkeley County, the Federal polls were not opened by reason of the failure of the managers to qualify and act. At this precinct the voters at the polls, on the morning of the election, improvised an election board, following the rules of the election law, and under the conduct of such board 217 ballots were cast for George W. Murray and none for Elliott, and 156 ballots were offered by voters qualified in all respects except they held no registration certificates.

The committee is of the opinion that voters can not be deprived of their ballots by the neglect or failure of regularly appointed managers to qualify and act; and where a true expression of the intentions of such voters can be had, and the fact of their qualifications is undisputed, such ballots should be counted, and for that reason 217 votes should be added to the vote of George W. Murray.

The 156 ballots offered for Murray, and rejected because the voters did not hold registration certificates, should be counted for Murray, under the theory that the law of registration of the State of South Carolina is unconstitutional; but as such question is not raised in this case, the committee does not consider it, and therefore does not count these 156 ballots.

To the action of the committee in counting for Murray the 217 Haut Gap votes there is no dissent by the undersigned.

(2) As to the returns from 24 precincts in the city of Charleston, which together returned for Murray 359 votes, and for Elliott 2,720 votes, the issue arises in the case. The majority of the committee concluded from the testimony that a conspiracy existed and was carried out to commit frauds in behalf of the sitting Member in the 24 attacked precincts of Charleston. According to the law in force in this district no elector was allowed to vote until he had registered, and the presentation of the registration certificate at the polls was necessary. The testimony disclosed that impediments had been put in the way of colored voters, who were supporters of contestant, when they attempted to register; and that in many cases where such voters did register the certificates issued to them contained errors. The committee concluded from the evidence that there was no reason why contestant should not have had the support of his party, and that this party numbered in its ranks nearly all the colored voters. Discussing this and other portions of the evidence the committee find the following indications of a conspiracy:

In the absence of some reasonable explanation it would indeed be strange that in a city of 65,000 population, with 8,000 colored voters and 6,000 white voters, the proportion of white voters to colored voters should be as 10 to 1.

But a study of the record discloses a reasonable explanation; and that is that the board of supervisors fraudulently impeded and prevented the registration of colored voters, and committed intentional errors in the execution of registration certificates for illiterate voters, and that challengers, unauthorized by law, and by the sanction of the managers at the various precincts, arbitrarily passed upon the qualifications of colored voters and directed who should vote and who should not, and that in some of the precincts the dead and absent were recorded as having voted.

The board of supervisors for the city of Charleston consisted of three men, to whom each voter was required to apply for a certificate of registration. This board was an arbitrary court, before which illiterate and ignorant voters were compelled to go and in which they had a right to place full confidence. If errors were made upon the certificates, the illiterate voters would not be able to discover them, and if an error proved fatal to his certificate the voter was helpless.

A common excuse for rejection of ballots was that certificates held by the voter failed to give the number of the precinct, or the correct number of the ward in which the voter lived, or the proper number of his residence. The fact that these errors appeared always with certificates held by colored voters is significant. That the voters holding such certificates were illiterate was sufficient excuse for their ignorance of the condition of the certificates, and plainly shows that the errors were made by the supervisor of registration, and whether intentional or not should not operate against the voter. The common character of the apparent mistakes, and their frequency, strongly and conclusively indicate that they were intentional, and made for the purpose of depriving the holders of the certificates of their ballots.

The evidence strongly shows that the supervisors of registration in Charleston threw every possible obstacle in the way of a full and fair registration. By delay in the issuing of certificates, by seeming investigations, by excuses, by favoritism, and by discrimination against the colored voters, unquestionably many hundreds were prevented from registering.

There were also disclosed further instrumentalities of the alleged conspiracy. Thus a Democratic challenger was on duty in every precinct, a privileged character, although having no standing under the law. The committee say:

In many instances the challenger was the authority of the board upon the question of qualification, and in no case where the challenge was exercised was the voter allowed a hearing or permitted to vote.

The familiarity of the challengers with the registration books and the kind of certificates held by the voters evidenced their preparation for their part in the plan, which was to point out the defects in the certificates of registration because of which the election managers rejected the ballots.

The election managers in each precinct in the city of Charleston were Democrats. No other party was recognized upon the boards. And while the law of the State is silent as to party representation, all sense of justice and right, equity and fairness, would demand such recognition. It is, of course, possible for a board composed wholly of men of one party to properly and honestly discharge the duties of such board, and the law presumes that their duties were so discharged; but in this case the managers of election became the third side in the triangle of fraud that controlled the election in the city of Charleston. By their treatment of the Democratic challenger, whereby he was made the authority upon the qualification of voters, by their refusal in many cases to expose the inside of the box before the voting began, and the conduct of a private count at the close, and in some cases by the personal misconduct of the members of the board, the presumption of law in their favor is overthrown; and, construing their action in the light of the conduct of the supervisors of registration and Democratic challengers, a conspiracy, involving them all, to defraud the colored voters of their ballots in the interest of the contestee, is reasonably inferred.

The majority further find in five precincts that certain dead or absent voters appear on the poll lists. The number of these is not large, however, but are introduced as incidents in support of the majority's final conclusion.

These instances strengthen the claim that the entire election in the city of Charleston was tainted with fraud, and that gross irregularities occurred at nearly every precinct.

The conduct of the supervisors of registration and the managers of election, and the practice of swelling poll lists with the names of the dead and absent voters, was such as to cloud the result with uncertainty and doubt.

The presence of the challenger and his conduct, although unauthorized by law, would not in itself be sufficient to invalidate the election where such officer acted, but, considered as a circumstance in connection with the known misconduct of the supervisors of registration and the manners of election and the swelling of poll lists, it becomes of great importance in determining whether or not the will of the majority of the voters at such precincts is expressed by the returns. Fraud in the conduct of an election may be shown by circumstantial evidence. (McCrary on Elections, 3d ed., sec. 540; English v. Peelle, Forty-eighth Congress.)

It is not necessary, in order to set aside a return for fraud, that the officers of election participated in the fraud. But if the unlawful acts of third persons are connived at by the officers the effect is the same. (McCrary on Elections, 3d ed., sec. 543.)

It is the opinion of the committee that the conduct of these officers was such as to bear the badge of fraud at each of the election precincts of Charleston, except Nos. 1 in Ward 2, 1 and 2 in Ward 6, and 1 in Ward 10, and the question then arises whether the returns shall be purged or rejected.

The authorities are clear and complete that where fraud taints a return it can not be purged, but must be rejected; but a return can be purged only by rejecting ballots illegally cast or wrongfully counted. While in this case legal ballots were unquestionably kept from the box by the illegal and wrongful acts of persons connected with the machinery of the election, it is impossible to determine the number of these ballots, and the only logical and equitable result is to reject such returns.

In accordance with their conclusions, the majority find for the contestant a plurality of 434 votes, and report resolutions declaring him entitled to the seat.

The minority dissented entirely from these conclusions as to the precincts in Charleston. They denied that the testimony showed the alleged conspiracy, or that there was fraud either on the part of the registration or election officers. The minority urge that the testimony, when analyzed, shows that only 41 persons are shown to have been rejected as voters, though properly registered. They also urge that contestant was shown not to have been popular with his party, and that he did not receive the party strength.

In conclusion the minority say:

So that taking the most extreme case against the contestee, there were not in the entire city of Charleston more than 41 registered voters who were refused the right to vote. It would require too much space to set forth in detail the testimony as to each of the persons, but the proof shows that the majority of them were not legally registered, and that as to all persons rejected by the managers, there was proof before the managers justifying them in rejecting the elector under the law of South Carolina, although it since may have been proved in this case that the elector had the right to vote.

A careful scrutiny of the whole evidence in this case convinces us that the contestee received a substantial majority of the votes cast for Representative in Congress, and that if every vote of those who offered to vote, with or without certificates of registration, in the city of Charleston, should be counted for the contestant the majority of the contestee would not be materially reduced.

The law upon this subject is tersely stated in McCrary on Elections, third edition, section 492:

"The fact that the right to register or to vote has been denied to any person or persons duly qualified to vote, may always be shown in a case of contested election whether such denial was fraudulent or not. The effect upon the rights of electors and upon the result of the election is the same whether such denial be the result of intentional wrong on the part of the officers of the election, or of accident, or an honest mistake as to the law. And if the number of voters whose rights have thus been denied is large enough to materially affect the result such denial will vitiate the election"

Upon the general subject of the impeachment of returns for fraud or illegal voting, attention is called to the following passages, also taken from McCrary on Elections:

"The return must stand until such facts are proven as to clearly show that it is not true. When shown to be fraudulent or false it must fall to the ground. This ruling is well settled by numerous authorities, including the following: Blair v. Barrett, I Bart., 308; Knox v. Blair, 1 Bart., 521; Howard v. Cooper, supra; Washburn v. Voorhees, 2 Bart., 54; State v. Commissioners, 35 Kans., 640."

The following remarks concerning the dangers which may attend the application of this rule are here quoted, with emphatic approval, from the report of the Committee on Elections in the House of Representatives in Washburn v. Voorhees:

"In adopting this rule the committee do not lose sight, however, of the danger which may attend its application. Wholesome and salutary, not less than necessary in its proper use, it is extremely liable to abuse. Heated partisanship and blind prejudice, as well as indifferent investigation, May, under its cover, work great injustice. It is not to be adopted if it can be avoided.

"No investigation should be spared that would reach the truth without a resort to it, but it is not to be forgotten or omitted if the case calls for its application. If the fraud be clearly shown to exist to such an extent as to satisfy the mind that the return does not show the truth, and no evidence is furnished by either party to a contest, and no investigation of the committee enable them to deduce the truth therefrom, then no alternative is left but to reject such a return. To use it under such a state of facts is to use as true what is shown to be false. (Sec. 536.)

"But misconduct which does not amount to fraud, and by which no one is injured, does not vitiate the poll." (Sec. 540.)

Unless the presumption is indulged that every man who has a dark skin is a Republican and votes the Republican ticket at all times and under all conditions and circumstances, even when he swears that he voted otherwise, it will be impossible to give to the contestant the seat which he claims.

The case was debated on June 3,[1] and on June 4[2] the substitute resolution of the minority, declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat was disagreed to, yeas 48, nays 144. The resolutions of the majority, declaring contestant elected and entitled to the seat, were then agreed to, yeas 153, nays 33.

Thereupon Mr. Murray, the contestant, appeared and took the oath.

1075. The South Carolina election case of Wilson v. McLaurin in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

An intelligible written notice of contest, in the hands of returned Member within the prescribed time, is sufficient, although served informally.

The House will count the votes of electors denied their right of suffrage by a registration law which it deems unconstitutional and not passed on by the State courts.

Where an unconstitutional State law disfranchises a large class, the House prefers to measure the wrong rather than declare a vacancy.

The House counts lists of wrongfully disfranchised qualified voters when sustained by other evidence that the voters were present near the polls to vote and would have voted for the party claiming had they not been prevented.

On May 1, 1896,[3] Mr. James H. Codding, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted a report in the case of Wilson v. McLaurin, from South Carolina.

A preliminary question was raised by the objections in the nature of a demurrer of sitting Member to the service of the notice of contest. The committee dispose of this objection as follows:

> It is admitted that the notice was in writing and was addressed by registered mail to the contestee, one copy to his "home office" at Bennettsville, S. C., and the other copy to Washington, D. C. It is not denied that both copies were received by Mr. McLaurin within the statutory thirty days, nor is it alleged that he has been placed at any disadvantage by the manner of service. That the notice was in writing and that it reached the proper party are sufficient for this committee to hold the contestee to the necessity of his answer and proofs. In all such cases the rules as to service may naturally be somewhat flexible, according to the circumstances, provided that no clear right be thereby denied or infringed. An intelligent and intelligible notice in writing, actually in the hands of a contestee within the thirty days established by statute ought to be sufficient.

As to the merits of the case, the committee consider two charges made by the contestant:

(1) That he had been deprived of a large number of votes by the action of election officers in drawing votes cast for the contestant from the boxes and destroying the same, under color of a section of the election law relating to purging the boxes in cases where the number of ballots found therein exceeded the number upon the poll lists. The committee did not find that the ballots so withdrawn were in quantities affecting the final result.

(2) Contestant in several specifications charged that voters were prevented from casting their ballots for him. Several means were alleged to have been employed, but this was accomplished principally by the operation of a so-called registration law of South Carolina passed in 1882, and in force at the time of this election, whereby the various election officers of the district were enabled to reject the votes of several thousand voters.

The committee therefore proceed (a) to a consideration of the constitutionality of the law and the attitude of the House toward it; (b) to a determination of the method for correcting the wrong; and (c) to the application of a rule of evidence to the testimony and the ascertainment of a result. As follows:

(a) As to the registration law the report says:

A casual examination of the testimony discloses the fact that if the contestant is to overcome the majority returned against him his chief reliance must rest in being allowed to reverse the results of the registration law of 1882 and to ally with his certified vote the aggregate of such votes as were rejected under that law.

In taking up this question some surprise is not unnatural that during its career of more than twelve years the constitutionality of this law has not been urged to a decision before the highest tribunals. Disfranchising, it is alleged, many thousands of voters, the law appears before this House for construction at a period when it is approaching, or has reached through other legislation, a practical death in the State of its adoption. Under these circumstances no labored or extended argument will be attempted in this report. That law, by its specific terms, extended the period of residence required by the constitution of South Carolina. It placed in the hands of a supervisor of registration, an official holding by executive appointment, a power practically absolute of judging the rights of voters, and the testimony is abundant that the power was unsparingly used for the exclusion of at least one class. It is equally true that the same power so molded the details of many registration certificates that officers conducting elections were able, or assumed to be, to reject many voters on account of trivial or pretended defects in their certificates. Against the sweeping disfranchisement of this law the average voter was powerless when he tendered his ballot. Under color of law his exclusion was complete.

A majority of this committee has reached the conclusion that the voters of the district now in consideration who were qualified under the constitution of South Carolina and who were rejected under color of the enforcement of the registration law are entitled to be heard in this contest.

In this conclusion no violence is done to the doctrine that "where the proper authorities of a State have given a construction to their own statutes that construction will be followed by the Federal authorities." While the supreme court of South Carolina has not passed decisively upon the statute in question the people themselves, the highest authority in that State, have decreed its disappearance from the statute book.

From this standpoint we look for the course to be followed. Shall the election be set aside and the seat in question vacated? Under the authorities we think not.

Beyond doubt the usual formalities of an election were for the most part observed. No substantial miscount of votes actually cast is alleged. There are no charges of violence or intimidation seriously affecting the result which have been verified. If fraud be alleged, under sanction of legislative enactment, it was a general fraud, and the returns are in general unchallenged for correctness. The votes actually cast are not in controversy; the votes not cast are the ones presented for computation.

The report then quotes McCrary on Elections as follows:

The election is only to be set aside when it is impossible from any evidence within reach to ascertain the true result—when neither from the returns, nor from other proof, nor from all together can the truth be determined. * * * Nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of votes were given ought to vacate an election.

The report then says:

It is a matter of serious import and precedent to introduce into an election the count of a large disfranchised class. But if the principle is good as to 4 or 40 or 400 it should certainly be no less available for a larger number; or, briefly, the number is immaterial if capable of correct computation.

Therefore the committee determine to follow the doctrine laid down in the case of Waddill v. Wise: [1]

If the fraudulent exclusion of votes would, if successful, secure to the party of the wrongdoer a temporary seat in Congress, and the only penalty for detection in the wrong would be merely a new election, giving another chance for the exercise of similar tactics, such practices would be at a great premium and an election indefinitely prevented. But if where such acts are done the votes are counted upon clear proof aliunde the wrong is at once corrected in this House and no encouragement is given to such dangerous and disgraceful methods.

(c) The contestant presented the names of several thousand alleged voters, whose votes he claimed should be counted for him although they were not actually cast. These names were generally presented in lists, drawn up in the form of petitions made in most of the election precincts on election day. One of these petitions would be addressed to the Congress, would represent that each of the subscribers was a citizen of South Carolina, over 21 years of age, a male resident of the county and election precinct, and qualified to register and vote; that on the election day in question the subscriber presented himself at the voting precinct, desiring and intending to vote for Joshua E. Wilson (the contestant) for Member of Congress, but that he was denied the right to vote; and that he had made every reasonable effort to become qualified to vote according to the registration law of the State, but had been denied an equal chance and the same opportunity to register as was accorded to other fellow-citizens.

These petitions were not generally verified by affidavit, but were usually supplemented by testimony of those who had them in charge, with such explanations and corroborations as the witnesses could give.

The report states the disposition made of these petitions:

It is considered by a majority of this committee that these lists are not per se evidence in the pending contest. They are declarations, important parts of which should be proven in accordance with usual legal forms. It is not impossible so to do, and consequently we think it is necessary for reaching trustworthy results.

Under the authority of Vallandigham v. Campbell (1 Bartlett, p. 31) these declarations might serve a use beyond a mere list for verification, for it was there held "the law is settled that the declaration of a voter as to how he voted or intended to vote, made at the time, is competent testimony on the point."

We propose to compute the ballots of those who were entitled to cast them, and there is ample support in a line of authorities and precedents. A few only are selected.

Delano v. Morgan (2 Bartlett, 170), Hogan v. Pile (2 Bartlett, 285), Niblack v. Walls (Forty-second Congress, 104, January, 1873), Bell v. Snyder (Smith's Rep., 251), are uniformly for "the rule, which is well settled, that where a legal voter offers to vote for a particular candidate, and uses due diligence in endeavoring to do so, and is prevented by fraud, violence, or intimidation from depositing his ballot, his vote shall be counted."

In Bisbee, Jr., v. Finley (Forty-seventh Congress) it was stated, "as a question of law we do not understand it to be controverted that a vote offered by an elector and illegally rejected should be counted as if cast."

In Waddill v. Wise (supra) the same doctrine was elaborately discussed and a further step taken by holding "that the ability to reach the window and actually tender the ticket to the judges is not essential in all cases to constitute a good offer to vote."

Referring to the evidence given in connection with the lists in this record, it seems proper to adopt some general principles as a standard for the examination, and the following have been used as suitable and in accord with the precedents quoted:

[1] See section 1026 of this volume.

First. The evidence should establish that the persons named in the lists as excluded voters were voters according to the requisites of the constitution of South Carolina.

Second. The proof should show that said persons were present at or near the Congressional voting place of their respective precincts, for the purpose of voting, and would have voted but for unlawful rejection or obstruction.

Third. That said excluded voters would have voted for the contestant.

Using the greatest liberality in computing according to the above principles, the committee could find but 3,124 votes which should be added to contestant's returned vote of 2,455. This would make a total of 5,579 votes for contestant, not sufficient to overcome sitting Member's certified vote of 8,171.

Therefore the committee reported resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat, and the same were agreed to by the House on May 1.[1]

1076. The Texas election case of Rearby v. Abbott, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

As to the use of red ink for writing a name on a ballot when a mandatory State law requires black ink.

The mere fact of a slight discrepancy between the returns and the check list does not, in the absence of fraud, invalidate the election.

Neglect of election officers to place ballots, poll lists, and tally sheets in a fastened box, as required by law, does not, in the absence of fraud, invalidate the return.

Returns of a precinct not being questioned, failure to carry out the law as to preservation of other election papers does not justify rejection of the returns.

Where State officers estimated a return from the tally sheets, there being no formal returns, as required by a directory State law, the House did not require a recount of the ballots, there being no charge that the tally sheets were incorrect.

On May 4, 1896,[2] Mr. Charles K. Bell, of Texas, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted a report in the case of Kearby v. Abbott, of Texas. The official returns gave to sitting Member a plurality of 344 votes, which contestant attacked on the ground of various illegalities and informalities. The examination and decision of the committee touched the following questions:

(1) In Morgan precinct, where the ballots had been preserved-as required by law, a recount showed that sitting Member had been credited improperly with one vote, and that four ballots had been rejected by the officers of election because the name of the contestant had been written in red ink, while the law of the State required that the name of the person voted for should be written or printed with black ink or a black pencil. The committee say:

The law of the State provides that no ballots not in accordance with the requirements of the statutes shall be counted, but as it is not necessary to a correct decision of this case, the committee does not decide the question as to whether the fact that this law is not complied with would justify the managers of election in refusing to count a ballot.

(2) In the county of Dallas, where the contestant had alleged that the returns in several precincts did not represent the state of the ballots, a recount was made, and the contestant, according to his contention, gained 139 votes. Some questions arose as to this recount, but the committee did not consider it necessary to go into them, and were willing to credit contestant with the 139 votes plus 5 at Morgan precinct, or 144 votes in all.

(3) At Pleasant Valley precinct one vote more was found in the ballot box than the poll list showed had been voted. The committee did not conceive that this circumstance raised any suspicion of fraudulent conduct on the part of the election officers, quoting Paine on Elections:

> The mere fact that the number of votes returned exceeds the number of names checked on the voting list does not, in the absence of fraud or of a change in the result, affect the validity of the election.

(4) "As to contestant's complaint," says the report, "that the presiding officers at certain precincts in Kaufman County neglected to place the ballots as voted at said precincts, together with the poll lists and tally sheets, in a box, and securely fasten it as required by law, we find that in the absence of fraud, or, for that matter, of claim of injury, such failure, even if it had been established, would constitute no ground for rejecting the votes cast." In fact, however, the proof showed appearance of irregularity in only one precinct. About two months after election an examination of the ballot boxes—then in the custody of the county clerk—showed that the box of Pleasant Grove precinct was not shut tight, it being in fact an old cigar box, and that only one ballot remained in it. But the committee found that the returns from this precinct had been signed by an election officer representing contestant's party, that they were not in any way questioned, and that no effort was made to show that the vote was not actually as certified. The committee quote Paine:

> Accidental loss of the ballots cast and affidavits used at a particular precinct before the county canvass affords no ground for the rejection of the entire returns of the precinct.

And McCrary:

> The rule is that the evidence must stand until impeached, i. e., until shown to be worthless as evidence—so worthless that the truth can not be deduced from it. * * * The return is only to be set aside, as we have seen, when it is so tainted with fraud or misconduct of election officers that the truth can not be deduced from it.

The committee therefore decline to reject the returns from this precinct.

(5) At Terrell precinct some of the tickets of contestant's party were destroyed before they were voted; but the testimony did not disclose that contestant had been deprived of any votes thereby. In fact it indicated the contrary. There was some testimony as to improper influence at this precinct for sitting Member, but the committee conclude that there was nothing in the evidence to warrant the rejection of the returns, it not being contended that the election officers were guilty of any breach of propriety or fraudulent conduct.

(6) From certain precincts—where the plurality of sitting Member was about 300 votes and which if rejected would, with previous deductions, be decisive in favor of contestant—no formal returns were made in accordance with the statutes of the State of Texas, which required the managers of election to make out triplicate returns of the same, certified to be correct and signed by them officially, showing the number of votes polled for each candidate, one of which returns, together with the poll list and tally sheet, was required to be sealed up in an envelope and delivered by the managers of election to the county judge of the county. Another similar package was required to be delivered to the clerk of the county court, and a third to be kept by the presiding officer of the election for twelve months.

But while the formal returns were not made, the poll lists and tally sheets were returned as required by law, and from the poll lists and tally sheets the county commissioners' court, which is a returning board, estimated the vote of the precincts.

The contestant alleged that this action was erroneous, although he did not allege and made no effort to show by evidence, that as a matter fact the vote as estimated was not exactly in accordance with the vote as cast.

The committee admit that the law of Texas provides that no election returns shall be opened or estimated unless the same have been returned in accordance with the provisions of the law. But they quote Fowler v. State (68 Texas) to show that this statute is directory. "It is true," says the supreme court in that case, "that our present statute says that election returns shall not be opened or estimated unless the same have been returned in accordance with its provisions (Article 1706), but this applies to the opening and estimate provided for in the previous section to be made by the county judge. It does not prevent the district court from arriving at the true sense of the electors in a proceeding to test the title to an office. The county judge deals with returns only, but in a suit for the recovery of the office the district court may disregard any unimportant informality in making them, or set them aside altogether when they do not speak the truth as to the state of the ballot."

The committee quote McCrary:

> The election is only to be set aside when it is impossible from any evidence within reach to ascertain the true result; when neither from the returns, nor from other proof, nor from all together can the truth be determined.

The committee then say:

> The contestee took the testimony of one or more officers of each of the election precincts from which no returns were made, and it was proved that the failure to make the returns in each instance was occasioned by the fact that no blanks upon which returns should have been made were furnished; but as to each precinct proof was made from the tally sheet and from the memory of the officers of election exactly what the vote actually polled for each candidate was.
> It was not contended by the contestant and no effort was made to prove that the vote was in any instance different from that shown by the tally sheet and as testified to by the witnesses. But he contends that it was necessary that there should have been a recount of the ballots cast at each of the voting precincts. Upon this point the committee are agreed that if the contestant had alleged that the vote at any of the precincts from which there were no formal returns was different from that shown by the tally sheet, or if he had charged that there was any fraud on the part of the election officers it would have been necessary for the ballots cast at such precincts to have been recounted, as they were in the precincts concerning which he made such charges, but it is to be observed that no such contention was made by the contestant, and no suspicion was raised as to the correctness of the vote as estimated by the commissioner's courts of the different counties and as proved by the contestee.

The committee quote Paine on Elections as to the application of the general rule requiring the production of the best evidence, cite Howard v. Shields (16 Ohio) to the effect that—> the tally sheet kept by the officers of the election was competent evidence in an election contest to show the true state of the vote, and that it was good until impeached, with the explanation by McCrary that—the rule stated presupposes that tally sheets are required to be kept by law, and where they are not required by law to be kept by the managers of the election they would not be admissible.

The committee call attention to the fact that in this case the tally sheets were required to be kept by law.

The committee concluded, in accordance with the above decisions, that the sitting Member was entitled to the seat, and reported resolutions in accordance therewith.

On May 4 [1] the House concurred in the report.

1077. The Virginia election case of Yost v. Tucker, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Where the intention of the voter is clear the ballot will not be rejected for faulty marking by the voter unless a law undoubtedly mandatory so prescribes.

Where a voter inadvertently or ignorantly erases the designation of the office in marking, the character of the ballot as an official ballot is not destroyed.

Instance where blotted or blurred ballots were disposed of by agreement of parties.

Although contestent claimed in his notice that blurred ballots should not be counted for contestee, and did not ask that they be counted for himself, the committee counted them for both.

On May 6, 1896,[2] Mr. Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts, presented the report of Elections Committee No. 3 in the case of Yost v. Tucker, from Virginia. The sitting Member had been returned by an official plurality of 892 votes over the contestant.

The case involved construction of the newly enacted Australian ballot law of Virginia, and a review of the conduct of election officers under it. This law, besides describing the ballot and providing for its printing so that its form and arrangement should not be disclosed until presented to the voter, has this provision:

SEC. 11. Every elector qualified to vote at a precinct shall, when he so demands, be furnished with an official ballot by one of the judges of election selected for that duty by a majority of the judges present. The said elector shall then take the said official ballot and retire to said voting booth. He shall then draw a line with a pen or pencil through the names of the candidates he does not wish to vote for, leaving the name or names of the candidate or candidates he does wish to vote for unscratched. No name shall be considered scratched unless the pen or pencil mark extend through three-fourths of the length of said name; and no ballot save an official ballot above provided for shall be counted for any person. When, as to any office, more than one name remains unscratched, the ballot for that particular office shall be void, but the ballot as to any other office for which only one name remain unscratched shall be valid. He shall fold said ballot with the names of the candidates on the inside and hand the same to the judge of election, who shall place the same in the ballot box without any inspection further than to assure himself that the ballot is a genuine ballot, for which purpose he may, without looking at the printed inside of said ballot, inspect the official seal upon the back thereof: Provided, It shall be lawful for any voter to erase any or all names printed upon said official ballot and substitute therein in writing the name of any person or persons for any office for which he may desire to vote.

After the election, at the instance of the contestant, a recount of the ballots was had in all the cities and counties of the district. It also appeared that 1,021 ballots had been destroyed, and over these ballots arose one of the principal issues of the case.

It will be convenient to notice, first, the questions arising over the ballots recounted, and second, those arising over the destroyed ballots.

(1) The questions arising over recounted ballots.

(a) The election law of Virginia provided:

SEC. 3. The ballot shall be a white paper ticket containing the names of the persons who have complied with the provisions of this act, as hereinafter provided, and the title of the office printed or written as hereinafter provided. None other shall be a legal ballot.

At the election in question candidates for only one office were voted for, and the following question arose:

Upon 1,169 ballots cast for Yost and 114 cast for Tucker the name of the office as well as the names of all other candidates except Yost or Tucker, respectively, were erased. What disposition shall be made of these ballots? The general rule, doubtless, is to count those ballots which clearly express the intention of the voter, but the intention must be expressed as provided by law. We do not suppose it would be contended, in view of the requirement of this statute for an official ballot and an express prohibition against counting any other ballot, that a ballot provided by the voter himself and deposited by him should be counted, although it expressed his intention beyond all doubt. The question here is not one which rests on a supposed ambiguity of the ballot, but it is a question of what the laws of Virginia require.

The intention of the voter, if it can be clearly ascertained from the ballot, will generally be given effect to, and when it is not expressed according to the strict requirements of a statute, such requirements will often be regarded as merely directory, unless a failure to comply with them is declared to be fatal to the ballot. But where the statute itself provides that a certain thing shall be done by the voter or his vote shall not be counted, then there can be no question that a provision of that character is Mandatory, and that a failure to comply with it fatal to the ballot.

In the present case there is no question of the intention of the voter. There was only one office to be filled, and it is hardly conceivable that more than 1,200 voters in this district should have left their homes, gone to the polls, entered the booths, and gone through the act of voting with the intention of voting to fill no office whatever. This was the first election at which the Walton law was applied in Virginia, and undoubtedly the caption was marked out by reason of the failure on the part of the voter to understand this novel system. Unless clearly required to reject these ballots by the Virginia laws, the committee believes they should be counted.

The words "none other shall be a legal ballot" in section 3 refer to the Australian ballot provided for at the public expense, and the words in section 11 of the act, "no ballot save an official ballot above provided for shall be counted for any person," were in the opinion of the committee intended only as a prohibition of the counting of any other than the ballot provided for by the first sections of the act. The erasure of the caption did not destroy the character of the ballot as an official ballot, and since there could be no ambiguity or doubt as to what office the voter intended his candidate to fill, since only one office was named on the ticket, the committee is of the opinion that these so-called "caption-marked" ballots—114 for Tucker and 1,169 for Yost—should be counted.

(b) Certain ballots were blotted or blurred. The most difficult question was one of fact as to whether they were "scratched" within the meaning of the law quoted above or simply "blurred." The committee say:

This question is settled by agreement of the contestant and contestee. It is conceded that they were all properly marked, and in folding them before the ink was dry an impression was made on the names not marked. This is purely accidental, and not to be deemed the marking or scratching contemplated by the statute, which is to be done by drawing a line "with a pen or pencil" through the names of the candidates for whom the voter does not wish to vote. The contestant's notice of contest contends that similar ballots cast for the contestee should not be counted, and does not claim that such ballots should be counted for himself. The committee are of opinion, however, that they should be counted—14 for Tucker, and 54 for Yost—as appears by the record.

Where the State law specifically required rejection of a ballot whereof the scratching of a name failed to mark two-thirds thereof, the House approved rejection.

Although the intent of the voter be entirely plain the House will follow a State law, arbitrary but mandatory, which requires rejection of the ballot.

Is the House, in its function of judging elections, to be precluded by an arbitrary State law from determining the intent of the voter?

Where the State prescribes the manner of election, may the House disregard an arbitrary State law which denies expression to the voter's intent?

Discussion of the distinction between directory and mandatory election laws.

(c) As to imperfectly marked ballots a sharp division arose in the committee and on the floor of the House. As shown by the extracts of law already given no name was to be considered scratched unless the pen or pencil mark extended through three-fourths of the length of the name, and it was further provided that "when, as to any office, more than one name remains unscratched, the ballot for that particular office shall be void." The majority of the committee say:

> It appears very clear that unless a name is marked through three-fourths of its length it is not, within the meaning of the law, to be considered as scratched at all, and therefore more than one name in the so-called "imperfectly marked" ballots remains unscratched upon the ticket, and the law expressly provides that in such a case the ballot shall be void. It is not for the committee to decide whether the provision as to the marking of the ballot is a wise or reasonable one or not. The voter has failed to express his will by the so-called "imperfectly marked" ballot, according to the requirement of the statute, and, failing in that, the statute declares that the ballot is void. In the judgment of the committee, therefore, these "imperfectly marked" ballots can not be counted.

The minority[1] contended strongly that these ballots, which if counted would, the minority contended, give contestant a plurality of 22 votes, were marked sufficiently to show the intent of the voter, and should be counted. The minority views cite legal authorities, including the Illinois case of Parker v. Orr (41 N. E. Reporter), and express surprise that there should be doubt as to so well an established principle that a ballot should be counted if it expressed the intention of the voter beyond a reasonable doubt.

In the debate this view was enforced on the floor, especially by the argument[2] of Mr. Charles Daniels, of New York, who contended that the Constitution, in making the House the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, excluded any State from tying the House down to any arbitrary principle or rule in determining from the evidence the voter's intention. Mr. Daniels drew a distinction between this case, where the mark "had a natural and reasonable significance," and those cases where the law of the State required what might be called an arbitrary mark, a cross before or after the name, and not naturally of significance. In reply [1] Mr. David A. De Armond, of Missouri, called attention to the clause of the Constitution under which the State prescribed the "times, places, and manner" of holding elections, and held that the law of Virginia, as to how the elections should be conducted, the returns ascertained, and the result declared, was the law of Congress, which the House might not, under the Constitution, disregard. The question was not as to the intention of the voter, but whether in fact the name was scratched. When a constitutional statute said that unless three-fourths of the name was marked through it was not scratched, the question was not as to what the voter intended, but as to what he did. And Mr. McCall, in concluding the case, dwelt [2] upon the fact—as he claimed—that the Virginia statute (sec. 11, quoted above) was clearly mandatory, and quoted McCrary and Paine on Elections, especially the following paragraph from the latter:

> Statutes expressly declaring specified acts or omissions fatal to the validity of an election, or expressly prohibiting the performance or omission of specified acts, are mandatory. While statutory provisions prescribing acts which are in their nature absolutely essential to the validity of the election may be mandatory, in whatever phraseology expressed, the most unimportant requirements may be made mandatory by a clear expression of the legislative will.

Referring to the case of Parker v. Orr, Mr. McCall noted the fact that the court held, on the particular provision of the law it was considering, that it was not intended by the legislature to be mandatory, and he cited from that decision the following:

> Wherever our statutes do not expressly declare that particular informalities do not avoid the ballot, it would seem best to consider their requirements as directory only.

An illegal destruction of ballots, but apparently done in good faith, was not held as evidence contributing to a charge of conspiracy.

Rejected ballots being illegally destroyed by election officers who were partisans of contestee, and against protest, contestant was held entitled to the advantage of every doubt.

Ballots improperly rejected by election officers, and then illegally destroyed, were proven aliunde and counted.

Electors being at the polls a long time, and prevented from voting by obstructive challenges of others, their votes were counted by the House.

To count votes tendered but not cast, it is necessary to establish obstruction by election officers and due diligence on part of the elector.

Serious irregularities by election officers, the rejection of an undue proportion of ballots for imperfect marking, and illegal destruction of rejected ballots, vitiated the return.

(2) The questions arising over the 1,021 burned or otherwise destroyed ballots: It appeared that a former law of Virginia had provided for burning ballots, but that the law under which this election was held—in use for the first time—had no provision authorizing the burning of rejected ballots. In debate Mr. McCall stated that the precincts where the rejected ballots were burned numbered about 15 out of 175 in the whole district.

At the outset an issue arose as to the burned ballots. The majority or the committee took a view which allowed to be credited to contestant only such of those ballots as he could prove to have been properly cast for him and which threw out the entire vote of only such precincts as could be successfully attacked individually. The majority say:

> With reference to these ballots, generally, it may be said, in most instances, that the Republican judges at the precincts where they were cast concurred with the other judges in treating them as absolutely void, and agreed that they should be burned or otherwise destroyed. At a few precincts the Republican or Populist judges objected to their destruction, but the record shows that in almost every case these judges agreed to the count and concurred in the conclusion of the other judges that these ballots were not marked, as required by the statute, and could not be counted.
> While the committee is of the opinion that in no case should the defective ballots have been destroyed, yet it is of the opinion that in nearly all of the precincts their destruction was made in entire good faith, and that such destruction in most of the precincts does not prove an intention to commit fraud on the part of the election judges. The contestant attempts to prove that some of these ballots were intended for him and as by their destruction he was prevented from having a recount of them, it is clearly his right to prove by the testimony of the judges, or of any witness, the exact condition of the ballots, and he is entitled to the benefit of any that he can show were cast for him.

The minority take issue with this position. They find 2,711 defective ballots, burned and unburned, which could be counted for no one, and declare that these defective ballots were "the result of an illegal and fraudulent conspiracy, entered into by sworn officers of the law for the sole benefit of this contestee." The Minority say:

> In violation of law, the election was practically in the hands of one political party. It is shown by the record that only 15 per cent of the election officers were Republicans. It is shown that at many precincts Republican had no representation whatever among the election officers, and that competent Republicans could have been appointed. It is conceded that the defective ballots were cast by illiterate electors. It is proven that in every instance the officer designated by law to assist the illiterate was a Democrat, and in many instances so partisan that no member of the opposite party had confidence in him. It is proven that, in violation of law, as construed by the supreme court of Virginia, special constables refused to mark the ballots for illiterates who were opposed to them. A willing and cheerful service was rendered to their political friends. To such an extent was this carried that it was practically impossible for an illiterate Democrat, with the eye of a jealous party friend upon him, to cast a defective ballot, and it was almost impossible, at many precincts, for an illiterate Republican to cast a perfect ballot.
> It is proven that in order to qualify themselves for the discharge of their duty as suffragans, the illiterate Republicans diligently sought to familiarize themselves with the printed name of the candidate of their choice—that many of them had so mastered the letters contained in the name "J. Yost" as to enable them to recognize it when printed in plain roman. That the Republican committee had widely circulated a pamphlet giving extracts from the election laws and detailing the method of voting. They advised that at each precinct an intelligent Republican should vote early, carefully inspect the ballot, and after voting explain to the illiterates who had not voted the location of Yost's name on the ballot. With this information and his ability to recognize the name of "J. Yost," the illiterate voter could have properly marked and cast his ballot. Knowing this, the Democratic officials, in utter disregard of law, entered into a conspiracy to dupe and deceive the opposing illiterate voter by alternating the names on the official ballot, printing the ballot in German text and other type illegible to a man who could only read plain roman, instructing special constables not to assist the illiterates, a6nd in other ways sought to so confuse and mystify the voter as to render his ballot defective. Their object was accomplished. The fraud they planned and executed was consummated.

Is it a wonder that under these circumstances thousands of ballots cast by honest men were thrown out as defective? The very guardians of the law became its violators; men sworn to render assistance to the illiterates considered it their duty to defraud that voter of his suffrage, and did defraud him. And this House is asked to put the seal of its approval upon such work.

If this contestant were given the same proportion of these 2,711 unconsidered defective ballots as he received of the 1,086, which were distributed upon recount and proof, his plurality would be over 2,000. His proportion of the 1,086 was 669 on recount and 292 on burned ballots proven, a total of 961, or over 88 per cent.

This proportionate distribution of the 2,711 ballots would give Yost 2,385; Tucker 326. Yost's plurality, 2,059.

The majority of the committee, proceeding on the basis announced, examined the various precincts. In the following cases they took action involving new principles:

(a) At Curdsville precinct there were returned 38 votes for Tucker, 54 for Yost, and 2 for Cocke, and 111 votes were rejected, of which 107 were destroyed. The testimony indicated that 90 destroyed ballots were intended for Yost. The majority say:

The burning of the ballots was illegal. It was done by the act of judges representing the contestee and against the protest of the judge representing the contestant. In view of the great number of ballots destroyed, of the clear proof that this number contained ballots which were legal, and further, that the evidence was destroyed by partisans of the contestee, the contestant is entitled to the benefit of every doubt in the situation, and the committee is of opinion that the contestant should be credited with his claim here of a gain of 90 votes.

Also at New Canton, under similar circumstances, the contestant proved 100 votes by the best evidence the case would admit and was credited with that number.

(b) At Court House precinct the contestant called 36 voters who testified that they were in line waiting and desired to vote for contestant and would have voted for him had they had the opportunity to do so. No question was raised as to their qualification as voters, nor as to their intention to vote for the contestant, but the testimony did not show how long the voters were in line. The committee intimate that, in view of the fact that the record did not show obstruction by election officers or whether the voters stood in line a reasonable time, there were doubts about counting the votes, and content themselves with saying that these votes would not affect the final result. But as to Jackson River precinct the majority say:

At this precinct 13 voters testify that they were at the polls during a considerable portion of election day, were in line and desired to vote, and would have voted for the contestant. There is also evidence showing that a supporter of the contestee, a Federal officeholder, was actively engaged in challenging Republican voters, and that he consumed a large part of the day in asking questions, and thus delayed the voting. It appears from the testimony of the contestee's witnesses that there were not sufficient voting facilities for all who wished to vote. According to the rule laid down in the case of Waddell v. Wise, and McCrary on Elections (3d edition, sec. 523), the contestant should be credited with 13 votes at this precinct.

At this precinct the contestant also proves (pp. 202 and 204 of the record) that Thadeus Jones, a legally qualified voter, offered to vote for him, but was illegally prevented by the judges of election. This vote should be counted for the contestant.

(c) At Brown's Church precinct, where the returns gave Tucker 131 votes, Yost 51, and Cocke 13, it appeared that 234 ballots were rejected and burned.

Two officers of elections were shown to have been drinking, and two judges and a partisan of contestee, who was not an election officer, kept account of the votes. The judges did not agree as to the result reported. The report says:

Misconduct of the officer who assists illiterates to mark their ballots justifies correction but not rejection of the poll

The presumption arising from the fact of registration is not overthrown by the simple proof that the voters are students.

The House favored purging rather than rejecting the return of an entire county wherein a partisan county electoral board had so printed the ballot as to confuse voters.

Because the officer who assists illiterates to mark their ballots takes a narrow and technical view of his duties under the law does not justify rejection of the poll.

B. W. L. Blanton, the Democratic precinct chairman, was present at the count, and the judges apparently followed his directions as to which ballots should be counted. Blanton was the one who suggested that the ballots should be burned. He admits that the alternating of the names upon the ballot was done at his order. He also admits that he caused the initial "J "to be separated from the name "Yost" by a blank space of 2 inches for the charitable purpose of giving Yost "the same rights and privileges on that ticket that the rest of the candidates had." The irregularities at this precinct were of the most serious character, and these irregularities, taken in connection with the gross disproportion of the ballots rejected to the ballots counted and their destruction, are sufficient to destroy all faith in the official acts of the officers and to require the rejection of the returns.

(d) As to Milner's precinct the majority find:

The evidence is pretty strong that the constable at this precinct did not perform his full duty in aiding illiterate voters. He admitted that the Democratic county chairman had instructed him as to his duty in marking the ballots. Misconduct of this officer would not be sufficient to warrant the rejection of the whole poll and the disfranchisement of all the voters there, because its effect can reasonably be limited to the number of illegally marked ballots, of which there were 23. The evidence does not show such irregularity or fraudulent conduct on the part of the judges as would destroy the value of the returns as evidence. If the contestant were credited with the rejected ballots, his vote at this precinct would be increased by 23.

(e) In Lexington precinct 11 students voted, and the contestant claimed the deduction of these votes. The committee say:

These votes were cast by students of the university located there, and the contestant contends that they were nonresidents. McCrary on Elections, section 41, says:

"The question whether or not the student at college is a bona fide resident of the place where the college is located must in each case depend upon the facts. He may be a resident and he may not be; whether he is not depends upon the answer which may be given to a variety of questions, such as follows: Is he of age? Is he fully emancipated from his parents' control? Does he regard the place where the college is situated as his home, or has he a home elsewhere to which he expects to go and at which he expects to reside?"

The contestant furnishes evidence upon few, if any, of these important issues.

The presumption, from the fact of registration, is that these 11 students were voters at this precinct, and this presumption is not overthrown by the simple proof that they were students. Moreover, there is no evidence that they voted for the contestee. These votes, therefore, should not be deducted from the vote of the contestee.

The minority say:

In regard to the 11 student votes at Lexington, the testimony of R. A. Fulwider, a fellow student, shows:

"Q. 12. Are these students residents of Lexington in the Lexington precinct, or are they merely here from other sections of the State as students?—A. They are all entered upon the catalogue as being residents of other States except the two Mitchells, who are from Brownsburg, Rockbridge County, Va.

"Q. 13. Please state the politics of these students and for whom they voted at the last election—A. They all claim to be Democrats, and I know that personally, and I believe they cast their votes for Mr. Tucker."

Not one of these students was placed on the stand by the contestee. The majority presumes "from the fact of registration" that these students were voters at that precinct, and this presumption is supposed to overweigh the positive testimony that these students appeared on the college roll and were recognized as residents of other States. It would have been an easy matter for contestee to have put these students on the stand and thus met evidence with evidence.

A leading issue in this case arose over the claim of the contestant that the entire votes of the counties of Amherst and Appomattox should be rejected. The minority give as reasons for rejecting the vote of Amherst County—

That the electoral board consisted entirely of members of sitting member's party, and that one of them was also the chairman of the county committee of the same party. This partisan, after appointing the special constables for each of the precincts, called them together and, as chairman of the county committee of his party, instructed them as to their duties in assisting illiterate voters. The electoral board failed to give contestant's party proper representation on the precinct boards, although such representation might have been allowed. The partisan chairman, who instructed the constables as to how to assist in marking the ballots, also as member of the county electoral board, had the official ballots printed, and he admitted that he alternated the names and used different styles of type, producing about seventy-five different kinds of ballots. In view of these facts the minority claim that the entire vote of the county should be rejected, saying:

It would indeed be an unfortunate precedent to hold that the crooked ways resorted to by the Democratic election officers in that county were legal and valid. It is admitted that at nearly one-half of the precincts in the county none of the judges were Republicans, contrary to the express provision of the statute; that the ballots were printed partly in German and partly in Roman text; that the names of the candidates were alternated; that the secretary of the electoral board instructed the special constables not to mark the ballots for the illiterate voters unless they were blind or physically unable to mark for themselves. It is proved that constables at many precincts in the county refused to give aid to Republican voters who requested them to do so.

For similar reasons the minority argued that the vote of Appomattox County should be rejected.

The majority of the committee condemn the action of the county board, but say:

If the officers guilty of such conduct had charge of the making up of the returns in the various precincts they would need to be scrutinized with the gravest suspicion, and they certainly would not be entitled to that weight and effect as evidence which are due to uncontaminated returns. But the elections were in charge of the election judges at the different precincts and, while the fact that these judges were appointed by the county electoral boards is a circumstance which would invite the most careful scrutiny of their conduct, it would be a daring conclusion to infer that the credibility of the returns at all the precincts in this county was destroyed and that all the voters should be disfranchised because the precinct officers had been appointed by a central county board which alternated the names on the ballot. Such a wholesale exclusion of votes would not be warranted; but the evidence of each precinct should be considered separately, as it has been by the committee in the preceding portions of this report.

The committee is also under the necessity of considering whether and how much the contestant's vote suffered on account of this method of printing. There were 349 defective ballots in Amherst County out of a total of 2,705 (p. 124 of the record), a percentage not materially greater than the percentage of defective ballots throughout the whole district; and the relative strength of the parties, as shown at previous elections, appears to have been fairly maintained in this election.

Substantially the same observations may be made as to Appomattox County, where there were 153 defective ballots out of a total of 1,431, and the contestee received a plurality of 49. The committee is of the opinion that the evidence will not warrant the rejection of the votes of these two counties.

The minority of the committee also contended that the entire vote of the First Ward of Staunton should be rejected "because of the confessed violation of law by Constable J. Frank West."

The law of Virginia as construed by the supreme court was:

It is the duty of the special constable to render him who is blind, or unable by defective education to read, every assistance asked for and required by the elector to aid him in preparing his ballot.

Constable West testified that he told the voters he did not want to know how they intended to vote, but pointed out the names and let the voters mark them. He declined to mark the ballots for the voters, considering that he had no right to do so. The minority claimed that West's illegal construction, and the illegal acts committed under cover of that construction, rendered the returns from the precinct unworthy of credit.

The majority concluded, however—

A careful examination of the evidence in this precinct fails signally to show any actual fraud. One of the judges was a Republican, and he is not called to testify by the contestant, and the only evidence tending to show any misconduct is directed to the action of the special constable. The evidence does not show that he committed any fraudulent acts, but does show that he performed his duties, under the law, as he understood it. The constable took a narrow and technical view of his duty, but there is no primary or direct evidence to show that he failed to sufficiently assist any voter. He himself declares:

"In no instance where in elector, whenever it was lawful for me to assist, told me for whom he wanted to vote did I allow his ticket to be deposited unless it properly registered his vote for the candidate he had told me he wanted to vote for."

As appears from the recount, out of a total of 663 ballots cast in this ward, 76 were rejected as defective, which is a very little larger percentage of the total votes cast than the rejected ballots of Ward 2 were of the total number of votes in that ward, where the returns are not attacked; and doubtless a considerable number attempted to mark their own ballots without asking assistance. The evidence fails to disclose any ground for rejecting the whole vote of this poll and throwing out the returns themselves, the reliability of which is not assailed in the slightest degree. The principle on which returns are usually rejected is that when the officers of election have been guilty of such frauds or irregularities as to destroy the value of the returns as evidence the returns can not be relied upon to prove the result and must be disregarded. There is no evidence that the returns at this poll did not correctly show the result, and to throw out the whole poll would be to ruthlessly disfranchise honest voters. Including the so-called "caption-marked" ballots, the committee finds, upon the basis of the agreement between the parties, that the contestant received 227 votes at this precinct and the contestee 335.

In conclusion, the majority of the committee found that after all deductions there remained to sitting Member 161 plurality. The minority found for contestant 736 plurality.

On January 20 and 21[1] the report was debated in the House with much learning and at great length. The question being taken, the proposition of the minority, declaring contestant entitled to the seat, was decided in the negative, yeas 119, nays 127. A motion to reconsider this vote was laid on the table, yeas 120, nays 104. Then the question recurred on agreeing to the resolutions of the majority of the committee confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat, and there appeared, yeas 119, nays 47, answering present 15. A quorum responding, the resolutions of the majority of the committee were agreed to.

1081. The North Carolina election case of Thompson v. Shaw, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Irregularities in the conduct of an election do not in themselves justify rejection of a poll.

On May 6, 1896,[2] Mr. Warren W. Miller, of West Virginia, submitted the report of the Committee on Elections No. 2 in the case of Thompson v. Shaw, of North Carolina. The sitting Member had on the face of the returns a majority of 994 votes.

The county canvassers in three counties had rejected the vote of certain precincts, which had given a total of 371 for contestant and 254 for sitting Member; it having been admitted by both parties to the contest that the action of the canvassers was wrong, and therefore the committee counted the rejected vote. This reduced the majority of sitting Member to 877.

Contestant claimed that the whole vote of Cross Creek precinct, where the return was 1,120 votes for sitting Member and 15 for contestant, should be rejected for frauds committed and unlawful acts done by the partisans of sitting Member. The committee, while believing that there were irregularities in the conduct of the election and that perhaps illegal votes were cast and counted for sitting Member, yet did not feel warranted, upon the facts proved, in disregarding the whole of the votes cast at the precinct.

In conclusion the committee found that, conceding to contestant the benefit of every reasonable doubt and all legitimate presumptions, he fell far short of a sufficient number to elect him legally.

Therefore the committee recommended resolutions declaring Mr. Thompson not elected and Mr. Shaw entitled to the seat. On May 6,1896,[3] the House concurred in the report of the committee.

1082. The Louisiana election case of Coleman v. Buck, in the Fifty-Fourth Congress.

Although violence, intimidation, and fraud were extensive in a district, yet, as it did not appear that the result was affected by these means, the returned Member was confirmed.

On March 12, 1896,[4] Mr. Warren W. Miller, of West Virginia, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of that committee on the case of Coleman v. Buck, of Louisiana. The sitting Member received on the face of the official returns a majority of 7,653 over the contestant.

[4] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 758; Rowell's Digest, p. 518.

The contestant attacked the returns from various precincts and parishes, in substance as follows:

That the Democratic officials had violated the election law in the appointment of election officers, registrars, and other persons; that any legal voters, who would have voted for contestant, were prevented from registering by acts of violence committed by Democrats; that hundreds of Republican who were entitled to vote, and who would have voted for contestant, were prevented from so doing by intimidation and other unlawful means used by Democrats in the interest of the contestee; that by means of murder, arson, false registration, the issuance of thousands of fraudulent registration certificates, ballot-box stuffing, forged returns, and destruction of ballots voted by Republican for contestant, the Democrats, in the interest of contestee, inaugurated and maintained before and at the time of said election such a reign of terror and committed such acts of lawlessness, with the knowledge and consent of the authorities, that no legal or fair election could be or was held in said district.

The committee, after explaining the election law of Louisiana, thus summarize their conclusions:

The record in this case shows a willful disregard by the Democratic officers of every one of the provisions of the election law above cited in the conduct of said election, except in the said parish of Orleans.

In Jefferson Pariah the watchers appointed by the Republicans were refused admission to the polling places by the Democrats. Republicans, mostly colored men and legal voters, who would have voted for contestant, were refused the right of suffrage; tally sheets, lists of voters, and poll books were altered and forged; ballot boxes were stuffed with fraudulent ballots and many other illegal acts done in the interest of contestee and against contestant.

For the foregoing reasons the vote of said parish of Jefferson must be thrown out and wholly rejected.

For like reasons the vote returned from the First, Second, and Fifth wards, respectively, of St. Charles Parish are also wholly rejected.

It is shown by the record that in the said wards in the city of New Orleans, in the parish of Orleans, large numbers of Republican voters were refused registration; that numerous unlawful assaults were made, and acts of violence committed upon colored Republicans who attempted to register as the law required; that mob violence prevailed in said wards of said city and parish before and at the time of said election, with the knowledge and, as the committee believe, with the assent of the authorities; that much fraudulent voting was done in favor of contestee, and that many of the colored Republicans were denied the equal protection of the law on account of their race and political opinions.

The committee is further of opinion that many Republicans who were entitled to vote, and who would have voted for contestant, were intimidated, and thus kept from voting; that some of the illegal votes cast for contestee in said wards of said city could be segregated and deducted from the number of votes returned and certified for him as aforesaid; but it does not appear that a sufficient number of legal voters who would have voted for contestant were refused the right of suffrage to change the general result of such election, as certified, after such correction should be made.

Neither is it shown that fraud, unfairness, violence, or intimidation prevailed in said election to such an extent as would warrant the committee in throwing out and rejecting the total vote of said wards in said city and parish of Orleans.

Unless this be done the contestee yet has a majority after deducting from his vote, as certified, the votes cast for him in the parish of Jefferson and wards 1, 2, and 5 in the parish of St. Charles as aforesaid, and any other illegal votes cast for him or legal votes rejected in his interest in the said wards in the city and parish of Orleans.

Therefore the committee reported resolutions declaring the sitting Member entitled to his seat, and the contestant not elected. On March 12, 1896,[1] the House concurred in the report without division.

1083. The North Carolina election case of Cheatham v. Woodard, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

A contestant must sustain by evidence his claim that he was elected.

On May 14, 1896,[1] the Committee on Elections No. 2 submitted the report in the case of Cheatham v. Woodard, from North Carolina. The official returns from the district gave to Mr. Woodard 14,721 votes, Mr. Cheatham 9,413, and Mr. H.F. Freeman 5,314. The contestant alleged various objections to the returns, and contended that the colored voters in the district were in the majority and were for him. The committee did not find this or any of the other allegations sustained, and reported resolutions confirming sitting Member in his seat. On May 14[2] the House concurred in the report of the committee.

1084. The Georgia election case of Felton v. Maddox, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Where contestant's case did not overcome returned Member's majority the House did not consider the returned Member's counter charges.

Failure of county officers to verify formally a registration list did not invalidate the election, no voter being deprived of any right.

Where an unauthorized but not fraudulent erasure of names occurred on a registration list the House counted votes of electors harmed by this erasure.

Failure of registrar to appear when summoned to explain charges of illegal registration does not prove the charges.

An election is not affected by the fact that the registration lists are in writing when the law requires them to be in printing.

On May 11, 1896,[3] Mr. Charles Daniels, of New York, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted the unanimous report of the committee in the case of Felton v. Maddox, of Georgia. The contestant challenged the election in three counties, and the sitting Member in reply challenged the result in three other counties, which were favorable to the contestant.

The official return gave the sitting Member a majority of 1,562 votes. As the committee found from contestant's testimony that this majority could not be reduced by more than 350 votes, they did not find it necessary to consider the counter charges by the sitting Member, since the only effect would be to increase the sitting Member's majority—an unnecessary result.

The charges of the contestant related to several features of the election:

(1) Irregularities in the registration, whereby in some cases voters were deprived of their votes:

(a) In Bartow County the law required the registry list to be verified by the county commissioners. They failed as a board to verify the list, allowing that to be done by one of the members. The committee say:

> This was an irregularity, but as long as it did not deprive the voters of their right to vote it did not invalidate the election in this county.

(b) In Bartow County, after the October election and before the election in November, 1894—the election in question—the tax collector erased, apparently without authority, 175 names from the registered list of voters which he, under the law, had made as collector. The committee found that they were made in good faith, and that it would be sufficient to allow to contestant the votes of 9 of his supporters who had in fact paid their taxes, but whose votes were refused because their names had been erased.

(c) In Cobb County it was charged that the registration list contained the names of fictitious and unqualified persons, and the register, when subpoenaed to attend and give his evidence for the contestant, failed to do so. But the committee found that his absence did not prove the truth of the charge, and testimony given failed to prove that names added were of unqualified persons.

(d) The law directed that the registration lists sent to the election managers should be printed, but in Cobb County were written. The report says:

> This was an irregularity, but it was not proven to have influenced in any manner the vote of any person or to have permitted any person to vote who was not entitled to do so. Accordingly, under the well-settled principle of the law, as well as of a positive enactment of the State of Georgia, this omission to print the lists can not be allowed to affect the result of the election, which seems to have been the same as though the lists had been printed.

(e) In Floyd County three persons were irregularly registered by their firm names, but as it did not appear for whom these persons voted, no special consideration was given the matter.

Returns are not vitiated simply because election officers lack certain qualifications required by law.

Failure of election officers to subscribe their names in full to their affidavits and returns does not vitiate the returns.

Election officers who have not taken the required oath are still de facto officers and their acts are valid.

It not being shown for whom a few paupers voted, the Elections Committee did not give the charge consideration.

Ballots deposited by error in a ballot box other than the Congressional box, and in charge of other officers, should be counted as if deposited aright.

The election for Congressman, being lawfully held, is not vitiated by another election on a local matter held unlawfully at the same place.

The entire poll may not be rejected because an unascertained number of electors were corruptly influenced by tickets to a barbecue.

(2) Irregularities as to qualifications or acts of election officers in these instances:

(a) In Cobb County the qualifications of certain superintendents of elections were alleged not to be in accordance with the requirements of the law of the State. It was also charged that they had failed to subscribe their names in full to their affidavits and returns. The committee found, however, that these were no more than "irregularities, not in fact changing or affecting in the least degree the election or its results, and the returns can not be set aside or disregarded because of these defects. They were of no materiality, and the statute prescribing them was in no respect mandatory."

(b) In Livingston district the report says "the managers may not have taken the oath prescribed for them by law; but if they did not, they were still de facto officers without taking the oath, and their acts are legal," quoting Paine and McCrary on Elections in support of this doctrine.

(3) As to illegal and informal votes in the following instances:

(a) In Floyd County 5 or 6 inmates of the almshouse were permitted to vote; but as it did not appear for whom the votes were cast, the committee gave the question no special consideration.

(b) In Livingston district a local county election was held at the same time, there being two boxes differently labeled and different election managers. At the close of the election a few Congressional votes were found in the local issue box. "But says the committee, "the fact that they were mistakenly so deposited did not legally deprive the candidate of those votes. They should still have been counted as they appeared by the managers of the Congressional election. But the failure to count them seems to have deprived the contestant of no more than one vote over those in the same box for the contestee."

(4) In Livingston precinct the committee found that "the failure to deliver a package of * * * votes, as they should have been, was a breach of confidence, but there is no reliable evidence that the contestant in the end lost any votes by that circumstance."

(5) At the same time and places that the Congressional election was held in Floyd County there was also an election to authorize an issue of county bonds. For that reason the election in this county was objected to as illegal. The committee say:

> But as the election for Members of the Fifty-fourth Congress was most certainly lawfully held it could not be deprived of that character because another election for another object held at the same time and place was held without authority. Each could well be held without the one interfering in the least degree with the other. As a matter of fact the bond (county) election was authorized by the law of the State, and it was represented by a manager and box different from that of the Congressional election box. the boxes were differently labeled and voters were required to state for which election their votes were offered.

(6) In Floyd County a barbecue was held to promote the county election on the bond question, and contestant charged that tickets to the barbecue were used to induce colored voters to vote for sitting Member. The committee found no sure means of determining how many votes were thus influenced, and that the evidence would in no way justify the rejection of the entire vote of the county.

The committee, in accordance with their findings, reported resolutions declaring contestant not elected and sitting Member entitled to the seat.

On May 11[1] the resolutions were agreed to by the House without debate or division.

1086. The New York election case of Mitchell v. Walsh in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Testimony in an election case being taken before a person who had ceased to be a notary, but none of the parties or witnesses being aware of this until nearly all the evidence was in, the House considered it.

As to the evidence required to show a conspiracy to bribe.

[1] Journal, pp. 475, 476; Record, p. 5088.

Where a conspiracy to bribe is shown, and an indefinite number of tainted votes are cast, the entire poll is rejected.

Where a conspiracy to bribe for the benefit of one party causes rejection of the return, should the innocent opposing party be credited with his unimpeached vote?

Discussion of the value in proving bribery of testimony as to statements of voters after they have voted.

On May 15, 1896,[1] Mr. Chester I. Long, of Kansas, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Mitchell v. Walsh, from New York.

At the outset of this case a preliminary question of importance was passed upon. The law of Congress provides that a contestant may apply for a subpoena to any notary public—among others—who may reside in the Congressional district in which the contested election was held. It is also provided that all witnesses who attend the examination shall be examined under oath. William A. Hoar, the notary before whom the testimony in this case was taken, was in 1893 a resident of Kings County, N. Y., and, as a resident of that county, was appointed a notary public. The statutes of New York provide that a notary public, appointed for the county of Kings—as well as for some other counties—upon filing a certified copy of his appointment, etc., in the clerk's office of New York County, may exercise all the functions of his office in that county, as well as in the "county in which he resides and for which he was appointed." In compliance with this provision Hoar filed a certified copy of his appointment in the clerk's office of New York County.

Prior to the taking of testimony in this case Hoar removed from Kings County and took up his residence in the Congressional district in which this contested election was held, which is in the city and county of New York. The law of New York provided that an office shall become vacant when an incumbent, if he is a local officer, ceases to be an inhabitant of the political subdivision of which he is required to be a resident when chosen. The courts of New York have held that a notary public is an officer within the meaning of the statute. The sitting Member made no objection to the qualifications of the notary until the taking of testimony in rebuttal began. The majority of the committee conclude as follows:

> We are of opinion that the testimony taken before William A. Hoar ought to be considered by the committee and the House, for the reasons following:
> 1. Because it is too late for the contestee to be permitted to object on this ground. He knew, or, what is the same in legal effect, he was charged with knowledge of the fact as to whether Hoar was a notary authorized to administer oaths. He knew that the notary was described in the notice as residing in the Eighth Congressional district, and in his signatures to the transcript of testimony as notary of Kings County, with certificate filed in New York County. To say the least, he was put upon inquiry.
> The contestee is in the same position as if he and the contestant had agreed that the testimony might be taken before a person who was not, by any law, authorized to administer oaths. It is true that such an agreement might not be recognized by the House of Representatives. It might abrogate that, as it might any other agreement between parties. But it does not lie in the mouth of either party who has, either in fact or constructively, so agreed to object to the validity of testimony so taken.
> 2. But we are constrained to put our conclusion on still broader grounds. The House of Representatives, with its broad and, indeed, limitless powers respecting the settlement of contested election cases, is only desirous of arriving at the truth. While it will not depart from wise and well-settled rules of law, it will not hedge itself about with technical rules which do manifest wrong.

In this case it is apparent that the parties to the contest, their attorneys, and every witness who was summoned, supposed that Hoar was a notary public, with full power to administer oaths, and that a prosecution for perjury could as certainly be based upon a false statement before him as upon a false statement made on oath in a court of justice. We have therefore considered the evidence.

The minority did not dissent from the law and facts as stated by the majority; but declined to assent "to the proposition that, under any circumstances, unsworn statements of persons called as witnesses can be substituted for evidence taken under oath duly administered as required by laws governing contested elections. Such a course of procedure, whether agreed to by the parties or not, would reduce the taking of testimony in contested election cases to a farce." The minority further argue:

We can not assent to the proposition that, under any circumstances, unsworn statements of persons called as witnesses can be substituted for evidence taken under oath duly administered as required by laws governing contested elections. Such a course of procedure, whether agreed to by the parties or not, would reduce the taking of testimony in contested election cases to a farce unworthy of a moment's consideration in the determination of an election contest. * * *

We think the acceptance and consideration of testimony so taken without the sanction of an oath would be an exceedingly dangerous precedent in contested election cases. The temptation to perjury, exaggeration, and evasion for partisan purposes, or through more unworthy motives, is already great enough in such cases without adding the encouragement of the assurance that Congress will accept and consider testimony taken by persons not authorized to administer oaths, in the giving of which the witnesses are assured of their absolute immunity from punishment for perjury. If the contestant and his witnesses, knowing, as stated, that Mr. Hoar was a notary public for Kings County and that he had changed his residence from Kings County to New York County, were ignorant of the legal effect of those facts, it may be a hardship upon him to exclude from consideration the testimony taken on his behalf before Mr. Hoar, but it is a misfortune for which he alone is responsible, and it is a misfortune for which no relief can be given at this time without causing a public injury infinitely greater than the private injury which might thereby be avoided.

Contestant had a remedy for his mistake in taking the testimony in question before an unauthorized person to which he might have resorted after discovering Mr. Hoar's incapacity.

He might have applied to the House or to this committee for leave to retake the testimony before an authorized person, and such a request, if made in reasonable time and in apparent good faith, would certainly have been granted.

The testimony being admitted, the merits of the case were considered. The sitting Member had been returned by an official majority of 367. All the portions of the Congressional district except the second assembly district gave contestant a majority of 1,328, while the second assembly district gave sitting Member 1,695 majority. Contestant attacked five election districts in this second assembly district. These five districts gave sitting Member 729 votes on the official return, and 286 to contestant.

The majority of the committee were satisfied from the evidence that a well organized system of bribery was carried on in the five districts on behalf of the sitting Member by the Tammany organization (of which sitting Member was a vice-president), in collusion with the keepers of lodging houses. After quoting the testimony of certain witnesses, the report says:

Contestee attempted to discredit the testimony of the above witnesses by showing that they had been entertained by contestant and his attorneys, and for this reason were unworthy of belief.

They were not impeached in any instance, and we believe that, taking into consideration the surrounding circumstances, they are entitled to credence.

Fraud can rarely, if ever, be proven by direct evidence, and the rule is that whenever a sufficient number of independent circumstances which point to its existence are clearly established a prima facie case of its existence is made, and if this case is not met with explanation or contradiction it becomes conclusive.

In Paine on Elections the following rule is announced: "When evidence of bribery by an active supporter of the respondent is shown, the court will draw unfavorable conclusions from the neglect or refusal of the person so charged to explain his conduct in the witness box."

Contestee did not introduce any evidence to disprove the charges of bribery. Not a Tammany captain on whom the bribery was fastented by the testimony was put upon the stand to contradict the statements made by the witnesses, nor to assert his innocence, nor to disprove what the testimony so clearly proves—namely, the existence of a conspiracy to procure votes by bribery.

The majority of the committee then go on to say that—

It is impossible to determine the number of bribed voters or the names of the voters. These five election districts were thoroughly saturated with fraud and corruption. The case of Platt v. Goode furnishes the only rule that can safely be followed in this case. In that case, where it was shown that 500 voters who had been bribed voted in three precincts which polled in the aggregate 1,619 votes, the whole returns of those precincts were rejected upon the ground that when the record showed that illegal votes had been cast, and furnished no method for their elimination, the vote of the entire precinct should be rejected.

Contestant insists that only the vote of the contestee in these five districts should be rejected, for the reason that there is no evidence of bribery in the interest of contestant. This is true. It is not necessary in the decision of this case to determine which rule should be adopted, and we do not decide which is correct. The result is the same whichever is followed. If the vote of contestee only in these five districts is rejected, contestant will be elected by 362. If the entire vote in these five districts is rejected contestant will be elected by 76.

Contestee insists that he should only lose those votes where individual instances of bribery are proven. We can not accept this theory of the law when the evidence shows the existence of a conspiracy to corrupt voters by bribery. The case of Noyes v. Rockwell clearly establishes the doctrine that where a conspiracy to corrupt voters by bribery is shown to exist, and it is established that one voter of a class was bribed, that the votes of all persons belonging to the class who cast similar ballots should be rejected.

In this case the existence of the conspiracy is clearly shown in these five election districts, and as it is impossible to determine the number of votes affected, and also impossible to eliminate the bribed votes from the legal, we have reached the conclusion that the vote from these five districts should be eliminated from the count.

Therefore the majority submitted resolutions declaring that sitting Member was not elected, and that contestant was elected.

The minority in views submitted by Mr. James G. Maguire, of California, denied the sufficiency of the testimony to justify the conclusions of the majority. They criticized the testimony as insufficient, as corrupt, and as hearsay. In respect to the latter class of testimony they say:

Nearly all of the testimony relied upon by contestant to prove bribery and corruption * * * consists of statements made by alleged voters to the witnesses after having voted. Such testimony is as worthless in an election contest as in any other judicial proceeding, and must be disregarded. In the case of Ingersoll v. Naylor, in which extensive frauds were alleged to have been committed, the committee refused to consider hearsay evidence much like that introduced in this case.

The minority also quote on this point Dodge v. Brooks, Cessna v. Myers, Gooding v. Wilson, and Littell v. Robbins.

On June 2, 1896,[1] the report was debated in the House. Without division the resolution of the minority declaring sitting Member entitled to the seat was disagreed to. The question then recurring on the resolutions of the majority, they were agreed to, yeas 162, nays 39. Thereupon Mr. John Murray Mitchell, the contestant, appeared and took the oath.

1087. The Kentucky election case of Denny, jr., v. Owens, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The House declined to count the votes of witnesses who failed to show that they were illegally refused registration or that they had tried to vote.

It is as important that the registration be kept free from disqualified persons as that every legal voter shall be registered.

The House confirmed a canvass made by a local board later than the date prescribed by law, the explanation of the delay being sufficient.

The House may canvass the returns and declare the result although the required State canvass may not have been made.

On May 19,1896,[1] Mr. S. S. Turner, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted the report of the committee in the case of Denny, jr., v. Owens, of Kentucky. There were four candidates, two of whom received small votes. Mr. Owens's plurality over Mr. Denny was officially returned at 101 votes. The notice of contest and answer thereto alleged frauds and irregularities.

The committee found considerable irregularity, but it appeared in general to affect both parties so as not to influence the result. The following questions were particularly considered:

(1) In Fayette County contestant alleged that he was deprived of between 200 and 300 votes for the reason that voters to that number were illegally refused registration. He produced 117 witnesses who swore that they were refused registration, and that they were legal voters and should have been registered. Another witness swore that 328 persons reported to him that they had been refused registration, and that 212 of them gave their streets and the numbers of their homes. The committee say:

> There is no evidence, except in two or three instances, tending to show that any of these persons went to the polls on election day and offered to vote and were refused. In each instance when a person was refused registration it was done so on the ground that the person seeking to be registered was unknown to the registration officers or for the reason that the registration officers entertained doubts as to the right of such person to register. The person was required to produce some one who could identify him and swear that he was a legal voter of the precinct where he sought registration.

The report quotes the Kentucky statute:

> If the officers of registration entertain any doubt as to whether or not any person offering for registration is entitled to such registration, or if anyone's right to register is challenged, citizens may be called in not exceeding three in number, who shall be examined touching the qualifications of such persons who offer to register.

"In no case where a person was refused registration" say the committee, "did he offer to produce three citizens by which to establish his right to register. Neither did the registration officers refuse to hear such citizens if they were produced. It is not made evident to us but what the officers refusing registration in each case had doubts about the right of such person to register. It is impossible for us to say, therefore, that these persons were wrongfully refused registration. The officers of registration may have applied the rule very strictly in many cases, but this alone would not be sufficient to establish a wrongful refusal." The committee conclude:

It is just as important that the registration lists be kept free from the names of persons which are not entitled to be there as it is that every legal voter shall be registered when he makes such application. In order that registration lists be kept pure the officers of registration are required to take the precaution prescribed by these sections, and they can not be charged with wrongdoing if they do this, though it may put legal voters to inconvenience.

(2) Contestant asked the rejection of the entire returns of Franklin County for the reason that they were not canvassed on the day prescribed by law. The report explains that

Under the Kentucky statute, the judge of the county, the clerk thereof, and the sheriff constitute the canvassing board. Any two of them may constitute such board, but if either one of the three is a candidate he shall have no voice in the decision of his case. If it should happen that two of them can not act in whole or in part in such canvass, their places shall be supplied by two justices of the peace, who may reside near the county seat. It happened that in Franklin County the judge, the clerk, and the sheriff were candidates for election. They therefore were not authorized to canvass the returns. Disregarding the provisions of the statute, these officers did canvass the returns one day earlier than the law prescribed. A few days after this two justices of the peace, residing nearest the county seat, also canvassed the returns of the county, and the result of their canvass was certified to the Secretary of State. This canvass, however, was had some days later than the one designated by law.

It is admitted by both parties that the first board had no authority to canvass the returns of the county.

Contestant, while admitting that the second board was properly constituted, maintains that as its canvass was had on a day not designated by law, it was illegal and void.

We can not agree with him in this contention. We think that the proper board could be compelled to make this canvass by a mandate from any court of competent jurisdiction. If this be true, then the board may do the same thing without the mandate to a court. The mandate does not give the right to canvass the returns, but requires it to be done; because, as a matter of right, it ought to be done. Certainly it would be a good return to the alternative writ if the board were to say they had already done what the court was asking them to do.

Aside from this, we are of the opinion that we would have the right to canvass the returns in this contest and declare the result, though there had never been a canvass.

The House made no correction for a limited number of persons registered at an illegal time, there being no proof of how they voted.

It being impossible to determine for whom informal ballots (issued because the regular ones had failed) had been cast, the House did not correct the return.

There being no evidence that either party had suffered especial harm, the House did not count votes excluded by closing the polls, although negligence of election officers was alleged.

The State law prohibiting rejection of a ballot for a technical error which did not obscure voter's intent, the House counted ballots marked with a pencil instead of a stencil.

The House rejected ballots marked publicly in presence of the election officers.

(3) The committee found that in one precinct 15 persons were allowed to vote who had registered on election day or the day prior. Such registration was wholly unauthorized; but the proof did not satisfy the committee as to how the unauthorized persons voted.

(4) In some precincts the ballots gave out before all persons had voted. In some of these cases ballots from other precincts were borrowed and used. In other cases blanks on which to make return of the votes were used. The committee considered it unnecessary to determine whether such devices were legal or otherwise, for the reason that they could not tell for whom such irregular ballots were cast.

(5) In one precinct the hour for closing the election arrived before all the voters had had an opportunity to cast their ballots. Contestant claimed that this occurred on account of the negligence of the election officers and that he lost many votes by reason of it. The committee left the vote to stand, as the testimony did not indicate to them that the contestant lost more votes for this reason than did the sitting Member.

(6) Certain ballots were not counted by the canvassers for the reason that the cross mark was made with a lead pencil instead of a stencil, as the statute required. The committee say:

> We are inclined to think, but without definitely deciding it, that these ballots ought to have been counted, for in section 1471 of the Kentucky statutes we find the following provision: "No ballot shall be rejected for any technical error which does not make it impossible to determine the voter's choice." We have made a computation of these ballots and find that 31 were rejected which should have been counted for Mr. Denny, and 3 that should have been counted for Mr. Owens. The committee accordingly made the correction.

(7) Two voters stamped their ballots publicly in the presence of the election officers. They voted for Mr. Owens and the ballots were deposited and counted for him The committee found that they should not have been deposited or counted, and deducted them from Mr. Owens's vote.

(8) Various other irregularities were found by the committee; but they benefited both parties, and as they neutralized one another, were not taken into account by the committee.

The result of the committee's conclusions were to reduce sitting Member's plurality to 61 votes. So sitting Member was still entitled to retain his seat, and the committee recommended resolutions to this effect.

On May 19 [1] the report of the committee was concurred in by the House without debate or division.

1089. The North Carolina election case of Martin v. Lockhart, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Both the registration and election being permeated with irregularities, fraud, and intimidation, the returns of the precinct affected were rejected.

A presumption arising from the previous good character of election officers is destroyed by uncontradicted and positive testimony as to their fraudulent conduct at the election.

Where election officers purposely put ballots in the wrong box and then rejected them, and did other illegal acts, the House rejected the poll.

Where a voter offered his tickets in a bundle and lawfully requested that the election officers deposit them in the proper boxes, the House rejected the poll because the election officers declined so to do.

On May 26, 1896,[1] Air. Jesse B. Strode, of Nebraska, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Martin v. Lockhart, of North Carolina. The official returns showed a majority of 444 for the sitting Member. The contestant's charges were summarized by the committee as follows:

> That the contestant, Charles H. Martin, was unlawfully deprived of a large number of votes to which he was entitled; that these votes were fraudulently rejected upon the pretense of irregularities in the registration; that the voters were not in fault with regard to such irregularities, but that they were committed by the election officers; that the votes of a large number of voters who would have voted for contestant were rejected by the poll holders on frivolous challenges; that the poll holders in many voting precincts purposely placed votes cast for contestant in the wrong boxes and afterwards rejected them because they were deposited in the wrong boxes; that poll holders in many voting precincts refused to put the ballots of voters in the ballot boxes, and that many voters who could not read and who cast their votes for contestant were compelled to deposit their own ballots and by mistake deposited them in the wrong boxes, and that they were rejected by the poll holders, when counting the vote, because they were found in the wrong boxes; that ballots for contestant were rejected because they were not printed, the regularly printed tickets of contestant having been stolen; that boxes were not used in some of the precincts as repositories for the ballots, as the law required; that the ballot boxes in some of the precincts were not labeled with roman letters, as the law required; that poll holders in some of the precincts purposely changed the positions of ballot boxes so as to disarrange them in their order, in order to entrap unlettered Republicans and Populists who desired to vote for contestant into putting their tickets in the wrong boxes; that at one voting place the election officers refused to count the ballots or make any returns of the election, where the contestant claims to have received a large majority of the votes cast; that many who were unlawful electors cast their ballots and they were counted for contestee.

The sitting Member also alleged irregularities and illegalities by which the official returns of contestant's vote had been increased. Among these was the alleged erroneous rejection of votes cast for sitting Member in the county of Columbus.

The committee examined the poll in the light of the evidences rejecting the vote of certain precincts, and in others purging the poll.

(1) Rejected precincts.

(a) Stewartsville precinct returned 295 votes for sitting Member and 14 for contestant. All the election officers but one were of sitting Member's party, and that one was not of those recommended by the opposition. The Constitution of the State provided that there should be a registration of voters, and that "no person shall be allowed to vote without registration." And the law required the registration to specify certain things in order to be valid. It was admitted by one of the election officers in this precinct, a partisan of sitting Member, that during the registration he allowed ignorant voters to give defective particulars, not such as the law required, and wrote those particulars as given, when he knew that by registering them in such a way he was giving an excuse for the rejection of their votes when challenged. Thus, an ignorant voter, when asked his residence, would give the name of the plantation where he was employed instead of the township.

[1] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 2002; Rowell's Digest, p. 524.

The registrar knowingly recorded this defective description. In this precinct 307 white men and 414 colored men were registered, and of these, the votes of 1 white man and 167 colored men were rejected, some on grounds absolutely frivolous. According to the law and usage in North Carolina there was a ballot box for each class of officers, and the law provided that "each box shall be labeled in plain and distinct roman letters, with the name of the office or offices to be voted for," etc. The evidence showed that the markings on the boxes were changed from the plain letters required by law to indistinct letters. The only election officer opposed to sitting Member's party was put in charge of the box in which votes for constable were received. The room where the boxes were placed was partitioned off into what was called a "bull pen," and marshals, partisans of sitting Member, kept strict guard and discouraged by intimidation those citizens who were disposed to protest at the conduct of the election. There was evidence of other intimidation, and also that bribery was carried on by partisans of sitting Member in presence of the election officers. The majority of the committee conclude:

> It is impossible to ascertain what would have been the true vote of this precinct had a fair and honest election been held. Contestee's counsel, in their brief, call attention to the fact that the contestant's witnesses testified to the good character of the registrar and judges of election. But the past good character of these election officers is not sufficient to overcome, wipe out, and destroy the positive and uncontradicted testimony of numerous witnesses, which shows that this election was barnacled with fraud and corruption. The ballots were destroyed as soon as they were counted, so that no examination of them could have been made after the returns were made up. It is impossible to ascertain with certainty the true vote of this precinct. The conduct of the election officers was such as to destroy the integrity of their returns. The entire vote of this precinct should be thrown out. This deducts 295 from contestee and 14 from contestant.

The minority views, presented by Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, held that the rejection of this vote was an injustice to more than 300 voters whose votes were properly cast and counted; that there was no evidence of fraud and intimidation, and that the errors in registration were not chargeable to the registrar."The supreme court of North Carolina, say the minority, "has declared, in construing the law, that if the registrar read over these headings [indicating questions to be asked] in the form of an interrogatory to the candidate for registration this was a sufficient compliance with the law, and if the voter did not give the proper answers the fault was his, and if proper answer was not given the person should not be allowed to vote." The minority were convinced that the registrar went only so far as the court allowed him to go. The minority also note that contestant did not introduce the rejected voters to prove that they endeavored to register properly, or to contradict the registrar, or to explain their conduct, or show that they were entitled to vote.

(b) Alfordsville precinct, where the returns gave sitting Member 98 votes and contestant 44, was entirely rejected, because it was impossible to ascertain with certainty the true vote, for the following reasons: The election board was not satisfactory, one of the two representatives of contestant's party being a person of doubtful politics who had been once in the penitentiary and pardoned therefrom; the undoubted representative of contestant's party was placed at the box wherein were placed votes for constable, an office for which there was but one candidate; poll holders of sitting Member's party placed the tickets of a large number of con-testant's party in wrong boxes and then for that reason refused to count them; contestant's party kept a list of those who claimed to have voted the ticket of that party, and there were 169 names on the list; about 190 ballots were thrown out because in the wrong boxes, and no ticket of sitting Member's party was among them; the name of contestant appeared on all the tickets thrown out because deposited in wrong ballot boxes; the poll book showed that 239 voted, while the return accounted for only 142 of these. The majority of the committee concluded that the conduct of the election officers was such as to destroy the integrity of their returns.

(c) Maxton precinct, which returned 160 votes for sitting Member and 15 for contestant, was thrown out entirely. The election officers were all of contestant's party, although the law of the State evidently contemplated a representation of both parties; and no representative of contestant's party was allowed to assist in the voting or the count. The voting was done in a closely guarded room, with darkened windows. Unsworn partisans of sitting Member assisted in the count. The voters of contestant's party tendered their ballots to the poll holders and requested that each ticket be deposited in the proper box. This request being refused, because the voters would not select them and present them one at a time, the ballots were laid on the table and afterwards brushed to the floor. The law of the State provided that the voter "shall hand in his ballot to the judges, who shall carefully deposit the ballots in the ballot boxes," and again that the ballot "shall be put into the proper box or boxes by said voter or by the judges at the request of the voter." The majority of the committee held that the voters were not compelled to select and deliver their ballots to the poll holders separately. The minority considered that the partisans of contestant were unreasonable, and that the offering of the ballots in bundles was not a proper tender of them. The partisans of contestant at this polling place kept a list of those who took the tickets of their party and went into the polling place to cast them. Most of these persons afterwards returned and declared that they had voted the tickets. The persons who issued the tickets and kept the lists were sworn as witnesses, and their lists were produced, identified, and incorporated in the evidence. More than 200 names appeared on the list. About 25 of them appear to have been challenged; but there is nothing to show how many challenges were sustained.

The majority of the committee concluded that the return from this precinct was so tainted with fraud and the misconduct of the election officers that the truth could not be deduced from it.

The House counted lawful ballots rejected by election officers on frivolous and technical challenges.

The House counted lawful votes rejected by election officers because deposited in wrong boxes through confusion created by election officers.

As to the use of tin buckets instead of the "ballot boxes" prescribed by law.

The House counted votes rejected by election officers because the initials instead of the full name of the candidate were written thereon, there being no doubt of the voter's intent.

Where the tally list was kept by an unsworn person not an election officer and the poll list and testimony as to the tally list showed discrepancies, the return was rejected.

(2) Precincts in which the returns were corrected.

(a) In Rockingham precinct contestant was credited with 70 votes wrongfully rejected because of frivolous challenges, or challenges based on technicalities arising from imperfect registration similar to that described in Stewartsville precinct.

(b) In Lumberton precinct the contestant is credited with the addition of 111 votes rejected by the election officers because deposited in the wrong box. In this precinct there were six ballot boxes, and the poll holders were two representing sitting Member's party and two representing contestant's party. But the two latter (both colored) were made to keep the constable's box, where only, one candidate was voted for, while their associates managed the other boxes. One of the colored poll holders refused to serve, and his place was filled by a partisan of sitting Member. The poll holders refused to receive the tickets of contestant's supporters and deposit them in the proper boxes, unless the electors first selected the tickets and designated the box into which each was to be put. But the votes of partisans of sitting Member were taken and placed in the proper boxes readily. No votes for sitting Member were rejected because placed in the wrong box. The majority of the committee considered that the fraudulent action of these election officers might justify the rejection of this entire precinct; but that those who honestly cast their ballots might not be disfranchised, recommended that the 111 votes definitely proven to have been cast for the contestant and rejected be counted.

(c) In Lilesville precinct the majority of the committee increases contestant's vote by adding 40 votes alleged to have been rejected because not deposited in the right boxes. In this precinct contestant's party was denied representation on the board of election officers. Tin buckets were used instead of the "ballot boxes" specified in the law, but it also appeared that buckets had been used for boxes for many years in this precinct. They were not, however, labelled plainly as directed by the law. The minority denied that the testimony warranted the conclusion reached by the majority.

(d) In Ansonville precinct the majority of the committee add 53 votes to the return of the contestant. The printed ballots for contestant having disappeared, written ballots were used, and were written "C. H. Martin, for Congress," instead of "Charles H. Martin, for Congress." These were rejected to the number of 53, although there was no other man named Martin running for Congress. The law of the State provided that ballots "shall be on white paper, and may be printed or written." The majority had no doubt that these votes were intended to be cast for contestant and the minority conceded that they should be counted for him.

(e) At Red Springs precinct the returns gave sitting Member 143 votes and contestant 110. The majority of the committee considered that these returns were impeached by the fact that the poll books showed that 275 persons voted, while the total for contestant and contestee was but 269; that two uncontradicted witnesses who counted and made a memorandum of the Congressional tally sheet found it gave contestant 126 votes instead of 110; and that 143 voters were shown to have called for the full ticket of contestant's party and to have entered the polling place. A regular election officer was poll holder at the Congressional box, and he read the tickets as they were taken out of the box, while the tally sheet was kept by one not an election officer and not sworn. Therefore the majority of the committee found that the return could not be said to have been made by an officer of election, and that it was impeached. So they added 16 votes to contestant's returns.

(f) At Blue Springs, Lanesboro, and Wadesboro precincts there were irregularities, but the proof was not of such a nature as to enable the committee to make any substantial change in the official returns.

(3) At Thompson's Township, in Robeson County, the election officers, after receiving votes all day, abandoned the count and the ballots and refused to make any returns. The testimony indicated that the partisans of contestant had carried the election, and although riotous conduct by partisans of contestant was alleged, the majority of the committee concluded that the count had been abandoned without sufficient reason. "But," concludes the committee, "as there is no way of ascertaining the exact number of votes cast in this precinct for the parties to this contest, and because it is not necessary to do so to determine this contest, we do not make any finding as to the number of votes cast for either of the parties at this township."

As to the allegations of sitting Member in regard to the return of Columbus County, the majority of the committee make no mention in their return. The minority consider that 54 legal votes should be added to sitting Member's return in this county.

In conclusion the majority found that as a result of the corrections there was a majority of 330 for contestant, and accordingly reported the resolutions to perfect his title to the seat.

The report was debated June 4 and 5,[1] and on the latter day the minority substitute declaring sitting Member elected was disagreed to, yeas 57, nays 156. After a motion to recommit had been disagreed to the resolutions of the majority were agreed to, ayes 113, noes 5.

Mr. Martin then appeared and took the oath.

1091. The Alabama election case of Aldrich v. Underwood, in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

A report sustained by a vote of a majority of the committee is not impeached by the fact that a less number sign it.

A contestant was found to be an actual inhabitant of the State and district, although for sufficient reason his family resided in another State.

Where the law required the voter's mark to be placed before the candidate's name, the House sustained a rejection of ballots whereon it was placed after.

A voter having written his own name under the name of the candidate on the Australian ballot, the House counted the ballot in the absence of a State law making it illegal.

On May 26, 1896,[1] Mr. Charles Daniels, of New York, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a report in the case of Aldrich v. Underwood, of Alabama.

The minority, in their views, called attention to the fact that the report was signed by only four members of the committee, and that this number was not a majority of the committee, which consisted of nine members. In debate it was explained that four members voted for the report in committee, and three against, while two did not vote. One of these two, Mr. Romulus Z. Linney, of North Carolina, spoke for the report in debate.

The majority, in their report, find this preliminary fact:

> That the contestant at the time of the election on the 6th day of November, 1894, was an actual inhabitant of the Ninth Congressional district of the State of Alabama, although his family, on account of the inability of his wife to reside in Alabama, resided in the State of Ohio.

The official returns gave the sitting Member 1,166 votes. Frauds and intimidation were alleged, and as a result of the examination of the vote of 23 precincts, the majority so purged the poll as to leave a majority of 220 votes for the contestant. The minority of the committee, dissenting from the conclusions of the majority, found for returned Member a majority of 1,038 votes, Mr. Charles L. Bartlett, of Georgia, presenting the views.

Before proceeding to an examination of the ground on which the sitting Member's vote was reduced, notice may be made of two precincts in Blount County where votes for the contestant were wrongfully rejected by the official canvassers. In Remlap, beat precinct the returns were not canvassed, because the inspectors of election failed to sign their certificate of the vote. Therefore the committee, credit sitting Member with his majority of 15 in this precinct. In Blountsville precinct certain votes improperly marked had been rejected by the canvassers. As to 5 of these, where the voter placed his mark after the name of the candidate the rejection was upheld, since the law required the mark to be placed before the name. Other rejected ballots were counted, one affording a case where the voter had written his own name under the name of the candidate, which was properly marked. "This, under the Alabama election law," says the report, "did not affect the legality of the ballot."

Where returns showed a large vote for contestee and a merely nominal vote for contestant, the House deducted from contestee where persons recorded on the poll list testified that they did not vote.

Where many votes were returned for contestee and one or two for contestant, and the total was larger than the number of persons shown to have entered the polling place, the excess was deducted from contestee.

Where election officers were all of contestee's party and certain electors voted twice, the excess was deducted from contestee.

In a rural precinct from which one vote was returned for contestant, and wherein names not known to old residents were found on the poll list, deduction was made from contestee's poll.

[1] First session Fifty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 2006; Rowell's Digest, p. 509.

The poll being virtually under control of contestee's friends, who acted fraudulently, the committee rejected contestee's vote, but apparently not contestant's.

In 21 precincts the report makes a reduction or completely throws out the vote of the sitting Member, or increases the vote of the contestant.

(1) As to precincts where the vote of sitting Member was reduced. In twelve precincts the vote of the sitting Member was reduced for the following causes:

(a) The poll lists of several precincts, Cunningham, Walthole, Gallion, Pope's, etc., showed the names of men as voting who testified that they did not vote at. all. In these precincts, as a general rule, the returns showed a large vote for sitting Member and no votes, or a merely nominal number, 1, 3, 5, etc., for contestant. The majority report reduces the poll of sitting Member by the number of citizens proven to have been recorded as voting when they did not vote.

(b) In certain precincts, as Greensboro, Gallion, Newbern, Evans, Cedarville, etc., where the returns showed large votes for sitting Member and few or none for contestant, witnesses testified that they had watched the polls and counted the number of persons who entered the polling places during the day. The majority of the committee deducted from the poll of sitting Member all votes in excess of the number who entered the polling places.

(c) In Havana precinct, where all the election inspectors belonged to the party of the sitting Member, two persons were found recorded on the poll list as having voted twice each. The majority of the committee deducted 2 votes from poll of sitting Member on the ground that it was not probable that the election officers would have allowed double voting to the opposition.

(d) For the same reason, at Hollow Square precinct, where the election board was similarly partisan, the votes of 2 strangers were recorded on the poll. These 2 votes were deducted from the poll of sitting Member.

Testimony that a certain man belonged to a certain club and a certain party was held insufficient proof aliunde of his vote.

The poll list containing the names of dead and absent persons, and the returns not showing votes presumed to have been cast, the returns were rejected.

The House added to contestant's return rejected lawful votes, on the testimony of persons who saw the votes rejected and knew the political preferences of the electors.

Where electors were intimidated by local officers, the House counted votes thus prevented, on testimony establishing a "strong probability" as to the number.

(2) As to precincts where the vote of sitting Member was entirely rejected.

(a) In Marion precinct, where the returned vote was 257 for sitting Member and 45 for contestant the committee found that the election officers had violated the law of Alabama by arranging the booths in one room and the ballot box in another. The voter, after marking his ballot, delivered it to an election officer who was supposed to place it in the ballot box. But the voter could not see him do this, and there was testimony impeaching the integrity of this officer, who did not deny the impeachment. Contestant was allowed one inspector, an ignorant man who was not the choice of contestant's friends. While admitting that in all cases the presumption is against crime and misconduct, yet the majority considered the infraction of law by the election officers such that—

> Both the secrecy and integrity of the ballots were so far impaired that no one can certainly say that the ballots of the voters, unless it may be the 45 just mentioned (for contestant) ever went into the ballot box. The election and the returns in this precinct are beyond that deprived of every source of confidence, and the 257 votes returned for contestee must be deducted.

The sitting Member had endeavored to prove a portion of the returned vote, but the majority of the committee did not consider the testimony adequate, as it consisted of testimony that certain men belonged to a certain club and a certain party.

(b) In Uniontown precinct, where the returned vote was 177 for sitting Member and none for contestant, the majority of the committee found the poll list false in several particulars. Persons dead, absent and not known to reside in the precinct were recorded as voting. Twelve colored persons, supposed to be friendly to contestant, entered the voting place; but no votes were returned for contestant. The majority of the committee concluded that no reliance could be placed on the poll list, and rejected the entire vote.

(3) Votes added to the poll of the contestant.

(a) At Elyton precinct, where the returned vote was 190 for sitting Member to 68 for contestant, the evidence convinced the majority of the committee that votes of colored men who intended to vote for contestant were refused unless voters were identified by white men or "boss" men, the law requiring no such identification. Testimony of each individual whose vote was so refused was not resorted to; but sundry persons who saw men refused testified as to the number of such men and that they were supporters of contestant. The majority for the committee considered that there was no justification for excluding the whole vote; but added nineteen votes to the poll of the contestant.

(b) In two precincts of Birmingham the majority of the committee found that deputy sheriffs intimidated colored voters by arrests not justifiable. In one of these precincts there was not sufficient testimony to show how many of contestant's voters were intimidated, but in the other the majority of the committee considered that the testimony established a "strong probability" (words emphasized by the minority) that 69 voters were prevented from casting votes for contestant, and so added that number to his vote.

Official ballots being destroyed in furtherance of a conspiracy of election officers, the House corrected the return on testimony of witnesses who estimated the amount of resulting injury.

Instance wherein the House took into account the votes of electors not actually at the polls.

Official returns may be impeached successfully by testimony of voters as to how they cast their ballots.

Where polls are not opened, even on frivolous excuses, it is difficult to correct the wrong.

(c) In Bessemer the night before election all but 127 of the ballots were stolen and burned. The election officers were of sitting Member's party, except one, who was not the choice of friends of contestant. It was also in evidence that the friends of sitting Member were notified to be on hand early to vote and that when the ballots had given out a deputy sheriff advised voters to go home. From 8.30 a. m. to 2.20 p. m. there were no ballots. There were also causeless challenges of voters. The majority of the committee were convinced that there was a conspiracy on the part of friends of sitting Member to deprive friends of contestant of their votes. The evidence satisfied the majority that 365 votes were in this manner kept from the contestant and added that number to his poll. The testimony on this point was not of those actually prevented from voting, but of various persons who saw and heard the persons turned away.

(d) At Five-mile precinct, for some unexplained reason, the ballots gave out at 1 p. m. The election officers were all of sitting Member's party, and when the tickets gave out one of them announced that there would be no more voting. The testimony convinced the majority of the committee that 32 supporters of contestant were thus deprived of their votes and added that number to contestant's poll. It does not appear that all the 32 were actually at the polls. A portion appear to have refrained from coming after starting, hearing that the ballots had given out. Eight persons testified that they would have voted for contestant.

(e) At Carthage the official return gave contestant 32 votes, but 76 witnesses testified that they voted for him. Therefore the majority of the committee added 44 votes to contestant's poll. There was some evidence that some of contestant's friends might have been misled into marking their ballots wrong, but the committee did not consider that this should reduce the allowance to contestant. Also at Dover precinct the evidence proved that 4 votes were cast for contestant where only 2 were allowed him. Therefore 2 were added to contestant's poll.

Furthermore, at Hillman precinct the polls were not opened and no election was held. The precinct, which had a small vote, usually gave a majority for contestant's party. Although the only excuse for not opening the polls was that the day was cold and there were no facilities for a fire, the committee concluded that no addition to the poll of contestant could be made, as they had no means of knowing what his majority might have been.

The minority views declined to give credence to the testimony adduced in the several precincts.

The report was debated at length on June 9[1] (legislative day of June 6), and the resolution declaring sitting Member not elected was agreed to, yeas 119, nays 98. The resolution declaring contestant elected was then agreed to, yeas 116, nays 107; and then the contestant, Mr. Trueman H. Aldrich, was sworn in.

1095. The Kentucky election case of Hopkins v. Kendall in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Instance wherein the House extended the time of taking testimony in an election case.

Form of resolution for extending the time of taking testimony in an election case.

A county official having, with intent to deceive voters, changed the party emblems on the official ballot, the House overruled its committee and rejected the entire returns.

In estimating harm done by fraud of officers, judicial cognizance was taken of the general prevalence of certain political sentiments.

The House, in judging the harm done by a fraudulent ballot, took account of the opinions of witnesses.

Discussion as to the mandatory or directory nature of a law providing that a ballot prepared in a certain way, and no other, shall be used.

The House purged the poll rather than to declare a vacancy when a fraudulent ballot was used in a decisive county.

On June 6, 1896[1] (calendar day of June 10), Mr. William H. Moody, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, reported the following resolution relating to the Kentucky election case of Hopkins v. Kendall:

Resolved, That the parties in the contested election case of N. T. Hopkins v. J. M. Kendall be permitted to take additional testimony touching the election in Clark County up to the 1st day of August, 1896, according to the rules for taking testimony in contested election cases prescribed in the Statutes of the United States, said testimony to be confined to the issues made by the notices of contest and the answer thereto.

On June 11[2] the time was extended from August 1 to November 1, 1896, by resolution agreed to by the House.

On February 5, 1897,[3] Mr. Charles Daniels, of New York, submitted the report of the committee, and at the same time Mr. L. W. Royse, of Indiana, on behalf of himself and Mr. Romulus Z. Linney, of North Carolina, submitted minority views.

The statement of facts shows that the result of the election depended on the disposition of illegal and fraudulent ballots used in Clark County, which returned for the sitting Member a plurality of 253 votes. In the other counties of the district, except Clark, the contestant had a plurality of the votes.

The difference between the majority and minority of the committee arose as to the effect which should be given to the fraudulent ballots; whether the vote of the whole county should be rejected, or whether the contestant should simply be credited with the number of votes actually shown to have been lost to him by the fraud. The majority of the committee found that 79 votes were lost to the contestant; and as this number was not sufficient to overcome the returned plurality of the sitting Member the majority concluded that the sitting Member was entitled to his seat. The minority contended for the rejection of the entire vote of the county.

The ballot for Clark County, as required by the law of Kentucky, was prepared by the county clerk in the Australian form. By law the clerk was required to place over each party column the party emblem prescribed by the party convention. In Kentucky the Democratic convention had selected as its emblem the rooster; the Republican convention an eagle, described as "the eagle about to fly." The clerk of the county placed over the Democratic column the emblem required by law, but willfully and knowingly placed over the Republican column the picture of a raccoon. The eagle symbol was placed over an independent ticket for local county officers, nominated by petition. The name of the contestant did not appear on this ticket at all. The minority call attention to the additional fact that this independent ticket was not legally entitled to a place on the ballot at all, since it was a requirement of law that no petitioner should be counted to make up the required number of 100 unless his residence and post-office address should be designated. Only 94 of the 104 petitioners for the independent ticket were designated by residence or address.

Both majority and minority of the committee agreed that the action of the county clerk in making up the ballot was illegal and fraudulent, done with the motive of deceiving supporters of the contestant.

A difference of opinion arose as to the method of measuring the extent of the wrong resulting from the fraud.

The majority of the committee found that there was no provision of Kentucky law providing for the rejection of ballots because of the displacement of party emblems; and that this displacement was the extent of the wrong done. To rectify the act required no more than to transpose the 79 votes under the device of the eagle to the ticket headed by the raccoon. The majority found that this would correct the fraud of the clerk, and that there was "no justification in going further, and by way of penalty on all the legal voters who voted the first ticket [the rooster ticket] to deprive them of their votes. To do that would be no less than to impose a punishment on innocent persons for no wrong of theirs, but for the misconduct of the county official." In the course of the debate [1] Mr. Daniels cited in support of this view the case of People v. Wood, 148 N. Y. The majority were satisfied that beyond the 79 votes no votes were lost to the contestant, this view being especially fortified by the fact that, compared with other years, the vote for contestant, was the normal Republican strength.

The minority of the committee dissented thus:

> We do not think that the injuries which flow from a wrong of this kind are capable of anything like an accurate measurement. Such injuries are not capable of being weighed, and if they were we would not feel justified in using apothecary's scales for such purpose. From such a bold and unscrupulous transaction the presumption must flow that a grievous wrong has been done, resulting in serious injury to contestant.
> Contestant is the innocent victim of this fraud of the clerk of Clark County. We do not believe it right to throw upon him the burden of making an accurate measurement of the extent of his injuries. Even if we should require him to furnish any evidence upon this subject it should only be slight, and then shift the burden of proof upon him who has received the benefit of this fraud.

[1] Record, P. 1958.

The minority found that the corrected returns for Clark County gave sitting Member only 203 plurality, not a large amount to overcome. While not pretending to prove absolutely the loss of this number of votes to the contestant as a result of the fraud, they found facts indicating such an effect

1. An uncontradicted witness declared that contestant lost between 300 and 400 votes by the fraud, because Republicans left the polls without voting when they found the ticket fraudulent. One party leader testified that he so advised 75 or 100 voters. In a precinct where there was a registration, only 64 out of 104 of contestant's party voted.

2. In every county of the district except Clark the vote of contestant's party increased in comparison with previous years; and had the ratio of increase prevailed also in Clark contestant would indisputably have been elected. Furthermore, the minority thought it proper to take judicial cognizance of the fact that all over the nation, except in Clark County, Ky., contestant's party was the recipient of an increased vote.

The minority furthermore insisted that the clerk of the county had violated a mandatory provision of the Kentucky ballot law, and therefore that the vote of the county should be rejected. The Kentucky constitution provided that "all elections by the people shall be by secret official ballot, furnished by public authorities to the voters at the polls, and then and there deposited," and directed the legislature to enact the necessary laws. Accordingly the legislature enacted that "the voting shall be by secret official ballots, printed and distributed as hereinafter provided, and no other ballots shall be used." The law then went on to provide how the ballots should be prepared, and the county clerk had no authority outside that law. And as he had willfully and corruptly disregarded that law the ticket he produced was not legal and not the official ticket. It was not the ticket prescribed by the constitution. Laws might be held merely directory, but constitutional provisions were mandatory. But the minority held also that the statute was mandatory, quoting Paine on Elections.

> Statutory provisions prescribing acts which are in their nature absolutely essential to the validity of an election may be mandatory in whatever language expressed. The language of the law was that "no other ballots shall be used."

The counting of a ballot was as much its use as the casting of it. The old law of Kentucky did not provide for voting by ballot. The new statute was a remedial one, and it was well settled that such laws should be construed broadly. The statute, also, in express language, provided that "this chapter shall be liberally construed, so as to prevent any evasion of its prohibitions and penalties by shift or device." The minority consider that this removes all doubt as to what the construction of the law should be, and that the ballot voted in Clark County was void and should be thrown out. The minority quoted several authorities, including Field v. Osborn, 21 Atl. Rept. (Conn.), 1070.

Therefore the minority reported resolutions declaring Mr. Hopkins, the contestant, elected and entitled to the seat.

The report was debated on February 17 and 18, 1897,[1] and on the latter date the resolutions of the minority were substituted for those of the majority by a vote of 197 yeas to 91 nays. Then the resolution of the majority as amended was agreed to without division; and Mr. Hopkins, the contestant, appeared at the bar and was sworn in.

1096. The Georgia election case of Watson v. Black, in the Fiftyfourth Congress.

No law preventing the use of more than one ballot box at a precinct, the use of several did not justify rejection of the poll in the absence of proof of harm therefrom.

On December 8, 1896,[1] the Clerk transmitted by letter to the House the evidence in the contested election case of Watson v. Black, from Georgia. The communication was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1, and on February 11, 1897,[2] Mr. Charles L. Bartlett, of Georgia, submitted the report of the committee.

In the election in question the sitting Member received on the face of the returns a majority of 1,556 votes. Contestant alleged fraud in both registration and voting in various portions of the district, but his attorney admitted that he could not overcome sitting Member's majority unless the entire vote of the city of Augusta and Richmond County should be thrown out. Therefore the committee did not consider at length the objections to other portions of the district. It did appear, however, that both parties were represented on the registration boards, and that there was not evidence to show the illegality charged.

As to Richmond County and the city of Augusta, on which the result hinged, the committee failed to find evidence sufficient to justify the throwing out of the whole vote. On the boards of election and registration officers both parties were represented, and there was no satisfactory evidence to sustain the contestant's charges of bribery, fraudulent counting, and illegal registration and voting.

The claim of the contestant that the votes of four wards of Augusta should be rejected because two ballot boxes were used at each voting place, and of a fifth ward because three ballot boxes were used at a voting place, was examined at greater length, and was settled on the basis of the report on a contest between the same individuals in the preceding congress.[3] The committee found no evidence to show that fraud resulted from the use of the additional boxes, and that such use was not prohibited by law. Therefore they found that the vote of those wards should not be rejected.

On March 2, 1897,[4] the report favorable to the sitting Member was agreed to by the House without division.

Chapter XXXIX.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1898 TO 1901.

1097. The Alabama election case of Aldrich v. Plowman, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

There being a general fraudulent conspiracy of election officers extending over a whole county, the entire county return was rejected, including precincts not specifically attacked by evidence.

In proving the vote aliunde, the Elections Committee rejected hearsay testimony and conjecture, and required the evidence of the voter or the marker.

The returns giving contestant much fewer votes than were proven to have been cast for him, the return of the precinct was rejected.

Where election officers procured incorrect markings for illiterate voters, so that the ballots were rejected, the House corrected but did not reject the vote.

Where certain electors testified that they were bribed to vote for contestee, the House subtracted their votes from his poll, but did not reject the entire poll.

On January 27, 1898,[3] Mr. R. W. Tayler, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted the report of a majority of the committee[4] in the Alabama case of

Aldrich v. Plowman. The official returns gave sitting Member a plurality of 2,967. The case divides itself into two branches, one relating to an alleged general conspiracy to defraud contestant in the county of Dallas, and the other to individual cases of fraud in the county of Talladega. In Dallas County the population by the census of 1890 was 2,146 white people, and 8,531 colored. In Talladega there was a preponderance of whites. The contestant was originally the nominee of a bolting Republican convention and of the Populists; but before the close of the campaign he was recognized as the regular and only Republican nominee. It was claimed on behalf of the sitting Member that contestant had much opposition in his own party; but this argument did not bear on the legal questions involved.

The majority of the committee begin the discussion with a description of the Australian ballot used in the election, wherein the names of the candidates for each office were arranged alphabetically. The report says:

On this ballot there are five different electoral tickets arranged, not according to parties, but alphabetically.

In view of the provision of section 43, which makes it a misdemeanor for one to have in his possession a copy of the ballot, it becomes a curious subject of inquiry how anyone can vote without the aid of a marker.

(a) The majority of the committee proposed to reject as untrustworthy the entire returns of the county of Dallas on the ground that they were fatally tainted by a fraudulent conspiracy. The report thus outlines the alleged conspiracy:

The machinery was simple and effective. Fortunately, it has been discovered and the details of its operation laid bare.

The law of Alabama, as already indicated, provided for the appointment, by certain county officers, of three inspectors of election for each voting precinct in the county, and two of these inspectors must be members of opposing political parties, if practicable.

In Dallas County the appointing officers were all Democrats. Notwithstanding the statutory requirement, they did not appoint a single Republican or Populist inspector of election. Lists were submitted to them of suitable men in each precinct; one by the so-called regular Republican nominee for Congress, and one joined in by the chairman of the People's Party of Dallas County, the chairman of the Republican party of Dallas County, the chairman of the Aldrich campaign committee, the member of the Republican executive committee for the Fourth district, and Mr. Aldrich himself.

Except in two or three instances where by mistake a Democrat's name was given in a list of three or four, not a single person was appointed inspector out of about two hundred names thus proposed by the opposition to Democracy. At the opening of the polls the friends of contestant at the several polling places submitted, in accordance with the law, names of suitable persons for markers and clerks. In a few instances a marker was appointed and in one precinct a clerk.

Some pretense was made, here and there, of appointing opposition inspectors, clerks, and markers by naming persons recommended by one Crocheron, a venal negro, who admitted his depravity, and worked for Plowman, or by appointing so-called representatives of the Gold Democratic candidate. But as only 111 votes were polled for other candidates than Plowman and Aldrich the pretense is apparent.

The fact is, and is constantly in evidence, that the machinery of election, in practically every precinct of Dallas County, was organized against the Republicans and Populists, and was so organized in pursuance of a conspiracy to absolutely control the casting, counting, and returns of the votes. It was successful. It was only because the necessities of the case seemed to be fully met that the cupidity of the Democratic managers was satisfied by returning a majority of 3,089, out of a vote of a little over 5,000, in a county where the colored vote outnumbered the white vote four to one.

Let us examine the methods by which this was done. Only representative instances will be taken. Fraud is everywhere; not lurking or secret, but bold and insolent. It is chiefly of five kinds.

1. Fraudulently padding the poll list with names of persons not registered; sometimes of fictitious persons and sometimes of persons who did not live in the precinct.

2. By padding the poll list with names of persons on the registration list who did not vote.

3. By imposing on illiterate voters who desired to vote for Aldrich, but whose tickets, against their will and without their knowledge, were marked for Plowman.

4. By the old-fashioned method of falsely recording votes cast for Aldrich, and certifying them as having been cast for Plowman.

5. By refusing to hold any election at all in certain strong Republican precincts. This was especially true in precincts 5 and 32, Dallas County, where for trivial and transparent reasons the inspectors failed to open the polls.

The report then goes on to review 7 precincts of Dallas County, showing the evidence of fraud from the poll lists, registration lists, and from testimony, and reaches this conclusion:

The result of our investigation is the conclusion that every precinct in Dallas County in which a contest is made is so fatally tainted with fraud that the returns therefrom must be entirely disregarded, and that we can count only such votes as the testimony in the case shows were actually cast. In doing so we considered as proved only those which were shown by direct testimony to have been cast, as when the voter himself, or a marker, testified. We have counted none which depend upon hearsay testimony or conjecture.

The minority, in their views, while apparently admitting some of the frauds charged in Dallas County, deny that contestant's party was denied representation on the election boards, and combat the principle on which the returns of the whole county are rejected:

The demand of the majority report that because the testimony concerning 8 of the precincts in Dallas County would seem to them to justify the exclusion or rejection of the returns therefrom as unreliable, but leaving all of the remaining 23 precincts unchallenged, the returns as a whole from Dallas County must be rejected, is absolutely untenable and unprecedented. There are no charges, nor is there any evidence, tending to show anything that would indicate that the returns from the 23 uncontested precincts are not entitled to full confidence and all the prima facies given them by the law. The official returns of Dallas County, therefore, should not and ought not to be rejected as a whole, but each precinct should be judged by its own acts and stand upon its own merits. Such an act is unwarranted by law, and such is not the course of procedure justified by the authorities or by the precedents in Congressional cases. The only just and proper course in this case is to deal with the returns by precincts, and where it is shown by competent and sufficient evidence that the returns from a precinct are overturned by proof of fraud, then the correct rule is to permit proof aliunde of the vote cast.

We shall endeavor to show the true result of the evidence as regards the precincts contested in Dallas County, and shall take it for granted that the House will not follow the recommendations of the majority of the committee in excluding the whole county returns, because of their claim that the returns are impeached in 8 of the precincts out of the 31 in that county. For the information of the House it is stated that there are only 31 precincts in Dallas County, there being no precincts of the numbers from 17 to 21, inclusive. We contend that the returns from the 23 precincts uncontested should stand as returned, the only charge against these 23 precincts being the general charge that inspectors were not appointed as required, unsupported by any proof of actual or other fraud.

(b) In Talladega County no general conspiracy was alleged and in only one precinct, Munford, was there a refusal to appoint an inspector to represent the opposition to sitting Member's party. The majority find that the official returns of that precinct give contestant 68 votes, while the evidence shows that 114 votes were cast for him. Therefore the majority conclude that the returns are so unreliable that no credit can be given them, and reject them. Contestant is allowed the 114 votes proved aliunde, and the sitting Member 7 votes similarly proven. The returns had given sitting Member 149.

In Childersburg precinct, where there was proper party representation on the election board, the majority of the committee purge the poll for the following reason:

Boaz, the leading Democratic inspector, seemed to be in charge of the election, and directed the markers, from time to time, to mark on the ballots exactly what the voter wished. If he said "Aldrich," without giving the Christian name or initials, the marker was instructed to write the name; and so, where the colored man, in pronouncing the name Aldrich in a manner not entirely suited to Mr. Boaz's sense of euphony, the marker was instructed to spell the name phonetically—as, for instance, "Alldridge," "Alldige"—Mr. Boaz insisted that there was no such name on the ticket as "Aldrich," or the two just given, and, therefore, there was no place where a cross mark could be put. None of these ballots were counted.

Boaz admits that there were 15 or 20 of them, and the inspector, Coleman, says there were 25. They ought to be counted for contestant. Other outrages against suffrage were committed by Boaz, but we do not feel that they ought to invalidate the poll, and we can not appraise their extent.

In another precinct the majority purged the poll for bribery:

In box 1, precinct 5, Talladega County, where the returned vote was 382 for Plowman and 19 for Aldrich, we find indubitable evidence of bribery on behalf of the contestee. It is probable that justice and precedent require the exclusion of the entire poll, but in view of the other evidence in the case and the general conclusion arrived at we prefer to base that conclusion on other grounds. "We must, however, subtract from contestee's votes in that precinct 10 votes of persons who testify that they were bribed to vote for Plowman.

The report was fully debated in the House on February 8 and 9, 1898, and on the latter day the resolutions of the minority confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat were disagreed to—yeas, 124; nays, 144.

Then the resolution declaring sitting Member not elected was agreed to—ayes, 129; noes, 114, by a rising vote. The resolution seating contestant was agreed to—yeas, 143; nays, 112.

Thereupon Mr. Aldrich appeared and was sworn in.

1098. The Virginia election case of Thorp v. Epes, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The House counted as if cast the votes of electors who, after using due diligence, were prevented from voting by the delays of election officers.

In proving votes not cast the House required that each elector should testify as to the facts which entitled him to vote and have his vote counted.

When the registration list was not conclusive as to the right to vote the House admitted parol evidence as to voter's qualification.

On February 10, 1898,[1] Mr. James A. Walker, of Virginia, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the report of the majority of the committee[2] in the Virginia case of R. T. Thorp v. Epes. The official return was as follows, showing a plurality of 2,621 for sitting Member:

For Sydney P. Epes	12,894
For R. T. Thorp	10,273
For J. L. Thorp	491
For others	25

Sitting Member conceded that his plurality should be reduced to 2,488 votes by the rejection of votes in various counties.

The majority of the committee, before proceeding to examine the election in detail, call attention to certain general conditions, viz, that the district in previous elections had shown a strong predisposition in favor of contestant's party; that the supporters of contestant were united while there was division among their opponents; that the negro population of the district was in excess of the white population; that the election machinery was entirely in the hands of sitting Members's party; that the law operated to the disadvantage of the illiterate voter by commanding that the ballot be kept a secret as to arrangement and form until the time when it should be put into the voter's hand; and finally that an obscure and ignorant person, named J. L. Thorp, had, through the agency of an election officer, petitioned to have his name put on the official ballot as a candidate for Congress. It was shown that this action was taken to delude ignorant voters and diminish the vote for contestant.

The majority of the committee, as a result of their examination, found a plurality of 812 votes for contestant. These changes resulted from the following conditions: (1) the addition to contestant's vote of 623 votes on account of that number of voters who were at the polls in seven precincts but could not vote; (2) the rejection of the returns from nineteen precincts where the election officers, all of whom were of sitting Member's party, were alleged to have done certain specific illegal and fraudulent acts as such election officers; and (3) the rejection of the returns from six precincts where unfit judges were appointed to represent contestant's party, and where frauds were proved.

As to the counting of votes not cast, and the relation thereto of a repealed section of the Federal election law.

Although a mandatory State law provided for counting no ballot but the official one, the House righted a wrong by counting votes not cast.

Discussion as to the act of tendering a vote under the old and new ballot laws.

Although the State law declares that no election shall be invalid by failure to have party representation on boards of election officers, the House will reject the returns where fraud accompanies the irregularity.

(1) In regard to the votes of voters who did not succeed after proper effort in casting their ballots, a sharp controversy arose between the majority and minority [1] of the committee. The majority, after quoting the opinions of McCrary and Paine, and citing the cases of Ball v. Snyder, Wallace v. McKinley, Wise v. Waddell, Featherstone v. Cate, Mudd v. Compton, Sessinghaus, v. Frost, Yates v. Martin, and Yost v. Tucker, takes the ground that in this case, where the testimony showed that voters were in line waiting to cast their votes, and where there were delays for which the election officers were responsible, the tendered votes should be counted. In the course of the debate [2] Mr. Walker stated that in the district over 1,000 votes were in this way excluded, but that the committee had counted only 623, because each one of those 623 voters was put on the witness stand during the proceedings in the contest and proved the facts which entitled him to vote and have his ballot counted. In cases where the names of such voters had been kept on tally lists, or where the voter had given a certificate of the fact to some one at the polls, the votes had not been counted. As to a question whether the testimony of the voter should be accepted as to his qualification, the report says:

It is contended, however, by the contestee that the votes excluded can not be counted in this case because the contestant has failed to prove that these voters were registered as required by law. This objection is based upon the idea that the registration book is primary evidence as to whether a voter is registered or not, and that no other proof of that fact can be received.

The registration books in Virginia are not public records to which verity can be attached. In fact they are only prima facie evidence that a man is a voter and may be attacked by parole evidence in many ways. It is true they are the best evidence as to whether a voter's name is on the registration book, but the fact that it is on the book is not conclusive evidence that he is a registered voter, and the fact that his name is not on the book is not conclusive evidence that he is not a registered voter.

The question in this case is whether the excluded person is a legally qualified voter at the precinct at which he offers to vote, and not the question whether his name is on the registration list or not. A citizen applying to vote whose name is not found upon the registration book may vote upon a transfer from another precinct in the same district, or he may prove that he was a duly registered voter at that precinct and that his name had been, by fraud or by accident, left off or erased from the list of registration. If the registration books are destroyed, the voters whose names were on them are still registered voters. The act of registration makes the voter a registered voter. The registration lists are only the subsequent memorial of the fact made by the registrar. Again, a voter whose name appears upon the registration book may not be a duly qualified elector for various reasons.

He may have removed from the election district more than ten days before he offers to vote; or he may have been convicted of some criminal offense; or he may have fought a duel with a deadly weapon, sent or accepted a challenge to fight a duel with a deadly weapon, or knowingly conveyed a challenge, or aided or assisted anyone in fighting a duel; or he may prove that his disabilities have been removed by a pardon or by an act of the legislature; or it may be shown that he is an idiot or a lunatic; or he may prove that in purging the polls as provided by the statute his name was improperly stricken from the list of voters.

All these cases for or against the right of a citizen to vote can be proved by parole evidence; and the question as to whether the name is upon the registration book or not is not the real issue, but whether the party offering to vote is entitled to vote at that election and at that precinct.

This question can be decided only by oral evidence furnished by the affidavit of the voter himself, by the evidence of other witnesses who know the facts, or by the records of the court. The fact that his name is on the registration book is only prima facie evidence that it is legally entitled to be there, and its failure to appear upon the book is only prima facie evidence that he is not a registered voter. The distinction lies between what constitutes a registered voter and what the poll books show. A duly registered voter who has not forfeited his title to be a registered voter at the precinct where he is registered is nevertheless a registered voter, although his name does not appear upon the books.

In this case it appears that no exception was made at the time in many instances to the testimony of the witnesses proving that they were duly registered voters.

The minority, in their views, combatted the proposition of the majority:

Votes not cast can not be counted as a matter of law generally. No contrary opinion can be cited from the adjudged cases of the ordinary courts of any of the States of this Union. This was a uniform rule of the House of Representatives until 1873, some time after the adoption of section 2007, et seq., Revised Statutes of the United States (adopted May 31, 1870). This section was repealed by act of February 8, 1894, and whatever influence it may have had is thereby removed.

The minority cite the cases of Biddle and Richard v. Wing, Whyte v. Harris, Morris v. Handley, Niblack v. Walls, Frost v. Metcalf, Bradley v. Slemons, Bisbee v. Finley, Sessinghaus v. Frost, and Waddill v. Wise, as well as passages from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, Wold v. Hanson (87 Wis., 179), Pennington v. Hare

If, therefore, under the Australian system we can not in such cases resort to the intention of an actual voter, what possible justification can there be in accepting the intentions of individuals as to whom we have no evidence or means of knowing how they intended to express their subsequently declared intentions?

It will not be forgotten, moreover, that all of the cases relied on in the majority report for the counting of votes not cast were decided under the old system of individual or party tickets, and the peculiar difference in the two systems was an important factor in the former cases.

In Frost v. Metcalf the ballots must have been offered at the polling place.

In Bisbee v. Finley and in Waddill v. Wise the identical ballots were filed.

In Sessinghaus v. Frost the ballot must have been actually offered, i. e., the clearly expressed intentions of the voter must have been declared at the time in the form prescribed by law.

The broadest statement of the doctrine sought to be enforced by contestant is that of Niblack v. Walls, so often quoted as the language of Paine, 518:

"When a legal voter offers to vote for a particular candidate and uses due diligence in endeavoring to do so, and is prevented by fraud, violence, or intimidation from depositing his ballot, his vote should be counted."

It is unnecessary to call attention again to the fact that this decision was prior to the adoption of the Australian system.

Furthermore, as to the qualification of such voters, the minority state:

Legal registration is an essential prerequisite for voting in Virginia.

By express statute the officers of election themselves can not take parol evidence of this fact, but the name must be found on the registration books (Idem).

This circumstance of legal qualification is essential to the doctrine stated above, and in contested elections the party desiring to invoke its application should furnish proof of equal dignity with that which the officers of election must have required. The registration books are the best evidence of the qualification of a voter, and, being in existence, are the only competent evidence on this subject.

After citing authorities, the minority state that due exception was taken by sitting Member to parol evidence on this subject and the contestant was challenged to produce the registration books.

In the debate [1] Mr. Walker replied to the contention that the Virginia law prevented the counting of excluded votes, saying it was admitted that when a voter put a ballot in the box it must be an official ballot in order to be counted; but in this case the question was not as to the counting of an illegal ballot, but as to the exclusion of a voter by fraudulent methods from voting. It was also denied that the right to count such votes depended on the former Federal statute. It existed independently of it.[2]

The evidence presented by the majority showed not only the fact that the supporters of contestant used due diligence, being long in line waiting to vote, but that they were prevented by illegal, arbitrary, or fraudulent acts of the election officers tending to make delays or put contestant's supporters at a disadvantage in getting to the ballot box.

(2) As to the 19 precincts where the officers of election were all of sitting Member's party; and the six precincts "where judges were appointed to represent the Republican party, who were educationally unfit to be judges, or who were not recognized by the party as Republicans," the majority report gives the law:

> The statute law of Virginia, as before shown, requires that wherever it is possible judges of election "shall be chosen for each voting place from persons known to belong to different political parties, each of whom shall be able to read and write."
> It further requires that the judges of election shall designate one of their number "whose duty it shall be, at the request of any elector who may be physically or educationally unable to prepare his ballot, to enter the booth with said elector and render him assistance in preparing his ballot by reading the names and offices to be voted for on the ballot and pointing out which name or names the said elector may wish to strike out, or otherwise aid him in preparing his ballot."

The report cites the cases of Thorp v. McKenney, English v. Peelle, Threet v. Clark, McDuffie v. Turpin, in support of the doctrine that where the testimony shows frauds in conjunction with a disregard of the law providing for representation of different parties on the boards of election officers, the returns should be rejected even though the law of the State may provide, as did the Virginia law in this case, that "no election shall be deemed invalid when the judges shall not belong to different political parties." Such a law did not apply to an election dishonestly conducted.

Concluding as to this point, and also as to the appointment of incompetent members of contestant's party, the report says:

> It can not be contended that the electoral boards failed by inadvertence to comply with this law, for their attention was called to its importance both by the report in the last-named case and by the Republican county chairman.
> We are constrained, therefore, to conclude that it was designedly done for the sole purpose of enabling partisan election officers to defeat the will of the voters as declared at the polls. If any doubt existed as to this design, it would disappear before the evidence in this case, which, as before shown, discloses that frauds, illegalities, and irregularities were perpetrated by these Democratic election officers at every precinct where this law was disregarded.
> All that is here said with reference to the refusal of the Democratic electoral boards to comply with the law requiring the selection of judges known to belong to different political parties applies with as much force to those precincts where these boards, in pretending to comply with the law, selected as representatives of the Republican party men who were not recognized by that party as Republicans or were educationally or morally unfit to be judges of election.
> That the statute requiring the judge selected for that purpose to enter the booth with the illiterate voter "and render him assistance in preparing his ballot by reading the names and offices to be voted for, and pointing out which name or names the said elector may wish to strike out, or otherwise aid him in preparing his ballot," is clearly mandatory is plain, not only from the language itself, but by a decision of the supreme court of appeals of Virginia. (Pearson et al v. Board of Supervisors of Brunswick Co., 91 Va., 322.)
> In the case last cited it was held to be the duty of the judge to render to the voter whatever assistance he might request in the preparation of his ballot. It is the duty of such judge, when requested to do so, to mark the ballot of the illiterate voter in such a manner as to make it a legal ballot for the candidates of his choice. As before shown, at many of the precincts the judges refused to render this assistance to the illiterate Republican voters, thus violating a mandatory requirement of the law. Paine on Elections, section 497, says:
> "A violation by electors or officers of a mandatory requirement of law, which changes or materially affects the result, is, even in the absence of fraud, a sufficient ground for rejecting an entire poll when it can not be purged."

That this assistance was almost universally requested can hardly be questioned in the light of the evidence in this case. Illiterate Republican voters were instructed by public speeches and by handbills not to rely on themselves, but to ask the judges to mark their ballots so as to enable them "to vote for McKinley, Hobart, and R.T. Thorp," the Republican candidates. Yet it is not denied that in this district 3,607 ballots cast by duly qualified voters were never computed or accounted for in the returns of votes cast for Congressional candidates, and that 491 votes were returned for J.L. Thorp, showing, practically, that over 4,000 ballots cast by qualified voters were improperly prepared. When it is remembered that at many precincts the election was held entirely by Democratic officials, and that in all the election was under the control of such officials, it is not reasonable to assume that any considerable number of these mismarked ballots were cast by voters who intended to vote for the Democratic candidate.

The majority of the committee review at length the testimony as to each of the rejected precincts, showing the inconsistencies in the returns and illegal and fraudulent acts of the partisan election boards.

The minority deny that the testimony had the effect claimed by the majority, and after analyzing the precedents cited by the majority, say:

From the foregoing analysis of the authorities relied on in Thorp v. McKenney it will be seen that there is little weight of authority to sustain an imputation against the verity of sworn returns by reason of the simple fact that officers of election are all of the same political party. It will be recollected, also, in addition, that the legislature of Virginia has added to the directory provisions of the statute the mandatory clause—

"But no election shall be deemed invalid when the judges shall not belong to different political parties or who shall not possess the above qualifications."

The report was debated at length on March 22 and 23, 1898, and on the latter day the House, by a vote of yeas 131, nays 151, rejected the resolutions of the minority in favor of the sitting Member, and then, by a vote of 151 yeas to 130 nays, agreed to resolutions declaring sitting Member not elected and that contestant was elected.

Thereupon Mr. Thorp took the oath of office.

1100. The Oregon election case of Vanderburg v. Tongue, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

A contestant must put in evidence the returns of the district as a basis for showing the effect of his charges.

A contestant having failed to show reasonable diligence, his request for time to take further testimony was denied.

On February 14, 1898,[1] Mr. Lemuel W. Royse, of Indian , from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted a report on the case of Vanderburg v. Tongue, from Oregon. The contestant, in his notice of contest, had charged frauds and irregularities; and the contestee in his answer had admitted certain of the charges as to Clackamas County, but denied all others. The contestant took testimony only as to Coledo precinct, in Coos County. This evidence, in the opinion of the committee, clearly showed that several persons, not over 25, voted who were not qualified electors. It was reasonably clear from the evidence that five of these persons voted for the contestant. The committee concluded:

We are unable to determine from the record how the others voted on Representative for Congress, but should we conclude that they voted for contestant, we would still be unable to tell how it would affect the result, since we have not been furnished with the election returns of the district. Several irregularities and violations of the law occurred in the conduct of the election held in this precinct, but we are satisfied that these were all brought about through the ignorance and unskillfulness of the officers of election. We believe that these officers were trying to hold an honest and fair election, and that the irregularities occurred through their want of a clear understanding of their duties as provided by law. There is no evidence which shows that these acts were committed or suffered to be done in the interest of any particular candidate. Some of the officers who participated in these acts were the friends and political adherents of the contestant, and there is nothing in the evidence tending to show that they would have been engaged in, or would have permitted, any thing detrimental to his interests. We therefore think that the vote of this precinct should stand as returned; but should the vote of this precinct be cast aside it would avail nothing, for, as stated before, it does not appear from the evidence that the exclusion of the vote of the precinct would change the result of the election.

The committee also say:

Contestant appeared before us by his attorney, and asked to reopen the case for the purpose of taking further testimony to sustain the charges in his notice of contest. But as he failed to show that he had been reasonably diligent in his effort to procure such testimony in the time allowed him by the statute, we recommend that his application be denied.

The House, without debate or division, agreed to resolutions confirming sitting Member's title to his seat.

1101. The Alabama election case of Crowe v. Underwood, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Although extensive frauds and irregularities were shown, the failure to show that the official return was overcome caused the House to confirm contestee's title.

On March 2, 1898[1] Mr. Romulus Z. Linney, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a report in the case of Crowe v. Underwood, from Alabama. The statement of the case is sufficiently embodied in the following from the report endorsed by the majority members of the committee:

The committee examined the evidence taken in the cause and find that according to the official returns the contestee received at said election 13,499 votes, contestant received 5,618 votes. The Hon. Archibald Lawson, Gold Democrat, received 2,318 votes; that the contestee received a majority over all candidates of 5,565 votes and a plurality over contestant of 7,881 votes.

The committee considered these returns as being prima facie true, and examined the evidence in the case in order to determine whether the fraud and other wrongs alleged and upon which contestant claimed that evidence had been offered had been established by a preponderance of the evidence to the extent of vitiating the returns. The committee find that there were many irregularities and much fraud practiced by the officers of the said election. The ticket voted at said election contained 57 names arranged in alphabetical order, with no device or other means of determining the politics of any candidate voted for. An illiterate man voter, in fact the most intelligent voter, would find it difficult to vote said ticket in the time allowed by law for an elector to be at the polls.

The laws of Alabama provide for the presence of a fixer at the polls to mark the ballots of illiterate voters, as directed by said voters, as to the candidate for whom he desired to vote. This ticket alone made it necessary that the fixers of each party should be intelligent. An ignorant or illiterate man could not have performed the functions of said office of fixer.

The entire absence of fixers or other officers to represent the illiterate voter would, in the opinion of the committee, strongly suggest fraud if it were confined to one party while the other party had no representation, and it appears on page 30 of the record that the chairman of the Populist party presented a list of names for inspectors of election for 42 beats in Jefferson County, but as no list as to the inspectors actually appointed appears the matter is left without proof as to how it was, and the official returns prevail. In Perry and Hale counties the evidence tends to show that the Populists and Republicans did not have an equal share of fixers as provided by the statute. Out of 48 inspectors of election in Perry County 40 are Democrats and only 8 Republicans and Populists, and in Cleveland beat, Perry County, all the inspectors and markers were organized Democrats. (See pp. 168–169 of the record.) The irregularities in said beat were so glaring and the fraud so clearly established that the contestee at the hearing admitted that the returns from that beat were successfully assailed, and that beat should be thrown out. When we consider the evidence as to Hale County, it is shown by the evidence to have about 4,000 registered voters, and about 1,150 of this number are white, the balance negroes. The opinion of a witness, Adison Wimbs, on page 196 of the record, which appears to have been given without objection, puts the vote of Hale County, so far as the negro vote is concerned, at 2,800 for Lawson, and that Underwood's vote at a fair election would not have been more than 850 or 900 votes, whereas the official returns put the vote of Hale County, Underwood, 2,458; Crowe, 152, and Lawson, 965. Mr. Wimbs further says that at Greensboro beat, Hale County, the Republicans and goldbug Democrats presented a list of fixers, each presenting six names, and none were appointed at that beat, and the returns show that Greensboro beat gave Underwood 467, Crowe 17, and Lawson 359 votes. This evidence tends strongly to show that the election in Hale County was unfair and that the Gold Democrats became the victims of the frauds of the organized Democracy to a greater extent than Crowe, the Populist and Republican candidate, but as it is founded chiefly on the opinion of a witness and the lack of a fair representation of inspectors and fixers at the polls the committee concluded that it was not sufficient to destroy the legal force of the official returns, although it is highly probable that the grossest frauds were practiced by the organized Democracy of Hale County in said election against both the contestant and the Gold Democratic candidate, A. Lawson, but more against Mr. Lawson than Mr. Crowe, the Republicans in this county having indorsed Lawson, the goldbug candidate. (See testimony of Adison Wimbs.) The contestant, on page 33 of his brief, claims that 40 votes should be added to contestant's vote, but it is admitted in contestant's brief that there is the absence of effective proof of the irregularities and frauds in said county at Centerville. The want of that effective proof of fraud as to Bibb County leaves the official returns in force. As to the counties of Bibb and Blount, we failed to find evidence sufficient to overthrow the returns.

The committee unanimously recommended resolutions confirming the title of contestant to the seat, inasmuch as sufficient fraud and irregularities to overcome his majority were not proven.

The House, without debate or division, agreed to the resolutions.

1102. The Virginia election case of Wise v. Young, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Where returns are falsified by election officers they have no prima facie effect, and the parties may be credited only with such votes as may be proven aliunde.

Where election markers fraudulently mark the ballots of illiterate voters, the returns may be impeached by the testimony of the voters as to the ballots they intended to vote.

Discussion of the weight of testimony of election officers as to their own acts when impeached by the evidence of illiterate voters.

Where returns are rejected because of fraudulent act of election officers friendly to contestee, the contestant yet loses his returned vote as well as contestee.

On March 21,1898,[1] Mr. W.S. Mesick, of Michigan, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the report of a majority of the committee[2] in the [2] Minority views presented by Mr. Robert E. Burke, of Texas.

Virginia case of Wise v. Young. The official returns for the district gave to sitting Member a plurality of 2,399 votes.

The contestant charged frauds and irregularities, and presented a large mass of testimony to overcome the official plurality.

At the outset a question was raised and discussed as to the election law, of Virginia. The committee review at length the provisions of this law, which provided for the Australian ballot, but had several features which the majority of the committee considered as especially favorable to fraudulent acts. The electoral machinery was all in the hands of one political party, and while it provided that the precinct judges should be of different political parties it also provided that the election should not be vitiated if this provision should be neglected. The form and arrangement of the ballot were kept from the voter until the time came to mark it, and he was allowed two and a half minutes for this act. The ballot was marked by drawing a line through the names of the candidates whom the elector did not wish to vote for, and no name was to be considered scratched unless the mark extended through three-fourths of the name. In case a voter was physically or mentally incapable of marking the ballot, a judge was to accompany him to the booth and point out the names "or otherwise aid him in preparing the ballot." The Virginia court of appeals declared this law constitutional, and that its provisions in regard to persons who marked their own ballots were reasonable. As to the provision for illiterate voters, it said that very great power was placed in the hands of the judge who assisted the voter, and commented on the fact that such confidence was liable to abuse. The majority of the committee, after quoting from the message of the governor of the State condemning the law, say:

> From this statement of a governor in full political sympathy with the framers of the law we turn to the undisputed fact that in the election which is the subject of our examination, the poll books at 88 precincts in this district, exclusive of the county of Norfolk, show that 32,277 voters deposited ballots, and of these but 25,433 were returned for anybody for Congressman, and but 22,758 were returned for Presidential electors. Thus nearly one-sixth of the entire vote cast for Congressmen were thrown out as defective, and one-fourth of the entire vote cast for Presidential electors.
> The law is plainly too intricate for illiterates to protect themselves and the trouble undoubtedly springs from errors or frauds committed by the election officers. Turning to the evidence to solve this last inquiry we find that the contestant has taken an immense amount of testimony on this point and taken it with much care and observances of legal requirements.

The minority, after showing that the law is valid, take the ground that all such irregularities as may be supposed to result from its intricacies or from ignorant misconception of it are removed from the category of fraudulent practices such as destroy the value of returns.

The minority further say:

> The highest court in the State of Virginia having upheld the validity of this law, and declared its provisions reasonable, we are bound by that decision, and in considering the evidence here we must endeavor to ascertain whether this election was conducted in accordance with the provisions of that law. If we find it so, the contestee is entitled to retain his seat. If we find that any of the provisions of this law were disregarded in the conduct of this election, we should further ascertain whether such disregard of the law was with fraudulent intent or through ignorance or misinterpretation of the law. If done with fraudulent intent, the value of the returns as evidence is destroyed, and the returns may be rejected; but if done through ignorance or misconstruction of the law, while the votes may be illegal, that fact will not affect the election or render it void, unless the number of such illegal votes is great enough to affect the general result; and where it is shown that illegal votes have been cast for a candidate they should be deducted from his vote. This is the common leaning of the profession on this subject.

The distinction is between mere illegality and fraud in the conduct of elections. The first does not deprive the candidate of any votes save those proven to have been illegally cast for him; the second, by destroying the value of the returns as evidence, causes the rejection of the entire poll and deprives the candidates of all the votes cast for them, as well the legal as the illegal ones, unless otherwise proved. * * *

Fraud, however, is never presumed, and "nothing but the most positive, credible, and unequivocal evidence should be permitted to destroy the credit of official returns. It is not sufficient to cast suspicion upon them." * * *

A fortiori mere opportunities for fraud should not be taken for proof of fraud. Reference to these fundamental principles of evidence is made necessary by the very general disregard of them by the majority in treating the evidence in its report. Instead of waiting for "positive, credible, and unequivocal evidence (of fraud) to destroy the credit of official returns," as the law requires, the majority seems to have started out with a presumption of fraud against the conduct of the officers of this election, and to have accepted trivial circumstances, uncertain and equivocal testimony as conclusive proof to sustain that presumption. For it must be remembered that the great majority-4ndeed, nearly all-of the witnesses whose testimony is relied on to prove fraud are ignorant, uneducated, unintelligent negroes; that the testimony of large numbers of them who testified that they voted for contestant, when subjected to cross-examination, shows that at the time of the election they did not know the contestant by name or that he was a candidate for Congress; that others, in large numbers, at the time of their examination as witnesses could not remember, when subjected to cross-examination, who they voted for Congress; that there was great defection from the contestant in his own party and that many negroes were opposed to. him. * * * The evidence of fraud on the part of the judges who assisted the illiterates consists almost entirely of the evidence of these illiterates themselves as to acts which, in the nature of the case, must have occurred only in the presence of two persons (i. e., the judge and the illiterate voter), both of whom testify in direct contradiction to each other; in which conflict of testimony the majority accept as true the statement of the ignorant, unintelligent, bow-ridden negro, characterizing the testimony of the judges as "perjury."

After this preliminary view of the law, the majority and minority proceed to consider the returns of 10 precincts, which the majority propose to reject entirely because of overwhelming evidence of fraud in each. The fraudulent acts in all 10 precincts fall under a class fully illustrated by the case of Longview, in Isle of Wright County, of which the majority say:

In this precinct 162 votes were cast and 127 returned; 102 for Young and 25 for Vise. Contestant examined 75 voters (pp. 569 to 605), whose names appeared on the poll book, all of whom swore that they voted for him, and only 6 of these prepared their own ballots. The others swore the judges helped them, and most of them swore that the judges themselves marked their ballots; thus contestant examined all but 87 of the men who voted, and the return gives Young 102 votes. Warren, a voter (p. 571), swore he saw the judge mark his ballot in a zigzag line. Jordan (p. 576) swore the judge marked his ballot from top to bottom in a straight line. Stewart (p. 581) swears he saw the judge mark his ballot by making the letter X on each name. All the judges and clerks for this precinct were Democrats. It was proved that of the 162 voters 78 were white and 84 colored. The return of the contestee gave him 24 more votes than the white voters, and gave McKinley, for President, but 16 votes, where 84 colored men had voted, and Bryan 98, where but 78 white men had voted.

The political complexion of the colored men as voters was admitted. The contestee examined nobody but the judges and the clerks. One of the judges (C. C. Brock, p. 31–18) swore he allowed voters to vote improperly marked ballots, when he knew them to be so marked. Another judge (Coulter, p. 3122), in answer to the question asked if he ever read the election laws of Virginia, replied: "Part of it—a very small part; I don't believe in law nohow." The registrar also was a Democrat (p. 603), and 11 duly qualified voters (pp. 584 to 604) swore that he refused to register them, and that if he had done so they would have voted for contestant.

The majority report goes on to quote the case of Clayton v. Breckinridge: "When returns are impeached they can not be received for any purpose, and only those proved aliunde can be counted." "If the returns have been falsified by the election officers," continue the majority in their review of Longview precinct, "it is a well-settled rule of law that they cease to have any prima facie effect, and each party can only be credited with such votes at the box in question as each may show by other evidence."

The minority minimize the effect of the testimony as to this precinct, and deny that it should have the effect of throwing out the entire precinct, since the judges testified that they rendered all the assistance asked for by illiterate voters, while the registrar testified that he never refused to register any man who presented to him a legal and proper transfer certificate. The clerks of the election further testified to the fairness of the conduct of the election."There is no reason," say the minority, in comparing the legal weight of testimony, "why these men should not be believed as readily as the ignorant, unintelligent, illiterate voter, who testifies against them, and they have the advantage of the presumption in their favor growing out of the fact that they are public officers acting under the sanction of their official oaths."

One other precinct of the 10 may be noticed because of the view which the minority take. The majority, in their report, say of Creed's Bridge precinct:

> The poll book showed 160 men voting. All the election officers were Democrats. The ballot box was nearly covered from sight by a curtain and the house darkened by bagging. The return gave Young 123 votes and Wise 16.
> Contestant put 54 voters on the stand. Twenty-five of these prepared their own ballots, and 29 were prepared by the Democratic judges. Only one mentions any other ballot fixer than Midgett. Young could by no possibility have received exceeding 105 votes—the return gave him 123—if every voter who marked his own ballot marked it wrong. Midgett, the judge, marked 28 ballots for Wise, and he received a return of but 16. The contestee's own witness said it was the smallest Republican vote he ever knew of. The details of the fraud at this precinct are too long to embody in this report.

The minority make this concession:

> There is no direct testimony of fraud in this precinct except some conflict of testimony as to whether the ballot box was in full view of the voters or not. But, if not, the provision requiring it to be so is simply directory, and its violation would not of itself invalidate the election. The judges, too, are men of good character, as the evidence shows (William A. White, postmaster, p. 3184). Yet the testimony here as to the vote cast and that returned is totally irreconcilable, and we think the entire poll should be rejected for uncertainty as to the vote cast. The contestee loses 123 votes in this precinct.

Reviewing the 10 precincts, the majority say:

> The aggregate vote returned for contestee from these 10 precincts was 1,517. He must lose this much, for he made no effort whatever to set up, aliunde, his vote, and he must have seen the utter worthlessness of these returns.
> The contestant would also lose his vote in these precincts if he had not set it up by evidence aliunde. His vote from these 10 precincts as returned was but 565, but in the fast 9 precincts, where but 425 votes were returned for him, he examined personally 805 witnesses, who swore they voted for him. His poll at these precincts and his increased vote, as established by his proofs, appears in a later statement. The contestee loses, therefore, on these 10 precincts, 1,517 votes.

Certificates of voters, stating how they had voted and given at the time of voting to a person who sustained them by testimony, were admitted as evidence against the return.

Discussion of the doctrine of res gestse as applied to certificates made by voters at the time of voting.

Where electors were present, ready to vote, and were prevented by dilatory acts of election officers, the House counted the votes as if cast.

In an election case allegations as to the means by which a person became a candidate are not properly considered.

Although the fraud in a district may be extensive, the House prefers to purge the return rather than declare the seat vacant.

The committee then take up 44 other precincts where the methods of proving the fraud were essentially the same, and where the majority recommend that the entire return be rejected. The majority say:

It will be seen that he has introduced nearly 5,000 witnesses in person to prove their votes for him at these precincts, when he received a return of but 3,729. It will be further seen that in 16 of these precincts, marked in the table with a star, he has introduced certificates or the rolls of his tally keepers, which, if they are admitted, will sustain his claim that he received at least 6,086 votes where but 3,729 were returned for him. In our view of the matter, it is unimportant to the contestant whether we count the votes proved by tally lists and certificates by him or not. His majority is already established, and the admission of the tally lists and certificates only swells that majority.

After citing the cases of Wallace v. McKinley, Sullivan v. Felton, Smith v. Jackson, and McDuffie v. Turpin, the report argues from the principles there laid down that the contestant in this case should be allowed the benefit of the certificates of the voters and the tally rolls. Thus, in Isle of Wright County, 102 voters swore that they voted for contestant, although but 31 votes were returned for him. Furthermore, in this precinct, says the report—contestant placed upon the stand Goodwin, who swore that 121 voters, whose names appeared on the poll books, came to him at the time they voted, and stated to him that they voted the Republican ticket, and that he kept the tally and put their names down. He produced and identified and filed his book. Of these 121, 102 appeared and testified. It was in the nature of the case impossible to procure the attendance of all, and the question is whether the unimpeached testimony of Goodwin entitles the contestant to the other 19 votes of persons not personally examined.

The next phase of this is presented by the returns from Stone House precinct, which are impeached and rejected. There 109 men appeared in person and falsified the return so that it has been rejected. These 109 men had given certificates. (See p. 2666.) They were part of 113 voters, who, on the day of the election and just after voting, gave to contestant's representatives on the ground certificates that they had voted for him, in the form which appears on page 2666. The other four men were dead or absent, but their certificates were produced by the persons to whom they were given.

Shall the production of such certificates, completely identified by the party who took them, entitle the contestant to the vote of these absentees? This question becomes important when we reach a precinct like Walls Bridge, Surry County, where 254 certificates were given, and from press of time and inability to reach the witnesses only 176 were produced. We are disposed, on the authorities above cited and upon the facts proved in this case, to admit these certificates and the evidence of these tally keepers

The testimony shows that the Republican managers had no confidence in the Democratic judges; that this distrust was communicated everywhere to the Republican voters; that they were instructed not to attempt, where ignorant, to fix their own ballots. The danger of their attempting to fix their ballots was foreseen. They were supplied with yellow slips which they took to the judges, in writing, requesting them to prepare the ballots for them. They were also supplied with these printed certificates as to how they had voted, which, immediately after voting, they voluntarily took to the tally keepers of the election and gave to them. That the Democrats understood what they were doing, and why they were doing it, is amply proved, and in many precincts the attempt was made to intimidate the voters from presenting the printed. slips asking the assistance of the judges, and to drive away the representatives of the contestant who were there to take the statements of Republican voters and the certificates of how they voted.

When a voter, thus suspecting the integrity of the election judges, seeks to protect himself by a contemporaneous statement to a competent and unimpeached representative of his party, we believe that the unimpeached testimony of the representative is admissible evidence concerning the vote. The transaction was certainly part of the res gestae, and after the poll has been impeached, the evidence of such a tally keeper and such certificates is the best evidence obtainable; for the judges of election are no longer credible, and the voters are in many instances inaccessible. We therefore think that the contestant is entitled to the excess of votes proved at these precincts, not only by the testimony of the voters themselves, but by the proofs of these certificates and these tally lists, and so we add to the poll of contestant 2,357 votes at these 43 precincts, that being the number proved in excess of the return for him.

The contestee's counsel argued that we ought not to count these votes, because even if we believe the statements of the witnesses that they voted, non constat that the ballots were correctly made out. We can not assent to this. On the evidence it is clear that if the judges had done their duty by these illiterates the returns would not have been so easily impeached. But they are impeached, and the contestant is trying to establish his vote by evidence aliunde. When witnesses swear that they voted for him, the presumption is that the ballots were correctly made out. The burden in every such case would be on the other party to show that it was not. If we err in admitting it, we err on the side of an expression of the popular will untrammeled by technicalities.

The minority do not admit that the proof is sufficient to allow contestant the votes claimed to be proven, and argue that votes may not be proven by certificates:

We can not agree with the majority that these certificates could be counted as proven votes. They seem to us the barest kind of hearsay. And while it is true that it often occurs that what would other wise be regarded as hearsay testimony becomes admissible as a part of res gestae, this is true only where the admission of such testimony would not contravene some well-established principle of law or be against public policy. In this case both of these reasons apply against their admission. The State of Virginia has passed a law for the conduct of elections in which, according to the opinion of her highest court, the dominant purpose is to "secure the independence of the voter by secluding him within an isolated booth;" "to free him from all solicitations and annoyance." (Pearson v. Supervisors, 91 Va., 331.)

But how is this independence to be secured if the voter is permitted to be escorted to the polls by his political bosses, instructed or even given to understand by his political overseers that he is expected to disclose his vote after depositing it, and knows that he will be spotted as a political traitor if he refuses to do so? To permit such practices is to continue the very evil the law was enacted to cure, to destroy the independence of the voter, and to make a delusion of the secrecy of the ballot. Such considerations overcome the mere rule of evidence that testimony otherwise hearsay may be admitted as part of res gestae. The contestant should not be allowed these additional votes.

The majority of the committee next consider the contention of the contestant that he should have counted for him 1,989 votes of "duly qualified voters who were hindered delayed, obstructed, and prevented from voting for him in 29 precincts." Of these excluded voters, 717 were in precincts where the conduct of the judges was such that the returns had already been rejected. The committee had no doubt that if the election had been properly conducted, all these votes might have been received. As to other precincts the report says:

The mass of testimony at every one of these is overwhelming to show delays in opening the polls, dilatory questioning of voters, waste of time, and wrangles with Republican representatives, recesses for meals, failure to supply adequate voting booths, and every kind of device to delay the vote. While this course was pursued toward the Republicans, equally plain discrimination was made at all points in favor of receiving the white vote.

The voters, contrary to law, were ranged in lines of whites and blacks. White men were voted in preference to blacks. Where the blacks were very numerous and the whites very few, at many of these points, ropes were stretched to keep off voters, but white men never had any difficulty whatever in passing under the ropes or coming up and voting directly. The discrimination was palpable everywhere and the result all in favor of the contestee. In fact, in the whole district but two men went on the stand to declare that they had lost their votes for him.

The minority denied that the testimony showed the improper exclusion of this vote, and combated the doctrine of counting excluded votes, quoting the cases of Biddle and Richard v. Wing, Whyte v. Harris, Frost v. Metcalf, and the following from Judge Cooley:

An exclusion of legal voters, not fraudulently, but through error in judgment, will not defeat an election, notwithstanding the error in such a case is one which there was no mode of correcting, even by the aid of the courts, since it can not be known with certainty afterwards how the excluded electors would have voted, and it would obviously be dangerous to receive and rely upon their subsequent statements as to their intentions after it is ascertained precisely what effect their votes would have upon the result. (Cooley, Const. Lim., p. 781.)

As we have seen that no evidence is admissible as to how parties intended to vote who were wrongfully excluded from so doing, such a case is one of wrong without remedy, so far as the candidates are concerned. (Idem, p. 789.)

The majority note that sitting Member has presented no countervailing proof to meet the issues raised by the contestant and sum up to show that the plurality of contestant is in reality 5,119.

Before closing their report the majority say:

The contestee introduced much in his answer and something in his testimony concerning the manner of the contestant's nomination. Now, in the case of Lowry v. White (Mobley, vol. 7, p. 622) it was well said:

"In contested cases it is improper to consider allegations in the testimony intended to show simply by what means the person became a candidate."

And so we dispose of that question.

The contestee raised a question about the legality of the electoral board of Norfolk County. His counsel did not seriously press the question, nor do we think there was anything in it; but if we should throw out the whole returns from Norfolk County, it would not affect the result.

Where fraud is rampant in an election, as it is admitted to have been in this district, it is sometimes decided to remand the election, but we do not think that rule should apply to the present case.

As was said in the case of Waddill v. Wise (Rowell, 1889–1891, pp. 203 and 204):

"If the fraudulent exclusion of votes, if successful, secured to the party of the wrongdoer a temporary seat in Congress, and the only penalty for detection in the wrong would be merely a new election, giving another chance for the exercise of the same tactics, such practices would be at a great premium and an election indefinitely prevented * * * but if * * * the wrong is at once corrected in this House, no encouragement is given to such dangerous and disgraceful methods."

The report was debated at length in the House on April 25 and 26, and on the latter day a motion to recommit the case with instructions to examine the ballots was defeated, yeas 110, nays 147. The resolution submitted by the minority, proposing to confirm the title of sitting Member to the seat, was then disagreed to, yeas 107, nays 147. The resolutions of the majority, seating contestant, were then agreed to without division, and Mr. Wise appeared and took the oath.

1104. The Tennessee election case of Patterson v. Carmack, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Instance wherein conditions of a district as to party and racial lines were considered in an election case.

Discussion as to appointment of election officers of one party only as prima facie evidence of fraud.

Discussion as to the sufficiency of tally lists kept by watchers at the polls to impeach the returns of the officers.

On March 31, 1898,[1] Mr. W. S. Kirkpatrick, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted a report of the majority in the Tennessee case of Patterson v. Carmack.[2]

The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 365, which contestant sought to impeach by charging fraudulent conspiracy on the part of sitting Member's supporters in one county, and other frauds in two precincts of another county. Sitting Member also made certain counter charges, the principal of which related to use of poll-tax receipts by contestant's friends. Certain general conditions were considered as of influence in this case. Both sitting Member and contestant were Democrats, there having arisen a division in the party in the district over the money question. Contestant had been indorsed by the Republicans. The majority in their report exhibit tables showing analysis of the vote, from which it is concluded:

> It will be seen that in these 10 contested districts the contestee overcame a hostile majority in the rest of the Congressional district of 1,207, and converted it into a majority in the entire Congressional district of 365. The total vote of these 10 contested districts is 2,170. It will be found from the evidence that of these 950 were white and 1,120 colored. A very short calculation will prove that in order to secure the vote returned for him, contestee must have received the entire white vote and three-fourths of the colored vote in these contested districts.

The election law of Tennessee provided as follows:

> The sheriff, and if he is a candidate, the coroner, shall hold all elections. (M. and V. Code, sec. 1044.)
> The county court shall appoint three judges for each voting place, who shall be of different political parties. If the court fail to make the appointment, the sheriff, with the advice of three justices of the peace, or, if none be present, three respectable freeholders, shall appoint said judges. (M. and V. Code, secs. 1047 to 1049.)
> If the sheriff or other officer whose duty it is to attend the particular place of voting fail to attend, any justice of the peace present, or if no justice is present, any three freeholders, may perform these duties, or in case of necessity may act as officers or inspectors. (M. and V. Code, sec. 1050.)
> When the election is finished, the returning officers and judges shall, in the presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, open the box and read aloud the names of the persons which shall appear on each ballot. (M. and V. Code, sec. 1068.)

The case as presented naturally divides itself into three branches: (1) A charge of conspiracy in Fayette County, which was effective in eight voting districts, and a charge of fraud in two districts in Tipton County; (2) the propriety of counting returns from ballot boxes extemporized in opposition to the regular poll; and (3) the use of tax receipts as an inducement to voters.

(1) As to the charge of conspiracy in Fayette County, the evidence showed that the opposition to sitting Member failed generally to procure from the sheriff of Fayette County proper representation on the boards of officers holding the elections in the various districts of the county. The majority, after citing from the cases of Threet v. Clark, Thorp v. McKenney, and English v. Peele, say:

> According to the foregoing citations, the appointment on the election boards to represent one of the opposing parties of persons not in sympathy with or objectionable to that party, or of persons unable to read and write and without the necessary mental capacity to enable them to serve intelligently, should of itself be regarded as evidence of conspiracy to defraud on the part of the election officials, and that the appointment of such persons was prima facie evidence of fraud and misconduct on the part of those charged with the constitution of these boards and the conduct of the election, where it was possible to appoint competent and well-known representatives of the complaining party to act as judges or inspectors of election. This presumption is still more emphatic where, as in this case, these appointments were strongly objected to by the friends of the contestant in the several districts complained of, and where timely application was made for proper representatives and the attention of the appointing parties called to a number of proper and unobjectionable persons for such place on the boards.
> The record shows that in every single voting precinct in Fayette County, against whose election returns contestant brings the charge of fraud, all the judges were Carmack supporters, or the Republican representative to whom the law intrusted the duty of protecting the interest of his party was an ignorant negro, unable to read and write, and of a very low grade of intelligence.
> There is no pretense that it was not possible to have selected persons who could read and write, the proof showing that there were many such persons in all these districts who were Republicans. Therefore, according to the rule laid down in the cases above cited, this one fact is a very strong circumstance, sufficient in itself, unless explained, to prove a conspiracy to defraud, and even making out, according to the holding in Thorp v. McKenney, a prima facie case of fraud and misconduct on the part of the officials charged with the conduct of the election.

The minority thus meet the charge of conspiracy:

> Manifestly if there is any force whatever in the claim of "conspiracy" it is that the alleged conspiracy operated against the contestant individually. So far from this being true, the face of the returns shows that contestant received 613 more votes than the Republican electors, and that contestee's majority was only 365 as returned, whereas the admittedly lawful and actual Democratic majority in the district is over 2,000. Moreover, it is charged that the alleged conspiracy had its chief operation in Fayette County, whereas it is shown by the record that in this county contestant received and had returned for him majorities at five of the election precincts. These returns absolutely destroy all possibility that there was any conspiracy by showing that it did not exist in that portion of the county at least. There is, in our opinion, absolutely no foundation in fact for the claim of the contestant that a conspiracy existed, having for its object his defeat by fraudulent methods.

The attitude of the colored vote in the county of Fayette was a matter of dispute, the minority contending that it was hostile to contestant personally for remarks he had made about the race, while the majority cited the returns of adjoining precincts in the county to show that such a general cause evidently did not operate.

The majority and minority join issue in the various contested precincts of the county to determine whether or not the testimony rebuts or sustains the presumption of conspiracy which the majority alleged had been raised by the action of the sheriff.

In general the testimony relied on to show the alleged fraudulent acts of the election officers was of two classes:

(a) The ballot not being secret, at several polling places friends of contestant kept lists of names of persons voting for contestant. In some cases the persons keeping the lists handed the ballots to the voters and saw them deposited. In addition to this, testimony was produced to show that the election officers refused to permit witnesses to be present at the count in spite of the fact that the law made a provision to that effect. When, under these conditions, the return showed for contestant fewer votes than were shown by proof aliunde, the discrepancy being material, the majority ruled that no confidence should be placed in the return, and that it should be rejected. The minority combated this proposition by showing the bad character of those keeping the lists, some of them having a record as "ballot-box stuffers," and by impeaching the verity of the lists kept by them through witnesses who testified that they did not vote, although their names were on the lists. Evidence was also introduced to show the unpopularity of contestant among those naturally expected to support him. And also the minority rely on testimony as to the good character of the election officers.

In Mason district, in Tipton County, the watcher at the polls did not preserve the names of those voting for contestant, but simply a tally of the number of Republican votes he saw cast, which he submitted with his deposition. The minority thus assail this testimony:

> No list of names was kept by them or by any other persons at or near the polls, making them a part of the "res gestse," but one of the witnesses says he kept a "tally list"—that is, made a mark on a piece of paper as each man voted; but he gives no names of such voters, and none of the witnesses are able to swear that any single particular man did vote for Patterson.
> We submit that such a dangerous precedent has never yet been set by the House of Representatives, and should never be, as to accept such incompetent evidence to impeach returns of a precinct.

As to the charge that the election officers had refused to allow the counting to be witnessed, the minority minimized it by endeavoring to show that the demands were not made in a proper way and in good faith.

(b) In one precinct contestant took the testimony of intelligent voters as to how they voted, and proved 36 votes, although the official returns credited him with only 10 votes. Therefore the majority proposed that the returns be rejected. The minority strove to impeach this evidence by showing that it was collected by a notorious "ballot-box stuffer" who had previously tried to corrupt the officers of election, and also by showing that the witnesses might have been mistaken, since some Republican tickets used did not have contestant's name, while a person who claimed to distribute Republican tickets that day did actually distribute Democratic tickets.

Discussion as to the disposition of rival polls caused by a division among election officers.

Discussion of the theory that State election laws are Federal laws for Congressional elections, and that constructions by State courts must yield to the precedents of the House if there be conflict.

Discussion as to the validity of outside polls.

Discussion of the legality of a vote cast by an elector whose qualifications as to poll-tax payment have been perfected at the expense of other persons.

2. In three districts outside polls were instituted. These districts were Galloway and Oakland, in Fayette County, and Tabernacle, in Tipton County.

At Galloway the opening of the polls was delayed for two hours under pretense, as the majority find, of trying to find a Republican judge. The majority claim that then the judge in charge, Braden, publicly announced that there would be no election; whereupon, as the report says:

> Immediately after this public announcement, and before Braden had left, Squire L. E. Griffin announced publicly that if Braden did not hold an election he would.
> This was his right, under the laws of Tennessee, as we understand them, he being a justice present and vested with the power of holding the election if the officer appointed to this duty failed to attend, or, having come, refused to perform that duty.
> Griffin, in accordance with the law, called in three freeholders, appointed judges and clerks, swore them in, and then these persons legally opened and held the election, Braden and his appointees having refused to act and having left the polls, as already stated.
> After the poll was thus opened and a number of voters had registered their votes Braden returned and opened another poll, selecting two of the judges who had been appointed in the first instance and one other person, and also proceeded to hold an election.

The majority also find that Braden had openly declared before the election that he was going to count Patterson out. The majority recommended that the Griffin poll be counted and that the Braden poll be rejected, as held in violation of law, citing the case of McDuffie v. Davidson as a precedent. The committee justify this act because:

> Griffin swears positively that he stayed at the place where his election was being held until after the voting began and then went up the street, passing the place where the Braden election was held, and that when he passed no one was there and no election was then being held.
> It further appears from the testimony that the persons holding the Griffin election actually went into the room where Braden subsequently held his election and took out the table which they used at their polling place. No one was in the room when the table was so removed.
> We are fully satisfied from the evidence that Braden had refused to hold the election, and, from all his conduct and the attending circumstances, that he expected thereby to defeat the holding of any election after being checked in his plans to commit a fraud on the clear Republican majority in this precinct.
> We also find from the great preponderance of the evidence that the Griffin poll was opened and underway before Braden changed his mind and concluded to open his polling place.

The minority deny that contestant shows by preponderance of evidence that the sheriff did refuse to hold the election and abandoned the place, and cite testimony and circumstances to prove that the election held by Braden was the regular election.

At Oakland the supporters of contestant became apprehensive that they would be defrauded at the regular poll, and opened another box, holding an election whereat contestant received 154 votes, which were not counted by the sheriff, however. The majority feel satisfied from the testimony that the officers intended to commit fraud, and, in fact, find the integrity of the regular box impeached by the testimony and not sustained by testimony to repel the presumption of fraud. As to counting the votes cast at the outside poll, they say:

> It is true that there are cases in some of the States which hold that the purpose to commit a fraud on the part of the election officers in charge, however clearly evidenced, is not of itself sufficient to authorize electors who fear to cast their votes at such polling place, however reasonable that apprehension may be, to set up and hold another election.

No case, however, was cited from Tennessee, and in view of the very liberal provisions of the statutes of that State and the still more liberal interpretation placed upon those statutes by its courts in construing and overlooking irregularities in the interest of a fair and free expression of the popular will, there is room for doubt as to whether this poll might not be sustained.

But in judging "of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members" under the grant of the Constitution, this House exercises judicial power, and is a court of competent and exclusive jurisdiction.[1] In passing upon these returns and elections, even if no Federal statute is in existence regulating the elections of its Members, it interprets and construes the State election laws which, for the purposes of such election, are to be regarded as having the quality of Federal legislation, and the opinions of State judges are only to be adopted so far as they commend themselves by the intrinsic force of their reasoning; and where such decisions are in conflict with its own determinations, the precedents established by Congress are the expression of the law, and must control that court with the same force and effect that its own prior deliberate rulings guide and control any other court.

It has been decided in numerous cases by Congress that it is its privilege and its duty in the exercise of its constitutional right to pass upon the election and qualifications of its own Members, to award the seat in Congress to the candidate who is ascertained to be the choice of the majority of the legal voters of his district, even though slight technicalities are required, in doing so, to be overlooked and disregarded. This power may be regarded as implied in the constitutional grant, and to that extent and thereby State legislation, so far as it relates to and regulates the elections of Members of Congress, supplemented and modified by that Constitution as the supreme law of the land.

After quoting the case of McDuffie v. Turpin, the majority say:

As already stated, an adherence to strict technical rules would seem to necessitate the rejection of the returns received from this precinct. However, as this would involve for the contestee a greater loss than would follow the counting of both, and as the contestant in his brief expresses a willingness that both should be counted, while recommending that the precedent set by the case of McDuffie v. Turpin be followed and that the vote cast in the box held by the supporters of contestant be counted under the authority of that case, we also recommend that the vote cast in box No. 1 be counted, especially as contestant does not insist that it should be rejected.

We are entirely satisfied that the recommendations made in the case of McDuffie v. Turpin as to a strict performance of all legal requirements were followed in this case, and that all persons who voted for contestant at box No. 2 were legal and qualified voters. Counting both returns, the vote from this district would be: For contestant, 159; for contestee, 241.

The minority do not agree that the outside poll should be counted:

We are of the opinion that the poll opened by Griffin at the brick house where these votes were cast were the outside polls, and that the returns thereof can not be counted, and we are strengthened in this opinion by the fact that the contestant, in his notice of contest, seeks to have these 247 votes counted, because, he says, "they were legal voters and their votes ought not to be lost simply because they were badly advised as to which of the boxes they should vote at."

At Tabernacle there was a conflict of authority between the sheriff in charge and election officers appointed by the county court, and two boxes were opened. The sheriff counted both boxes. The minority considered the outside poll illegal, and the majority apparently consider the sheriff poll illegal. This precinct is not discussed at length, as it did not affect the result.

3. As to the poll-tax receipts. Sitting Member charged that a large number of votes were cast for contestant upon poll-tax receipts which had been paid for by contestant's political friends, and that the votes so cast were illegal. The majority found no sufficient ground in this respect to modify the conclusions already arrived at. They say:

We are of the opinion that when the voters accepted the poll-tax receipts for taxes paid by others for them, they ratified the payment so made for their benefit, and they thus constituted the parties so paying the taxes their agents in that behalf. Nor was it necessary that the voters should offer or bind themselves to repay such taxes to the person so paying them in order to constitute it a payment by the voter or a ratification thereof. The acceptance by the taxpayer of the receipt is in itself a sufficient adoption of the payment by another for him, and it makes no difference how or by whom the payment was made, the State's demand is fully satisfied by the payment and the delivery of the receipt to the voter, and his acceptance thereof is a final payment and appropriation.

Besides, according to a proper construction of the Tennessee statute, a voter who has any one of the evidences named in the statute that he paid his poll tax is entitled to cast his vote and have it counted upon exhibiting such statutory evidence, whether he paid his tax in person or some other person paid it for him, provided he adopts the act by availing himself of such receipt, even though such payment was by a political committee for the purpose of qualifying him to cast his vote.

After citing the case of Re Griffith (1 Kulp, Pa., 157) and Massey v. Wise, they say:

Nor is the mere furnishing and acceptance of such receipt a corrupt act or proof of bribery. It must appear that such payment of a tax by another than the voter and delivery to him of the receipt therefor was done as an inducement or consideration for the vote or for the purpose of influencing the choice of the voter. The evidence utterly fails to establish these elements, or even to identify any sufficient number of voters voting on such tax receipts to affect the result. Indeed, there is no adequate or competent proof that such voters for whom poll taxes were paid actually voted for contestant, or to what extent their votes were included in the returns.

The majority further cite the case of United States v. Foster (6 Fed. Rep., 248).

The minority fully recognize the doctrine "that one's poll tax may be legally paid by another, provided the voter shall properly ratify the act afterwards, but we do not think the mere taking of the receipt and voting on the same is such a ratification as the law contemplates. We think the better and sounder doctrine is that the voter should not only accept the receipt, but he should recognize the act the more substantial way, by repaying or promising to repay the amount." Humphrey v. Kingman (Mass., 5 Metcalf, 162) was cited in support of this contention.

The minority further say:

The evidence also discloses the further fact that a great many of these poll-tax receipts were issued in blank, and were delivered to the friends and agents of the contestant, who carried them to the polls on the day of the election and issued them out to those persons who would agree to vote the Republican ticket, and especially for the contestant.

That a great many of them were given out in this manner is sufficiently shown from the evidence. It also appears that at the time these poll-tax receipts were issued there was an agreement and understanding made with the officer issuing them, that all those not used could be returned and pay would only be exacted for such as were not returned; and many of them, in fact, were returned.

This practice does not meet with our approval. The laws of the State make the poll tax a charge and burden against the voter, and it is not a tax against a campaign committee or a certain candidate, and neither of them should be permitted to use them for the purpose of bribing voters.

It is held in 12 Phil., page 626 that where a poll tax is paid by an agent of another, not previously authorized to do so, credit must be given to the individual for whom payment is made by the collector at the time of receiving the money; otherwise there was no valid payment of the poll tax. No such credit was given in this case, nor was such a thing ever contended for. But, upon the contrary, the the proof shows that at least $150 of this poll-tax money was not paid until some eighteen days after the election. This being so, there can be no question but what 75 of these votes were illegal and, as the testimony shows, they were cast for the contestant. We think that this number should be deducted from his vote.

The majority say:

We are disposed to hold that unless the fact of such actual nonpayment was known to the voter, his acceptance of the receipt in good faith constituted his discharge as between him and the taxing authority and under the law the liability of the collector to account for the tax became fixed.

The voter thereupon became qualified to cast his vote upon exhibiting his receipt, and the acceptance thereof by the election officers was an adjudication of his right which could not be afterwards collaterally set aside, especially after he had lost his opportunity to perfect his right had it been questioned before casting the vote.

The report was debated fully on April 21 and 22, and on the latter day the question was taken on amending the resolutions of the majority by substituting resolutions proposed by the minority declaring setting Member elected and contestant not elected. There appeared yeas 138, nays 120, so the motion to amend was agreed to. The original resolutions as amended were then agreed to, yeas 136, nays 118. So the contention of the majority of the committee was overruled, and the title of sitting Member to the seat was confirmed.

1106. The New York election case of Fairchild v. Ward, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Although contestee's name may have been unlawfully placed on the ballot, yet in the absence of deception, the ballot might be used to express the honest and intelligent wish of the voter.

A decision by a State court after the election that contestant's name, which had appeared in the independent column, was entitled to place in the regular party column, was held not to affect the election, no deception of the voters having occurred.

On March 23, 1898,[1] Mr. Lemuel W. Royse, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted a report[2] in the New York case of Fairchild v. Ward. The facts in relation to the election and the ground of the contest are set forth in the report:

At the election held for Representative in Congress in this district on the 3d day of November, 1896, there were five candidates for the office, viz: William L. Ward, the regular Republican nominee; Eugene B. Travis, Democrat; James V. Lawrence, National Democrat; Lucien Sanial, Socialist; Ben L. L. Fairchild, Independent Republican.

The certified returns from this election show the following results:

	Votes.
For William L. Ward	30,709
For Eugene B. Travis	23,450
For James V. Lawrence	1,697
For Lucien Sanial	1,299
For Ben L. Fairchild	770

William L. Ward therefore received the certificate of election, by virtue of which he now holds a seat in this House.

[2] Minority reviews were filed by Mr. John W. Gaines, of Tennessee.

In due time, after the result of the election was declared, the contestant served upon the contestee his notice of contest, in which he charges that before the election he had been regularly nominated by the Republican party of the district as its candidate for Representative in Congress, and that therefore his name as such candidate should have been placed upon the official ballot in the Republican column; that the contestee, by tricks, devices, and abuse of the process of the courts, wrongfully and fraudulently procured his name to be placed upon the official ballot in the Republican column as a candidate for Representative in the Fifty-fifth Congress instead of contestant's name.

The contestee, in his answer to contestant's notice, denies all the charges contained therein, and asserts that he was the regular nominee of the Republican party, and that his name was rightfully placed upon the official ballot in the Republican column.

The law of New York, under which the election was held, is fashioned after the Australian system. It provides that the names of candidates nominated by a party organization shall appear upon the official ballot in a separate column and under a device chosen by said party. No other person's name can legally appear in such column. The voter, by making a cross in a circle at the head of this column, votes for all the candidates appearing in such column.

It appears that the Republican district convention of 1894, held for the purpose of nominating a candidate for Congress, appointed a committee to call the next Congressional convention. In the spring of 1896 this committee called a convention of the Republicans of the district to select delegates to the national convention. This latter convention, before adjourning, appointed a committee to call the next Congressional convention. So there were two committees charged with the duty of calling the Congressional convention of 1896. The result was two conventions, the first of which nominated sitting Member, while the second nominated contestant. Each candidate, complying with the law, filed with the secretary of state his nomination paper, and that official, after a hearing, decided in favor of the contestant. A State law allowed an appeal, and the report, after quoting the statute, says:

Under the provisions of this statute the contestee brought proceedings before Judge Edwards, a justice of the supreme court of the third judicial district, to review the decision of the secretary of state.

It will be observed that the act is silent as to who should be made parties to the proceeding for review. It does provide, however, that notice shall be served upon the officer whose decision is sought to be reviewed. No other notice seems to be required. It appeared in the first instance the secretary of state and the contestee were the only parties to the proceedings. The contestant, however, asked to intervene as a party. Over the objections of the contestee, Justice Edwards granted this request, and accordingly contestant was admitted as a party. Contestant thereupon moved to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction in Justice Edwards. This motion was overruled by Justice Edwards, and he proceeded to hear the review. At its conclusion he reversed the decision of the secretary of state and decided that the contestee was the regular nominee of the Republican party, and that his name as such should go upon the official ballot.

Contestant appealed from this decision to the appellate division of the supreme court of the third judicial department, and upon hearing of this appeal the decision of Justice Edwards was affirmed. Thereupon the secretary of state directed the printing of the name of the contestee upon the official ballot as the regular nominee of the Republican party. He also directed that the name of contestant be printed upon the ballot in a column by itself, in obedience to a petition filed with him by the contestant. The ballot was framed in accordance with these directions, and as so framed was voted at the election. After the election contestant perfected an appeal of the cause to the court of appeals of the State of New York. In January, 1897, the court of appeals reversed the decision of the supreme court and that of Justice Edwards.

The court of appeals held: First. That the proceedings to review the decision of the secretary of state should have been brought in the second judicial district, where the complainant resides and in which the district is located for which the nomination is made, and that therefore Justice Edwards had no jurisdiction to hear such review. This necessarily required a reversal of the decision of the supreme court and that of Justice Edwards. Ordinarily this would have ended the case, but the court said that it regarded the questions of sufficient importance to warrant it in going further and passing upon the merits of the case in order "to prevent other complications that may arise out of the existing state of affairs and prevent embarrassment in the future administration of the law."

On the consideration of this phase of the case the court held that Mr. Fairchild was the regular nominee of the Republican party, and that his name, therefore, should have appeared upon the official ballot in the column of that party.

In the debate considerable was said about an alleged unfair act of sitting Member's attorney in delaying the filing of the order in favor of his client to such an extent as to deprive the contestant of a decision on appeal before election day, but this delay was reduced to a few hours when analyzed by a member of the committee. The committee—and all the members of the committee signed the report except Mr. John W. Gaines, of Tennessee, who presented minority views—deny that the court of appeals could by its decision affect the election already held, and state that it did not go into the original merits of the controversy, but deferred to the action of the State convention in seating Fairchild delegates, the controversy having been carried into the primaries selecting delegates to that convention. The committee also dissents from the position of the court of appeals in holding that Justice Edwards did not have jurisdiction. The report says:

The question of jurisdiction does not appear to have been argued before the court of appeals, and it does not appear that the court's attention was called to the fact that Mr. Fairchild had voluntarily appeared as a party to the proceedings in the court below, nor does it appear from the transcript of the record in the court of appeals, which is before us, that contestant did appear voluntarily. We therefore think that Justice Edwards had jurisdiction over the proceedings to review and over all the parties thereto and possessed full power and authority to make the order issued by him. It must follow that the order so made was binding on the contestant, the contestee, and the secretary of state.

The ballot was printed in accordance with this adjudication, and was therefore valid; at least so long as the adjudication remained in force. It did remain in force until after the election was held and the result declared. It seems to us that any reversal of it afterwards could not affect the election. We are strongly impressed that the legislature which enacted the law under which this election was held intended that all controversies as to who was the regular nominee of a party should be settled before the day of election.

The committee, however, do not admit that these preliminary questions are necessary to the decision of the case, and they consider it unnecessary "to decide which one of these parties was entitled to have his name on the ballot under the Republican emblem," for—

There was no deception practiced upon the Republican electors in the district. There is no proof but that all that had been done with reference to the printing of the ballot was fully known to all of them. The mean of obtaining this information was ample and within their reach.

It must therefore be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that when they went into the polling places to vote they knew Mr. Ward's name was on the ballot as the regular nominee of the Republican party, and that if they voted the straight Republican ticket their votes would be counted for him. The evidence of several of these voters is in the record. They all say that, while they would have preferred to vote for Mr. Fairchild, yet they knew that Mr. Ward's name was on the ballot in the Republican column, that they supposed that the decision of Justice Edwards and the supreme court had settled that Mr. Ward was the regular nominee of the Republican party, and they voted for him accordingly.

If we were to assume that contestant was the regular nominee of his party, and that he had been deprived of the right to have his name go upon the official ballot in the Republican column by a decision that was void, because of the want of jurisdiction in the justice of the supreme court who made the same, still we do not believe that we would be authorized to count for him the votes cast for Mr. Ward; nor do we think we could declare the election void.

It must be borne in mind that the order of Justice Edwards, after it was affirmed by the supreme court, was obeyed by the secretary of state, and that Mr. Ward's name went upon the ballot in the Republican column at the direction of this official. Information of this action was generally circulated throughout the district prior to the election. On several occasions the contestant, both in public and private talks to the Republican voters in the district, advised them to vote the straight Republican ticket, as it was then framed, with Mr. Ward's name upon it as a candidate for Congress.

Although the placing of Mr. Ward's name on the ballot might have been an unlawful act, yet it did not follow that such a ballot could not be used to express the honest and intelligent wish of the voter. The case of People ex rel. Hirsch v. Wood et al. (148 N. Y., 142) is quoted in support of this view, wherein it was held—

That while the action of the county clerk in inserting in the local party column the names of candidates who had not been nominated and certified by that party was, under the election law as amended in 1895 (chap. 810, Laws of 1895), unauthorized and without right, it was a latent defect and did not disfranchise qualified and innocent voters who had used the official ballots so furnished them; and that, where the local party column had been duly crossed by voters to express their choice, the county board of canvassers should not be required to reject the ballots from the count for candidates so improperly included in that column.

The report was debated at length in the House on April 11, and on that day, by a rising vote of ayes 162, noes 30, the House decided that contestant was not elected; and, by a vote of ayes 138, noes 42, it was decided that sitting Member was elected and entitled to the seat.

1107. The New York election case of Ryan v. Brewster, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Specifications in contestant's notice of contest criticised as too general.

Contestant's case should be limited to the allegations of his notice of contest.

Instance wherein the Elections, Committee examined a contest on the merits, although the pleadings were too imperfect to support a decision for contestant.

As to the use of a voting machine in one city of a district.

On March 30, 1898,[1] Mr. James G. Maguire, of California, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of the committee in the New York case of Ryan v. Brewster:

Contestant and contestee were the Democratic and Republican nominees, respectively, for Representative in Congress from the Thirty-first Congressional district of the State of New York at the general election held on November 3, 1890.

According to the official returns, 44,600 votes were cast at the election for Member of Congress, of which contestant, Ryan, received 17,109 and contestee, Brewster, received 25,399, giving contestee an apparent plurality of 8,280 votes.

The only question, so far as the merits of the case was concerned, was as to the legality of the use of the Myers voting machine in the city of Rochester; but a considerable portion of the report is occupied by discussion of an incidental question relating to the notice of contest. The first two specifications of the reasons for contest were:

I. Because you were not the duly and legally elected Representative from said district to said Congress.

Il. Because I am the duly and legally elected Representative from said district to said Congress.

The report criticises the notices in this and other respects as follows:

The first and second allegations of the notice are too general to constitute specific statements of grounds of contest within the meaning of the United States statute requiring contestant to specifically state in his notice the grounds of contest; but in so far as testimony has been taken, without objection, concerning the number of votes cast for either of the parties, it will be considered.

All other issues made by the pleadings of the parties relate to the legality of the record of votes made by the Myers ballot machines, which it is alleged and admitted were used exclusively at all of the voting precincts in the city of Rochester as a substitute for tickets printed on paper.

There is no allegation in the notice of contest that contestant was deprived of any votes that were legally cast for him; nor that the exclusion of the votes alleged to have been unlawfully cast through the Myers ballot machines in the city of Rochester, and unlawfully counted, would, either alone or in connection with other facts, change the result of the election; nor that any of the electors of the city of Rochester, if they had been permitted to vote legally, would have cast their votes for contestant; nor that any elector of the city of Rochester, who would have voted for contestant or for any other person than contestee, sought to cast a legal ballot at such election, or to vote otherwise than through the Myers ballot machine.

It not only does not appear from the allegations of the notice of contest that contestee was, either directly or indirectly, guilty of any wrongful act in connection with the election in question, but it does not appear from such allegations that contestant was in any way injured or deprived of any votes; nor that contestee derived any advantage of any kind whatever by reason of all or any of the matters complained of.

In all contested election cases the notice of contest must show prima facie that the acts and conditions complained of were not only wrongful or unlawful, but that the elimination of the effects of the acts and conditions complained of would change the result of the election in question. In the absence of such prima facie showing, the notice of contest is insufficient to support a decision either that contestant was elected or that contestee was not elected.

The general rule is that a contestant's case is limited to the allegations of his notice of contest. While he may establish his case by proving less than he has alleged, he can not make a case by proving more than he has alleged. (McCrary on Elections, sec. 394; Paine on the Law of Elections, sec. 824.)

If, therefore, the evidence fails to establish either the first or the second allegation of contestant's notice-that is to say, either that contestant received a plurality of the votes actually cast, or that contestee did not receive a plurality of such votes—the contest should be dismissed because of the insufficiency of the remaining allegations (if conceded to be true) to constitute a cause of contest.

As to the merits of the case, the report points out that if all the votes cast in the city of Rochester should be held illegal, the sitting Member would still be elected by the votes of the remainder of the district. But it was in evidence that the law permitting the use of the voting machine, also provided paper ballots in case the electors should choose to use them. There had been a defect in the working of the machines, and there was a discrepancy of 1,696 votes between the total number of electors voting in the city of Rochester and the number recorded by the machine as voting for Representative in Congress, but there was no evidence to show that this discrepancy was caused by the failure of the machine. Had there been such evidence, the result of the election would not be changed by the discrepancy.

Therefore the committee concluded unanimously that sitting Member was entitled to his seat, and reported resolutions to that effect.

The case was not acted on by the House, sitting Member of course retaining the seat.

1108. The Virginia election case of Brown v. Swanson, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

A return should not be rejected because the signatures of the election judges, by their direction and in their presence, were made by the clerk.

A slight discrepancy between the poll list and the ballots found does not justify its rejection.

The fact that a voter displays his Australian ballot to an election officer, no improper purpose being shown, is not necessarily a violation of the law of secrecy.

A ballot should not be rejected because an official marker has failed to mark it properly.

On April 13, 1898,[1] Mr. Edgar D. Crumpacker, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted a report in the Virginia case of Brown v. Swanson. The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 551 votes, and contestant attacked this majority, alleging fraud and irregularities. The report of the committee in this case was signed by only four of the nine members, and there was a question as to its presentation. The paper representing the opposition view actually represented a majority of the committee, and was entitled "Views of the majority." This paper is summed in the following extract:

> After listening to exhaustive arguments in this case, four members of the committee have filed a report in which they recommend that contestant be given a majority of 372 votes. They also direct attention to 147 other votes which, in their opinion, might justly be counted for contestant, making his majority 519.
> The undersigned agree with the conclusions of the said report, except so far as they relate to the so-called excluded vote at Stokesland, Ringgold, and Design precincts, and the 147 votes aforesaid, which we do not think should be counted for contestant.
> After a careful examination of the cases and authorities cited by contestant and a rigid analysis of the evidence contained in the record relating to these three precincts, we are constrained to conclude that, while the law is correctly stated by contestant, the facts, as disclosed in the record, do not warrant the counting for contestant of the 495 excluded votes.

As the decision of the case turned on the excluded vote of the three precincts, Stokesland, Ringgold, and Design, it is evident that the actual majority of the committee were opposed to the contestant, although the committee as a whole agreed as to the law applicable to the three precincts, and also as to the law and facts in regard to the other precincts treated in Mr. Crumpacker's report.

1. As to the precincts wherein the whole committee agreed, the issues were determined by the Australian-ballot law of Virginia. Under that law no sample ballots were allowed, and the voter knew little of the form and arrangement of the ballot until he attempted to vote. At the election in question the ballot was printed in a single column without emblems or party lines, and contained the names of sixty-six candidates for various offices. The whole election machinery was controlled by sitting Member's party, but in making up the local boards of election judges they did not in this district generally disregard the provision of law allowing minority representation. In nearly every instance, however, the judge selected to assist illiterate voters was a member of sitting Member's party. Of the functions of this assisting judge the report says:

A voter who requires assistance in preparing his ballot is not permitted to select the judge he desires to assist him, but is bound to accept assistance from the judge selected by the board for that purpose. A large percentage of the voting population of Virginia is illiterate and the act of voting is surrounded with so many obstacles that all the illiterates require assistance in preparing their ballots. The judge selected to assist illiterates, as a rule, can perpetrate fraud with impunity, for the voter, by lack of education, is unable to know whether his ballot is marked so as to express his will or not. The only safeguard for the honesty of elections in this particular is the capacity and personal integrity of the assisting judge.

The instances of irregularities or fraud on which the committee reached a conclusion without differences fall under two heads:

(a) Returns improperly rejected by the board of canvassers and which should be counted. In Patrick County the board of canvassers rejected returns from three precincts which had given contestant an aggregate majority of 146.

At Court-House precinct two of the three judges were political supporters of sitting Member, one of the judges was not sworn, and this was the only irregularity. Counsel for sitting Member admitted that this return was improperly rejected.

At the second precinct the report concludes:

At Gates Store the return was in due form, but the signatures of the judges thereto were written by one of the clerks. The signatures were so written in the presence of and at the request of the judges. Two of the judges were Democrats and supporters of contestee and the other was a Republican and a supporter of contestant. There was no evidence that any fraud or irregularity occurred prejudicial to the interests of contestee, but the return was rejected on the sole ground that the signatures of the judges were written by the clerk. That was clearly an insufficient reason for rejecting the return. The rights of the innocent voters of the precinct should not suffer on account of such a slight irregularity, if it were an irregularity at all. The signature of each judge was written in his presence and at his request, and was, in the sense of the law, his own signature. An attorney in fact has no authority to sign the name of an election judge to official papers, it is true, for such signing would relieve the judge of some of the responsibilities of his trust, but in this case the signature was not by an attorney in fact, but by the judge himself, because it was made under the direction of his will. Each of the judges so signing the return could be prosecuted under the law for making a false return as fully as if he had written the signature with his own hand. The law requires the signature to be the act of the officer, but it does not prescribe the instrumentality he shall employ in making it.

Therefore the report concludes that contestant's majority in this precinct should be counted for him.

Of the third precinct the report says:

At Kings Store 177 ballots were found in the box and only 175 names appeared on the poll books, and for that reason the return was rejected. There was no other evidence of fraud or irregularity submitted, and two of the three judges were political friends and supporters of contestee. It was the duty of the election officers under the law to count the ballots without unfolding them as soon as the polls were closed, to ascertain whether the number of ballots was the same as the number of names on the poll books. If there were more ballots than names one of the officers should be blindfolded and draw the excess from the box. That seems not to have been done at this precinct. The board of county canvassers notified the election judges to appear during the canvass of the vote of the county and purge the poll in accordance with the law, but they declined to do so. There were only 170 votes cast for candidates for Congress, so the number of Congressional ballots was 5 less than the number of names on the poll books. However, that slight discrepancy, in the absence of other evidence impeaching the poll, would not be sufficient to warrant its rejection. The possibility of an omission on the part of the clerks to record all of the names, or the possibility of voting a double ballot through inadvertence, may account for the discrepancy consistently with honest conduct.

Moreover, the vote at the precinct was proven by evidence aliunde. One of the election judges who assisted in canvassing the ballots testified that contestant received 113 votes and contestee received 57 votes. The testimony was based upon an actual inspection and count of the ballots, and it stands in the record wholly uncontradicted. The conclusion of the undersigned members of the committee is that the majority of 146 for contestant at the three precincts in Patrick County should be counted for him.

At Ridgeway precinct, in Henry County, 55 boots improperly marked for President were rejected altogether on that account and were burned at the close of the canvass, but it was proved without dispute that 48 of them were correctly marked for contestant and 5 for contestee. The election law expressly declared that ballots correctly marked for one candidate should be counted for him, although improperly marked for candidates for other offices. The board of officers was composed of two Democrats and one Republican. But sitting Member insisted that the whole poll should be rejected because of alleged fraud in another respect:

The evidence shows that a number of voters, after having their ballots marked, ready to be deposited in the box, showed them to the Republican judge. That is the only evidence of fraud at that precinct appearing in the record. It was not shown that the voters so displayed their ballots for improper purposes. The judge who assisted illiterate voters was a Democrat, and there was some solicitude on the part of the voters about the manner in which their ballots were being prepared. The Virginia law provides for secret voting, but the secrecy is for the protection of the voter and is not compulsory as to him. There is nothing in the law prohibiting the voter from displaying his ballot to the election officers after it has been prepared, provided he does not do it for corrupt purposes.

The law provided that the voter should fold his ballot after marking it and hand it to the judge of election, but legal opinion had been given by sixteen reputable lawyers before election and scattered broadcast over the State to the effect that the law did not require the voter to fold his ballot until he had left the booth, and that before folding it he might expose it to any person near enough to see its contents, and that such exposure was a legal method for the detection of possible fraud. "There can be no doubt." says the report, "under the Virginia law, that it is not improper for a voter to show his ballot to the election officers when he does it for proper purposes." Therefore the report counts the ballots proven.

At Hurt's store Election Judge East, who assisted illiterate voters a portion of the day, testified that he ignorantly mismarked ballots, 14 for contestant and 1 for sitting Member. All these ballots were rejected. The report says:

It is manifest that those votes should be counted. There is no dispute upon the facts, and it is well settled that an elector can not lose his right to vote by the mistake of one of the election officers. If the voter himself made the mistake the ballot should not be counted, but where he depends upon an officer whose duty it is to assist him in the preparation of his ballot and the officer, through ignorance or design, fails to mark the ballot properly it should be counted. Contestant should be credited with 14 and contestee with 1 vote at that precinct.

Returns impeached by the testimony of the voters themselves, and by an unofficial tally, were rejected.

In proving votes aliunde the testimony of the voters themselves was preferred to an unofficial tally.

Where a marking judge refused assistance to voters, the House did not reject the returns, but added votes proven aluinde.

In an inconclusive case the committee agreed that voters shown by parol proof to be qualified and to have attempted to vote should have their votes counted as if cast.

At Dry Forks contestant was credited in the returns with only 46 votes. A tally was kept of the Republican vote and the tally keeper testified that 116 Republicans voted. The depositions of 98 witnesses who voted, and whose names were on the poll books, proved 98 votes for contestant. The election judges tried to prevent the tally being kept, and the evidence showed that the judge who assisted voters was a man of bad reputation. Therefore the report concludes that the returns are vitiated by palpable fraud and should be rejected. In counting the votes proved aliunde the report allows the 98 proved by the voters themselves, and does not accept the tally as a "main reliance."

In a similar manner, by the testimony of voters, the returns of Mount Airy were impeached, and it was further shown that the election officers, all of whom were of sitting Member's party, had whisky during the day; that at noon they adjourned and took the ballot box to another room out of view of the voters and kept it there an hour. There was also evidence to show that the marking judge marked ballots wrong, and one of the judges was heard to declare that they intended to count contestee in. Therefore the return was rejected.

At Dickinson, where contestant received 58 votes and 45 were rejected, while 147 were returned for sitting Member, it was shown that the marking judge declined to furnish voters the necessary assistance. As 95 voters testified that they voted for contestant the report adds 37 to contestant's vote, although they intimate that the returns might be rejected altogether. This is evidently the precinct somewhat inaccurately referred to in the views of the opposing members of the committee.

(2) The above decisions in themselves were not sufficient to overcome the majority of the sitting Member, and an issue of fact, rather than law, was joined as to the precincts of Stokesland, Ringgold, and Design, in Pittsylvania County. The report asserts that 494 legally qualified voters went to the polls in those precincts on election day and made diligent and persistent efforts to vote, but were unable to do so. The report thus states the facts and law:

The total registered vote at Stokesland was 888, of which 173 were white and 715 were colored. The vote polled was 326, contestant receiving 200, contestee 116, and 10 were not counted. It is the duty of county courts in Virginia to establish voting precincts, and after they are once established those courts, upon the petition of 15 voters of a precinct, are authorized to change the boundaries and create new precincts if the convenience of the people seems to demand it. In September, 1895, 32 voters of Stokesland petitioned the county court to divide that precinct and create a new one, on the ground that there were too many voters for one. The petition was continued from term to term, and finally refused in September, 1896.

The total registration at Ringgold was 470 white and 362 colored. There were 504 votes cast, contestant receiving 87 and contestee receiving 316, and 101 ballots were rejected. The registration books were purged about ten days before the election and 95 names were stricken off, leaving the number as above noted. The judges and clerks were all Democrats at that precinct. At Design there was a registered vote of 530, of which 164 were white and 366 were colored. The number polled was 332, distributed as follows: Contestant received 165, contestee 141, and 16 were rejected.

There were 526 who testified that they attempted to vote at those three precincts and failed, and the undersigned members of the committee carefully examined the testimony of each witness and disallowed a number because of their failure to show satisfactorily their right to vote or that they were refused the privilege of voting. All that there was any question about were eliminated from consideration, leaving 494 who proved that they were registered voters of the precincts and made due effort to vote and failed, and that they would have voted for contestant.

The purpose of elections is to register the will of a majority of the voters, and it is the duty of the officers of the law to afford every qualified voter a reasonable opportunity to exercise the important right of suffrage. If that opportunity is afforded and the voter fails to avail himself of it, or if by some fault of his own he violates some regulation in attempting to exercise the right and thereby loses his vote, he can have no just cause of complaint. But if conditions exist, for which the voter is not responsible, that operate to defeat the rights of a substantial number of electors to vote, so that it can not be said that the result at a particular poll reflects the will of a majority of the voters, it discredits the entire poll.

After quoting McCrary on this point, the report goes on to say that it would aggravate the wrong to exclude the poll, and that the excluded votes should be counted for the candidate who would have received them. The case of Thorp v. Epes was cited in support of this contention. The report also asserts that the election officers were proven to have resorted to methods the purpose and effect of which was to discriminate against contestant's party and favor the party supporting sitting Member, while if they had honestly cooperated to facilitate voting, all voters could have had an opportunity.

The report further discusses parol evidence as competent to prove registration. Quoting McCrary and Thorp v. Epes, it says further:

Registration is designed to prevent fraud and to determine disputed questions that might otherwise arise at elections in advance, so as to avoid confusion and delay. Election boards do not have the time nor opportunity on election day to investigate critically questions that may arise respecting the qualifications of voters, and for the purposes of election the registration books are primary evidence; but when questions arise, as they do here, before a tribunal fully equipped to investigate for the truth, the qualifications, including the registration of voters, may be proved by parol.

Registration does not create the right to vote, but it is an official memorandum of an existing right, and parol evidence is as near the fact as the books. In fact, the books are made from parol evidence, and they are never regarded as more than prima facie evidence of the right to vote. In most of the States laws exist requiring a record to be made of marriages, but the record does not constitute the marriage; it is only an official memorandum of it; and in all the States marriage may be proven by parol evidence notwithstanding the record. A very liberal policy has always been followed in election cases respecting the admissibility of evidence. McCrary, in his work on elections, at section 467, says:

"It is undoubtedly the policy of the law not to throw too many obstacles in the way of investigating the correctness and bona fides of election returns. On this point the court in Reed v. Kneass very justly observe:

" 'The true policy to maintain and perpetuate the vote by ballot is found in jealously guarding its purity, in placing no fine-drawn metaphysical obstructions in the way of testing election returns charged as false and fraudulent, and in assuring to the people by a jealous, vigilant, and determined investigation of election frauds that there is a saving spirit in the public tribunals charged with such investigations, ready to do them justice if their suffrages have been tampered with by fraud or misapprehended through error.[3]

"It is in the spirit of this rule that questions respecting evidence in contested election cases should be solved."

In the recent case of Thorp v. Epes this House decided that parol evidence is admissible to prove registration, and that decision is in harmony with the best expression of writers and courts on the subject.

Under the long-settled practice of the House there is no doubt that the 494 votes excluded at the three precincts in Pittsylvania, County should be counted for contestant.

This report was never discussed in the House. On January 9, 1899, when it was called up, the House declined to consider it, yeas 79, nays 143. Again on February 23, when it was called up a second time, the House refused to consider, yeas 101, nays 133.

The sitting Member therefore retained the seat.

1110. The Louisiana election cases of Gazin and Romain v. Xeyer, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The fact that votes proven to have been cast by testimony of the voters do not appear in the count does not vitiate an election when not numerous enough to affect the result appreciably.

A question as to whether a candidate nominated by nomination papers may suggest the names of election officers under a law giving that function to the "nominating body."

The mere delay in the appointment of election officers does not vitiate an election held by them.

An election is not vitiated by unavoidable delay beyond the legal limit in arranging voting districts.

The premature opening of official ballots and failure to post cards of instruction at the polls do not vitiate an election held properly in other respects.

On June 6,1898,[1] Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of the committee in the Louisiana case of Gazin v. Meyer, from the First Congressional district. The report gives the conditions of the election as follows:

The election law of the State of Louisiana, under which the Congressional election in 1896 was held, is patterned after what is known as the Australian system. Upon the official ballot used on that occasion there appeared the names of four Congressional candidates, viz: Joseph Gazin, People's Party; A. E. Livaudais, Republican; Adolph Meyer, Democrat; Armand G. Romain, Independent Republican.

From the returns, as certified, it appears that the said candidates received, respectively, the following votes, viz:

Gazin	113
Livaudais	401
Meyer	10,776
Romain	4,022
Scattering	6

Adolph Meyer, having received a large majority of all t.ie votes cast, was returned as elected, and by virtue of such return now holds a seat in this House.

[1] Second session Fifty-fifth Congress, House Report No. 1520; Rowell's Digest, p. 564; Journal, p. 608.

Mr. Gazin in due time served notice of contest, relying upon the following grounds:

First. That the votes cast for me at various precincts in the city of New Orleans were not counted and returned by the commissioners of election as cast.

Second. That the commissioners of election, in violation of their oath of office, counted votes in your favor that were cast for me.

In support of the first proposition the contestant produced 31 witnesses who testified that they voted for him or attempted to do so, in various parts of the city. In some cases the votes of these witnesses appear to have been counted. But the committee found that 15 witnesses in various parts of the city testified that they voted for contestant, while the returns from the several precincts fail to show any votes counted for him. There is evidence that in some of these precincts votes were thrown out because improperly marked, but it was generally impossible to say whether any of the ballots so thrown out were those in which the voter had attempted or intended to vote for the contestant. In one precinct three or four ballots bearing contestant's name were thrown out because other names on the ballots were improperly marked; but the committee think this was the result of an honest mistake.

The committee conclude that contestant did not show over 20 votes cast or attempted to be cast for him, which were not counted for him.

The second proposition of the notice was found entirely unsupported by evidence. Therefore the committee recommended resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat, and these were agreed to without debate or division.

Also on June 6, 1898,[1] Mr. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, presented the report of the committee in the case of Romain v. Meyer, from the same district and relating to the same election. The contestant's notice contained several specifications, which the committee consider at length:

(1) Contestant claimed that he was not personally permitted representation at the polls in the parish of Orleans, on the board of commissioners appointed to preside over the election at each polling precinct, in accordance with this provision of State law:

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, etc., That in the parish of Orleans it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors, at least thirty days prior to any election, to appoint six commissioners and two clerks to preside over the election at each polling precinct. Said commissioners shall be qualified voters in the ward of which such polling precinct forms a part, and shall be appointed from lists to contain not less than six names, furnished by each of the several political parties and nominating bodies. The commissioners shall be so apportioned as to equally represent all of the political parties or nominating bodies authorized under this act to make nominations, in so far as practicable.

The committee therefore consider whether Mr. Romain was the candidate of a political party or nominating body. The State law as to nominations provided:

SEC. 48. Any convention of delegates and any nominating body, and any caucus or meeting of qualified voters as hereinafter defined, and individual voters to the number and in the manner herein specified, may nominate candidates for public office, whose names shall be placed upon the ballots to be furnished as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 49. Any convention of delegates representing a political party or other nominating body which at the general election next preceding the holding of such convention polled at least 10 per cent of the entire vote cast in the election district for which said convention is held, or any convention of delegates who have been selected in caucuses called and held in accordance with the provisions of this act, and any caucus so called and held in any such electoral district or division, may, for the State, or for the district or division for which the convention or caucus is held, as the case may be, by causing a certificate of nomination to be duly fled, making therein one such nomination for each office to be filled at the election. Every such certificate of nomination shall state such facts as may be hereinafter required for its acceptance, shall be signed by the presiding officer and by the secretary of the convention or caucus, who shall add thereto their places of residence, and shall add thereto their affidavit that the affiants were such officers and that said certificate is true to the best of their knowledge and belief.

SEC. 50. Nominations of candidates for electoral districts of the State, or for municipal or for parish or ward offices, may be made by nomination papers, signed for each candidate by qualified voters of such district or division, to the number of at least one thousand for any officers to be voted for by the electors of the State at large; one hundred for parish or municipal officers, members of the legislature or Congress, and twenty-five for ward officers.

The committee found that Mr. Livaudais was nominated at the convention of the Republican party, and that Mr. Romain was nominated by individuals who signed nomination papers as an "Independent Republican," a designation not belonging to a party that had polled the 10 per cent vote required by the law to give it convention standing. The committee therefore conclude:

The "nominating body," if it may be so called, which placed Mr. Romain in nomination, did not submit any list of names whatever nor claim representation in the appointment of election commissioners, nor did said body authorize Mr. Romain to submit any list on its behalf.

Furthermore, it will be noted that the list submitted by Mr. Romain was of citizens of "Republican faith" and to be selected as "Republican commissioners." Mr. Livaudais was at that time the candidate of the Republican party. Mr. Romain had no authority to represent it in any way, having been nominated as an Independent Republican in opposition to Mr. Livaudais, the regular Republican candidate. It is true that after the submission of this list by Mr. Romain, and before the selection of the election commissioners, Mr. Livaudais had practically retired from the field as a candidate, although he does not seem to have officially withdrawn, as provided by the election statute in section 57, otherwise his name would not have been printed on the official ballot, but that fact did not, and could not, change the status of Mr. Romain's claim to representation. As already stated, the act did not confer the right of representation upon each candidate, but only upon "each of the several political parties and nominating bodies." Candidates for other offices were as much interested in the election and in the selection of election officers as were the candidates for Congress.

Thomas A. Cage, as chairman of the executive committee of the Republican party, submitted to the board of supervisors a list of names as required by section 12. After the practical withdrawal of Mr. Livaudais the real contest was whether the executive committee or the candidate nominated by the Independent Republicans, but to whom the regularly nominated Republican candidate had given way, should be considered as representing the Republican party. The board of supervisors made their selections of Republican commissioners from the list submitted by Mr. Cage, and not from the list submitted by Mr. Romain. Your committee is unable to find that Mr. Romain was personally entitled to submit lists of commissioners, or that the board of supervisors committed any fraudulent or illegal act in recognizing the executive committee as the proper representative of the Republican party for the purpose of submitting such lists.

(2) The second objection considered by the committee is set forth in the report as follows:

It is further objected by contestant that some of these election commissioners were not selected as long as thirty days prior to the election, as required by the statute. The evidence shows that most of them were so appointed. But it is true that, owing to some omissions in Mr. Cage's original list, a supplemental list had to be furnished, causing some little delay, and a comparatively small number of the commissioners were appointed within thirty days of the election. Delay in appointing commissioners or inspectors does not vitiate an election held by them; otherwise it would be in the power of the board of supervisors to defeat every election by delaying such appointments. "Mandamus will lie to compel the appointment after the time designated, which appointments, when made, will be as valid as if made at the proper time." (McCreary on Elections, 253.) There is no evidence that the delay in the appointment of the inspectors was the result of any fraudulent intent or purpose, nor that contestant was injured thereby.

(3) The Louisiana law of July 9, 1896, in its fortieth section provided for redistricting the city of New Orleans into a larger number of precincts through the agency of the city government, and further provided that "the boundaries and precincts to be fixed as above [are] not to be changed within three months prior to any general election." This statute of July 9 was promulgated July 25, 1896, and became operative twenty days thereafter. The time required for the arrangement of the precincts was so great that it was not fully accomplished until about one month prior to the election of 1896. Contestant's counsel contended that this delay was in violation of the statute and must be presumed to have been done with fraudulent intent. The report notes that no such charge was made in the notice of contest, and that the objection was not well taken in any event. The committee note that the purposes of the statute were good, as the multiplication of precincts was an important means of securing freedom of elections and providing against fraud. The new law, says the committee—

Repealed "all laws or parts of laws contrary to or in conflict with this act." If the city had not been redistricted it might well be held that the election of 1896 had been held in violation of the requirements of the statute.

Some inconvenience was doubtless caused by the redistricting of all the wards in the city and the multiplication of election precincts, and a few voters may have failed to deposit their ballots on that account. There is no evidence, however, from which we can determine the number, nor is there any evidence that in this regard the supporters of the contestant fared worse than those of the contestee, or that the result would have been in any way changed had every vote been cast.

(4) The contestant claimed that when the official ballots were sent out some of them were not sealed as the law directed, and also that many packages were delivered to the election officers before the day of election, although the law provided—

That the board of supervisors shall "send to the commissioners of each voting place, before the opening of the polls on the day of the election, cards of instruction, tally sheets, blank forms, and one set of ballots, sealed and marked by the secretary of state, for such voting place.

Objection was also made that in some voting places the cards of instruction were not posted as required. The committee found no substantial foundation for the charge that ballots were sent out unsealed. As to the other two charges, they say that in the absence of any evidence that votes were lost to contestant or the election in any way affected by the sending out of ballots earlier than the morning of election and the neglect to post the cards, these informalities could not tend to establish the election of Mr. Romain or invalidate the election. It was proven that one official ballot was passed about before election, contrary to law, but the report says:

Section 42 of the statute, read in connection with section 44, makes it an offense punishable by fine or imprisonment for any person charged with the duty of compiling, making up, or printing the official ballot to permit any person not so engaged to have access to or give any information with regard to the said official ballot or the form thereof, except as provided in the act. In the absence of evidence that any official ballot, fraudulently or otherwise obtained prior to the day of election, was voted or attempted to be voted, it can not be held that the existence of such outstanding ballots in any way affected the result of the election.

(5) Under the law of Louisiana one registration, for which the person registered receives a certificate, is good as long as the voter remains in the precinct. When he removes or dies there is no surrender of the certificate, although the registration lists are from time to time purged. As a result, upward of 14,000 names were stricken from the poll list of New Orleans, leaving that number of certificates outstanding. Contestant claimed that about 7,000 votes should be deducted from sitting Member's plurality on account of fraudulent voting on such outstanding certificates. The committee, however, found no evidence to support this contention, and deemed the charge improbable. A few other charges of fraud were likewise found wanting in proof.

The committee point out that the white population is largely predominant numerically in the district, that sitting Member's party was united, while contestant's was divided, and conclude to report resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

These resolutions were agreed to, without debate or division.

1111. The Virginia election case of Wise v. Young, in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

A general scheme to defraud being shown in all the precincts of a city, the entire return from the city was rejected.

Where election officers returned 12 votes for contestant and 17 electors swore they voted for him, the House rejected the entire return.

Instance wherein depositions given by voters at the time of voting were admitted in proof aliunde.

On February 1, 1900,[1] Mr. Edgar Weeks, of Michigan, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, presented the report of the majority[2] in the Virginia case of Wise v. Young. The returns are thus described in the minority views:

> The certificate of the secretary of the Commonwealth of Virginia shows that at the election held in November, 1898, for Representative in Congress, Contestant Wise received 6,204 votes, and Contestee Young received 12,183 votes, and W. S. Holland received 3,445 votes. Young was the nominee of the Democratic party in that district, and both Wise and Holland were Republicans, each claiming to be the regular nominee of the Republican party in the district.

This case divides itself naturally into two branches—one concerning the city of Norfolk and other relating to other portions of the district.

(a) As to the city of Norfolk, the majority reported in favor of casting out the entire vote, considering that frauds proven fatally impeached the returns of all the eleven precincts. The report, after calling attention to what is alleged to be an abnormal vote for contestee, says in regard to the frauds:

> The similarity of method with which it was put into effect in every precinct in Norfolk shows planning, forethought, and deliberation. It was in brief thus: To accept all votes offered, to make return of few defective ballots, and to add to the list of actual voters on the poll books of the several precincts enough names of fictitious voters to enable the judges to return for the contestee a false vote so large that the majority returned for him could not be overcome.
> If this scheme had been worked adroitly it might have rendered the fraud practiced difficult of detection. The party thus defrauded does not complete his task by producing proof of the vote actually cast for him; the burden is still upon him to show that the vote returned for his adversary is false. Where the fictitious names copied from the registration list onto the poll book are those of his political adversaries whom he can not approach, his difficulty in getting at the proof that they did not vote is great. But the friends of the contestee practiced the fraud so bunglingly in Norfolk that their own work convicts them. It has neither the merit of novelty nor clever execution. The contestee admits, touching two precincts of the Fifth Ward of Norfolk, from which nearly 1,000 of his 3,600 votes from Norfolk were returned, that the returns are unworthy of belief. The admission was unnecessary, for contestant proved it. He kept tally of the votes cast and proved that the returns made were absurdly large. He then proved who were the last voters at these precincts, and that being proved, the poll books show that these sworn officers, both before and after the voting ceased, added hundreds of fictitious names to those of genuine voters on the list and returned them as cast for the contestee.

The Democratic registrars were summoned for many precincts, and admitted that many of the names appearing on the poll books were not even upon the registration lists. Many persons appearing in those poll lists, some of them Democrats, came forward and testified that they had not voted. The names thus fraudulently placed on the poll lists were so inartificially made up that they are evidence of crime. They show numbers of persons whose names begin with A voting together, followed by numbers whose names begin with B and C, and so on throughout the alphabet. Dead men were voted, and men known to be absent in the service of the United States. Prominent citizens, about whom the judges could pretend no ignorance, were written down on these lists as having voted. Where the frauds permeated every precinct, and the evidence leaves no doubt of conspiracy, and the returns are absurdly large, and poll books forged, it seems idle to go into the details of these returns from Norfolk, precinct by precinct. Suffice it to say that we dismiss the returns from Norfolk as evidence of nothing but an organized effort to return a fraudulent vote for contestee.

In the course of his impeachment of the returns in Norfolk the contestant proved 437 votes to which he is entitled.

The minority, while admitting that the returns of two precincts which credited to sitting Member over 900 votes, should be entirely thrown out because evidently corrupted, contended that the extent of fraud shown in the other wards was not sufficient to cause the rejection of the entire returns. Their position as to the Sixth Ward is illustrative of their argument:

Sixth Ward.—Three hundred and eighteen votes were cast at this box, 22 being illegal ballots. We still believe that it would be fair and just both to the candidates and to the people that these 22 illegal ballots should be deducted from contestee's vote, it being more than probable they were cast for him, rather than to exclude the entire box. This being done would leave Young 225 votes and Wise 45 votes.

(b) As to the portions of the district outside the city of Norfolk, the principle on which the majority proceeded is illustrated by their decision in regard to the precinct of Longview, in Isle of Wight County:

The proofs from Longview present succinctly a point raised by the contestee, involving a principle which this committee must settle for its guidance.

It is admitted that the returns showed 99 votes cast, and that 4 were rejected, 12 returned for Wise, 60 for Young, and 23 for Holland. Contestant put upon the stand in due form 17 witnesses who swore they voted for him at Longview (pp. 66 and 72), and proved and filed the certificate of another voter (p. 66) and by another witness (p. 67), the father of an absentee, proved his son, who was then absent engaged in the business of oystering, voted for contestant.

We have concluded not to consider the evidence of two other voters at this precinct taken after contestant's forty days expired. To make the issue more pointed, we will confine it to the 17 voters at this precinct examined within the forty days. We consider every one of these votes well proved for contestant, and while certificates of the character of the one produced are admissible beyond question as proof of votes cast, let us ignore it also for the purpose of decision. If contestant received 17 of the 99 votes, the return is plainly false as to him. It is also demonstrably false as to 83 votes returned for Young and Holland, for only 82 votes were in the box. Can the return stand? Is it any more possible to hold that a return stating that 82 men could cast 83 votes shall stand than it would be if a smaller number of men were returned as having cast that many? If the return is impossible can it be reconciled at all because it is nearly possible?

Therefore the majority proposed to reject the vote of Longview and leave to contestant the vote proven aliunde.

The minority say:

The contestant took the testimony of 17 witnesses who swore they voted for him. This gave him an excess of 5 over the returns. All 17 of these gave their depositions with their marks. They could not read, yet 6 of them, William Sheppard (p. 67), Wm. Newby (p. 68), John Kines (p. 69), Wm. Kelly (p. 70), Jos. A. Graves (p. 70), and Walter Glover (p. 71) prepared their own ballots. The ballots rejected because improperly prepared were 4, leaving an excess of 1 vote, claimed to have been proved over the returns, for contestant. Instead of rejecting the vote in this precinct it should stand, Young 60 as returned, Wise 12 as returned; Young lost in correction 1, Wise gained in correction 1—Young's true vote 59, Wise's true vote 13.

The majority contended that the certificates (papers "given by voters who came out of the polling booth, went to some partisan on the outside, and took an oath that they voted for Wise," in the language of a Member[1] who argued for the minority) were admissible in evidence; and they appear numerously in the proofs adduced to impeach the returns of various precincts. The minority argued that they were inadmissible to contradict the regular returns, and made the point that those giving them were not examined as witnesses.

The minority conceded that the returns of certain precincts were unworthy of credence. Thus, in Stonehouse, in James City County, the returns gave contestant but 29 votes, while he proved 86. No objection was made to rejecting the returns and giving contestant the vote he proved. In other precincts the majority and minority were at variance. Thus, of Suffolk, Nansemond County, the majority say:

At this precinct the poll book shows that 451 votes were cast, yet but 405 are returned. This is no return at all. Such a return is of itself a badge of fraud where but one office is voted for. Ten per cent of the vote cast is simply ignored.

Contestant proved 130 votes cast for him at this precinct. Contestee made no effort to account for the discrepancy of 46 votes cast or to show why the return was silent concerning them. He only examined two or three witnesses concerning the general good character of the judges. The committee think such a return worthless and allows contestant the vote he proved there.

While the minority say:

Contestant has examined 130 witnesses who say they voted for him. One hundred and fourteen votes were returned for him. There were, however, 106 ballots rejected as imperfectly marked. This large number of defective ballots was accounted for by the large number of ignorant voters who undertook to prepare their own ballots. This vote as returned, in our opinion, should stand: Young, 208; Wise, 114.

Thus, running through the district, the majority proposed the rejection of returns showing such discrepancies, while the minority contended for a correction merely.

The minority by their process reduced the majority of Young over Wise from the 5,979 given by the official returns to 3,735, if certificates were to be disregarded, or to 2,954, if certificates were to be accepted as valid proof. They contended that even admitting the majority's rejection of Norfolk city entire the sitting Member would yet have 897 majority over contestant.

The majority, rejecting the returns entirely where they found the returns tainted fatally, in their opinion, and treating the certificates as valid in contestant's proof aliunde, found that contestant had a plurality of 2,434 over sitting Member in the district, and reported resolutions giving him the seat.

The report was fully debated on March 8, 10, and 12, 1900, and on the latter day a resolution of the minority declaring sitting Member duly elected was rejected when moved as a substitute—yeas 128, nays 132. Then a resolution declaring sitting Member not elected was agreed to—yeas 132, nays 127. A second resolution declaring contestant elected was then agreed to—yeas 131, nays 125. Mr. Wise then appeared and took the oath.

1112. The North Carolina election ease of Pearson v. Crawford, in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The arrest of a witness for contestant on charge of perjury in testifying as to a precinct of a city does not justify, on the plea of intimidation, the rejection of the entire vote of the city.

In a report barely sustained by the House it was held that the making of a registration in disregard of the terms of law justified rejection of the returns.

Where the law requiring the ballot box to be empty at the beginning of the election was disregarded the House rejected the returns.

As to effect on the return of participation by an illegally appointed election officer.

On February 5, 1900,[1] Mr. Ernest W. Roberts, of Massachusetts, from Elections Committee No. 3, submitted the report of the majority of the committee[2] in the case of Pearson v. Crawford, of North Carolina. The official returns, after the correction of certain obvious errors, showed a plurality of 218 votes for the sitting Member. The contestant attacked this plurality on the ground of organized intimidation, fraud, forgery, and bribery. The majority of the committee intimate that, were there not more specific grounds, the House might be justified in declaring the seat vacant because of intimidation, mob violence, and the circulation of forged letters injurious to the contestant's cause. The minority strenuously denied the general charges, and the case may be said to turn entirely on specific rather than general conditions.

The majority, in their report, proposed to reject the entire vote of the city of Asheville, which gave sitting Member a plurality of 163 votes; but when the case was taken up the announcement was made that this portion of the report might be considered as withdrawn. The reasons for throwing out Asheville arose from the arrest for perjury, at the instigation of attorney for contestee, of a witness named Harrison, who had testified as to an alleged attempt at bribery on the part of the said attorney in one precinct of the city. The majority conceived that this arrest was made to intimidate other witnesses who had been summoned, and, on the strength of the precedent in the case of Featherstone v. Cate, decided that the vote of the entire city should be thrown out. They say that in the case of Featherstone v. Cate there was nothing to show that other witnesses were to be examined on the same point, and conclude:

> This shows that the case now under consideration is much stronger for the contestant, as it appears from the statement of the notary that other witnesses to prove the same allegation were not only under subpoena but were personally present when contestant's first witness was arrested, and that these other witnesses, when called next morning, failed to appear, and the inference is irresistible that these men had been intimidated by the arrest and incarceration of the first witness. It is also worthy of note in this case of Featherstone v. Cate that the majority report rejecting the entire vote of Independence Township—and on this point the whole case turned—was supported by many distinguished Representatives who are still members of this body.

The minority criticised this proposition as follows:

> The testimony of Harrison charges Murphy with an indictable offense, and, if Murphy is to be believed, he had a right to have Harrison arrested, as he was guilty of a felony, and no just inference could be drawn that the purpose was to intimidate witnesses. Witnesses who testify in contested election cases do so under regulations of law, as in other cases, and men who rely upon the testimony of such witnesses have no right to have them protected in the violation of law. It does not appear that a single witness whose name was called, or any other witness, was absent on account of the arrest of Harrison, or that any effort was subsequently made to examine them or anyone else in Buncombe County or the city of Asheville.
> The facts do not put this case even in the neighborhood of Featherstone v. Cate. In that case the returns were impeached, and the contestant was proving the votes cast, and the witness (Powell) was arrested on the charge of perjury by attorney of contestee after swearing that he saw 92 ballots cast for contestant; and the attorney threatened to arrest all other witnesses he thought were swearing falsely. Contestant in that case proved by a number of witnesses that the threats deterred other witnesses from testifying, and the committee held in that case that strict and technical proof is not required where testimony has been suppressed, and the evidence of Powell was sufficient to establish the number of votes received. He was not contradicted by the attorney and no votes were proven for contestee.
> In the Featherstone case the committee applied the rule as to Powell's testimony to only one voting precinct, but in the pending case the majority of the committee reject not only the precinct No. 2, about which all those witnesses were to testify, but reject eight other precincts about which there can be no contention. We submit that this is the most sweeping and monstrous proposition ever submitted to the House of Representatives.

The debate indicates that the abandonment of the majority's contention in regard to Asheville was occasioned by a strong sentiment in the House against it.

One of the main issues of the case was joined over the precincts of Montezuma, South Waynesville, and Marble, where the majority held that the entire vote should be rejected because of defective registration. The report cites the statute of the State:

> The language of the North Carolina statute on this point is as follows (sec. 8):
> "Provided, That no registration shall be had except at the times and places hereinafter provided."
> And in section 9:
> "And such registrars shall also, between the hours of 9 o'clock a. m. and 4 o'clock p. m., for four consecutive Saturdays, and between the hours of 9 a. m. and 12 o'clock m. on the second Saturday preceding the election, at the voting place of said precinct, keep open said book for the registration of any electors residing in such precinct, etc."

The majority contend that this statute is mandatory, and that, as the registration in the precincts named was held at places other than the voting places, the vote should be rejected in each. In support of this contention the committee say:

It appears from the case of Eaves and Lambert v. Southern and Kerley, a contested election case in the general assembly of North Carolina, at the session of 1899, that that body construed the election law in force in North Carolina in 1898, and decided that the regulations as to time and place of registration were mandatory provisions; and for a violation of these provisions in this respect that body unseated two Republican senators and awarded the seats to two Democrats. Contestee says in his brief (p. 47):

"It will appear, by reference to the citation made by contestant from the minority report, submitted by Mr. Campbell, that the question passed upon was the effect of registration on days other than the Saturdays prescribed by law."

In the oral argument before this committee contestee's counsel admitted that the law of North Carolina was equally mandatory both as to time and place of registration; so that, if we admit contestee's demand that Montezuma be rejected on the ground that a mandatory provision of the statute was violated, we must reject both South Waynesville and Marble on the same ground.

The case of Quinn v. Lattimore (120 N. C., 426), which contestee cites in his brief, is not applicable to the law under which this election was held, for the reason that the election law construed in Quinn v. Lattimore was repealed by the act of 1895; and the only construction of this last act which we have been able to ascertain is the construction given by the legislature in 1899, in the case of Eaves and Lambert v. Souther and Kerley, declaring in effect that the provisions in respect of time and place of registration are mandatory. This interpretation made by the general assembly of North Carolina in the case above cited is in accord with a long and unbroken line of decisions in the national House of Representatives enunciating the same rule of construction. (Covode v. Foster, 2 Bart., p. 602; Coffroth v. Koontz, idem, p. 32.)

The minority views challenge the accuracy of the precedent of the North Carolina legislature, as cited by the majority, and say:

The report submitted by the majority erroneously states that the contestee's counsel admitted on the oral argument before the committee that the law heretofore quoted is "mandatory as to time and place." We positively deny that counsel made any such admission. On the contrary, the burden of their argument was to the effect that the statute is directory. They did admit that the same rule of construction would apply to time and place, repeatedly declaring that these statutory regulations are directory. In any view, the House will judicially determine for itself the proper construction of this statute.

The contention of the majority as to contestee's demanding that Montezuma precinct should be thrown out, on the ground that the statute is mandatory, is, to say the least, absurd. No such demand is made. The contestee simply set up a charge against this precinct in the nature of a counterclaim or set-off and only in the event that the charges against South Waynesville and Marble should first be sustained does he claim that any vote should be thrown out. This the majority do not seem to appreciate, from a legal standpoint, but is permissible under the statute.

The only warrant for rejecting South Waynesville on account of the irregular registration is the suggestion in the legislative minority report above cited. There is not even a hint that the precinct should be thrown out and innocent, legally qualified voters disfranchised, but only rejects the individual votes of those who were not registered on the days prescribed by law, and the burden was on the contestant to prove the illegal votes. Contestant has not put himself in a position to derive any benefit from the doctrine laid down in this purported report. Both of the registrars at South Waynesville precinct were on the stand, and were not, as it appears from the testimony, asked to produce the registration book and point out the names of those who were registered away from the polling place.

While the doctrine which may be inferred from the meager and unauthenticated statement of Mr. Campbell does not in the least support the recommendation of the majority to reject the entire precincts of South Waynesville and Marble, yet we do not approve the doctrine that even individual ballots should be rejected, after being cast, on the ground of inequalities in registration when the voters are otherwise qualified.

The minority cite, in support of their contention, these cases: Newsom v. Earnheart (86 N. C., 391), Quinn v. Lattimore (120 N. C.), People v. Wilson (62 N. Y., 186), State v. Wood (38 Wisconsin), and the cases of Smith v. Jackson and Foster v. Cavocle in the House of Representatives.

The majority of the committee furthermore attack the returns of South Waynesboro and Marble on other grounds. Evidence tended to show that the ballot box at Marble was stuffed, although the minority denied the effect of this testimony, pointing out that it did not apply to the Congressional box. As to South Waynesboro, a question arose over the findings of old ballots in the box after the election began, although the State law required the judges, before the opening of the polls, to examine the ballot boxes and see that there be nothing in them. The majority also impeached the legality of the appointment of one Stringfield as an election officer. The minority contended: "He was an officer de jure, but in any view certainly de facto," having been appointed by the board to take the place of a judge who was called away. The majority say:

> In addition to all this, Stringfield counted the ballots at this precinct, though he was neither judge, nor registrar, and, by the express terms of the law, no one but a judge or registrar is permitted to count the ballots.
> The provision of law requiring ballots to be deposited in empty boxes is in its nature just as mandatory as a provision requiring that the ballots shall be on white paper and without device. Under such a law a ticket printed on red paper, or containing a device, is void; and, by parity of reasoning, ballots deposited in a box one-third full of tickets at the opening of the polls, resulting in an incorrect count, as in this case, must vitiate the returns. It is axiomatic that laws designed to secure the accuracy of the count are mandatory. So the returns from this precinct must be rejected, whether we decide that the law in respect of time and place of registration be mandatory or directory.

The minority contended that the provision of law relating to examination of ballot boxes before the election, to see that there was nothing in them, was directory, not mandatory, and give the state of the returns of other boxes at this precinct to show that the Congressional vote was not affected by the old ballots, which were said to have been removed when discovered.

An election officer being shown guilty of fraud at one ballot box no confidence was placed in another to which he had access at the same election.

Discussion as to what is valid testimony in rebuttal.

Instance wherein an entire precinct return was rejected because a few votes were proven to have been bribed.

Instance of rejection of a precinct return because of violation of an alleged mandatory law requiring ballots to be counted before adjournment of the election.

The majority reject Black Mountain precinct's vote because one of the judges, one of sitting Member's party, was shown by testimony to have stuffed one of the ballot boxes. The minority, while considering this testimony incredible, point out that it relates to the box in which the votes for county officers were received. But other testimony showed that the judge in question had assisted in counting the vote from the Congressional box, although he testified that he did not. The majority say:

In Spencer v. Morey, the following text from McCrary is quoted, with approval:

"If, for example, an election officer having charge of a ballot box prior to or during its canvass is caught in the act of abstracting ballots and substituting others, although the number shown to have been abstracted is not sufficient to change the result, yet no confidence can be placed in the contents of the ballot box which has been in his custody."

This rule discredits all the acts of Martin, although he swears that he did not count the ballots in the Congressional box. His Democratic associate, T.P. Sutton, as well as other witnesses, swear positively that Martin did count some of the ballots in the Congressional box, and, of course, their testimony outweighs the testimony of Martin.

The effort of the contestee's counsel to show that the box which Martin was caught in the act of stuffing was the county box is of no avail, because it is clear that he stuffed one of the boxes and that he handled part of the tickets from the Congressional box, so that his touch tainted the entire returns, and they must be rejected.

At Old Fort precinct the committee found "nine distinct varieties of fraud and irregularity," the return being false, the number of ballots exceeding the number of voters, and the poll list introduced by contestee being forged. Also one of the judges of election, belonging to sitting Member's party, confessed that he was drunk on quinine. The report says:

Contestee makes no attempt to defend the false poll sheet, but claims that the proof in regard to its falsity was not strictly in rebuttal. After the taking of testimony at this precinct was concluded and contestant's witnesses had been discharged and had gone home this fictitious poll list was introduced in evidence by contestee's attorney; and, although contestee took no further testimony in the county of McDowell, the introduction of this poll list, which, if genuine, would have contradicted contestant's witnesses, had the same effect as the examination of witnesses in behalf of contestee, and would have justified contestant in offering evidence in rebuttal The testimony taken by contestant in rebuttal at this precinct was confined solely to the genuineness or falsity of this poll list.

The minority dispute the validity of this testimony in rebuttal, and say:

Such circumstances in a report is unjustifiable. What the remaining frauds and irregularities mentioned in the report are, it does not appear.

Contestant failed to allege or introduce testimony tending to show that he was in any way deprived of a single legal vote, or that contestee had the benefit of a single illegal vote, or that there was an illegal vote cast at this precinct, and we submit that to reject this precinct will violate every recognized principle of law pertaining to elections.

In Limestone and Ivy precincts the majority reject the whole returns because of bribery. Of Limestone, they say:

The returns from this precinct must be rejected, because the proof of bribery is clear and conclusive and taints the whole poll, so that it is impossible to purge the poll of the illegal votes. The testimony of J.H. Sumner, James Webb, and Paton Durham, of which extracts are given below, make this perfectly clear.

The minority say:

The evidence (p. 110 et seq.) shows that contestant examined twelve witnesses at this precinct and proved that 2 votes were bribed. The utmost that contestant can rightfully claim is the rejection of these 2 votes. The claim that the whole precinct should be rejected and 242 honest voters be disfranchised because James Webb received $1.50 from an unnamed man and Paton Durham, who had the promise by a Democrat of a steady job to "vote the Republican ticket," voted the Democratic ticket and got the job, violates every sentiment of fairness and is without precedent or authority. It is noticed that the majority cite no authority for their recommendation to reject this precinct.

In Ivy precinct the proof as to bribery and the criticism of the minority is similar. In addition, the majority found defective registration at this precinct and that false letters, injurious to contestant, had been distributed.

In the precinct of Herrell's, where the return gave contestant a plurality, there was a violation of the law claimed by the majority to be mandatory, requiring the ballots to be counted before adjournment of the election. The majority intimate that the ballots might be recounted as evidence aliunde, and the minority deny this. But, in fact, the majority reject the evidence aliunde and reject the Herrell's returns.

Before the abandonment of the proposition to reject the vote of Asheville the majority found a plurality of 318 for contestant as a result of their conclusions. But the abandonment of the Asheville proposition reduced this by 163 votes.

The report was fully debated on May 9 and 10, 1900, and on the latter day the resolutions of the minority confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat were disagreed to—yeas 127, nays 128. Then the resolutions of the majority, unseating the sitting Member and seating contestant, were agreed to—yeas 129, nays 127.

1114. The Kentucky election case of Evans v. Turner, in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Circulation of a general circular proposing bribery, but of which contestee was not cognizant, did not vitiate an election although accompanied by acts of bribery.

On February 5, 1900, Mr. Romulus R. Linney, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a report [1] in the Kentucky case of Evans v. Turner. The grounds of the contest alleged by the contestant were fraud and bribery, the specifications of which were denied by the sitting Member. The sitting Member had been returned by a pluralty of 568 votes, and the committee decided that contestant had not successfully attacked that vote, as it was not shown that enough votes were vitiated:

> The evidence offered by the contestant tends to prove the allegations of fraud and bribery, and much of it discloses the resort to methods that were disreputable. Among other things it is in evidence that on the morning of the election a circular was issued and generally distributed in the city of Louisville among the political workers of the contestant, printed on the paper of the Congressional campaign committee, on that date, and containing a proposition to place $100 in each precinct, and requesting captains of each ward, if they do not get the money by 6.30 on the morning of the election, to come to headquarters. This circular was issued by enemies of contestant. This is a novel method in the history of political struggles in the United States, and in the opinion of the committee demands the unqualified condemnation of the committee. This, with the evidence tending to prove fraud and bribery in other respects, in our opinion, tends strongly to establish the contention of contestant, but does not show that contestee was a party to such fraud.
> There is no evidence tending to show that the contestee had anything to do with this fake circular, and there is much evidence offered by the contestee tending to show that the propositions of bribery came from persons who had organized for the purpose of obtaining money from some one-Anyone from whom they could obtain it. Upon a careful consideration the committee is unable to determine the exact number of votes tainted and vitiated by fraud and bribery.

On February 5, 1900,[2] without debate or division, the House agreed to the resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member to the seat.

1115. The Alabama election case of Aldrich v. Robbins, in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Where a particular election board denies representation to the opposing party, the returns being impeached by evidence, are rejected.

Where voters of one party are compelled to remain away from the polls to thwart organized fraud, the other party is not permitted to avail himself of votes proven aliunde after returns are rejected.

On February 14, 1900,[1] Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, presented from the Committee on Elections No. 1, the report of the majority of that committee[2] in the Alabama case of Aldrich v. Robbins. The district in this case was composed of five counties. In four counties the white population predominated, and in three of the four the vote of contestant exceeded that of sitting Member. In the fifth county, Dallas, where the census of 1890 showed 8,531 colored population and 2,146 white population, the returned vote was 2,438 for Robbins and 392 for Aldrich, the Republican and Populist candidate. The official returns gave Robbins a majority of 1,230 over Aldrich.

The contest rested solely on claims of fraud in Dallas County, on the vote of which the sitting Member relied wholly for his majority.

After quoting the portions of the constitution and laws of Alabama relating to elections, the majority of the committee lay down the conditions governing the case:

> It will be noticed that the Alabama law provides that the judge of probate, the sheriff, and the clerk of the circuit court must, at least thirty days before the holding of any election in their county, appoint three inspectors for each place of voting, two of whom shall be members of opposing parties, if practicable, and that it shall be the duty of the sheriff to notify such inspectors of their appointment within ten days after such appointment.
> The three county officers of Dallas County who constituted this appointing board were all Democrats, and supported Mr. Robbins at the election.
> It appears by the report of the committee in the Fifty-fifth Congress that in the Congressional election of 1896 the appointing board was composed wholly of Democrats, and that, although at that time lists were submitted to them of suitable men in each precinct by the Republican and Populist managers for Mr. Aldrich, they did not appoint a single Republican or Populist inspector of election.
> There are 31 election precincts in Dallas County. In 1898, at the proper time, a request was submitted to the probate judge, sheriff, and circuit clerk of Dallas County by the chairman of the People's Party of Dallas County, the chairman of the Republican party of Dallas County, the chairman of the Aldrich campaign committee, and by Mr. Aldrich himself, all joining in the one request, asking for the appointment of a citizen named in the request for each of the precincts as an inspector to represent the Republican party and People's Party. In 20 of the precincts the respective inspectors asked for by the Republican committee were named by the appointing board. In 11 of the precincts, without any satisfactory reason or explanation, the persons requested by the Republican party managers were not appointed, but either some lame or illiterate person or Democrat appointed in their stead.
> Of the 20 precincts in which the regular Republican inspectors were appointed, your committee has followed the official returns in all but 3. In the 11 precincts in which the persons regularly presented for Republican inspectors were unreasonably rejected, your committee finds sufficient fraud in 7 precincts to warrant the rejection of the official returns. In 2 other of these 11 precincts no election was held. As to 1 other, your committee disregards the evidence of fraud because offered as rebuttal and not as direct testimony.

But not only did the appointing board refuse to give proper representation to Mr. Aldrich in the election officials, in 11 precincts, but they also neglected and refused to give him information prior to election day as to what election officers had been selected for any of the precincts. The chairman of Mr. Aldrich's campaign committee, by a registered letter, made application to the probate judge of Dallas County for a certified copy of the names of the inspectors and returning officers, and offered to pay the legal fees in order to get such copy. The only answer he could obtain from the appointing board was the ordinary postal-card receipt returned to the sender in cases of registered mail, and which in this case was signed by the probate judge.

The provision of law requiring the sheriff to notify the persons appointed inspectors within ten days of their appointment was generally disregarded. Mr. Aldrich and his campaign managers did not know, and had no way of ascertaining, who were to be the election officials in the various precincts prior to the day of election, and they did not know, and had no way of ascertaining, which of the names suggested by them for inspectors had been selected by the appointing board.

The majority of the committee conclude that "no just election is intended to be had where the appointing board selecting the election officials denies representation to the opposing party," and lay down a principle which was the subject of much contention during consideration of the case:

Although we do not find it necessary to rest our conclusion in this case upon the following proposition, yet we still affirm, as a matter of proper statement:

"That in view of past experience in Dallas County elections, Mr. Aldrich was entitled at the election of 1898 to notify his supporters to remain away from the polls at all precincts where he was not given representation among the election officers. To request his supporters to vote at such precincts would be only to increase the vote of his opponent. If his voters remained away from the polls and counted the persons who went inside of the polls, they had a check on the number of votes which could be returned for his opponent, but if they voted themselves, they would only add to the vote counted to the opponent without any satisfactory method of preventing the fraud. And in those precincts where Mr. Aldrich was entitled to request his supporters to remain away from the polls, because of proper and well-grounded expectation of intended fraud, we further think that it would be a travesty upon justice to permit his opponent to be allowed the votes which were cast at the election in his favor.

"It is the duty of this House to give some incentive to just elections in such districts (or rather in this district, because it has no equal), and the only way to give the incentive to fair elections in Dallas County is to compel the officers there to allow official representation to both parties, or to disregard the returns from such precincts in those cases where the Aldrich supporters, for sufficient reason, remained away from the polls."

For these reasons we think the official returns from Orrville precinct No. 8, Lexington precinct No. 9, Marion Junction precinct No. 28, and Kings precinct No. 30 should be entirely disregarded, because, without any excuse or without any reason, except the intention to commit fraud, the proper request of Aldrich for representation in the election officers was coolly disregarded by the appointing board; and we do not think that the contestee should be entitled to reap any active benefit from such fraud committed in his interest.

The minority of the committee in their report, and Members on the floor, contended that the sitting Member should be given the benefit of the votes which, by proof aliunde, he had shown to have been cast for him in the above-mentioned precincts; that legal, honest voters should not be deprived of their suffrages through alleged faults of election officers, etc. In reply a distinction was drawn between precincts where the contestant had felt constrained to keep his supporters from the polls and those where he had not.

In Orrville precinct the report shows the bad character of the election officers, they being in large part the same who had officiated in previous elections wherein fraud had been shown in the returns; also that these officers had disregarded the provisions of law for the appointment of clerks of election, so that none had been appointed. It also appears (from the minority views) that there was testimony tending to show fraud in the return. From the evidence the majority considered that the vote in the precinct should be entirely disregarded; and they do not count the 5 votes for Aldrich and 75 for Robbins which were proven aliunde.

In the same way and for the same reasons, the majority reject entirely the election in Lexington, Marion, and King's precincts.

Where an election is not held, although there be no sufficient excuse for the failure, the House is reluctant to allow votes for either party.

Where the voters of one party left the polls for no just cause, the House counted the returns of the election held by the other party.

Evidence in chief taken in time of rebuttal evidence is not considered in an election case.

Failure to give one party lawful representation among election officers, accompanied by proof of fraud, justifies rejection of the returns.

In River and Pine Flat precincts no election was held. The reasons given for this were conflicting. The committee, while thinking that no sufficient reason had been given for not holding an election, found no sufficient evidence for allowing votes for either party. In Dublin precinct, however, where a dispute caused the Republicans to leave the polls in a body, and where later the polls were opened by the other party and an election held, the committee found that the vote should be counted as returned, the action of contestant's supporters not being justified.

In Smyley's precinct the committee find:

> The evidence in the record as to this precinct is sufficient to cause the returns to be disregarded if the evidence is to be considered at all. But this evidence which should have been offered in chief was offered for the first time in rebuttal, and we feel that it ought not to be considered. Hence we find that the vote should be counted as returned.

There remain six precincts wherein the majority of the committee found frauds sufficient to justify the rejection of the returns, leaving the vote to be proven aliunde by the parties.

In Valley Creek precinct representation on the board of inspectors was denied contestant's party, a portion of the officials had officiated in previous elections where frauds had been found, and there was evidence of fraud in the count. In the precinct 141 witnesses personally swore that they voted for Aldrich, "and the testimony showed that other voters had also voted for Aldrich." So the majority credit Aldrich with 152 votes and Robbins with 51. In Cahaba precinct the conditions as to appointment and character of election officers were similar, and there was evidence of fraud, besides the fact that a Republican election clerk was ordered from the polls during the count. In Union, Pence's, and Burnsville precincts evidence of fraud caused the rejection of the returns.

In the city of Selma, where contestant was allowed the appointment of an inspector whom he named, but where Republican clerks and markers were not appointed, and where there was violation of the law of Alabama providing that no one could legally vote who had not been registered, the majority of the committee discarded the official return for the following reasons:

First. Because the poll list shows that more than 80 illegal votes were cast by unregistered persons.

Second. Because it is shown that a much larger vote was cast in favor of Mr. Aldrich than was returned by the inspectors.

Third. Because a number of the persons voting obtained their ballots illegally from various persons and at various places, contrary to the positive provisions of the law.

Fourth. Because several persons appear to have voted whose names are not on the poll list, and several persons whose names are on the poll list appear not to have voted, though we do not lay great stress upon this reason.

Fifth. Because, in absolute violation of the law, the inspectors of election refused to appoint a Republican clerk of election from the written list which was submitted according to the provisions of the statute. If there had been an intention to hold an honest election there could have been no objection to complying with this positive provision of the Alabama statute.

The contestee proved by witnesses 627 votes in this precinct, but there should be deducted from this number 28 votes which were proven, but which were illegal because the names of the voters were not on the registration lists. There should also be deducted 35 votes of persons who obtained their ballots illegally from various persons who were not entitled to handle them and at various places where the ballots were not entitled to be. The Australian ballot law should not be made a screaming farce.

The minority of the committee contend with much argument that the failure to appoint the clerk was a failure to perform a merely directory duty imposed by statute, and such failure could not vitiate the poll. Decisions in support of this doctrine are cited.

The majority of the committee, following out their conclusions, found that contestant had been elected by a majority of 206, and in accordance with this finding reported the proper resolutions.

The report was debated at length in the House on March 2, 6, and 8, 1900. On the latter day the proposition of the minority, to confirm the title of sitting Member to the seat, was rejected, yeas 134, nays 138. Then the resolutions of the majority were agreed to, yeas 141, nays 135; and the oath was administered to Mr. Aldrich.

1117. The Kentucky election case of White v. Boreing, in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

No surprise being practiced on the voters, who were free to vote for whom they pleased, alleged irregularities in placing a name under a party emblem do not vitiate the election.

Discussion as to use of proxies at meetings of political executive committees.

On March 29,1900,[1] Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted a report in the Kentucky contest of White v. Boreing. The sitting Member in this case had received by the official returns a plurality of 4,462 over the contestant, who was his next highest competitor, and a clear majority of 1,021 votes over all opposing candidates. While there were various charges and countercharges, the only issue considered finally by the committee was the allegation that the Republican party of the district had failed to nominate Mr. Boreing lawfully; that therefore he was not entitled to the use of the party emblem (the log cabin) on the Australian ballot, and hence not being entitled to the votes which the people were deluded into giving him there was either no election or contestant was elected.

The committee, after explaining the ballot law of Kentucky and the use of party emblems, state that contestant was a "Free Republican," whose name was printed under his own emblem on the ballot, and who had not sought the regular Republican nomination. The law of Kentucky recognized three methods of placing a name on the ballot: (1) nomination by convention, (2) nomination at a primary election of the people, (3) nomination by petition.

The requirement of law in regard to primary election was as follows:

Whenever it shall be desired by the committee or governing authority of any political party to hold a primary election under the provisions of this article, said committee or governing authority shall, at least forty days prior to such primary election, give public notice thereof by posting such notice at the court-house door and at least twenty other public places in the county or district. Such notice shall state the date of such proposed primary election, the hours between which it will be held, the offices for which candidates am to be nominated, and the places at which polls will be opened at such primary elections.

The rules of the Republican party left it optional with the committee to call either a convention or primary election, except that on petition of 51 per cent of the votes cast at the last preceding election, if presented not less than twenty days prior to the time fixed for the convention, if a convention has been called, a primary election must be held.

The statute provides that the committee or governing authority of the political party holding the primaries may provide the manner in which the expenses of holding the same, the pay of officers, the cost of publishing and circulating notices of election, etc., shall be defrayed, and section 1561 enacts that any person who shall not have notified the committee or governing authority not later than fifteen days next preceding the primary election of the fact that he is a candidate, "and any person who has not given such notice to the committee or governing authority, or who has not complied with the conditions prescribed by the committee or governing authority for the government of candidates, shall not have his name printed on the ballots used in such primary election."

On June 14, 1898, the Republican district committee met and passed resolutions providing for a primary election on August 11, 1898, in accordance with the law, and providing:

That each of the candidates pay to the chairman of the district committee the amount assessed against him, to defray the expenses of the primary, not later than fifteen days next preceding the holding said primary election.

That in the event of there being no more than one candidate complying with the requirements herein, and upon notice of that fact by the chairman of the committee, the committee shall meet in the town of London on August 5, 1898, and declare the said candidate complying with the above requirements the Republican nominee for a seat in the Fifty-sixth Congress of the Eleventh Congressional district of Kentucky.

Mr. Boreing was the only person who qualified himself as a candidate within the time limit, so on August 5, 1898, in pursuance of a call of the chairman, the district committee met and passed a resolution declaring Mr. Boreing the nominee, since he was the only person announcing his candidacy and complying with the conditions, and directing the chairman and secretary to certify this fact to the several county clerks in the district, which was done.

The committee showed that the practice of dispensing with a primary election in such cases was well established in both parties in Kentucky, and was considered proper and legal. The report goes on:

Contestant claims, however, that the committee meetings of June 14 and August 5 were both illegal or at least irregular, because a number of those present and acting as members of the committee were not original members, but held proxies from original members, there not being enough original members actually present to constitute a quorum; or, in other words, if the proxies were thrown out there were not enough members present at either meeting to constitute a quorum. We are referred to rule No. 29 of the Republican organization of Kentucky, which is said to read as follows:

"No delegate elected to a State or district Republican convention shall be permitted to cast a vote by proxy."

This was not, however, a State or district Republican convention, and the parties present did not attend as delegates elected to said convention, but as members of the district committee of the Eleventh Congressional district of Kentucky, a standing committee. As this district committee or governing authority is recognized by statute, and is authorized in the case of a tie vote or contest at a primary election to hear and determine such contest and decide who shall be entitled to the nomination, the argument is made on behalf of contestant that its members are public officers and can not delegate their powers. But even as to public officers the distinction is always drawn between duties of a judicial nature and those which are purely ministerial. The evidence shows that not only in the State central committee, but also in the district committees of the Republican party the use of proxies is quite common.

Mr. White was not a candidate for the Republican nomination. He did not seek to become a candidate of that party. He obtained his own place upon the ballot, in his own column, and under his own picture, by petition signed by 400 or more persons as prescribed by the act of assembly. The committee meetings of June 14 and August 5 were held after due public notice. The action taken at each of said meetings was matter of public notoriety. The question of no quorum was not raised at either of said meetings, no objection was made by anybody to representation by proxy, and although it was publicly known at the meeting of August 5 Mr. Boreing was declared the nominee, and the chairman and secretary of the committee were directed to certify his nomination to the clerks of the several counties for the purpose of having his name printed upon the ballot, no effort whatever was made by Mr. White, or any other parties, to prevent such certification, or to prevent the clerks of the several counties in the district from printing Mr. Boreing's name upon the ballot in the Republican column and under the log cabin. If there was such gross irregularity or illegality as claimed, a restraining order or injunction might undoubtedly have been obtained from the court preventing the printing of Mr. Boreing's name upon the ballot until his right to have it so printed could be inquired into. But his name having been permitted to go upon the ballot without legal objection and be submitted to the people, who thereupon cast a majority of their votes in his favor, it would seem to be a case where any irregularity in the pleading must be considered as cured by the verdict.

The committee proceed to distinguish this case from that of Fairchild v. Ward, showing that a far stronger case was made out for Ward, who was nevertheless not seated.

The committee go on to show that no fact had been adduced to prove that the voters cast their ballots for Mr. Boreing simply because his name was under the log cabin emblem; and it was furthermore to be remembered that each person desiring to vote the party ticket might nevertheless write the name of another candidate for Congress in a blank space provided on the ballot. The committee quote the law of Kentucky, "No ballot shall be rejected for any technical error which does not make it impossible to determine the voter's choice," and conclude:

In order to sustain the contestant's position we should have to squarely reverse the decision of the House in Fairchild v. Ward, and go even much further in the opposite direction. We have here no difficulty whatever in determining the choice of a majority of the voters in the Eleventh Congressional district of Kentucky, and we are unable to find any irregularity of sufficient importance to warrant us in reversing that choice or even in setting it aside.

The House, following the recommendation of the committee, sustained the title of the sitting Member to his seat without debate or division.

1118. The Virginia election case of Walker v. Rhea, in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The mere existence of frauds and irregularities does not vitiate an election if not shown to be sufficient to change the result.

On January 30, 1901,[1] Mr. R. W. Tayler, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, presented the report in the case of Walker v. Rhea, from Virginia. The sitting Member had received a vote of 17,344 according to the returns, and the contestant a vote of 16,595. The total population of the district was 166,699. The committee found:

> The conclusion arrived at as a consequence of the committee's investigation is that while the evidence shows that there were frauds and irregularities practiced, chiefly in the interest of the contestee, they fall very far short of being sufficient to justify a change in the result of the election.

Therefore they reported resolutions confirming the title of the sitting Member to the seat. There was no action by the House.

GENERAL ELECTION CASES, 1902 TO 1906.

1119. The Alabama election case of Spears v. Burnett, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Unfair conduct on the part of election officers and suspicious circumstances do not justify overturning a majority not destroyed by testimony.

On February 28, 1902,[4] the Committee on Elections No. I reported in the case of Spears v. Burnett, of Alabama. The committee reported the sitting Member entitled to the seat, saying:

On the face of the returns the contestee, Burnett, appears to have been elected by a plurality of 747. The contestant disputed the validity of these returns, claiming that in certain precincts in the district he was denied proper representation, and that at many of the precincts fraud and bribery were resorted to its accomplish the return of the contestee.

Your committee have given full and careful attention to all of the claims made by the contestee and to the testimony in the case. The contestant appears to have been the regularly nominated Republican candidate for Congress, and in the main received the support of his party. While in some of the precincts, concerning which complaint is made, there is evidence of unfair treatment on the part of the Democratic managers and some circumstances appear raising at least a suspicion of fraud, there was certainly no general conspiracy to dishonestly deprive him of votes in the precincts of which complaint is made and concerning which proof is presented to us, and there is not sufficient ground of criticism to seriously affect the return majority of 747 votes.

On March 22[1] the House, without division, agreed to the report of the committee.

1120. The Kentucky election case of Moss 42v. Rhea, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

A technically informal ballot having been illegally received by a judge of election was counted, the voter being guiltless of collusion in the illegal act.

The failure of an election judge to detach a stub from a ballot, as he was required to do by law, did not justify the rejection of a ballot cast in good faith.

As to what is a sufficient return of rejected ballots under the Kentucky election law.

On February 28, 1902,[2] the Committee on Elections No. 1 reported in the case of Moss v. Rhea, of Kentucky, that the sitting Member was not entitled to the seat and that the contestant was elected and was entitled to the seat.

The official returns gave to Rhea a plurality of 156 votes. The majority of the committee added to the official return "the number of undoubted votes received by each of the two candidates upon the ballots which were rejected and not counted in the various precincts in the district" as follows: For Rhea, 135; for Moss, 312; leaving for contestant a plurality of 21.

The minority denied this conclusion, and joined issue with the majority on two general points:

(1) As to the proper identification of the rejected ballots, in order to determine whether they had or had not been already counted in the original return.

(2) As to what irregularities in the ballots should be sufficient to sanction rejection.

The Australian ballot law of Kentucky, in providing generally for the count of the ballots, provides:

> That if there are any ballots cast and counted or left uncounted, concerning the legality or regularity of which there is any doubt or difference of opinion in the minds of the judges of election, said ballots shall not be destroyed, but sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election for such judicial or other investigation as may be necessary, with a true statement as to whether they have or have not been counted, and if counted, what part and for whom.

The minority contended that under the judicial decisions of Kentucky each of the rejected ballots should be accompanied by a statement signed by all the election officers of the precinct. And it was further urged that under the provisions of the Constitution the House was bound by the law of Kentucky as construed by the Kentucky courts.

[2] First session Fifty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 625.

The majority of the committee denied that the courts of Kentucky had construed the statute in the way declared by the minority.

From the general return the rejected ballots were sufficiently identified in the opinion of the majority:

> The certificate of the election officers states the whole number of ballots voted, the number counted as valid, and the number questioned or rejected. It seems to us quite evident that if, for instance, the precinct election officers, in their certificate of election, state that the number of ballots cast was 400, that the number counted as valid was 300, and that the number questioned or rejected was 100, that this is a sufficient statement to show that there are 100 rejected ballots not counted. And if in such case the election officers have returned in proper form and in the proper envelope just 100 ballots as questioned or rejected ballots to the county court clerk, then it seems to us this establishes clearly that these 100 ballots were not counted by the precinct election officers, but were ballots rejected by them in making the count.
> "In such case we can not conceive of any reason why there should be any other or further certificate made by the precinct election officers. If, on the other band, we take a case where we find the election officers returned 400 ballots as cast, 350 ballots counted as valid, and 100 ballots returned as questioned or rejected, then it is very evident that, without a further identification of the questioned ballots which have been counted and the rejected ballots which have not been counted, it is impossible to determine which of the ballots returned as questioned and rejected can be counted where contest is made."

As to the second point—the irregularities in the ballots themselves—the majority and minority joined issue on several points:

(a) A considerable number of ballots were cast without the indorsement of the clerk of election, required by the following provision of law:

> No judge or other officer of the election shall deposit any ballot on which the facsimile signature of the county clerk and the name of the election clerk do not appear.

The minority contended that these ballots should not be counted, and had been properly thrown out by the election officers. (Case of Slaymaker v. Phillips, 5 Wyoming 453, cited.) The majority held that in a case of this kind the ballot should be counted if received, referring for authority to the Missouri case of Heyl 42v. Guion, 55 Southwestern Reporter, page 1036.

An evidently accidental ink blot on a ballot, or blot of stencil mark caused by folding is not a distinguishing mark and the ballot should not be rejected if the intent of the voter is apparent.

Faint pencil marks, evidently not of utility in identifying ballots, and appearing under circumstances suggesting fraud, were held not to be such distinguishing marks as to justify the rejection of ballots.

Where the intent of the voter was not in doubt the House followed the rule of the Kentucky court and declined to reject a ballot because not marked strictly within the square required by the State ballot law.

A voter having marked above two tickets on an Australian ballot, the counting of a vote for Congressman was considered of doubtful propriety, even in view of the fact that one ticket contained no candidate for Congress.

The question raised as to the right of the House to determine the rule as to evidence it will receive, even though State law and decisions are alleged to prescribe a rule.

(b) A large number of ballots were blotted in folding so that the stencil mark made by the voter, as provided by law, was reproduced with greater or less distinctness on another portion of the ballot. In some cases this blotting was so extensive as to make a doubt as to which, of two tickets on the ballot, the voter had marked. The election officers threw out not only those where there appeared a real doubt, but also many where the fact that the second mark was a mere blot, appeared so evident that the majority of the committee, after careful inspection, decided that they should be counted. The Kentucky law provides that when the voter has made on his ballot any distinguishing mark to show to another how he has voted, the vote shall not be counted; but the majority of the committee could not find that these blots were such distinguishing marks.

(c) Certain ballots, some for sitting Member and some for contestant, had been rejected by the election officers because of a faint, barely distinguishable pencil mark, usually on the upper right-hand corner of the ballot. The evidence, though not conclusive, tended to show that the mark had been put on the ballots by an election clerk who was a partisan of the sitting Member. The majority of the committee decided that, as inspection made evident, these pencilings were not distinguishing marks within the meaning of the law.

(d) Certain ballots were thrown out because of the negligence of an election judge, who was required to detach a stub from the ballots before they were deposited in the ballot box, and did not perform this duty. The majority of the committee decided that these ballots should be counted, the voter not having anything to do with the detachment of the stub.

(e) Certain ballots were rejected because they were found marked in both the Republican and Socialist-Labor circles, and others in both the Democratic and Socialist-Democratic circles. As there was no candidate for Congress on either the Socialist-Labor or Socialist-Democratic tickets, the claim was made that the doubly marked tickets should be counted for the only candidate for Congress appearing on the two. The majority of the committee cite Parker v. Orr (158 Ill., 618) in support of this view, but consider it doubtful whether such votes should be counted and do not include them in the list of counted votes, according to which the election of contestant is shown. The minority contended that such ballots were neutralized, and should not be counted, citing the case of McMahon v. Polk (10 S. Dak., 296).

(f) On the Kentucky official ballot there is a blank space on which the voter may, under the statute, write the name of his choice if he does not wish to vote for the regular candidate. Under the law the voter marks the ballot in a circle above the party ticket, or in a square opposite the name of the particular candidate. On certain ballots the voter marked in the square opposite the blank space below the name of the candidate, and on others in the blank space itself. The majority of the committee contended that, under the decision of the Kentucky courts and under the following provisions of law, the intent of the voter was plain and the ballots should not be rejected.

Should any elector desire to vote for each and every candidate of one party he shall make a cross making the large square [changed to circle] embracing the device and preceding the title under which the candidates of said party are printed, and the votes shall then be counted for all the candidates under that title: Provided, however, That if a cross mark be made in the large square including the device of such party, and a cross mark be also marked in the square after the name of one or more candidates of a different party or parties, the vote shall be counted for the candidate so marked, and not for the candidate for the same office of the party so marked; but the vote shall be counted for the other candidates under such party name or designation.

The minority, quoting as authority 17 R. I., 812, and 18 R. I., 822, contended that votes marked as above were not votes for any persons.

The case was considered by the House on March 22, 24, and 25.[1] During this debate especial stress was laid by those speaking on behalf of the sitting Member that the laws and judicial decisions of Kentucky were binding on the House in the decision of the case. Mr. George F. Burgess, of Texas, expressed the contention as follows:

The right to vote is not a matter guaranteed to any citizen in this country by the Constitution of the United States or any act of Congress. It is a State privilege. The only provision of the Constitution which could attach to an election in one of the States is that which has reference to the color line, and that is not involved in the remotest degree in this contest now before the House.

The Constitution also provides that the Members of the House of Representatives "in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." That provision is not involved at all in this case. The Constitution also further provides that "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." That provision is not involved in this contest.

Mr. Tucker, in his work, tersely and completely states this whole contention in the sentence when he says: "Suffrage is a State privilege belonging to State citizenship, and is exclusively under State jurisdiction."

The minority report says: "The State of Kentucky has fixed the qualification of electors and has prescribed the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress. Although perfectly competent to do so, Congress has not at any time made such regulations or altered those made by the State of Kentucky."

Hence it follows this House is bound by the laws of the State of Kentucky and the decisions of her supreme court thereunder, and it is therefore perfectly obvious that the gentleman from Illinois admits the legal situation when he says this House is bound by the statutes and decisions of the State of Kentucky touching upon the manner and conduct of her elections, Congressional or otherwise.

The majority report, drawn by Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, did not combat this proposition, for the reason that the decisions of the Kentucky courts did not, in the opinion of the majority, lay down the rules which the minority claimed that they did.

Mr. Walter I. Smith, of Iowa, while agreeing with the majority of the committee in their construction of the Kentucky decisions, also took the position that the rejected ballots were admissible without the individual certificates of the election officers, "even in defiance of the statute and in defiance of the decision of the supreme court of Kentucky. I propose," he said—to put it on both grounds, and I feel that it may be well to read even to our Democratic friends the provisions of the Constitution of the United States upon this subject. "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof."

Does that provide that the legislature of any State can prescribe the rules of evidence which shall govern this judicial body in sitting and trying contested-election cases? Does the Constitution, when it says—"That the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof," confer authority to enact rules of evidence for the government of this judicial tribunal?

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members."

Is this House, sitting in the exercise of its high judicial functions, to be bound and limited by rules of evidence derogatory of the common law enacted by the legislature of the Commonwealth of Kentucky?

Mr. Smith quoted the contested election case of Norris v. Handley in support of his contention.

The House sustained the report of the majority of the committee, unseating Mr. Rhea and seating Mr. Moss.

The vote on the motion to substitute the minority resolutions, favorable to Mr. Rhea, for the majority resolutions, favorable to Mr. Moss, was yeas 124, nays 136.

The majority resolutions, declaring Mr. Rhea not entitled to the seat, and Mr. Moss entitled to it, were then agreed to without division.

1122. The Missouri election case of Horton 42v. Butler, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

The contestant is not limited as to the number of places in which he will take testimony at the same time.

A certified copy of a public record was admitted in an election case, although presented in the time for taking rebuttal testimony.

Discussion as to the extent to which the House is bound by the technical law as to taking evidence in an election case.

On April 5, 1902,[1] Mr. Robert W. Tayler, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted a report in the case of Horton v. Butler, from Missouri.

Two preliminary questions were considered by the committee before proceeding to the merits of the case.

(a) In relation to the taking of testimony the majority of the committee say:

No important questions of practice are raised respecting any relevant testimony, although, in view of the fact that strenuous objection was made to the fact that during a period covered by the taking of testimony witnesses were examined for the contestant at several different places at the same time, we deem it proper to state our views in relation to the subject.

We see no objection to such practice, especially in such a case as this, where about a thousand witnesses were examined, many of them on matters of great importance and at considerable length. To deny the right to take such testimony at as many places as the necessities of the case may require is to deny the right of the contestant to make out his case at all.

Instances have occurred in our experience where a contestee by frivolous and unnecessary cross examination has so consumed time as to seriously interfere with the orderly and just progress of the investigation.

(b) In relation to rebuttal testimony the majority of the committee say:

The contestant having consumed forty days in taking his testimony in chief rested his case. The contestee examined no witnesses. After the expiration of the time allowed to contestee for that purpose the contestant, having given due notice thereof, proceeded, on March 26, to examine E. A. McBurney, and his testimony then taken appears at pages 2199–2204.

The contestee did not appear either in person or by counsel, but on May 1 presented his objection to the consideration of this testimony to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the following reasons:

"First. It is rebuttal when no testimony was taken for the contestee, and therefore nothing to rebut.

"Second. It was taken after the time for taking testimony had expired."

---

[1] First session Fifty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 1423.

The testimony of McBurney at this time was of two classes:

First. Certified lists from the Director of the Census giving the name, address, color, and age of the males 21 years of age and over in the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Twenty-third wards of the city of St. Louis as returned by the census enumerators engaged in compiling the United States census of the year 1900.

Second. Comparative tabulated statements made up from the registration lists, the recount of the ballots, the poll books, the McBurney canvass (all of which had been offered in evidence within the first forty days), and the certified census lists referred to above.

As to the matter embraced under the second head, it is apparent that it is not testimony at all, but only a consolidation, tabulation, and rearrangement of the testimony formerly introduced. It is valuable if correctly consolidated, tabulated, and arranged, and in so far as it has been found to be, or is believed to be, correctly done it has been of service to us in considering the case.

The sole question remaining, therefore, is, Must we disregard the certified census lists?

We see no reason whatever for so doing.

1. It is a public record, and such testimony is always competent. If it had been offered when the case came on for hearing before the committee, it would have been received. If, in the opinion of the committee, its reception at that time would find the contestee unprepared to meet and answer any inferences which might be drawn from it, he would have been given ample time to suitably respond, either by rebutting testimony or by such an examination of it as he might need.

2. In the case cited by contestee as showing the ground why this testimony should not be considered in the case the rule is held to apply only to "ordinary cases" and "without any cause whatever being shown therefor."

The case under consideration is far from being an "ordinary case," and excellent reasons appear why the course followed should have been adopted.

We agree that in ordinary cases the letter of the law should be followed; but after all the serious question always is, Has the party been diligent, and more important still, has the opposing party been prejudiced and has he had opportunity to make answer to the testimony taken out of time? No wrong has been done the contestee by the introduction of these lists.

Counsel for contestee closed his argument with an eloquent panegyric of technicalities and their value in art, science, and jurisprudence. What he so well says in that relation may be freely admitted to be sound. In a certain sense it may be said to have some application to contests in the House of Representatives. But if it be true that courts must sometimes be compelled to confess themselves powerless in the face of rigid rules and precise "technicalities" such is not the unhappy state of the House of Representatives. There is no power lodged anywhere which limits its discretion and authority, except the Constitution and its sense of right. Partisan prejudice may color its judgments and want of wisdom may make its decrees unsound, but it is never without power to do the right within the limits of its wide jurisdiction.

Where fraud so permeated a large part of the district as to prevent a full, free, and fair expression of the voters' will, the seat was declared vacant.

The degree and kind of testimony required to show a registration to be fraudulent, in connection with a conspiracy.

As to the validity of census returns and a canvass in proving a registration to be fraudulent.

As to hearsay evidence of persons participating in a fraudulent registration.

The kind and degree of evidence required to establish a conspiracy to defraud in a district.

As to the merits of the case, the majority of the committee, in their report, set forth that the official returns gave the sitting Member a plurality of 3,553. The contestant attacked these returns on numerous grounds, the most important of which were fraudulent registration, fraudulent voting, violation of law as to appointment of election officers, violence, intimidation, and false counting. The majority of the committee thus summarize:

We find that no valid election was held for Representative in the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth district of Missouri, because—

First. Fraud so permeated the conduct of the election in a large part of the district as to prevent a full, free, and fair expression of the public desire in respect to the election of a Representative in Congress.

Second. While the evidences of Democratic fraud are numerous and in almost every precinct discoverable, yet upon one of the many phases of the testimony showing Democratic frauds it appears that about 5,000 votes were cast for the contestee and about 2,000 for the contestant under names and addresses which a careful canvass could not discover as representing actual residents. We can not apply one rule of inference to one side and refuse to apply it to the other side. Nor can we when so many votes apparently tainted with fraud are involved determine that he who has least benefited by them shall be declared elected. It is possible that this conclusion may not be entirely fair to the contestant, but we are convinced that it is the only just decision we could render.

The minority of the committee, in views submitted by Mr. Sydney J. Bowie, of Alabama, contend that—there is no competent evidence in this record which remotely tends to invalidate a sufficient number of these votes to make this majority even doubtful.

The majority of the committee, preliminary to the consideration of specific acts of fraud, call attention to certain conditions which existed or were created to further what is termed a conspiracy. A new election law had recently been enacted, which enabled the party of the sitting Member to deny to the other party an efficient, representation on the boards of officers conducting the registration and voting. The police board of the city in which the district was located was also under the partisan control of sitting Member's party; and the committee concluded, from a report of a grand jury which sat in St. Louis, that it was used in furtherance of a conspiracy entered into by leading officials of sitting Member's party.

A further fact having a bearing on the decision of the case was the provision of the constitution of Missouri that every ballot voted should be numbered in the order of its reception and opposite the name of the voter depositing it, and that this record should be open in case of contest. The majority of the committee examined—

1. The fraudulent registration. There appeared from the testimony to have been a fraudulent registration to the extent of about 9,180 in a total registration of 27,467. The methods and extent of this registration were proven as follows:

(a) By the testimony of 5 witnesses, who saw acts disclosing a system of illegal registration by the issuance of slips of paper containing fictitious names on which repeaters registered.

(b) By canvassers in certain precincts which disclosed enough fraudulent registration to discredit the election in those precincts.

(c) By the testimony of persons living in houses neighboring to those wherein suspicious registrations were located, and who did not know the persons registered, although they did know everyone living in the houses.

(e) Registration from lots found to be vacant.

(f) That registered letters addressed to about 1,500 suspicious names could be delivered only in a few cases. The minority attempt to impeach this by showing certain cases where the persons were in fact living at the address but did not receive the registered letters. These cases were not numerous.

(g) Apparent registration of about 2,500 names from low resorts, saloons, yards, shops, stables and other places where there were no dwellings attached.

(h) By admissions on the part of those who participated in the frauds. The majority of the committee say:

> There is much heresay evidence of specific admissions by persons claiming to have participated in the frauds, but we have not considered such evidence unless it appeared that the person thus confessing was in a position of authority, or was engaged in the fraudulent work aside from his admissions.
> Thus we learn, that one Reese Evans was industriously engaged with a gang of repeaters distributing slips to his men, so that they might have timely advice as to their names, ages, and places of residence. The plan of using these dips will be more fully referred to when we come to a description of the election itself. Reference is here made to it for the purpose of showing Evans's relation to the conspiracy.
> The witness tells us, that he knows Evans well, and that before the election Evans told him that he had 20 men on his list, and that he was registering them as many as twenty times a day.
> It may be said that this testimony narrates an improbable story. The simple answer to that is that it is very full and explicit, and that Evans does not go upon the stand and deny it; nor is any explanation suggested why he did not do so.

(i) The excessive registration in the district as compared with population. The ratio was 24 per cent of the population, while in New York the ratio was 17.7, and in Philadelphia 18.1. The minority contended that this comparison was misleading and made on a false basis.

(j) By a comparison, on the initiative of the committee itself, of the first 509 names to which registered letters were sent, with the city directory which was made from a canvass within two or three weeks after the election, the committee found in the directory 110 of the persons, and did not find 399.

(k) By a comparison with the returns of the Federal census taken in the June preceding the registration in October. From this it appeared that of 27,467 persons registered, 14,088 were not enumerated in the census. The majority say:

> It is not to be denied that no census can be exactly accurate, and it must be true that conditions in June do not necessarily determine conditions in October. Nevertheless, whatever may be the conditions of population as to permanence, it is not for a moment admissible that in a city like St. Louis half of the population registered in October did not reside in the district in June, nor can it be true that if residing there they were not found by the census enumerators.

(l) By a canvass made in the latter part of December under direction of attorneys for contestant, and ostensibly for the purpose of a trade directory. This canvass, called the "McBurney canvass," failed to find 12,411 of the 27,467 names on the registration lists. This canvass also demonstrated that many persons entitled to registration were not registered. As to this canvass, which was a subject of much contention in this case, the majority of the committee say:

> While some question is raised as to the competency of this canvass as evidence in the case by reason of the fact that the canvassers themselves were not put upon the witness stand, we are yet inclined to receive it for what it is worth in precisely the same way and for exactly the same purpose as that for which we would consider a city directory competent.

It must not be forgotten that this is not a case in which an effort is being made to prove that Richard Roe did or did not commit a crime or whether John Doe did or did not vote at a certain place at a certain time. Considering the character of the issue made in this case and the nature of the frauds alleged and otherwise proven, it is difficult to understand what kind of testimony could be more persuasive or even more competent than the results of the canvass made under the circumstances in which a city directory of a great city is ordinarily made.

It is proven in this case to our entire satisfaction that the canvassers under McBurney were competent to perform their duty; were suitably instructed; that each made an affidavit to the correctness of his returns; that that affidavit was the basis upon which his compensation was fixed; and that the canvass made by them and by them returned, and tabulated by Mr. McBurney, is, in all respects, as worthy of credibility as any canvass for a city directory could possibly be.

As to its persuasiveness respecting any particular individual we would of course have very grave doubts, but as to the charges made and the facts en masse nothing could be more convincing. So we consider that whatever objections there are to the McBurney canvass go to its weight, and its weight is to be determined by its comparison with other testimony.

The minority of the committee assail this testimony as heresay:

There were 57 canvassers who did this work, only one of whom, Mr. Elmer L. Moone, was examined. The testimony as to the work done by the remaining 56 canvassers consists simply of a lot of names and residences written down in a book, signed by them, and which they left with Mr. McBurney. The latter testifies that he knows absolutely nothing as to the correctness of the work of any of these canvassers, but the tabulated figures which he makes are based upon the assumption that it is correct. In other words, he testifies as to what they told him.

The minority then quote at length the authorities against heresay evidence; and also attacks the canvass on its merits.

(m) The majority of the committee also draw unfavorable conclusions from the failure of sitting Member to contradict the testimony of false registration:

But when we consider the specific testimony on behalf of the contestant, pointing out people by name who had participated in unlawful registration and unlawful voting, when house after house was specifically referred to as places from which many persons had been registered, but did not live there and had never lived there; when, in a word, hundreds of accurately and unmistakably described instances were given of fraud which, if they had not occurred, could be disproved in a moment by witnesses who must have been subject to the call of the contestee, it amounts to little short of an admission of the truth of the contestant's statement for the contestee to say that it was not necessary to take testimony in his own behalf.

2. The fraudulent voting. The system under which the majority alleged this to have been done was disclosed by testimony as to the following features of the election:

In the wards in which the greatest frauds were perpetrated, 60 out of 113 judges and clerks who were appointed by the Democratic deputy commissioner as Republican judges and clerks were opposed to the election of Horton.

(b) The ejection of Republican challengers from polling places where fraudulent voting was about to take place.

(c) The activity and inactivity of the police in apparent furtherance of the plans for fraudulent voting, as shown by uncontradicted testimony.

(d) The use of repeaters, described by the majority of the committee as follows:

The various leaders in charge of repeating gangs possessed themselves of slips, upon each of which was recorded the name and address of some fictitious person, or of a person having no right to vote, who was registered in a certain precinct. Arranging these slips by precincts, the man in charge of the repeating crowd would, when approaching the polling place, distribute among his people the slips representing registrations from that precinct. The crowd then entered the polling place, each one giving to the judges the name which he found written on the slip in his hand. The judges, of course, promptly found the proper name and address upon the registration list and permitted the offering voter to vote. This operation was repeated at that precinct as often as it was deemed safe to do so until as many of the illegally registered names could be voted as the leader cared to risk; then the crowd passed on to the next precinct, where the same process was carried on.

Among the most striking incidents was the fact that at a polling place the votes cast while the repeating gangs were present would be given by voters who, to the number of over 100 consecutively, had no middle names, although in other parts of the poll lists such a phenomenon was not observed.

3. The recount of the ballots showed that sitting Member had been credited on the count with a larger number of votes than were actually cast. Contestant charged that this excess amounted to 913; and sitting Member admitted that it amounted to 402, thus leaving his official majority at only 3,151.

The recount also showed that sitting Member received 3,727 votes of persons not found either by the census or the McBurney canvass; and that contestant received 1,345 votes from such persons.

Deducting the 3,727 apparently fraudulent votes from sitting Member, would leave a majority for contestant; but the committee consider that in applying such a rule it would be necessary also to deduct the 1,345 apparently fraudulent votes from contestant's vote, which would still leave sitting Member elected. But in view of the widespread corruption. which tainted so many of the polling places, and in view of the fact that the testimony indicated that there had been some fraudulent manipulation of ballots after they were cast, the majority reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That no valid election for Representative in Congress was held in the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri on the 6th day of November, 1900, and that the seat now held by the contestee is hereby declared vacant.

The minority reported resolutions declaring sitting Member elected and entitled to the seat.

The report was debated on June 27 and 28,[1] and on the latter day the motion to substitute the minority proposition for the majority was disagreed to, yeas 100, nays, 136. Then the resolution declaring the seat vacant was agreed to.

1124. The North Carolina election case of Fowler v. Thomas, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Although the election in a large part of a county may be vitiated by disregard of law by the county election officers, yet the returns of unassailed precincts in the county should be counted.

On April 9, 1902,[2] Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted a report in the case of Fowler v. Thomas, of North Carolina.

The sitting Member had on the face of the returns a plurality of 1,909 votes over contestant, and a majority of 1,893 over all. The contestant claimed the rejection of enough votes to give himself a plurality of 574 votes. But in order to effect a result favorable to contestant it would be necessary to deduct, the entire vote of the two counties of Craven and Duplin, the first of which gave sitting Member a majority of 911 votes and the second of which gave him 810 majority.

[2] First session Fifty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 1514.

Craven County.—The first reason given for excluding the entire vote of Craven County is—that the county board of elections of Craven County, in appointing judges of election for the various voting precincts under the law of the State of North Carolina, which provides that each party shall have representation among the said judges, ignored those who had been recommended by the Republican executive committee in all the precincts in said county except Maple, Cypress, Truitts, Dover, Fort Barnwell, Core Creek, Lees Farm, First Ward, and Third Ward.

The vote in these excepted districts, as to which contestant concedes that the judges were properly appointed, was 915 for sitting Member and 357 for the contestant, a majority of 558 for the sitting Member. The report goes on:

There is evidence that in some or all of the other precincts the election officers were all Democrats, or that if Republicans they were not those recommended by the Republican executive committee. We are not satisfied that the consolidation of some of the other precincts, so as to crowd more Republican and Populist voters into one precinct than could readily vote and be counted in single day if attempts were made to delay the voting, was done for an honest purpose. But if we were to throw out all of those districts Mr. Thomas would still have a majority in the unattacked districts as above stated, and we have been shown no reason why the vote of the unattacked districts should be rejected. Therefore, notwithstanding the evidence of considerable irregularity in some parts of this county, we are unable to reject the entire vote as requested by contestant.

Duplin County.—The report says:

Contestant also complains that in Duplin County the election boards were either composed entirely of Democrats, or where Republicans or Populists were appointed they were not those recommended by the recognized authorities of said respective parties. It does not appear from the evidence that the Republican party submitted any list of those whom it desired placed upon the respective election boards. The Populists did, and asked for the appointment of a Populist on each election board. The county board, however, in some instances appointed Republicans and in others appointed Populists, but not always the persons named by the party authority.

There is evidence tending to show that in some of the districts the so-called Republican or Populists who were appointed were of doubtful allegiance to the parties they were supposed to represent and sometimes voted mixed tickets, but we have not been pointed to any evidence that they worked or voted against the contestant.

As to some districts no cause has been shown for complaint as to the complexion of the election boards, and upon the whole we are not satisfied that the vote of the entire county can properly be rejected.

There was also some evidence that, in the August election preceding the Congressional election of November, there was intimidation in Duplin County, but very little evidence of any in November.

There was also some evidence of other irregularities, but not enough to prevent the committee from arriving unanimously at the conclusion that the contestant had not been elected, and that the sitting Member was entitled to the seat.

On May 21,[1] the House, with little debate and no division, concurred in the report.

1125. The Ohio election case of Lentz v. Tompkins, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Instance wherein the Elections Committee condemned pleadings in notice and answer for irrelevant charges and insinuations.

The Elections Committee has no authority to alter or suppress improper pleadings in the notice and answer.

Ex parte and hearsay testimony is rejected by the Elections Committee.

The House should not count a bribed vote, although no State law may require its rejection.

The entire vote of a precinct should not be rejected simply because certain votes are shown to be corrupt by reason of bribery.

On April 10, 1902,[1] Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, presented the unanimous report of that committee in the case of Lentz v. Tompkins, of Ohio, finding that contestant was not elected, and that the sitting Member was entitled to the seat.

This report discussed two questions—(1) a question of pleading, and (2) the merits of the contest.

1. As to the pleading the committee say:

The statute governing contested Congressional elections provides that the contestant shall, within a specified time, give notice to the Member whose seat he designs to contest, "and in such notice shall specify specifically the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." The Member whose seat is contested must, "within thirty days after the service thereof, answer such notice, admitting or denying the facts alleged therein and state specifically any other grounds upon which he urges the validity of his election." (R. S., secs. 105, 106.)

This notice and answer constitute the pleadings of the case and are intended to present clearly the issue to be determined.

The notice filed by the contestant in this case contains 29 specifications, 18 of which were declared by his counsel to have been abandoned, no testimony whatever having been offered in support of any of them. They embraced charges against persons and matters in no wise connected with the Congressional election. They were evidently not intended to have any bearing upon the contest, but simply to place upon record slurs, insinuations, and direct charges against persons not parties to the proceeding and having no opportunity to defend themselves. The reply of the contestee also contains much that is objectionable and wholly unjustifiable, except as it may be stated to be a reply in kind to the notice of contest. Contestant then filed an additional paper, not authorized by law, containing matter still more scurrilous and abusive. All three of these papers would, if contained in pleadings in any court, be suppressed as scandalous and impertinent. Your committee has no authority to suppress or alter them, but desires as earnestly as possible to condemn the manifestly improper use of papers, which are intended by the act of Congress to be the means of enlightening the committee and the House as to the precise points at issue in the contest, by making them vehicles of abuse and vilification of each other by the parties to the contest, and particularly of third parties in no way connected therewith.

2. As to the merits of the contest, the committee found that Mr. Tompkins had an apparent plurality on the face of the returns of 18 votes. The report says:

The ballot in use in Ohio is of the form known as Australian, and under the laws of that State each ballot about which there is any dispute or question is required to be placed by the election officers in a sealed envelope, with evidence showing whether it was counted or not, and if counted, for whom. It is remarkable that in an election at which 51,903 votes were polled there were only 25 such ballots. Some of them were counted for contestant, some for contestee, some were not counted at all, and as to others there is no evidence showing whether they were counted or not, or if counted, for whom.

Having carefully examined these ballots and the law relating thereto, your committee finds that a proper counting of them shows an increase of 1 vote in favor of contestee, increasing his plurality to 19.

The committee go on to notice the charges of bribery made against the sitting Member, and after analyzing the testimony rejected certain as ex parte, certain other as hearsay, and other because it was shown that it had been procured by the offer of bribes. Finally the committee conclude:

But if the ex parte affidavits and the hearsay testimony were all admitted and all the testimony accepted as true according to the construction most favorable to contestant, it could not be found that more than 10 persons had received or been promised, either directly or indirectly, compensation to vote for Mr. Tompkins.

The integrity of the election returns is in no way attacked. No election officer has been proved, or even charged, with any irregularity whatever. No such general bribery in any precinct has been shown as ought to require the entire return to be rejected. But if there had we could not tell what precincts to throw out, as the evidence as to some of the said 10 persons does not show in what precinct or precincts they voted, and as to others does not show that they voted at all. Furthermore, as to some of the 10 who are shown to have voted, it does not appear whether they voted for Tompkins or Lentz.

If we were convinced that any precinct ought to be thrown out entirely we could not say whether to throw it out would benefit the contestant or contestee, as we have not been furnished evidence showing the vote by precincts. We have the vote by counties only. Surely we could not throw out a whole county, even if it were clearly shown that the 10 persons had been bribed and had voted.

The injustice of disfranchising more than 50,000 honest voters will at once appear. There is authority in the minority report in Delano v. Morgan, 2 Bart., 204, written by a former Speaker of the House, that as the law of Ohio provides only for the punishment of persons offering or receiving bribes, but does not declare their votes illegal, therefore they must be counted. But we can not consent to this doctrine, holding, as we do, that to receive and count a vote clearly shown to have been cast as the result of a bribe would be in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of all laws tending to secure the freedom and purity of the ballot.

If satisfied from the evidence that these 10 persons had been paid to vote for contestee and bad so voted, your committee would not reject the entire vote of the respective precincts in which they deposited their ballots, even if we knew which precincts they were, or had returns by precincts so that we might act upon them. We would not throw out the entire precinct, but exclude the illegal votes, following Robinson v. Harrison, Fifty-fourth Congress, Report 1121, Bowen v. Buchanan, Rowell, 196. But the throwing out of such votes would not change the result of the election.

On May 21 [1] the report was considered by the House, and after brief debate the House, without division, concurred in the conclusion of the committee, and confirmed the sitting Member in his seat.

1126. The South Carolina election case of Johnston v. Stokes, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Where the notice of contest was objected to as to specifications not relating to vital questions, the Elections Committee disregarded the objections.

A declination of members of one political party to participate at an improvised poll legally conducted does not vitiate the vote cast.

The House, overruling its committee, declared the seat vacant in a case wherein thousands of voters were kept from the polls by what it deemed an unconstitutional registration law.

[1] Record, p. 5755.

Instance wherein the House determined that a State registration law was obnoxious to the State constitution.

The House declined to count votes of persons whose right to vote was illegally nullified on the evidence of statements of fact signed by those persons.

Discussion of a signed statement of an elector whose vote has been refused in relation to the doctrine of res gestae.

Form of resolution declaring a contested seat vacant.

On April 13, 1902,[1] Mr. John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the report of the majority in the case of Johnston v. Stokes, of South Carolina. The sitting Member, on the face of the returns, had a plurality of 4,702 votes, but certain corrections reduced this to 4,204.

A preliminary question had been raised by the sitting Member, who insisted that the notice of contest was not sufficient under the law, inasmuch as it failed to state particularly the grounds upon which the contestant relied in the contest. But as the result did not turn upon the objections, the committee went on and heard the case without passing on the question. In the course of his argument[2] before the House Mr. Jenkins discussed these specifications quite fully.

Two features of the case, over which there was no argument as to law or fact, were:

(a) At the precincts of Gadsden and Eastover the regularly appointed election officers—all members of sitting Member's party—did not open the polls. Thereupon members of the party supporting contestant improvised a board of election and held an election, following all the requirements of law. The voters of sitting Member's party declined, however, to participate in this election. The committee were unanimous in counting the votes of these precincts, which had also in fact been allowed, at the request of counsel for both sides, by the State canvassers.

(b) At Strawberry Ferry, after the official returns were made by the precinct officers to the board of county canvassers, and before that body proceeded to canvass the votes of Berkeley County, the ballot box used at Strawberry Ferry, containing the votes cast at that precinct, the official returns, poll list, and tally sheets, were all stolen. By competent evidence it was proved that there were cast at that precinct 104 votes—92 for Johnston and 12 for Stokes-and the committee has counted them for the respective parties, as proven.

Aside from these minor points the decision of the case turns upon the registration law of South Carolina and questions arising out of its application. No better statement of the facts in regard to this law can be made than is contained in the brief minority views filed by Mr. Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, whose views the House finally adopted.

I concur in the conclusion of the majority of the committee that the contestant was not elected. The testimony, in my opinion, does not show such a tender of votes on the part of the excluded voters, such as the authorities require, as will justify the counting of a sufficient number of them to overcome the adverse plurality. But while the testimony is not sufficient for such a purpose, it does show a wholesale exclusion of voters and an unfair application of the registration law.

The law only provides one registration place in each county, and only one day for registration each month from December to June, inclusive. Although the constitution provides that a male person otherwise qualified shall have the right to vote who has resided in the precinct sixty days before the election, the registration law, in fact, denied him registration, and, consequently, the right to vote unless he had resided in the precinct on the 1st day of July preceding the election. This provision is clearly repugnant to the constitution of South Carolina, which, under the pretense of regulating suffrage, imposes a new qualification upon it and is, therefore, unconstitutional. I may add that the chief justice of South Carolina and the judge of the United States court for that circuit each rendered an opinion that the law was unconstitutional, and although their associates held in each of the cases presented that the court did not have jurisdiction, that fact does not detract from the weight of the opinions.

The testimony shows that many voters, some of them coming 30 or 40 miles, appeared regularly at the places of registration from month to month, and were denied registration by means of a systematic obstruction. It shows further that many thousand men who had the constitutional qualification, but were not registered, and who therefore had the right to vote if the registration laws were unconstitutional, expressed their desire to vote by going to the polls. Doubtless many thousands more unregistered voters remained at home who would have come had they not known that a rule requiring registration certificates was in force and that they would be excluded if they came.

"If the officers conducting an election adopt and enforce an erroneous rule as to the qualification of voters which prevents certain legal voters who offer to vote from giving in their votes, and being made known prevents other legal voters similarly situated from offering to vote, the election may be set aside, especially if it appear that such votes if offered and received would have changed, or rendered doubtful, the result. After a decision has been made by the election officers affecting the right of a class of voters to vote and that decision becomes known, it is not necessary that every voter belonging to such class should offer his vote and have it formally rejected." (McCrary on Elections, third edition, section 241; Scranton borough election case, Brightly's Election Cases, 4,55.)

The colored race is enormously in the majority in this district, and it appears that as a rule the voters of that race in that district were Republicans. Believing that the registration law of South Carolina was unconstitutional, I am constrained to find from the evidence in this case that if said law had not been applied at all, or even fairly applied, the result would probably have been different, and I am therefore not able to give my assent to the conclusions of the majority of my colleagues that the contestee was elected.

The entire committee were—unanimously of the opinion that this registration law was unconstitutional, and all arguments proceeded on the basis that such was the fact.

The contestant, realizing that this registration law was the means of disfranchising his supporters, had printed in advance and distributed to list keepers at the several polling places the following forms of petition:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of the subscribers, citizens of the State of South Carolina, respectfully showeth

That your petitioners are over the age of 21 years and male residents of the county of Colleton, and the voting precinct of Walterboro, in the county and State aforesaid, and are legally qualified to register and vote.

That on this the 6th day of November, 1894, they did present themselves at said voting precinct in order to vote for Member of Congress, and that they were denied the right to vote.

That your petitioners have made every reasonable effort to become qualified to vote according to the registration law of this State, but have been denied an equal chance and the same opportunity to register as are accorded to others of their fellow-citizens.

Your petitioners desired and intended to vote for Hon. Thomas B. Johnston for Member of Congress

Wherefore your petitioners pray that you investigate the facts herein stated and the practical workings of the registration and election laws of this State and devise some means to secure to us the free exercise of the rights guaranteed to us by the constitution of this State and the laws and Constitution of the United States, and your petitioners will ever pray, etc.

An aggregate of 7,336 names were signed to petitions of this kind, the signatures being made sometimes by the person and sometimes by the list keeper or another who was authorized to sign.

The main issue of the case arises over the admissibility of these lists as testimony that the person whose vote was rejected was a legally qualified voter, that he actually made a tender of his vote, and that the vote so tendered was a vote for contestant.

Two distinct questions are involved in this branch of the case: (1) A question of law, and (2) a question of facts.

1. As to the question of law.

A minority of the committee, composed of Messrs. Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana, James A. Walker, of Virginia, and Henry F. Thomas, of Michigan, contended that the lists were competent evidence. They say in their views:

> The evidence discloses that, on account of the very large number of voters who were present at the polls and desired to vote for the contestant, and made effort to cast their votes and failed, it was impossible to take the evidence of each separate voter, and to facilitate the matter and properly show the entire conditions that existed, and the number of voters thus deprived of their vote, lists of voters were kept by various parties at the precincts; and the person keeping said lists submitted himself to examination and testified to the facts, and it is sought by the contestant to admit in evidence these lists so prepared as above stated.

After describing the form of the petition, they say—

> Nor should we be unmindful of the truth so we11 expressed in Reed v. Kneass (Brightley's Election Cases, 260):
> "The true policy, to maintain and perpetuate the vote by ballot, is found in jealously guarding its purity, in placing no fine-drawn metaphysical obstructions in the way of testing election returns charged as false and fraudulent, and in assuring to the people by a jealous, vigilant, and determined investigation of election frauds, that there is a saving spirit in the public tribunals charged with such investigations, ready to do them justice if their suffrages have been tampered with by fraud, or misapprehended through error."
> This language is quoted with approval in McCreary on Elections, section 467, and the author adds:
> "It is the spirit of this rule that questions respecting evidence in contested-election cases should be solved."
> No doubt it is true, as a general proposition, that the party offering evidence is required to produce the best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible, but it will be observed that the nature of the case is to be considered. Here a class of men numbering thousands was denied the right to vote because of the nature, as well as the administration, of the registration law of South Carolina. To have examined each of these witnesses concerning each and all of the facts establishing his right to registration and to vote, proving the incidents of the attempt or failure to exercise the right of suffrage, and subjecting the witnesses to lengthy cross-examinations by contestee's attorneys, would have required more time than the law grants for the taking of testimony and have caused a miscarriage of justice. And so it became incumbent upon the contestant to offer the best evidence that he could command within the limitations and conditions existing, and he did that by furnishing the written declarations of these men as to their qualifications, efforts, and purposes, supplemented by the testimony of men who knew them, to the effect that they were entitled to but were denied the right of suffrage. Where there is no substitution of evidence, but only a selection of weaker instead of stronger proofs, or an omission to supply all the proofs capable of being produced, the rule concerning the production of the best evidence is not infringed. (1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 14 ed., sec. 82.) We submit that the contestant's evidence was a selection of weaker instead of stronger proofs, and for the very best of reasons, considering reasons from the standpoint of existing conditions and not of theory.

They then proceed to refer to the text writers and the precedents, Greenleaf on Evidence, the New Jersey, or Broad Seal case, Vallandigham v. Campbell, certain English cases,[1] etc., and say:

The principle underlying the Congressional cases above cited is this: That the declaration of a voter, or one entitled to vote at a given election, made at or in the vicinity of the voting place immediately following his effort to vote, concerning his own acts and qualifications or disqualifications, are parts of the res gestae, and are admissible in evidence. In voting or in attempting to vote, or in being present at the polls with the desire to vote, the voter is discharging, or attempting to discharge, or desiring to discharge one of the most solemn and momentous duties of citizenship, and to us it seems clear that his every act and word calculated to show in any degree what his purposes or qualifications were are clearly admissible in evidence as part of the res gestae. This evidence may be furnished by the depositions of others, or by the written statements of others, made at the time, preserving and exhibiting the statements or declarations or admissions, either oral or written, made by the voter or the nonvoter, as the case may be, as is clearly established by the preceding authorities.

After announcing their endorsement to the following statement of principle made by counsel in the case—

We are aware that, while the same general rules of evidence which govern courts of law are observed in the investigation of contested election cases, yet the rules of evidence are applied by the committee more according to their spirit than with the technical strictness observed by ordinary judicial tribunals.

The minority call attention to the fact that the declarations of the rejected voters "were brought into the record by the depositions of the men who made the lists, or who signed to the petitions the names of the rejected voters at their request," and say:

These authorities, and the reasoning upon which they are predicated, clearly show that the declarations of those who were deprived of the privilege of voting on election day are competent evidence in support of the allegation that they were lawful voters, intended to vote, were deprived of that privilege, and would have voted for contestant. These declarations were made at the time of holding the election, and to persons in or near the voting places. They related to the subject-matter of the election, formed a part of the history of the transactions of the election, and were in the highest and truest sense parts of the res gestae.

Further, in debate,[2] Mr. Overstreet explained that the minority counted only the lists where the voters in person approached the list keeper in the vicinity of the polling booth immediately after the rejection of the vote and disclosed to him the facts which showed his qualifications; and second where the persons did not approach the list keeper, but where the latter swears that he saw the vote rejected, and also swears to the facts that show the person to have been a qualified voter and belonging to a political party supporting contestant. In cases where a third person, not the list keeper, deposed to the fact that the list was kept, or where the lists were not kept, at the polling place, the minority rejected them.

The majority of the committee—and on this feature of the case Mr. McCall concurred with them—decline to accept the lists as testimony. The report says:

No doubt it is the safer and better rule, when the evidence will warrant it, and as this House has done in many instances since the Nineteenth Congress, to count lawful votes, lawfully tendered and unlawfully refused, when the number is sufficient to change the result and it is known for what candidate the elector intended to vote. But before the vote can be counted, it ought to appear by competent evidence that qualified electors, sufficient in number to change the result, had lawfully tendered their votes and were unlawfully rejected, and for whom the rejected electors would have voted if they had been permitted to vote.

Certainly this is as far as any court or legislative body ought to go. But in this case, to unseat the contestee, this House is asked to go further—to receive the declarations of a supposed elector in order to count his vote—a position not sustained by any law writer or judicial authority anywhere. Yet even if this was the law and rule of the House it would not affect the right of the contestee to his seat in the House, because under it not a dozen votes could be counted for the contestee according to law and evidence.

An examination of the evidence will prove that, with very few exceptions, no declarations were made, not even anything that could be called hearsay evidence, and if what are called declarations are admissible none of the same are sufficient to show that a qualified elector lawfully tendered his vote and was unlawfully rejected, and for whom he would have voted if permitted to vote. Moreover, all of these so-called declarations were made away from the polling place and subsequent to any offer or attempt to vote, even if any such were made. Yet it is asked, on this class of testimony, that enough votes be counted to impeach the certificate of election held by the contestee.

In the debate [1] Mr. Jenkin more specifically criticized the petition, calling attention to the fact that the signers do not even declare that they tried to vote, but say that they desired and intended to vote; that they were not in fact declarations or even memoranda.

The report of the majority continues further in this line:

It is also difficult to understand what reliance can be placed upon the lists as evidence, if the heading to the lists contained all the necessary elements to justify the counting of the votes. The signing of the same would not make the lists evidence. It would only be ex parte evidence at the best. It would not be as strong as an affidavit, and certainly an ex parte affidavit would not be considered as evidence, for a party has a right to be present when witnesses are examined in his case and participate in the examination.

If the mode of procedure had in this case is permitted, this valuable right would be denied. Not a fact that must be proved in order to count a vote can be found in the headings of the lists. There is no statement in the heading that they tendered their vote or that they belonged to a class of electors that were denied the right to vote by the election officers. If the declaration of the elector who was denied the right to vote can not be received, certainly the headings of the petition can not be admitted as evidence for a declaration.

No doubt a few votes can be counted, but not enough to make mention of; but independent of that there is no evidence to show declarations of electors as to their qualifications, intentions, or efforts to vote.

It is elementary that hearsay evidence is not admissible in election cases. The same rules of law apply in election cases as in all other cases, and while the power of the House is very great in election cases, yet its actions should be governed by law and evidence. It is not only just, but safe.

If the House, uninfluenced by partisan feeling, decide election cases according to the established principles of law and rules of evidence, it will come nearer doing exact and equal justice; and it will be establishing a dangerous precedent to admit what is offered in this case to impeach the title to a seat in this House.

It was argued upon the part of the contestant that these lists, etc., might be received as a part of the res gestae. It certainly is no part of the res gestae, for anything said or done after the vote was rejected and the elector had gone away from the polls would have no connection whatever with the principal fact, which in this case was what was said and done by the elector at the polls when offering to vote. But even this position would fail from the fact that no declarations were made, if correct as a proposition of law.

The question of the res gestae was also gone into very thoroughly in the debate.[2]

(2) As to the facts relating to the petitions.

The minority of the committee did not contend that all of the 7,366 names on the lists should be credited to contestant. They credited him with 4,523 votes—enough to show his election—adopting principles governing their rulings, illustrated by the following cases:

[1] Record, pp. 5909, 5910.

[2] See remarks of Mr. Powers, of Vermont, Record, p. 5904.

(a) In Calleton County they count the lists for these reasons:

The lists of voters taken at the various precincts in said county were brought into the record by the witnesses who took the declarations from the voters immediately after the vote was rejected and in the vicinity of the polling place, the qualification of all of said voters whose ballots were so rejected being shown either by the heading of the petition or paper upon which their names were entered or by the statement of the voter himself, for the paper, being signed by the voter or by one authorized to sign it for him, discloses the qualification and intention of the voter, and therefore becomes a part of the declaration itself; and, taken together, all constitute one and the same transaction, and each of said votes should be counted the same as if each of the voters themselves had come upon the stand and testified singly to the same statements.

(b) In Sumter County a more liberal rule was followed:

Lists of voters whose votes were rejected were kept by persons who testify in the case, but at these precincts the voters whose votes were so rejected did not make the declaration to the persons who kept the lists, but an examination of the evidence shows that the witnesses who testify to having kept these lists testify to the qualification of the voters and the fact of their rejection, and testify also that these voters belong to the Republican party; and, as herein before held, inasmuch as Johnston was the regular candidate of the Republican party, it is reasonable to assume that the voters at these precincts mentioned intended to cast their votes for the contestant, and we therefore count the votes at these precincts.

The minority also say:

Objection is made in the majority report of the committee that all of these lists are not properly tendered in evidence, and therefore can not be considered as part of the record. But, while it is true that the formal technical presentation of the list, filed as an exhibit, was not resorted to in each case, yet the lists themselves appear in the record and are subject to the scrutiny and criticism of the committee; and, inasmuch as they conform to the testimony introducing them, it is our opinion that the objection to their form of presentation is too technical to warrant their exclusion, and we have therefore considered them as having been properly introduced in the case.

The majority of the committee do not admit the contention that the lists justify the addition of the number of votes allowed by the minority, even in view of their admission as evidence. Mr. James H. Codding, of Pennsylvania, who filed views of his own,[1] called attention to three precincts, on the lists of which contestant was credited by the minority with 293 votes (the minority contention only allowed him a plurality of 233 votes), on evidence that did not come up even to the rules established by the majority.

From the different views of the case, the majority proposed to declare sitting Member entitled to the seat; the minority proposed to seat the contestant, and Mr. McCall proposed to declare the seat vacant, on the ground that there had been no valid election.

The report was debated fully and ably in the House on May 26, 28, and 29.[2] On the latter day the proposition of the minority, to award the seat to the contestant, offered as a substitute, was rejected—yeas 95, nays 105[3]—and at the same time the majority resolution declaring contestant not elected was agreed to—yeas 103, nays

[1] These views do not appear with the report, but were presented in the House on May 28, and may be found in the Record, p. 5875.

[3] Journal, pp. 552, 553.

99. On June 1 this latter vote was reconsidered, and Mr. McCall offered as a substitute for the majority resolutions the following:

That there was no valid election for Representative in the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina on the sixth day of November, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, and that neither Thomas B. Johnston nor J. William Stokes is entitled to a seat therein.

This substitute was agreed to—yeas 130, nays 125. Then the resolutions of the majority, as amended, were agreed to.[1]

1127. The Virginia election case of Wilson v. Lassiter in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Incompetent testimony and long statements by counsel tending to present such evidence should not be included in the record of an election case.

The mere existence of frauds and irregularities does not vitiate an election if insufficient to affect the result.

On June 30, 1902;[2] Mr. Kittredge Haskins, of Vermont, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted a report in the case of Wilson v. Lassiter, of Virginia. The sitting Member in this case was returned by an official majority of 4,738. The committee concluded:

That while the evidence shows that frauds and irregularities were practiced in the interest of the contestee it falls short of being sufficient to legally justify a change in the result of the election.

The minority of the committee concurred in the result, but not in admitting that frauds were shown.

On an incidental question the report says:

The practice of introducing into the record in contested election cases, as was done in this case, testimony clearly incompetent and irrelevant, and long statements by counsel intended to convey information as to facts which could not be properly proven, is inexcusable and deserves to be severely condemned.

This report was not acted on at this session of Congress.

1128. The Missouri election case of Wagoner v. Butler in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

The returns of 41 out of 116 election precincts being rejected, the contestant was seated on his plurality in the remaining precincts, which cast over half the returned vote.

Offlcial copies of registration lists, such copies made in pursuance of law, were admitted as evidence of the registration by a divided committee.

A fraudulent registration was held to justify a conclusion that a conspiracy existed to perpetrate fraud in the election.

Instance wherein the city directory and a canvass by means of registered letters was accepted to discredit a registration.

Where a law requiring ballots to be numbered, even though directory merely, was totally disregarded, and the poll books and ballot boxes disagreed essentially, the returns were rejected.

[2] First session Fifty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 2744.

In a district where gross frauds prevailed generally irregularities in the reception and record of the ballots were held to justify rejection of the return.

On February 24, 1903,[1] Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, presented the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections No. 2 in the Missouri case of Wagoner v. Butler. The sitting Member had been returned at a special election, November 4, 1903, by a plurality of 6,293. The report thus states the circumstances of the case:

At the regular Congressional election in 1900 James J. Butler, the Democratic candidate, was returned as having been elected to membership in the Fifty-seventh Congress by a plurality of 3,553. His Republican opponent, William M. Horton, contested his election.

That case was heard by Committee on Elections No. 1, which, in an able and exhaustive report[2] presented by its chairman to this House April 5, 1902, found that frauds numerous and varied had been so extensively practiced in or relating to said election that the honest choice of the voters could not be determined, and recommended a resolution, adopted by this House June 28, 1902, to the effect that there had been no valid election and that the seat held by Mr. Butler be declared vacant. The governor of Missouri ordered a special election to fill the vacancy thus caused, which special election was held Tuesday, November 4, 1902, that being also the day for the regular election of Representatives in the Fifty-eighth Congress. Mr. Butler was returned as elected to fill the vacancy in this present Congress caused by his own unseating and by the increased plurality of 6,293. He took the oath of office December 1, 1902, and now occupies the seat of which he was once deprived by the action of this House, as above indicated.

His counsel informs your committee that at the same election Mr. Butler was also elected to membership in the Fifty-eighth Congress and by a still larger plurality. No evidence concerning that election has, however, been presented to your committee, and with it this Congress has, in any event, no concern.

Mr. Wagoner, who was not a candidate for membership in the Fifty-eighth Congress, contests the election of Mr. Butler for the remainder of the Fifty-seventh Congress and claim himself to have been lawfully chosen to fill the vacancy.

The notice of contest charges that in and with respect to 63 election precincts, hereinafter named, there were practiced nearly every variety of fraud yet devised for producing unfair and dishonest political results, such as padded registration, repeating, false personation, the reception of ballots from persons whose names were not upon the registration books and, therefore, under the laws of the State of Missouri, not entitled to vote at all, the stuffing of ballot boxes, fraudulent conspiracies on the part of election officers to prevent free voting and honest returns, improper interference by the police, intimidation, and, in some instances, actual violence. As to some, if not all, of these precincts the charges are well sustained by proof.

The Twelfth Congressional district comprises certain wards and parts of wards, and is wholly within the city of St. Louis. It extends across the city from east to west, the western end, however, being considerably wider and greater in extent than the eastern, which borders upon the Mississippi River. No complaint is made as to the election in the western portion of the district, but the middle and eastern portions embrace what are, let us trust, the worst portions of the city, and contain the lowest classes of her inhabitants. Saloons, bawdy houses, low theaters, mule stables, boarding houses for roustabouts, gambling houses, etc., here abound in great profusion, and the field is well adapted to corrupt political practices.

The district comprises 116 election precincts. As to 53 of these, counsel for the parties mutually agree that there were no such irregularities as would justify the setting aside or modification of the returns.

As to the 63 precincts remaining in dispute, the majority found that in 41 it was impossible to determine the true and lawful vote, and therefore that the returns should be rejected. These returns from the 41 precincts had given Butler 9,239 and Wagoner 2,179, a majority of 7,060. So it is evident that the rejection of the 41 precincts gave to contestant a majority of 1–67 in the district. The vote returned for contestant and sitting Member together in the whole district was 27,395, and the total vote for both in the rejected 41 precincts (out of 116 precincts in all) was 11,418. So the portion rejected was less than half the vote and less than half the precincts.

[1] Second session Fifty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 3857.

[2] First session, Fifty-seventh Congress, House Report No. 2744.

In discussing the reasons justifying the rejection of the precincts in question, the majority first describe the registration system.

The so-called "Nesbit law," adopted in 1899, provides election machinery applicable to the city of St. Louis only.

Counsel for contestant claim that the provisions of this law give partisan control of the election machinery and facilitate the perpetration of corrupt practices. Counsel for contestee claims that some of its most objectionable provisions were eliminated by the supplementary act of 1901. It appears that in 1898, just prior to the adoption of the Nesbit law, this particular district elected a Republican Congressman by a majority of 2,321, but since the adoption of the law Democratic majorities have invariably been returned. This of itself may or not prove anything. It seems to your committee that the law, even as amended, contains some very objectionable features.

The entire election machinery of the whole city is placed under the control of a "board of election commissioners," composed of three members appointed by the governor for the term of four years. The law does, indeed, provide that "one of said commissioners shall be a member of and belong to the leading party politically opposed to that to which the governor belongs." Nevertheless, he is selected by the governor and not likely to be very antagonistic to the party whose governor confers upon him the position. It is provided that "said election commissioners shall make all necessary rules and regulations, not inconsistent with this article, with reference to the registration of voters and conduct of elections, and shall have charge of and make provisions for all elections, general, special, local, municipal, State and county, and of all others of every description to be held in such city or any part thereof at any time."

The voters in the several election precincts are not permitted to select their own judges, inspectors, and clerks of election, but this board of three election commissioners appointed by the governor is authorized to select for each polling place four judges and two clerks of election. It is, indeed, provided that two of the judges and one of the clerks shall be "designated" by the minority commissioner. It requires, however, the concurrence of at least one of the majority commissioners to make this designation effective.

The provision of the Nesbit law with reference to registration is a striking feature, and, it is believed, unknown to the election machinery of any other city. A voter may upon a certain day register in the precinct in which he lives, but except upon that day registration must be made outside of the precinct, and in many cases outside of the Congressional district, at the office of the central board of election commissioners. The provisions of the Nesbit law upon this matter of registration afford a wide field for fraud. It appears from the testimony that by far the greater portion of the names appearing upon the registration books were placed there not in the precincts where the voters lived, but at the central office of the board of election commissioners.

The four judges of election in each precinct are constituted by law a board of registration for their precinct, but, as already stated, the majority of registrations are made at the office of the board of election commissioners and not with the precinct board.

The general board is required to furnish to the precinct board verification lists. No new, names are permitted to be added after "the Saturday following the Tuesday three weeks preceding such election," but the clerks of election are constituted canvassers of their respective precincts and, being supplied with the verification lists, may "come together and canvass their precinct, calling at each dwelling house for the purpose of verifying the register." When that has been done a further meeting is to be had for corrections of the registration. Then it is provided by law that—

"SEC. 7238. Judges shall sign registry—registry to be sent to commissioners—commissioners to proceed—how lists public records.

"At the end of the last session provided for the said board of registration and said clerk shall compare and correct the registers aforesaid and make them correspond and agree; and said judges shall then, immediately following the last name on each page of the register, sign their names so that no other name can be added without discovery, and shall return the two registers to the possession of the election commissioners; thereupon the said commissioners shall at once cause copies to be made of such registers, of all the names upon the same, with the address, and arranged according to the streets, avenues, or alleys, commencing with the lowest number and arranging the same in order according to street numbers, and shall then cause such precinct register, under such arrangement, to be printed in sufficient numbers to meet all demands, and upon application a copy of the same shall be given to any person in such precinct. Said registers in the office of the election commissioners shall be public records and open to public inspection."

Duly authenticated copies of these precinct registers were presented in the testimony and relied on by the majority.

The minority views [1] present testimony to show the unreliability of the lists, and say:

The lists above referred to, which are named "Exhibit C, of January 3, 1903, on the part of the contestant," and are made a part of the record in this case, were introduced on January 3, 1903, with the testimony of Louis P. Aloe, which appears on page 289 of the record. Mr. Aloe identified them as official lists of the registered voters of the various precincts, as issued by the election commissioners' office for the convenience of voters, official, however, only, as he afterwards stated, in the sense that they were issued by the election commissioners' office. He states that these sheets were printed from the verification lists which are prepared by the judges and clerks of election in the various precincts as provided for by section 7233, which is as follows:

"SEC. 7233. Verification lists—challenges.—The election commissioners shall prepare and furnish to the board of registration in each precinct two blank books to be known as 'verification lists,' each page to be ruled into columns and contain pages sufficient for each street, avenue, and alley in the precinct. During the progress of registration or immediately thereafter, the clerks of said board shall transfer all the names upon the register to the left-hand pages of such 'verification lists,' arranging them according to the streets, avenues, alleys, or courts, beginning with the lowest residence number and placing them numerically, as nearly as possible, from the lowest up to the highest number. They shall, first write the name of such street, avenue, alley, or court at the top of the second column and then proceed to transfer the registered names to the pages of such 'verification lists,' headed 'Registered names,' according to the street number, as above indicated.

"If, during either day of registration, a registered voter of the ward shall come before the board of registry and make oath that he believes that any particular person upon such registry is not a qualified voter, such fact shall be noted, and after the completion of such 'verification lists,' such board or one of said judges shall make across or check a in ink opposite such name upon each of said 'verification lists.' If such judges shall, however, know that any person so complained of is a qualified voter, and shall believe that such complaint was only made to vex and harass such qualified voter, then such cross or checked mark shall not be put upon such lists. Said board of registration shall, before 8 o'clock on the following day, return said 'verification lists' to the office of such election commissioners." (New section.)

The above section is contained in the law of 1895 and is no part of the much-abused Nesbit law.

It will be seen that these registration sheets, upon which the majority of the committee rests so much of their case, can not be said to have special verity or genuineness of character to be admitted as evidence of the actual legal registration in any court in the United States. It is not suggested that they have the color of verity in any degree, such as would examined copies or certified copies of the registration books.

[1] Presented by Mr. John J. Feely, of Illinois.

They are not copies of the registration books. They are not even copies of copies of the registration books, but they are arranged from verification lists, which verification lists are made up by taking the names of the registered voters from the registration books and arranging them by streets, avenues, and alleys, commencing with the lowest street number of any voter registered from any street, etc.

The majority report finds from testing the registration that it was to a large extent false and fraudulent and that the conclusion therefrom is irresistible that a conspiracy existed in the district to perpetrate systematic fraud in the interest of sitting Member:

Contestant addressed or caused to be addressed and sent through the post-office a registered letter to each person whose name and address were thus shown to be registered in the 63 precincts in controversy. The total number of registered letters thus Mailed was 25,179. Of this number, 12,608 were returned, with endorsements bearing the number of the letter carrier and statements to the effect that the parties were not found at the address given. These letters were mailed, some on the 16th and some on the 17th of December following the election.

Of the 25,179 names appearing on the officially published registry lists, 16,045 do not appear in the city directory for 1902, and, as will hereinafter appear, thousands of votes were cast and counted in names not appearing upon either.

Four thousand six hundred and sixty-nine of the registered letters returned bore the statements of the letter carriers to the effect that the parties to whom they were addressed had "removed." Of this 4,669 names of persons appearing upon the registry lists, all of whom "removed "shortly after election, only 245 grace the pages of the St. Louis city directory for 1902.

These registry lists, printed by authority and required by law to be published for the information of the public as to the registration in each precinct, were offered and received in evidence, with no objection whatever on the part of the contestee, either as to their authenticity or relevancy, or as to their not being the best evidence. But the minority election commissioner was cross-examined and subsequently called on behalf of contestee for the purpose of showing that they were not correct. He actually testified that they were not, but that a great many of the names which were actually upon the registration books in his office were not included in these printed sheets.

Contestee also placed in evidence the certificate of the secretary of the board of election commissioners, showing 425 names upon the original registration book of Ward 22, precinct 1, whereas the printed registry sheets showed only 205; also a similar certificate showing 676 names upon the registration book in the office of the board of election commissioners from Ward 4, precinct 7, although the printed registry sheets showed only 169.

These exhibits, offered on behalf of Mr. Butler, seem to your committee to present the highest evidence of fraud. No names could have been honestly placed upon the registration books after the published registry sheets were given out except in a few cases of persons who, having been refused registration in their respective precincts, had appealed to the board of election commissioners. The testimony of the minority commissioner is to the effect that there were not more than forty of such cases in the entire city of St. Louis, but in this Congressional district alone thousands of persons voted whose names were not upon the printed registry lists, and it now appears from the contestee's own testimony that in one of the precincts above mentioned less than half the names upon the registration books were contained in the printed sheets and in the other less than a fourth.

This same state of affairs, extending throughout the entire district or at least throughout the 63 precincts in controversy, shows premeditated and deliberate fraud, for either thousands of names were illegally added to the registration after the giving out of the printed sheets or else thousands of the names upon the registration books were deliberately and intentionally omitted from the published lists for the purpose of depriving the public of ascertaining or knowing the extent to which false registration had been made. No such glaring discrepancies as are here apparent can possibly be accounted for upon the ground of accident or ignorance.

Counsel for Butler has insisted with great earnestness that the evidence as to the sending out of the registered letters and the results thereof was improperly offered by contestant in rebuttal and ought not, therefore, to be considered by your committee. The fact appears to be, however, that the sending of such letters having become public, the person who had charge of the matter was called by contestee himself and much information concerning the results elicited.

An attempt was also made by contestee to impugn the character of this witness, for the purpose of discrediting his evidence as to the number of letters sent out and those returned. The contestee himself having proceeded so far in the taking of testimony upon the subject, your committee is unable to see that it was not proper for contestant, in rebuttal, to place in evidence the letters themselves, bearing the returns of the letter carriers who had attempted to deliver them. We are not prepared, however, to accept the conclusions which the contestant asks us to draw from this testimony. In a given case a man may have been lawfully entitled to vote, although his name did not appear in the city directory published some months before the election, and he was not found by the letter carrier a few weeks after the election. We therefore decline to cast out any particular vote or votes upon that ground.

Nevertheless the fact that so great a number of names appearing upon the registry list could not be found either in the directory or by the letter carriers does throw suspicion upon the integrity of the registration. When this is coupled with evidence offered by the contestee himself to show that thousands of names were found upon the registration books which do not appear in the printed lists, and were therefore not embraced within the registered-letter scheme of detection, and that the votes of such persons not upon the registry lists were received by hundreds and thousands throughout these 63 precincts, the conclusion is irresistible that there was premeditated and systematic fraud perpetrated in the interest of the contestee.

It appears from the evidence that, although the law of Missouri expressly provides that no vote shall be received from any person not registered, there were in these 63 precincts actually cast for Mr. Butler 3,017 ballots and for Mr. Wagoner 636 ballots by persons whose names did not appear upon the printed registry sheets submitted to the public. Higher evidence of fraud it would be difficult to imagine.

The constitution of Missouri expressly provides "that in all cases of contested elections the ballots cast may be counted, compared with the list of voters, and examined under such safeguards and regulations as may be prescribed by law."

There appear in the evidence in this case the complete registration lists for these 63 precincts, showing the name of every person registered according to the information which the election commissioners supplied to the public immediately before election. Also the poll books giving the name and address of every person who appeared and voted, or at least in whose name a ballot was deposited, and, the boxes having been opened, the evidence showing for what candidate for Congress the ballot voted in that name was cast. With all this information before us it is possible to detect some, though not all, of the frauds which have been perpetrated.

The report proceeds to consider each of the 41 precincts in detail. In several of these there is direct affirmative testimony as to the fraudulent character of the registration, the witnesses being personally cognizant of frauds. In the Fourth Ward, ninth precinct, where a mob assaulted and badly injured an election officer of contestant's party, the following state of facts was disclosed, as viewed by the majority:

We have in evidence the registration list, which contains, or ought to contain, the names of all persons entitled to vote in this precinct. The manner in which it was made up appears from the testimony cited. There has been also offered in evidence the poll book, which, as that term is used in Missouri, means a book supplied in blank and in duplicate to the election officers. The numbers 1, 2, 3, etc., are printed at the beginning of each line. The name and address of the first person who appears and votes is, or should be, written in the first line. The name and address of the second person in the second line, etc.

Each voter is, or should be, given a ballot numbered to correspond with the number of the line upon which his name and address are written. This poll book, which is thus made up as the voting proceeds, should show the name and address of each person voting. It has been offered in evidence (p. 459). It contains the names, addresses, and numbers of 258 persons who are supposed to have appeared and voted in this precinct.

The ballot box was opened, and commencing on page 796 will be found a statement showing the number of each ballot found therein and the name of the candidate for whom said ballot was voted for the short term for Congress. A study of these tables shows remarkable results. According to the poll book 258 persons, and no more, whose names and addresses are given, appeared and voted. There were found in the ballot box 260 ballots. According to the poll book 258 was the highest number of ballot voted, but there were found in the box ballots numbered 270, 275, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 310, 312, 314, 315, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 323, 328, 335, 349, 351, 352, and 898–25 numbers in all, none of which appear upon the poll book, and all of which were counted for Butler.

Another remarkable fact is that ballots numbered 43, 115, 117, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 130, 131, 134, 136, 137, 138, 139, 142, 144, 146, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 167, 168, 180, 181, 182, 183, 185, and 222—45 in all, were voted and counted twice for Butler, while ballot number 137 was voted and counted three times for him. In other words, these 46 persons in repeating did not even take the usual precaution of voting under different names. How many times they voted under other names will never be known.

The further fact, still more significant if possible, is that as to 77 names of persons appearing in the poll book no corresponding ballots are found in the box at all. These numbers are 3, 5, 12, 13, 20, 34, 37, 39, 46, 48, 52, 55, 56, 61, 64, 71, 77, 78, 80, 89, 105, 109, 111, 112, 113, 178, 187, 188, 190, 191, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 211, 213, 215, 216, 221, 226, 227, 228, 231, 233, 234, 236, 237, 238, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, and 258.

Thus, if the integrity of the poll book can be assumed, it appears that 77 ballots cast were not found in the ballot box at all, their places being supplied in part by the duplication of other numbers upon the poll book and the addition of 25 numbers not found on the poll book. Those who fixed up this return tried to make the accounts balance. There were 258 names and numbers on the poll book, and they returned 258 votes, 237 for Butler and 21 for Wagoner. But even counting the 45 duplications and 1 triplication and the 25 additional votes not accounted for on the poll book at all, there were in the box only 227 ballots bearing Butler's name, while there were 28 bearing Wagoner's, 3 bearing the name of Artz, and 1 containing no name for Congress.

Election signifies choice. In view of this array of facts it needs no argument to show that the returns from this precinct afford no evidence whatever as to the choice of the voters. The registration, the conduct of the election, the poll books, and the returns are all fraudulent and utterly unreliable. There was ballot-box stuffing and ballot-box robbing, and nearly every form of irregularity known to political history.

The minority admit in their views that the returns of the above-mentioned precinct should be rejected.

On another precinct, No. 10, of Ward 15, an issue is joined. The majority say:

The poll book shows 171 persons as having voted. The opening of the ballot box disclosed 167 ballots. Not a single one of these ballots was numbered, as required by law, and it is therefore impossible to tell what ballot was voted by any particular person whose name appears upon the poll book or whether any of them were voted by the persons whose addresses thus appear. Eighty-nine ballots bearing Butler's name were found in the ballot box. The returns gave him 98. Fifty-nine bore Wagoner's name. The returns give him 61. By reason of the absence of numbers upon these ballots it is impossible to tell whether all or any of these ballots cast by persons who, according to the poll book, did appear and vote, were found in the box or whether the persons who cast the ballots which were found in the box were registered voters, or whether, as in most of the other precincts, there were duplications of ballots by the same voters. The provision of the Missouri statute upon this subject is as follows:

"SEC. 7247. Procedure when ballot is offered by voter in cases of challenge.—One of the said judges of election shall receive the ballot from the voter, and shall announce his residence and name in a loud voice, and shall write on the back of said ballot the number of the same, in the order in which it was received, which number shall also be placed opposite the name of the voter in the poll book in the column headed 'number,' and another judge shall put the vote in the ballot box in the presence of the voter and the judges and clerks, and in plain view of the public. The judge or clerk having charge of the registry shall then, in a column prepared thereon, in the same line of the name of the voter, mark 'voted,' or the letter 'V.'

"If such person so registered shall be challenged or disqualified, the party challenging shall assign his reason therefor, and thereupon one of said judges shall administer to him an oath to answer questions, and he shall be questioned by said judge or judges touching such cause of challenge and touching any other cause of his disqualification, and may also be questioned by the person challenging him in regard to his qualifications and identity, but if a majority of the judges are of the opinion that he is the person so registered and a qualified voter his vote shall then be received accordingly. The vote of no one shall be received by said judges whose name does not appear upon the books of registration as a qualified voter."

Whether the provision as to numbering the ballot should be considered as mandatory or as merely directory it is not important to consider. Ordinarily an honest voter ought not to be deprived of his vote by any dereliction on the part of the election officers, but where the action or inaction of election officers renders it impossible to ascertain the honest vote in a precinct the whole return must be rejected. It seems incredible that 171 or 167 persons could have voted without noticing that their ballots were not numbered.

The minority say in opposition:

We have had no positive evidence pointed out to us by counsel for the contestant of any irregularity in this precinct outside of what is shown in the Owen registered letter and directory tabulation. On the contrary, we find the positive testimony of Judge of Election Steve Pensa that the election in that precinct was conducted honestly, fairly, and in an orderly manner.

As to Ward 15, precinct 6, the majority say:

The poll book shows 140 persons to have voted. The opening of the ballot box disclosed 139 ballots. Ninety-three of these (including 4 duplications) bore Butler's name. The returns give him 95. Fifteen ballots bore the initials of but one judge, whereas the law requires two. Thirty-two ballots cast for Butler, 16 for Wagoner, and 2 for Artz were not numbered as required by law. Four ballots were duplicated and counted for Butler. Notwithstanding the fact that the number of ballots found in the box is only one less than the number of persons whom the poll book shows to have voted, 52 names appearing upon the poll book as having voted were not found represented by ballots in the box when opened, their numbers being missing. It is impossible to ascertain whether the unnumbered ballots were cast by persons whose names appeared upon the poll book.

The minority say:

No citation of positive evidence of irregularity was furnished the committee by contestant's counsel, and we find positive evidence of Election Officials William S. Wellman and Otto Bell as to the absolute fairness and regular conduct of the election in that precinct.

The minority also say generally:

It is true that there is shown in the evidence instances where fewer ballots were found in the box than the poll books show to have been cast, and this is taken by the majority to be an evidence of fraud, and great stress is laid upon that particular fact in their report. They totally exclude from their guessing the possibility that defective ballots are not placed in the box, but are directed under the law to be segregated and placed in envelopes and kept separate and apart from the remaining ballots when returned.

These envelopes are what axe known as rejected-ballot envelopes. The evidence shows that no demand was made by contestant or his counsel for these rejected-ballot envelopes, by which the discrepancy between the number of ballots found in the box and the number of votes shown by the poll book to have been cast would have been accounted for.

Ward 4, precinct 2, affords another example, thus set forth by the majority report:

The poll book (p. 440) shows 488 persons to have appeared and voted. The opening of the ballot box (p. 780) disclosed 486 ballots therein. Of this number, 472 (including 45 duplications) bore Butler's name. The returns give him 471. Wagoner had 14 ballots in the box. The returns give him 17. Three hundred and thirty-two persons voted in this precinct whose names were not on the printed registration list. Forty-five persons voted twice upon the same names and numbers. There were missing from the ballot box the ballots of 48 persons who, according to the poll book, appeared and voted.

The fact that 31 persons, mostly Irish, registered from one building, 1038 Third street, in this precinct and arrived at the place of registration in reverse alphabetical order is not more remarkable than that 39 others, mostly Italians, registering from 615 Franklin avenue, by a singular coincidence, arrived in precisely the same order. Assuming that each one of these persons did appear personally for registration, as the law requires, these coincidences would be remarkable, but upon the not very violent assumption that if there were such persons actually in existence, which may be fairly doubted, their names were handed by designing persons to registration officers anxious to assist in false registration for the purposes of the election. The case is not unusual. It is perhaps not singular that every vote cast from the two houses above named were cast for Butler.

After an examination of the 41 precincts, and in accordance with their conclusions, the majority recommend the following:

Resolved, That James J. Butler was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That George C. R. Wagoner was elected a Representative in the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The minority views, while conceding that some frauds might have existed, dissented from the conclusion that they were sufficient to invalidate sitting Member's title to the seat.

The report was debated on February 26,[1] and on that day the question was taken on substituting resolutions confirming the title of sitting Member for the resolutions proposed by the majority; and the motion to substitute was lost, yeas 112, nays, 153.

A motion to recommit was disagreed to, and then the question recurred on the first resolution proposed by the majority report. This resolution was agreed to.

The second resolution was also agreed to, ayes 161, noes 2, the minority not generally voting in pursuance of dilatory tactics, and the Speaker pro tempore overruling the point of no quorum present as dilatory.

Mr. Wagoner thereupon appeared and took the oath.

1129. The Massachusetts election case of Conry v. Keliher in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

The House declined to consider false publications, neither party being shown to be concerned therein, and no deception of voters being shown, as a reason for changing an election return.

On January 18, 1904,[2] Mr. Joseph H. Gaines, of West Virginia, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted the unanimous report[3] of the committee in the Massachusetts election case of Conry v. Keliher.

The committee found the following facts:

It appears that the Ninth Congressional district of Massachusetts, which is located in Boston, is a district of overwhelming Democratic strength. The Democratic Congressional convention in that district in 1902 was unable to agree upon a nominee within the time fixed by the law of Massachusetts for convention nominations. The contestant, Conry, and the contestee, Keliher, were each candidates before the Democratic convention, and after the final adjournment of the convention each became a candidate by petition.

Each of these candidates, a few days before the election, endeavored to get the support of Hon. James M. Griggs, chairman of the Democratic Congressional committee. Each of them communicated with Griggs and each received a telegram from Griggs. Each of these candidates caused to be published, as an advertisement, in certain Boston papers, a telegram purporting to have been received by him, or the chairman of his committee, from Mr. Griggs.

[3] House Report No. 385.

Contestant insists that contestee was guilty of gross fraudulent representations in the publication of the telegram which contestee caused to be published, and contestee claims that contestant was guilty of gross fraudulent misrepresentations in the telegram which contestant caused to be published.

Contestant denies, and it is not shown, that he was responsible for the published advertisement of the fraudulent telegram which was published in his interest, and it is not shown that contestee was personally cognizant of the fraud in the telegram published in his interest.

At the election contestee received 10,352 votes and contestant 10,099 votes. Contestant insists that by reason of the false telegram from Mr. Griggs, published as a paid advertisement in behalf of contestee, enough voters who would otherwise have voted for contestant were led to vote for contestee. It is not shown by the evidence that any particular person so changed his intention or was led by the advertisement to vote for contestee when he intended otherwise to have voted for contestant.

But contestant urges that it is the duty of the Committee on Elections, and of the House itself, to assume that the publication of a false telegram from the chairman of the Democratic Congressional committee recommending to the voters of the Ninth Congressional district of Massachusetts that he favors a particular candidate ought to have great weight.

The telegram published in the interest of contestee purported to be a denial of a previous telegram published in the interest of contestant, both telegrams purporting to be from Mr. Griggs. Contestant urges that the telegram, published in behalf of contestee, which denied the authenticity of the telegram published in behalf of contestant, attributed such moral turpitude to contestant that many people who read contestee's later telegram, and believed it to be true, were thereby persuaded to vote against contestant, because they believed him to have published a falsehood in his own favor.

Contestant urges that it is the duty of the Committee on Elections and the House itself to assume that voters must have been so influenced and must have so changed their votes from contestant to contestee.

The conclusions of the committee were as follows:

It appears to this committee that the claim that the Committee on Elections should assume a certain number of voters in the Congressional district were influenced, because they ought to have been influenced, by improper charges, to vote for one candidate when otherwise they would have voted for the other candidate, is a claim which belongs in the realm of hypothetical presumptions. To agree to the claims set up by contestant would require a method of ratiocination on our part too fantastic for our minds.

We do not condone the offense of publishing false telegrams or telegrams in a different manner from the one in which they are sent. It may be true that the resident voters in Boston were waiting with bated breath to learn what Hon. James M. Griggs thought before they cast their ballots. Mr. Griggs himself, however, thinks otherwise. His conduct in the matter was very careful and very gentlemanly, as would be expected coming from him.

We are inclined to agree with him that the influence upon the Boston voters of the telegrams sent by him, and those published and purporting to have been sent by him, has been very much exaggerated by the counsel in this case.

Some allegations of fraudulent voting and of fraudulent colonization of voters have been made by contestant, but not enough votes are involved in these charges to make any change in the result of the election.

The Committee on Elections No. 1 therefore beg leave to report to the House, and respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That Joseph A. Conry was not elected a member of the Fifty-eighth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Massachusetts, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

"Resolved, That John A. Keliher was elected a member of the Fifty-eighth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Massachusetts, and is entitled to retain his seat therein."

The resolutions were at once agreed to, without debate or division.

1130. The Pennsylvania election case of Connell v. Howell, in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

It being shown that election officers had flagrantly ignored and violated mandatory law, the House declined to purge and rejected the poll.

As to the extent to which hearsay testimony is admissible to prove that a person recorded as voting was not within the precinct on election day.

As to the force of admissions by counsel during argument of an election case.

Admissions in the brief of a party to a contest are of force if not contrary to proven facts.

Election officers being required to file certain affidavits with a prothonotary, his certificate that this was not done was accepted as proof that the affidavits were not taken.

On February 9, 1904,[1] the House began consideration of the election case of Connell v. Howell, from Pennsylvania. The sitting Member had received the certificate by a returned plurality of 461 votes. In the course of the contest over 6,000 witnesses were examined, the great majority in behalf of contestant, and the evidence filled 3,824 large pages.

Four essential points were involved in the examination:

(1) The rejection of the returns of certain polls:

(a) The poll of the borough of Winton, Second Ward. After quoting the law of Pennsylvania the majority,[2] in their report, say:

> Notwithstanding the plain, unequivocal statement in the statute which provides that "No man shall be permitted to vote at the election on that day whose name is not on said registry list, unless he shall make proof of his right to vote," as herein before required; and notwithstanding the oaths of said election officers above set forth, they permitted in this ward a large number of men to vote whose names were not on the registry list, without affidavits in proof of their right to vote as required by law. Contestant's counsel claimed in the argument that there were 83 such voters, and their names are set forth in his brief. Contestee's counsel, in his presence, admitted 50. The returns show that 220 votes were cast in this ward, and of these 50 are admitted to have been received by the election officers contrary to the positive directions of the law and in violation of their solemn obligations. The evidence does not disclose that any affidavits were required at that voting precinct from unregistered voters. And contestee's counsel practically admitted it, for at page 18 of their brief, in referring to the Second and Third wards of Winton, they say:
> "The contestee affirms that a careful examination of the evidence fails to disclose any fraud, irregularity, intimidation, improper or corrupt practices of any of the election officers in either of these election districts. An examination of the list of voters who voted at this election, and a comparison with the registry list, shows that no persons voted who were not registered; therefore no affidavits were taken by the election officers."
> This fact alone is sufficient to cast grave suspicion on the honesty and good faith of those election officers. But other facts are disclosed by the evidence. In the neighborhood of 50 votes were received in the names of men who were not present and did not vote. Votes were received in the names of dead men. Several duplications were received. A large number of names were added to the registry list of this ward by the election officers, in violation of the law and their duty. The illegal votes received amounted to much more than a majority of the votes cast and counted.

[2] Report No. 639, submitted by the chairman of the committee, Mr. Michael E. Driscoll, of New York.

The minority views, by an evident clerical error, fail in certain respects to join issue, taking up considerable space in discussion of documentary evidence relating to another borough, that of Old Forge. On the points where issue is joined they say:

The majority of the committee insist that the reception of so large a number of illegal votes from nonregistered persons, who filed no affidavits, can be accounted for on no other ground than that of gross and palpable fraud, connived at, encouraged, and participated in by the managers of election.

Not one single manager or clerk of that precinct was called to the stand in the case and no witness has testified to any single act or utterance of said election managers, so that the sole ground for rejecting the precinct is the inference that such a large number of illegal votes could not have been cast without fraud. Let us see if there is any testimony in the record that shows that any man voted who was not entitled to vote. Contestant's counsel argued that there were names on the poll list that were not on the registration list, and that no affidavits were required of the nonregistered voters. There is absolutely no proof in the record that the managers of election did not take affidavits as the law required from all nonregistered persons who applied to vote.

The second finding, that about 50 votes were received in the names of men who were not present and did not vote, is based upon evidence printed in the record. We think the evidence established that Wallace Barber, D. W. Dawson, Michael Corcoran, Richard Sanderson, Thomas Wright, and John Mackey were not present and did not vote and somebody impersonated them and voted in their names. The two last-named men were dead. The other four were called to the stand and testified that they did not vote at said precinct on November 4, 1902. Their evidence is competent and unimpeached. As to all the other alleged impersonations, we are not inclined to argue them. Begging pardon for encumbering this report with such matter, we here quote every word of the testimony in the record tending to establish the impersonations. Aside from the fact that it is given by men who were employed by the contestant to hunt up evidence, almost every sentence is hearsay and is utterly incompetent.

The minority then quote, in support of this attack on the evidence, the testimony of two witnesses, Gaughan and Kearney, each of whom had an acquaintance with the people of the ward and had canvassed it to ascertain whether or not the persons recorded as voting had actually voted. The witness would testify in some cases that he had seen the voter personally and the latter had told him that he did not vote, and that he (witness) knew personally that no other person of that name lived in the ward. In other cases witness would testify that the wife or parents or an associate of the voter said that voter was at some other place on the day of election, and then witness would testify that he knew personally that no other person of that name lived in the ward.

After quoting the testimony, the minority say:

We now come to the finding that the election officers added a large number of names to the registry list in violation of the law and of their duty. If any witness testified touching such a matter, we have been unable to find it after a most careful and painstaking examination. We confidently assert that there is no evidence on that point, and that there is nothing to discuss.

The fourth and last finding of the majority is that there were duplications. The only evidence we can find to sustain this is that the name John Kennedy appears twice on the poll list as voter 176 and 211, and Thomas O'Connor appears as voter 8 and 75. It is fairer to assume that there are two John Kennedys and two Thomas O'Connors than it is to impute fraud to the election officers.

In the debate, on February 9,[1] a question arose as to the admissions made by sitting Member's counsel. Mr. Joseph T. Johnston, of South Carolina, conceded that Mr. Balentine, counsel for sitting Member, admitted that there were 50 illegal votes; but denied that sitting Member was present, claiming without contradiction from the majority that Mr. Howell was absent in Pennsylvania at the time. Mr. Johnston denied that such admission was effective, saying:

I admit that a lawyer can bind his client by an admission in a pleading. I admit that a lawyer can bind his client by an admission in writing entered upon the minutes of the court. That is all right; but to tell me that when a lawyer is arguing a case before a judge, if he misstates the facts and the record shows that he misstates the facts, the judge is bound to decide the case by what the lawyer said and not by what the record shows, is a new sort of justice to me. That is the way it happened. In the argument of the case this lawyer did say that there were 50 illegal votes at that precinct, but that does not bind anybody. The record says otherwise. We are trying the case on the record.

Speaking on the next day for the majority of the committee, Mr. James Kennedy, of Ohio, said:

When the argument opened we stood in the presence of this record a. little appalled at the amount of work that the committee thought was before it, and when Mr. Balentine, representing the contestee, arose to talk, I inquired of him whether or not certain admissions could not be agreed upon by counsel, so as to shorten the labor of the committee, calling his attention directly to the claim of the contestant to the great number of votes in these three wards cast by men whose names were not on the registration list. That was at the beginning of the hearing, and he said that the figures presented by the attorney for the contestant were inaccurate in this regard.

I forget what the exact figures were with reference to the Second Ward of Winton, but it was something like 83 votes that the contestant claimed had been cast in this way, the names of those who cast them not appearing upon the registry list. Mr. Balentine said that there were 50 in that ward, that the balance of the 83 names on that list were not names that did not appear on the registry list, but that they were substitutions.

The minority views lay stress on the fact that Mr. Green, associate counsel for sitting Member, declined to concur in the admissions.

As to the admission in sitting Member's brief, quoted by the majority report, Mr. Johnston said:

The majority of the committee quote that as an admission of counsel that no affidavits were taken. Why, gentlemen, if you are going to quote that for anything, quote it for all it is worth. He makes two affirmative declarations. One is that no affidavits were taken and the other is that nobody voted who was not on the registry list. If you are going to take his statement about one, take it about the other.

In reply on this point, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, stated that a comparison of the list showed the declaration that no one not on the registry list voted not to be true.

(b) As to Winton, Third Ward, the majority report states:

Contestant's counsel claimed that in this ward 80 votes were received from persons whose were not on the registry list, and from whom no affidavits were required in proof of their right to vote, as required by law. Contestee's counsel, in his presence, admitted 53.

James Conry, judge of election in that district, swore that no affidavits were taken from men who voted and whose names were not on the registry list.

The evidence further discloses that in this precinct about 22 votes were cast and received in the names of other persons, and it is difficult to understand how so many violations of the election law could be due to honest mistakes on the part of the election officers. It was also claimed, with some evidence to sustain the contention, that about 15 men voted at this precinct none of whose names appeared on the voting, list as returned by the election officers. That one H. V. Lawler, a tax collector and adherent of the contestee arranged with one Benni Betti to bring in his friends to vote and when he was informed that they were not citizens he did not hesitate but said" take them anyway." When those men reached the polls they were taken in charge by one John Lally, one of the inspectors of election and a friend of the contestee, their ballots were marked, and they were voted.

The majority further cite facts indicating that the election machinery was entirely in the hands of sitting Member's friends.

The minority, in their views, say:

The judge of elections at this precinct was sworn, and testified that no persons voted who were not registered, and for that reason no affidavits were taken. In so far as it is alleged that some men voted in the names of men who were not present, and that some voted whose names were not entered on the poll list, we think the fairest thing we can do is to quote the evidence relied upon by the contestant. The witnesses are F. A. Snyder, Benni Betti, and Domineck Cherntom, and they utterly failed, in our judgment, to sustain their allegations.

The minority here cite testimony similar in general character to that cited in discussion of the Second Ward of Winton, and which was criticized as hearsay.

Speaking of this evidence on February 10 [1] Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said:

The committee finds that there were 50 men who were returned as having voted in that precinct who were not there at all. I suppose the best evidence in proof of this fact would have been to summon the men themselves if they could be found on the face of the earth, to bring them before a commissioner and take their testimony that they were not present and did not vote. That was not the course pursued. A man was sent out who was not a stranger—a man who was a tax collector and assessor in that little borough of Winton, who knew every man, woman, dog, and cat in the place. They sent him out with a list in his hand of 50 men who were returned as having voted there, but who did not in fact vote, as it was alleged. He was sent out to ascertain facts, and he came back and reported that A had moved away, that B was in some other country, that C had died, etc. Nobody contradicted his testimony or doubted his veracity. It may not have been the highest or best form of evidence; but in the absence of any contradictory proof which Mr. Howell could have made, if any such existed, it was enough to satisfy a reasonable man of the fact.

Mr. B. P. Birdsall, of Iowa, speaking particularly of the committee's investigation of this ward, showed, by quoting the testimony of a considerable number of persons who voted, that in regard to the voting of unnaturalized persons not on the list, the testimony was not hearsay but direct and positive as to the fact of illegal voting. After showing that the law of Pennsylvania requiring affidavits from persons not on the lists was declared by the courts to be mandatory (Cusick's case, 13 Pa., 459), he said: [2]

The testimony hereinbefore quoted shows that illegal voters, without any declaration whatever to the judges, were accompanied by adherents of contestee into the voting booths, and in truth did the voting for the foreigner, who was indifferent as for whom he voted.

In the face of the positive injunctions of the law as to the care in the exercise of their duty, how, in the light of this testimony, can we conclude that an honest election was held? How could the election officers on this record defend themselves from the charge of negligently performing their duties? And if they can not, it is folly to urge that conduct which subjects them to the penalty of the law does not amount to such fraud as will vitiate their returns.

(c) As to Old Forge precinct the majority report says:

Contestant's counsel claimed in the argument that there were 158 votes cast in this district by persons whose names did not appear on the registry list and from whom no affidavits were taken in proof of their right to vote, as required by law. Those names are set forth in their brief. Contestee's counsel, in his presence, admitted 90.

There was some dispute in the arguments on the question whether any affidavits were taken from unregistered voters in proof of their right to vote. But the certificate of the prothonotary of Lackawanna County seems to settle it. The following is a copy of the certificate:

"COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Lackawanna, ss:

"I, John F. Cummings, prothonotary of said county of Lackawanna in said Commonwealth, do hereby certify that among the returns of the election held in the said county of Lackawanna on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1902, which returns are now on file in my office pursuant to law, it appears that one affidavit only was filed from the first district of Old Forge borough in said county, which affidavit is the oath of office taken by the election officers, and that no affidavit of any voter was filed from said district.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and have affixed the seal of court of common pleas of the said county of Lackawanna, at the city of Scranton in the said county, this 12th day of January, A. D. 1904.

"JOHN F. CUMMINGS,
"Prothonotary of Lackawanna County."

According to the evidence about 11 persons voted at that election in that district whose names did not appear on the voting list as returned by the election officers. There were duplications and substitutions in that district, and about 8 persons were permitted to vote, opposite whose names the letters "D. I." appeared on the registry list, without filing affidavits in conformity with the law in proof of their right to vote.

On the morning of election, one Michael Cafferty was sent for and appointed an inspector of election. He was not registered, but he voted without making an affidavit in proof of his right to vote. Although there was no disturbance, peace officers were present, apparently assisting the election officers who were friends of the contestee; threats were used; a Republican watcher was forcibly ejected; the right of challenge was denied; voters were denied the right to make their own selection of persons to assist them in marking their ballots, and ballots were marked contrary to the instructions of voters; and the election generally in this district was conducted in a high-handed manner and without regard to the provisions of law and the sworn obligations of the election officers. And the active participants in those lawless practices were the political friends and adherents of the contestee.

From the foregoing facts, and others which may be recited from the evidence, pertaining to the conduct of the elections in the Second and Third wards of the borough of Winton and the first district of the borough of Old Forge, your committee is of the opinion that the election officers in those three districts, and other friends of the contestee acting with them for a common purpose, were guilty of carelessness, lawlessness, and fraud to such an extent as to impeach the returns from those districts.

Fraud can never be presumed, and must in all cases be proved. But it may be established by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence. In those three districts the character and ignorance of a large proportion of the voters, the political conditions, the party feeling, the admitted violations of the election law and reckless disregard of their oaths on the part of the election officers, the opportunities for substitutions, personations, and other illegal voting, the advantage taken of those opportunities, as shown by the evidence, all point to such fraud on the part of the election officers and others, by their consent and connivance, as to vitiate the returns from those districts.

It is a serious matter to disfranchise the honest and legal voters in three districts, or even in one; but it is a more serious matter to trifle with the law which was enacted and intended to be so enforced as to protect the legal and honest voters against fraud and imposition. If the honest, legal voters in any district would insure an honest vote and a fair count, they must see to it that only honest and competent election officers are on guard. The maintenance of the law in its purity and vigor is of more importance than the vote of one or three districts, and your committee is of the opinion that should it excuse the election officers in those three districts for their acts as disclosed by the evidence, such a decision would be accepted by them and others as a justification of their reckless and lawless practices in disregard of their sworn official duties.

Your committee therefore finds that the election in those three districts was so tainted and permeated with fraud as to make them void, and that the returns from them should be thrown out and deducted from the official returns of the respective candidates.

Legal voters in those three districts who supported the contestee were not necessarily disfranchised by this action. Their votes could have been proven aliunde during the contest. That was not attempted.

The minority cite McCrary at length in support of this view. In the debate on February 9, Mr. Michael E. Driscoll, of New York, cited the cases of Knox v. Blair, Finley v. Walls, Van Wyck v. Green, Wise v. Young, Murray v. Elliott, Robinson v. Harrison, and Noyes v. Rockwell.

Speaking on February 9,[1] Mr. Birdsall said on behalf of the majority, after showing the mandatory nature of the laws of Pennsylvania controlling the acts of the election officers:

The evidence, to my mind, establishes such gross negligence and a willful violation of the law as to render their acts and returns unworthy of belief in any tribunal worthy to investigate them. It is difficult, indeed, to find a single provision of the law that was not violated in some one of the districts in question. A few of these violations may be noted, as clearly shown by the evidence already alluded to and elsewhere found in the record, namely:

The reception of known illegal votes;

The appointment of a disqualified inspector;

The denial of the right of assistance;

The permission to accompany voters to the booths and mark their ballots when no assistance was demanded;

The acceptance of votes from nonregistered persons who made no affidavits;

The reception of votes on defective affidavits;

The presence of peace officers in the voting places;

The rejection of Republican watchers;

The failure to seal the ballot boxes as required by law;

The failure to deposit them as required by law; and

The electioneering of one of the inspectors.

If such gross violations of the law as are shown in this case are permitted to stand and meet with our approval, then we may as well desist in all efforts to enact laws for the protection of the ballot. No man can with honesty be the beneficiary of such frauds. Let us set a higher standard for the conduct of election officers and keep as pure as possible the fountain of authority in this Government. * * *

In the debate Mr. Johnston, speaking for the minority, urged that the polls should have been purged:[2]

I want, before I take up this case in detail, to say that it is a dangerous doctrine, it is a damnable doctrine to throw out entire precincts in an election. You may find that where partisan zeal has controlled it has been done, but I challenge you to show where courts of law have thrown out entire precincts. The law which is laid down in the books, the law which must commend itself to our sense of justice, is that if it is possible to purge a ballot box of illegal votes it shall be done. I do not stand for fraud; I detest it whether it is in politics or in the private walks of life. In this case there is absolutely no reason for saying that fraud was shown to such an extent as to justify throwing out entire precincts. Every illegal ballot can be ascertained. The contestant has set forth with great particularity the name of every voter that he claims cast an illegal ballot. He has referred to the testimony upon which he bases that contention.

There is nothing in the way of this committee—there is nothing in the way of this House taking up those names one by one and determining the facts judicially whether the alleged vote was illegal, and if it was illegal, and the testimony shows for whom it was cast, deduct it from the candidate who received it. If the testimony fails to show for whom it was cast, then adopt the sound rule of law that says that illegal votes, in the absence of testimony showing how they were cast, shall be deducted from the candidates in proportion to their legal votes. I want in my remarks to incorporate certain citations from authorities in regard to the law upon this point.

Mr. Johnson cited the cases of Le Moyne v. Faxwell, Taylor v. Reading, Burch v. Van Horn, Atkinson v. Pendleton, Bromberg v. Haralson, Cessna v. Myers, Butler v. Lehman, Chaves v. Cheever, Abbott v. Frost, Koontz v. Coffroth, English v. Hilborn, Wallace v. McKinley, Hurd v. Romeis, Todd v. Jayne, and Barnes v. Adam in support of his contention.

The mutilation of ballots in the return of election officers did not cause rejection of the returns in absence of proof of fraud on part of the officers or the party apparently benefited.

Over 2,000 illegal votes having been proven, the committee by proof aliunde determined for whom a portion were cast and rejected them without disturbing the remainder.

A voter's testimony under oath that he was disqualified and voted for a certain candidate was accepted as justification for rejecting the vote.

Where the ballot was secret, testimony of an acquaintance as to voter's declaration before election was accepted as proof aliunde.

(2) As to their refusal to reject the poll of Dunmore precincts the majority say:

Contestant's counsel in their briefs and arguments vigorously attacked the returns from the first and second districts of the First Ward, the second district of the Second Ward, the third district of the Third Ward, and the first district of the Sixth Ward, all of the borough of Dunmore, for fraud, and for the reason that after the contest was commenced the ballots returned from those districts were destroyed, or so mutilated by being wet as to make them undecipherable. It was claimed that this was done in the interest of the contestee, for the purpose of covering and concealing fraud perpetrated by the election officers. The destruction of those ballots, under the circumstances revealed in the evidence, is not; free from suspicion. But your committee does not find sufficient evidence to establish fraud on the part of the election officers nor to charge the contestee with the responsibility of destroying the ballots, and therefore this claim is dismissed.

(3) As to illegal votes in the district at large and proof aliunde as to how they were east, the majority show that 489 votes were cast by persons who gave defective affidavits where the law required accuracy, and continue:

It was also urged on the part of the contestant, in the notice of contest and in the briefs and arguments of his counsel, that, aside from the 489 votes above referred to and aside from the Second and Third wards of Winton and the first district of Old Forge, 1,795 votes were cast in said Congressional district for Representative in Congress, received by the election officers, counted by them, returned to the canvassing board, and canvassed by men who were illegal voters under the statutes of the State of Pennsylvania, as construed by the courts of that State. The contestee's counsel admitted this claim, except as to the number of about 211, and it was practically conceded that 1,584 of those votes were illegal. Therefore, according to the evidence and the concessions of counsel on the argument, about 2,002 votes were cast in said district by illegal voters, aside from the Second and Third wards of Winton and the first district of the borough of Old Forge.

Contestant attempted to prove aliunde that those votes were cast for contestee. Proving how men voted is generally a difficult matter and always is so when the political supporters of the opposing candidate are on the witness stand. The law provides for a secret ballot. No man is required to state how he voted. On the part of the contestant evidence was introduced tending to show that practically all those illegal votes were cast for contestee. However, the evidence in many of those cases was not entirely satisfactory to a majority of your committee, but after a careful examination of the evidence it finds that at least 200 of those votes were proven by competent and sufficient evidence to have been cast for the contestee and should be deducted from his count, and that one of those votes was proven by competent and sufficient evidence to have been cast for contestant and should be deducted from his count.

Testimony was taken tending to show that more than 2,000 illegal votes were cast in districts other than the three which the majority of the committee have thrown out entirely. The majority of the committee have declined to take up these alleged illegal votes and purge the ballot boxes. They have gone just far enough to find a plurality for the contestant and ignored all other illegal votes. The pleadings brought up the question of the legality of votes in every precinct. Testimony was taken for the purpose of substantiating these allegations. By what rules of law or justice the committee can consider only a part of the record and a part of the illegal votes we are unable to discover. At a trial of causes at law it may and frequently does happen that the determination of one point renders the consideration of all others unnecessary.

For instance, if one brings suit for personal injuries against a railway company, where the doctrine of contributory negligence obtains, after the jury finds that the plaintiff sustained his injuries through his own negligence, it is unnecessary for the jury to go further and consider the expenses he incurred on account of his injuries, his sufferings, etc. This is not a case of that nature. The whole election is at issue. Suppose, for instance, that the contestee had been elected to Congress by a plurality of two votes, and the contestant had demanded and this Congress had granted a recount of the ballots; and suppose, further, that after counting three boxes the contestant had gained three votes, would any committee or any Congress stop then and there and say that they had gone far enough, and that the contestant is entitled to his seat? It would shock the ordinary lawyer and paralyze the honest layman. It appears to the minority of the committee that under the circumstances supposed the entire vote would be counted. It appears to us that the entire illegal vote should be eliminated according to the rules and forms of law and the seat awarded to that man who received the majority of the legal votes.

Speaking on February 9 [1] on behalf of the majority, Mr. Birdsall said:

The committee relied on all these points, and I desire to say that the gentleman who preceded me is entirely mistaken in saying that the majority of the committee rely on the character of the testimony that he refers to, and which is set out in the minority report in determining the fact that an illegal vote was cast. A stronger rule was adopted by the majority of the committee than met with my approval. I think there is sufficient evidence in this record to establish the fact that between 1,500 and 1,600 of these illegal votes were cast for Mr. Howell.

Mr. Kennedy, on the same point, said [2] as to the mass of testimony:

Now, when we approached that testimony, it was as if this House had submitted to this committee the question of whether or not in that great haystack there were rats to a greater number than eight or nine. We went out and hunted and hunted, and we found 200 rats. We saw them. The committee all saw them. There were many more than I discovered; there were evidences all around us of more rats. It seemed unreasonable to go through, clear through, that entire stack, straw by straw, when we had already found so many illegal votes that were cast for Mr. Howell.

Mr. Kennedy, then proceeded to reply to the assertions of the minority that the evidence by which illegal votes were shown to have been cast for sitting Member was inadmissable as heresay. He quoted a number of witnesses whose testimony showed that they were not qualified voters, and who declared positively that they voted for sitting Member, and declared that he found 200 cases as well substantiated as those quoted. In conclusion he presented a table giving the names of the persons illegally voting and the precincts where their votes were cast.

Concluding the argument on February 10,[1] Mr. Driscoll said:

Judge Birdsall, who addressed the House yesterday on this question—who has been on the bench and is a well poised lawyer—said that about 1,400 or 1,500 of those 2,000 illegal ballots were cast for Mr. Howell. And another gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Kennedy], who has spoken this morning, has said that 600 or 800 or 1,000 of those votes were cast for Mr. Howell. I suppose I was one of the conservative members of that committee. I did not go as high in my estimate as some of the rest; but I had no doubt that on the evidence at least 200 of those votes were cast for Mr. Howell.

Questioned as to why the names were not set forth in the majority report, he said:

That was not necessary when we showed that only 10 illegal votes were required to overcome the apparent plurality for Mr. Howell after those three precincts were thrown out. Nobody questioned this in the committee. It was unnecessary to set out the names with the pages of the evidence.

(4) As to the proof aliunde by which contestant proved 32 votes cast for him in the three precincts of which the committee had rejected the poll, the minority views say:

One witness proves all these aliunde votes, except three. Here is the evidence, and, in our judgment, it is incompetent, for reasons appearing on its face.

The minority give a list of the votes, all but five of which were in the Second Ward of Winton, and then quote the evidence, which generally as to each voter was as follows, the questions being put by contestant's counsel, to one Flynn, witness for contestant:

Q. Patrick J. Walsh, do you know him?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was he supporting Mr. Connell?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Daniel Dyer up there, also?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was he supporting Mr. Connell in the last campaign?—A. He was.
Q. Do you know John Kearney?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was he supporting Mr. Connell in the last campaign?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know John E. Walsh?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was he supporting Mr. Connell in that campaign?—A. He was.
Q. Do you know John Macker?—A. Well, Macker—I don't know that gentleman.
By Mr. BALENTINE (sitting Member's counsel):
Q. Are you attempting to tell whom these men voted for?—A. Yes, sir; men told me that.
By Mr. DONOVAN (contestant's counsel):
Q. Do you know Anthony O'Connor?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And was he supporting Mr. Connell last fall?—A. Yes, sir .

On cross-examination witness testified generally that he did not see the voters cast their votes, but that they told him before election how they should vote.

The majority in their report content themselves with declaring the sufficiency of the proof; but in the debate[2] on February 9, Mr. John A. Sterling, of Illinois, one of those concurring in the report, said:

The question arises, What kind of testimony is competent to prove how a vote was cast? Where the ballot is secret, the ballot does not disclose the fact. What is the next best evidence? The party who casts the vote, and in that regard I desire to call attention particularly to the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa, that in the pages of this record it appears that when the contestee had asked witnesses as to how they had voted the contestant interposed an objection and stated and instructed the witness that he need not answer. We are not complaining of that. The gentleman representing the contestee is complaining of the character of the evidence, and I desire to call his attention now to the testimony of the very witness from which he read, Mr. Flynn, who testified that some of these persons who voted legally in these precincts had voted for Mr. Connell, and that same witness was asked by the attorney for the contestant for whom he voted, what his politics were; and the contestee objected and instructed that witness that he need not answer.

Both the contestee and contestant seem to have tried this case on the theory that a voter was not permitted and could not be required to testify as to how he voted, and the pages of this record are full of objections made by counsel for contestee when contestant sought to prove by a witness as to how he voted. I say the record is full of objections and instructions from their mouths to the witnesses.

So he is estopped now from complaining that the evidence in this case as to how these men voted did not come from the mouths of the voters themselves. He told these witnesses that they need not disclose that fact, and witness after witness took advantage of the instruction and this information as to what their rights were under the law, and refused to tell under the instructions of counsel for the contestee as to how he voted. * * *

It is convenient here now to call attention to the position taken by the counsel for the contestee on that very question by this very witness. I am quoting from the testimony of Flynn. The counsel for the contestant asked what was his politics—that is, the witness's politics. He asked, "Do you know James Flynn?" That is the witness himself. He said, "Yes." He was asked, "What is your politics?" The witness answers, "Mine?" And the question is, "Yes; yours." Mr. Ballentine, attorney for the contestee, says, "You don't have to answer that question if you don't want to." I am reading on page 26 of the Views of the minority, a little above the middle of the page. That is the witness that the gentleman from Iowa read from on that same page.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Martin J. Wade, who sustained the minority contention] also said this is the character of his testimony, and he read as follows: "Patrick J. Walsh; do you know him?" "Yes." "Was he supporting Connell?" "Yes." Now, that is not all the evidence of James Flynn. The evidence farther down on the same page, on cross-examination of Flynn, is, "Are you attempting to tell whom these men voted for?" And the witness says, "Yes; the men told me so."

Now, the question is whether or not the declaration made by the voters themselves is competent to prove how they voted. If the ballot does not disclose the facts, if the witness himself is not allowed to testify, where are you going for proof as to how this or that man voted in any election? Is it impossible to purge the ballot for the reason that these two classes of evidence are barred under the law? The next best evidence, and the only evidence that is left for any party in a case of this kind, is to prove what? Why, to prove what the voter said—prove his declarations, prove what political party he belongs to.

In accordance with their conclusions, the majority rejected the three polls above mentioned, thus deducting 172 votes from contestant and 625 from sitting Member; credited contestant with 32 legal votes proven aliunde; and deducted from sitting Member 200 illegal votes proven aliunde to have been cast for him. One illegal vote was deducted from contestant.

The result of these corrections left a plurality of 223 for contestant; and the majority reported the usual resolutions:

Resolved, That Hon. George Howell was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-eighth Congress from the Tenth district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That Ron. William Connell was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-eighth Congress from the Tenth district of the State of Pennsylvania, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The minority proposed substitute resolutions declaring Mr. Connell not elected, and Mr. Howell elected and entitled to the seat.

The report was debated at length on February 9 and 10, and on the latter day the substitute was disagreed to, yeas 150, nays 161. Then the first resolution of the majority was agreed to, yeas 160, nays 148. The second resolution was agreed to, yeas 159, nays 147.

Mr. Connell then appeared and took the oath.

1132. The Tennessee election case of Davis v. Sims, in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

The House will not, on pretense that a class of voters are unconstitutionally prevented from voting, count the votes of persons not shown individually to have attempted or desired or been qualified to vote.

Votes may not be proven aliunde on mere estimates of witnesses.

The Elections Committee declined to consider the failure of election officers to hold the elections in certain precincts when it was not shown that either party was deprived thereby of votes to which he was entitled.

No fraud being shown, a slight irregularity in canvassing returns was not considered by the Elections Committee.

On March 4, 1904,[2] Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted the report of the Committee in the Tennessee election case of Davis v. Sims. The sitting Member had been returned by a majority of 976, which the committee found reduced to 970 by corrections which it made in the returns. But one question was involved in the decision made by the committee. Contestant claimed—that a large number of votes, not cast nor offered to be cast, should be counted as if actually cast for him, because, as he alleges, the persons who would otherwise have cast them were prevented from voting by the operation of the "Dortch law," which he holds to be unconstitutional.

For the sake of the argument the committee admit that the law is unconstitutional, and thus conclude:

What would be the effect of holding the Dortch law unconstitutional? The election was held under it in only 13 civil districts out of a total of 168 in the Congressional district. If we throw out entirely the returns from these 13 districts the contestee will still have a majority. The contestant insists, however, that in the event of holding the law unconstitutional the vote already counted should stand, presumably upon the theory that persons who voted under the Dortch law would also have been entitled to vote under the laws in force at the time of its enactment and which it, if constitutional, must be held to have repealed. He also contends that we must add to his total a large number of unvoted votes which he asserts would have been cast had the Dortch law not been enacted. He claims that it has been proved that 1,061 persons named in the testimony would have voted for him had they been entitled to vote under the Dortch law, thus giving him a majority of 85—and that 1,920 persons, "estimated," but not named in the proof, should also be treated as having voted for him, thus increasing his majority to 2,005.

Just 20 persons who were actually called to the stand testified that they would have voted for contestant had not the Dortch law prevented, and as to one of them the testimony does not show that he was registered or had paid a tax so as to be qualified to vote under any law. As to all the other persons claimed, the evidence is purely hearsay and very unreliable.

As to 12 of them, contestant's claim that they shall be considered as having voted for him rests solely upon the testimony of J. H. Falls (the first witness called to prove names of this class), of which the part bearing upon this question is as follows:

"5. Q. Can a person who can not read vote under the provisions of the said Dortch law?—A. No, sir.

"6. Q. What effect does the Dortch law have upon the Republican voters of the Fourth civil district of Hardin County?—A. It has a big effect to keep them from voting.

[2] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 1382; Record, pp. 2804–2809.

"7. Q. How many do you know, of your own knowledge, in said Fourth district who are disfranchised under the provisions of this law?—A. Twelve, that I know of.

"8. Q. Will you please give the names of those whom you know to be disfranchised?—A. Buck House, old man Ras White.

"9. Q. How long have you lived in this district?—A. I have lived in this district all my life.

"10. Q. How old are you?—A. 1 am 53 years old.

"11. Q. Have you a list of persons who did not attend the November election because the same was held under the provisions of the Dortch law?—A. Yes, sir; I have got a list of them.

"12. Q. Please give the names of the parties contained on your list, and are they Republican or Democrats?—A. Marion Cole, Wiley Cherry, Bud Campbell, Henry Doran, Tom Ellison, Ike Kendall, Ike Rhone, B. F. Rinks, Ulis Lowry, Buck House, John White, and old man Ras White. They are all Republicans.

"13. Q. Do the above-named parties all live in the Fourth district of Hardin County?—A. Yes; every one of them.

"Cross-examined:

"1. Q. Where did you get the list of names that you have just read?—A. I got them all over there at my store.

"2. Q. When did you make up said list?—A. I do not recollect whether it was before Christmas or since Christmas.

"3. Q. How came you to make up said list? What was it made for?—A. Abernathy come along there one day and asked me if I knowed how many around there that had not voted, and I told him there was a good many. He told me to write them down; that he would be back a certain day and I could hand them to him.

"4. Q. Did Mr. Abernathy tell you what he wanted with the names?—A. I believe he did tell me. I do not exactly remember, it was about the election some way or another.

"5. Q. How do you know that the names you have given are men who can not vote under the Dortch law?—A. I do not know. I did not ask them about that.

"6. Q. Then you just mean that they did not vote in the last November election, and do not know whether they could vote under the Dortch law or not. Is that correct?—A. I do not know whether all of them could or not. Them two old men told me they could not vote, because they could not make their mark straight.

"7. Q. As a matter of fact, most of those that you have named did vote in the last August election, in 1902, did they not?—A. I do not know whether they did or not; I did not even ask them that.

"Further this deponent saith not."

The witness practically contradicted every statement he made save that the 12 were all Republicans. Not one of the 12 was called to testify whether he was or was not a Republican, or had registered and paid taxes, or had or had not voted, or was prevented by the Dortch law from voting, or whether, if able to vote, he would have voted for contestant.

The substantial part of the testimony of the next witness, L. K. Freeman, is as follows:

"5. Q. What kind of a qualification does said law put upon the voters where the same is in operation, if any?—A. It is necessary for the voter to be able to read and write; both.

"6. Q. How has this law operated upon the Republican party in the elections of the Fourth district of Hardin County, and how did it operate in the election of November 4, 1902?—A. It disfranchises a great number of the voters.

"7. Q. Give your best estimate of the number of Republicans disfranchised in the Fourth district of Hardin County, in said November election, by the provisions of said law.—A. From 75 to 100 voters.

"8. Q. Have you gone over and made a list of the names of the Republican disfranchised by the Dortch law in said election of November 4, 1902, in said district; and if so, will you give the names of those whom you know to be unable to vote under the provisions of said law?—A. Yes; I have made a. list to the best of my knowledge and recollection. The names are as follows: Sam Broyles, Wes Bailey, Lute Bailey, Andy Bailey, Josh Bailey, Bill Cherry, Newt Campbell, Marion Cole, Bud Campbell, Lige Dixon, Henry Doran, Mose Davis, Henry Dillahunt, A. C. Duckworth, George Graham, Ned Graham, Pete Gillis, Tom Graham, Fred Guinn, Gus Houston, Pate Hopson, Jack Hunt, Bob Hunt, Bob Hardeman, Lewis Hassell, John Hassell, Ben Higgins, G.O Hunt, Bill Hunt, Bud Hunt, Chub Hunt, Caesar Kendall, George King, Bill Kyle, Jim Lutts, Jerry McDougal, Jim McKinney, John Pollard, Sid Pollard, Frank Pollard, Tom Patton, Green Patton, W. A. Palmer, Otis Pointer, Jerry Sevier, Elias Stephens, Jim. Stephens, Joe Sanderson, Mose Shull, Sam Tall, Dave Winters, Bishop White, Elias Williams, Joe Young, Louis Hassell, Bob House, Buck House, John Hinton, Dez Johnson, Ernest Johnson, Ike Kendall, Bob Johnson, Ras White, Ike Lynch, Bill Wolf, Will Fitzgerald, Adam Ellison, Sam Bundy, Charlie Ermin, Press Martin, Andrew Mack, Jonas Ross.

"9. Q. Will you please file said list as Exhibit A to this, your deposition, making it a part of the same?—A. I herewith file the same, marked 'Exhibit A.'

"10. Q. Was the parties whose names you have given otherwise qualified voters in said November election for all State and county officers, barring the provisions of the Dortch law?—A. I think they were."

In his cross-examination this passage occurs:

"14. Q. How many of the persons named by you in answer to question 8 in chief that can not read?—A. I could not say just how many.

"15. Q. Had the persons whose names you give in answer to question 8 in chief paid their poll taxes for the year 1901 before the November election, 1902?—A. I could not say whether all of them had or not, but I know some of them had.

"16. Q. How many of them had registered for voting?—A. I do not know."

Even among these vague statements there is not a single assertion that anyone of the 72 persons named desired, even if qualified, to vote for contestant.

S. J. Creevy produced a list of 345 names, concerning which he testified as follows:

"27. Q. I will ask you to state if you have briefly, made a list of voters in this city and civil district who are unable to read?—A. Yes, sir; I made that yesterday.

"28. Q. How many names does this list prepared by you contain?—A. If I made no mistake in the count it is 345.

"29. Q. Do you think those persons appearing from this list are able to vote under what is known as the Dortch law?—A. I do not.

"30. Q. If those persons appearing upon said list could vote, what ticket would they vote?—A. My opinion is they would vote the Republican ticket."

From his cross-examination the following is taken:

"8. Q. You have stated that there were 750 Republican voters in the city of Jackson, and of this number you estimated about 345 were unable to read. Now state whether the remaining 405 voters are able to vote under the Dortch law.—A. I think they are.

"9. Q. Then how do you account for the fact that Hon. F. M. Davis, candidate for Congress, received only 23 votes in this city at the last November election?—A. I account for it by the Republican voters not having their poll taxes and by general indifference as to the result of the election.

"10. Q. What was the cause of that indifference?—A. To some extent dissatisfaction existing in the Republican party in the county; and being what we term an off year, accounts for some of it.

"11. Q. What dissatisfaction do you speak of existing in the Republican party?—A. Dissatisfaction as to the county organization; as to who would be recognized as county chairman and members of the executive committee.

"12. Q. Is it not a fact that there were two factions—one headed by H. C. Worsham and the other headed by F. R. Bray—amd that the majority of the colored voters were identified with the Worsham faction?—A. I can't say a majority. They were nearly equally divided from the strength exhibited in the convention.

"14. Q. Which faction had the larger following?—A. Both factions claimed it.

"15. Q. Did either faction champion Mr. Davis's candidacy?—A. The Bray faction recognized Mr. Davis as the regular nominee and entitled to the Republican support.

"16. Q. What was the attitude of the Worsham faction toward Mr. Davis?—A. Apparently it was hostile.

"17. Q. Did this apparent hostility serve to keep the members of the Worsham faction from voting for Mr. Davis?—A. I am of the opinion that it did.

"18. Q. Of the 345 voters in the city of Jackson whom you say are unable to read, what per cent of these can be instructed or coached before election so as to be able to vote under the Dortch law?—A. My opinion, not over 5 per cent.

"19. Q. Is it necessary to pay poll tax in order to vote in the Fifteenth civil district?—A. If you are not exempt by age or infirmity, it is.

"20. Q. Are you able to state what per cent of the persons whose names appear on Exhibit A pay their poll taxes?—A. I estimate 75 per cent of them are over age.

"21. Q. Can you say of your own knowledge what per cent of the remainder pay their poll taxes?—A. I can not.

"22. Q. From your personal knowledge, then, it may be that none or a very few of them?—A. It may be; yes, sir. I am not informed."

Upon the mere expression of opinion by the witness that "they would all vote the Republican ticket" and without evidence of registration or tax payments we are asked to add 345 to contestant's vote. The evidence concerning the remainder of the names claimed as proved by contestant is of the same class except that in some instances there was evidence tending to show registration and payment of taxes.

Upon this character of testimony we are asked to treat 1,061 named persons as if they had voted for contestant. As already shown, 20 only of them have testified. As to the other 1,041, the evidence is even less satisfactory than that which was rejected in the Forty-third Congress in Bell v. Snyder (Smith's digest, 247), in which case the committee said:

"L. Bloomer, supervisor at that precinct, in his deposition, page 164, states that the 20 persons whose names are given by him had certificates of registration, and that he saw all of them registered except two, and that they would have voted for contestant if they had been allowed to vote; that they presented their certificates of registration and offered to vote; then made affidavit and offered to vote. He says that he did not read all the tickets, but to the best of his knowledge the parties would have voted for Bell, as all the Reform tickets were alike.

"The committee regard the fact of these 20 persons having been registered as voters as sufficiently proven, but the proof as to the fact that all of them offered to vote for contestant or that they intended to or would have voted for contestant is insufficient."

In the case in hand 1,041 of the persons named did not even offer to vote. As to many of them we have no evidence of their registration or payment of taxes, and as to none of them have we any save hearsay evidence that they desired to vote at all or would in any event have voted for contestant.

The additional 1,920 claimed by contestant rest upon evidence even more flimsy—the mere estimates of witnesses of which a fair sample is found in the testimony of T. J. Sawner, here given in toto:

"1. Q. What is your age, place of residence, and what position do you hold in the county?—A. I am 46 years old; reside at Savannah, Tenn., and am sheriff of Hardin County.

"2. Q. What experience have you had in the politics of Hardin County, and how many times have you canvassed the county?—A. I have had some experience in the politics of the county. I have canvassed the county something like half a dozen times, but not thoroughly, though, every time.

"3. Q. How many times have you been sheriff of Hardin County, and what other offices have you held?—A. I have been sheriff three times, and was constable of the fourth district before I was elected sheriff.

"4. Q. Are the elections of the Fourth civil district of Hardin County held under the provisions of the Dortch law and what kind of qualifications does it place upon the voters?—A. They are held under the Dortch law, and a man is required to read and has to be a good marker.

"5. Q. Is it possible for a person who can not read to vote the Dortch ticket?—A. It is not, unless he has assistance.

"6. Q. What effect has the application of the Dortch law had upon the Republican vote of Hardin County? I mean how much has it diminished their vote?—A. I believe it has diminished their vote something like 500.

"7. Q. In your best judgment, how many Republicans are there in the Fourth civil district of Hardin County who can not vote under the Dortch law?—A. I believe there is 100.

"8. Q. What effort was there made by the leading Republicans of Hardin County in the campaign in 1902 to poll their full strength for their ticket?—A. They made as strong an effort as possible under the circumstances.

"9. Q. I will ask you if there were men selected and put into each civil district of the county several days before the election for the purpose of canvassing each Republican voter in order to get him out to the November election, 1902?—A. That is my understanding.

"10. Q. I will ask you if the Republicans felt very buoyant and hopeful of success in the Congressional election of November, 1902—?–A. They did.

"11. Q. Have you made a list of the Republicans whom you know to be disfranchised under the operation of the Dortch law in the Fourth civil district of Hardin County?—A. No; I have not.

"Further this deponent saith not."

Upon this it is demanded that 100 votes be added to contestant's count, and upon similar testimony a total of 1,920. No names are given, no evidence of registration or payment of taxes, nor of intention or desire upon the part of the unknown persons to vote for contestant. Such evidence is wholly inadmissible for any purpose. There have been cases in which persons proved to have been qualified, desiring, intending, and attempting to vote, have had their votes counted, notwithstanding that they were not received by the election officer; but there is no precedent for adding to the count the votes of persons not shown to have attempted or desired or been qualified to vote for any candidate under the law.

A careful study and analysis of all the evidence in this case and of the printed briefs, supplemented by exhaustive oral arguments of able counsel, convinces us that, no matter what view may be taken of the Dortch law, the result of the election is not changed. Your committee therefore recommends the adoption of the following resolutions (H. Res. No. 241):

"Resolved, That F. M. Davis was not elected to membership in the House of Representatives of the United States in the Fifty-eighth Congress, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

"Resolved, That T. W. Sims was elected to membership in the House of Representatives of the United States in the Fifty-eighth Congress, and is entitled to a seat therein."

The resolutions were agreed to by the House without debate or division.

Although the main issue was thus simplified, the committee discussed several questions related to the case but not essential to its determination:

(1) As to a failure of election officers to hold elections in certain precincts:

In the two precincts of Sibley and Walnut Grove, in Hardin County, the election officers failed to hold any election. It is claimed that the Republicans are in considerable majority in these precincts, and that by the failure of the Democratic officials to hold elections the contestant was deprived of votes which he would otherwise have received. It appears, however, that under the law of Tennessee a voter may vote in any one of several precincts in the same civil district, and it is in evidence that there were three other voting places in that particular civil district in which the residents of Sibley and Walnut Grove might have voted. We are not fully satisfied with the reason given for failure to hold elections in these precincts. It is perhaps not unfair to presume that the real reason was a desire to prevent or reduce the Republican vote by subjecting these people to the inconvenience of journeying to other precincts at distant points. But as we are not advised whether all or any of the voters in these precincts did vote in any of the three other precincts in which they were lawfully entitled to vote, we are unable to say to what extent, if at all, failure to hold elections in Sibley and Walnut Grove affected the votes of the respective parties to this contest.

(2) As to an irregularity in handling returns:

Contestant charges that the returns in Henry County were opened before the meeting of the election board. The fact appears to be that the chairman, upon receipt of the returns, opened them, compiled the vote on a properly prepared sheet, and upon the meeting of the full board submitted the same to them, when the returns were compared with the tally sheet and certified. There is no evidence of any dishonesty in this practice or that the returns as certified were not correct.4

Discussion of the claim that a ballot law practically disfranchising the ignorant established an unconstitutional qualification.

Discussion of the claim that a law practically disfranchising the ignorant in certain portions only of a State violated a constitutional provision that "elections shall be free and equal."

Reference to the principle that in exercise of the powers conferred by the Federal Constitution the State legislature is not controlled by the State constitution.

(3) As to the constitutionality of the Dortch law.

The committee describe the law:

The so-called "Dortch law" (named after the person who originally devised or introduced the system) now comprises a principal act passed in 1890 and a number of supplemental acts of various later dates. It does not apply to the whole State, but requires that in certain specified portions there shall be used an official ballot, which may be described as one variety of the Australian form.

"This ballot contains no party emblems, devices, designations, nor party column. There is no provision for voting a straight party ticket by marking in a circle or square or in any other manner. The law requires that "the names of all candidates for the same office shall be printed together and arranged alphabetically according to the initials of their surnames, irrespective of party; but the order in which the title of the various offices to be filled shall be arranged upon each separate ticket or ballot shall be left to the will of the officer or officers charged with the printing of said ticket."

After giving forms of ballot, the report continues:

The voter having received a ballot is to go into the voting compartment and "prepare his ballot by marking in the appropriate margin or place a cross (X) opposite the name of the candidate of his choice for each office to be filled, or by filling in the name of the candidate of his choice in the blank space provided therefore and marking a cross (X) opposite thereto."

He may not have in advance a specimen ballot, and until he receive the official ballot, just before going into the booth, can not even know the order in which the respective offices will be grouped thereon. But he may with his ballot receive a printed card of instruction, of which the following is a sample:

"Official card of instructions prepared by commissners of registration of election.

This card is intended to assist and instruct voters how to prepare their ballots.

"1. Having received from the registrar your polling place an official ballot, present it with your certificate of registration to the assistant registrar, who will number the stub of the ballot and put the same number on your certificate of registration; then go to one of the shelves or compartment and prepare your ballot by placing a cross mark (thus X) before or after the line in which the name of your choice appears.

"2. You are not allowed to vote any ticket except the official ballot.

"3. If you spoil your ballot in trying to mark it correctly, return it to the registrars and get another; you will be allowed to get but three ballots. You are not allowed to take or remove any ballot from the polling place, but must deposit the ballot as received, or return the same to the registrars, as above provided, in case you have spoiled the game.

"4. If you are unable to your ballot, by reason of blindness or other physical disability, ask the officer holding the election to assist you.

"5. Before leaving the voting shelf fold your ballot without displaying the marks thereon, but so that the words 'Official ballot for,' etc., printed on the back of the ballot, and the numbered stub shall be plainly visible; then present to the officers of election your certificate of registration, your poll-tax receipt, and your marked ballot.

"6. It is your duty to mark and deposit your ballot without undue delay and quit the polling place as soon as you have voted. If other persons are ready to vote when you get your ballot you will be allowed only five minutes in which to mark it, but if no other voters are waiting you will be allowed ten minutes.

"7. You must not allow any person to see your ballot, or to take the same from you, or remove the same from the polling place, nor to place any mark on the same other than as hereon instructed, it being a misdemeanor to do so."

If "by reason of blindness or other physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot" the voter may receive the assistance of the officer holding the election in marking the same, but unless so blind or otherwise physically disabled he can be assisted only in the following way:

"The registrar shall upon demand of any voter made at the time his ballot is handed to him give to such voter a correct statement of the order in which the title of the various offices to be filled stand upon the particular ballot furnished to such voter."

It is expressly provided that "a voter who shall, except as herein otherwise provided, allow his ballot to be seen by any other person * * * or any person who shall * * * aid, or attempt to aid, any voter by means of any mechanical device, or any other means whatever, in marking his ballot, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100," and election officers are to cause the arrest of any person so violating this provision, and the offender is to be "treated as one caught in the very act of committing a misdemeanor."

It is alleged by contestant in his notice of contest that these statutory provisions "are highly partisan; were passed, together with their amendments, with partisan motives and in an intolerant partisan spirit."

We do not see, however, that we have anything to do with that. This House can hardly be expected to preserve the balance of partisanship in State legislatures, nor can the motives of State legislators be considered in determining Congressional elections, provided the statutes enacted by them were within their constitutional authority.

The inquiry as to the constitutionality of this law involved two branches:

(a) Does it establish an additional qualification:

But contestant contends that no person who can not read can vote the official ballot; that by the Dortch law an additional qualification is thus imposed, and that it violates Article I of the State constitution of Tennessee, which declares "that elections shall be free and equal, and the right of suffrage as hereinafter declared shall never be denied to any person entitled thereto, except upon a conviction by a jury of some infamous crime previously ascertained and declared by law and judgment thereon by a court of competent jurisdiction."

And section 1 of article 4, which is as follows:

"Every male person of the age of 21 years being a citizen of the United States and a resident of this State for twelve months, and of the county wherein he may offer his vote for six months next preceding the day of election, shall be entitled to vote for members of the general assembly and other civil officers of the county or district in which he resides; and there shall be no qualifications attached to the right of suffrage, except that each voter shall give to the judges of election where he offers to vote satisfactory evidence that he has paid the poll taxes assessed against him for such preceding period as the legislature shall prescribe, and at such time as may be prescribed by law, without which his vote can not be received; and all male citizens of the State shall be subject to the payment of poll taxes and to the performance of military duty within such ages as may be prescribed by law. The general assembly shall have power to enact laws requiring voters to vote in the election precincts in which they may reside, and laws to secure the freedom of elections and the purity of the ballot box."

Some seventy witnesses in this case, some of whom were white and some colored, some Democrats and some Republicans, all testified that ability to read is essential to enable one to vote this form of ballot. The contestee himself frankly admits that a person unable to read can not vote "as well as a man who can read and write; but he can possibly vote some ballots under the law, and they do it." It must be manifest to anyone that the persons unable to read, who can successfully mark all the candidates of a particular party, especially in a Presidential year, must be very few, if any.

The supreme court of Tennessee, however, in Cook v. State, 90 Tenn., 407, sustained an indictment and conviction for "aiding electors in marking their ballots, instructing them how to vote," etc., and expressly declared that this law does not violate Article IV of the State constitution. This ruling was followed by the Elections Committee and the House in Thrasher v. Enloe in the Fifty-third Congress, the minority, however, expressly declaring its opinion that the act was unconstitutional.

(b) As to the provision of the Tennessee constitution requiring that "elections shall be free and equal":

The Tennessee court does not appear to have considered the constitutional requirement that "elections shall be free and equal." This provision, found in many State constitutions, must have been intended to have some meaning and effect. Unlike the rain from heaven, the Dortch law does not fall upon the just and the unjust alike or, to be more accurate, it does not fall upon all of the just nor upon all of the unjust. It does not apply to the whole State nor to the whole of this Congressional district. It applies only in spots.

In the Eighth Congressional district there are 168 civil districts. The Dortch law applied in 13 of them and practically required the voter to be able to read in order properly to mark his ballot. In the other districts a voter might use a printed ballot or write his ballot, if he desired, or have somebody else write it for him and carry it in his vest pocket for a week or six weeks and vote it freely upon election day and have it counted, provided, of course, he was duly registered and had paid his taxes. With such varying conditions in different parts of the same Congressional district, are elections "free and equal?"

The supreme court of Tennessee further sustained this law in Moore v. Sharp, 98 Tenn., 491.

The constitution of Kentucky, like that of Tennessee, contains a provision that all elections shall be "free and equal." The legislature prescribed a form of ballot and required each voter to retire to a compartment and there unaided and alone indicate by marks on his ballot the various candidates for the several offices for whom he wished to vote. The supreme court of that State in Rogers v. Jacob, Mayor, etc. (98 Ky., 502), unanimously declared that provision of the statute unconstitutional, Mr. Chief Justice Lewis, who delivered the opinion, saying (p. 508):

"A statute requiring votes to be given by ballot need not, any more than the mode of voting viva voce, operate unequally or so as to deprive any person entitled of the privilege of suffrage, and if the one we are considering conflicts with that clause of the constitution, or denies the privilege of free suffrage, which really exists independent of that section, it is simply on account of defect or vice of some particular provision not indispensable to the general or successful operation of the law. And the only question about which we have any difficulty is in regard to section 9, that, by requiring each voter to retire to a compartment and there, alone and unaided, indicate by a mark on his ballot the various candidates for numerous offices he wishes to vote for, practically operates to deprive those unable to read or write of a free and intelligible choice, and in fact makes free suffrage as to them a matter of chance or accident. And thus, while the interests and rights of many may be involved and should not be denied or jeopardized by nullifying the entire statute already in operation, if it is in other respects valid, we have no right to sanction any law or part of a law that takes from a single human being his constitutional rights. It is, however, permissible and often important to limit the operation of, disregard, or strike from a statute one or more provisions that conflict with the constitution rather than allow them to vitiate the whole; and in accordance with, or at least in analogy to, that rule section 9 must be held inoperative to the extent it in the manner mentioned deprives illiterate persons of the opportunity and means of freely and intelligibly voting, for they have the right to avail themselves of whatever reasonable aid and information may be necessary to enable them to cast their ballots understandingly, and can not be legally deprived of it."

The State of Virginia had a similar provision in its constitution requiring freedom and equality of elections. The legislature passed a law providing a ballot much like the Dortch-law ballot, except that it provided that "at the request of any elector in the voting booth who may be physically or educationally unable to vote, the said special constable may render him assistance by reading the names and offices on the ballot and pointing out to him the name or names he may wish to strike out, or otherwise aid him in preparing his ballot."

In passing upon that statute, in Pearson v. Supervisors, etc. (91 Va., 322), the supreme court of that State said (p. 330):

"It will not be disputed—

"First. That the right of suffrage is derived from the constitution of the State, and to it we look for the qualification of voters and the limitations and restrictions upon the right of voting; in other words, to ascertain who may or who may not vote.

"Second. That the legislature can not prescribe any qualification in addition to those found in the constitution, and any attempt to do so openly or covertly, directly or indirectly, is void.

"Third. That there is no educational qualification prescribed by our constitution, and a person otherwise qualified to vote, no matter how ignorant he may be, is entitled to vote.

"Fourth. That the sole function of the legislature, with respect to the exercise of the right of suffrage, is to provide the mode in which those entitled to vote may do so and have their votes counted, and to guard against improper, illegal, or fraudulent voting.

"Fifth. That to this end the legislature may adopt and enforce reasonable rules and regulations to secure the one and prevent the other.

"Sixth. But if under cover of a law to regulate voting a provision is introduced into the law which virtually establishes a test of the qualification of the voter, additional to those prescribed in the constitution, such provision of the law transcends the power of the legislature and is null and void."

And again (p. 332):

"It is obvious that one who, either from physical or intellectual blindness, is unable to read, is wholly incapable of voting by ballot without assistance from some quarter."

The court sustained the statute in that case by construing the word "may" to mean "must," thus making it absolutely the duty of the sworn special constable not only to point out the names and offices on the ballot, as provided in the Tennessee statute, but also to do what is positively prohibited by the Dortch law, viz, "otherwise aid him in preparing his ballot."

A Michigan statute, providing an official ballot and requiring it to be marked by the voter in the booth, contained no provision either forbidding or allowing him to have assistance. Its constitutionality was challenged in Common Council v. Rush, 82 Mich., 532, and the supreme court of that State, after referring to the Kentucky case, said (p. 541):

"It is contended that under the act in question the result is the same, because no one is permitted to accompany the voter to the booth to assist him. It is to be regretted that the legislature did not expressly provide for furnishing ballots to this class of voters. We must therefore carefully examine the act to ascertain if it leaves no way for such voters to obtain ballots. It is clear that if voters are limited to the use of tickets provided in the booths then some voters are disfranchised by the very terms of the law. But we do not think that the law necessarily bears that construction. There is no express prohibition against assisting such a person in the preparation of his ticket, nor against his obtaining a ticket outside the polling place for that purpose, nor against assisting to a booth or the polls one physically unable to go alone. Such a case is not within the mischief aimed at, and we hold that under this law such a voter is entitled to receive assistance in the preparation of his ticket, and to receive and have his ticket prepared outside the polling places. This, we think, is in accord with that maxim of interpretation that a thing which is within the spirit of a statute is within the statute, although not within the letter, and a thing within the letter is not within the statute unless within the intention."

In other words, in order to sustain the statute, the Michigan court construed into it a very liberal provision providing for such assistance to the voter as, under the Dortch law, would render the voter and the person assisting him subject to fine and imprisonment.

In Capen v. Foster, 12 Pick., 488, the supreme court of Massachusetts marked the distinguishing line between laws which took away or abridged the right of suffrage and those which may lawfully be enacted to regulate its exercise, and held, substantially, that in order to belong to the latter class, such laws must be reasonable, uniform, and impartial, and must be calculated to facilitate and secure, rather than to subvert or impede, the exercise of the right to vote. This proposition was sustained by the supreme court of Ohio in Monroe et al. v. Collins, 17 Ohio, 665, in which case a statute of that State was declared unconstitutional and void because, although entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to preserve the purity of elections,'" it imposed upon certain classes of persons conditions not imposed upon others, to enable them to exercise the right to vote.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania in a very recent case held in an opinion by Chief Justice Mitchell, as reported in the Philadelphia Press of February 16, 1904, that—

"The constitution confers the right of suffrage on every citizen possessing the qualifications named in that instrument. It is an individual right and each elector is entitled to express his own individual will in his own way. His right can not be denied, qualified, or restricted. The constitution itself regulates the times and, in a general way, the method, to wit, by ballot with certain specified directions as to receiving and recording it. Beyond this the legislature has the power to regulate the details of place, time, manner, etc., in the general interest for the due and orderly exercise of the franchise by all electors alike. Anything beyond this is not regulation, but unconstitutional restriction.

"It is never to be overlooked, therefore, that the requirement of the use of an official ballot is a questionable exercise of legislative power, and even in the most favorable view treads closely on the border of a void interference with the individual elector. Every doubt, therefore, in the construction of the statute must be resolved in favor of the elector.

"Every elector, as already said, has the right to express his individual will in his own way and for his own reasons, which are not open to question, however unsound or unimportant others may deem them. And the rights of electors acting together as a party are equally beyond question. The electors themselves are the only tribunal to decide whether the principles, platform, aim, or method of reaching the desired object are broad enough, permanent enough, or important enough to be the basis of united action as a party, and, if they so decide, courts must recognize and treat them accordingly."

We have stated contestant's contention very fully and the authorities bearing thereon in conflict with the Tennessee decisions.

(4) Another question raised by the sitting Member was stated by the committee but not discussed.

But the contestee, while not admitting that the Dortch law is in violation of any provision of the State constitution, contends that even if it were it would still be valid because of the provision of sec. 4, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, that in the absence of action by Congress "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof." He contends that in the exercise of the powers thus conferred by the Federal Constitution the legislature can not be controlled by the constitution of the State, and in support of this proposition cites Baldwin v. Trowbridge, 2 Bart.; Donnelly v. Washburn, 1 Ells., 495, and McCrary's Law of Elections, 109–112.

The resolutions recommended by the committee were agreed to without division.

1134. The South Carolina election case of Dantzler v. Lever in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

The House declined to invalidate an election because a State constitution had established qualifications of voters in disregard of reconstruction legislation.

As to the duty of the House to pass on the constitutionality of a State law as to the qualifications of voters.

On March 18, 1904,[1] Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, submitted the unanimous report of the Committee on the South Carolina election case of Dantzler v. Lever. This report was as follows:

At the Congressional election in the Seventh district of South Carolina on the 4th day of November, 1902, the contestant, Alexander D. Dantzler, received in said district the total number of 167 votes. The contestee, Asbury F. Lever, received 4,220 votes.

There is nothing in the record or in the case to sustain a claim that the contestant, Dantzler, was elected. It is indisputable that if a legal election were held in the district the contestee, Lever, was fairly elected.

It is urged on behalf of contestant that no legal election was held in South Carolina, and the claim is made that both the election laws and the constitution of South Carolina, then and now in operation, are illegal, invalid, and unconstitutional because in direct conflict with the so-called reconstruction act of June 25, 1868 (15 Stat. L., 73), readmitting South Carolina and other States to representation in Congress upon the condition (stated in said act to be a "fundamental" condition) "that the constitution of neither of said States shall ever be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote in said State who are entitled to vote by the constitution thereof herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any altering of said constitution may be made with regard to the time and place of residence of voters."

The constitution of South Carolina referred to in the reconstruction act of June 25, 1868, did not contain any educational or property qualification of voters. The constitution of South Carolina of 1895

(which was adopted and put into effect by a constitutional convention without a vote of the people adopting it), as well as the election laws adopted or passed in accordance with it, contain educational and property qualifications.

It is claimed that under the South Carolina constitution of 1895, and the election laws in force under it, many citizens are deprived of the right to vote in said State who were and would be entitled to vote by the constitution of 1868, referred to in the reconstruction act of June 25, 1868. The South Carolina constitution of 1895 and the election laws under it are therefore claimed to be in direct conflict with the reconstruction act of June 25, 1868, readmitting South Carolina to representation in Congress upon the conditions therein named as "fundamental conditions."

Contestant claims that if the citizens of the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina who could have voted under the terms of the constitution of 1868 had been permitted to vote he would have been elected, and he asserts that many thousands of colored voters in the Congressional district entitled to vote under the constitution of 1868 were deprived of the right to vote under the educational and property qualifications of the constitution of 1895.

It is very plain that contestant was not elected; but counsel for contestant insists that if contestant was not elected then no election was held, and that it is the duty of Congress to declare that no valid election was held in South Carolina for Members of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and therefore to unseat the contestee.

It would seem that if no valid election was held in the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina in November, 1902, and if the House of Representatives, holding this view, should declare the seat from that district vacant, then no election could be held to fill the vacancy until after the South Carolina constitution of 1895 and the election laws under it had been changed. This would necessarily involve an entire lack of representation from the district for a considerable period of time.

If the Seventh district of South Carolina were the only district involved it might be proper for the Committee on Elections, as well as the House itself, to put on record its opinion in the case and to declare elected or not elected, as that opinion might run, the contestee. But the reconstruction acts were not confined to South Carolina. Practically the same "fundamental conditions" are found in the acts readmitting Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas to representation in Congress. Most of these States have adopted new constitutions said to be in conflict with the terms and provisions of the reconstruction acts readmitting them to representation in Congress.

It follows, therefore, quite logically that if the House should unseat the contestee on the ground that no valid election was held or could be held in his district under the present constitution and election laws of South Carolina, a similar construction would require the House, in the case of contest, to unseat all of the Members from South Carolina and from most of the other Southern States, and that new elections could not be held to fill the vacancies until the respective constitutions of these States had been changed so as to comply with the reconstruction acts.

The question of the constitutionality and validity of the constitution and election laws of South Carolina, therefore, in its effect upon the membership of this House is one of far-reaching importance. It involves in its outcome the right of a very large number of the Members of the House to their seats. But the decision of this House against the contestee in this case would have no binding force in South Carolina except in this particular case. It probably would not be followed or obeyed by the State of South Carolina except in this particular case.

However desirable it may be for a legislative body to retain control of the decision as to the election and qualification of its members, it is quite certain that a legislative body is not the ideal body to pass judicially upon the constitutionality of the enactments of other bodies. We have in this country a proper forum for the decision of constitutional and other judicial questions. If any citizen of South Carolina who was entitled to vote under the constitution of that State in 1868 is now deprived by the provisions of the present constitution he has the right to tender himself for registration and for voting, and in case his right is denied, to bring suit in a proper court for the purpose of enforcing his right or recovering damages for its denial.

That suit can be carried by him, if necessary, to the Supreme Court of the United States. If the United States Supreme Court shall declare in such case that the "fundamental conditions" in the reconstruction acts were valid and constitutional and that the State constitutions are in violation of those acts, and hence invalid and unconstitutional, every State will be compelled to immediately bow in submission to the decision. The decision of the Supreme Court would be binding and would be a positive declaration of the law of the land which could not be denied or challenged.

On the contrary, the decision of the House of Representatives upon this grave judicial question would not be considered as binding or effective in any case except the one acted upon or as a precedent for future action in the House itself.

A majority of the Committee on Elections No. 1 doubt the propriety in any event of denying these Southern States representation in the House of Representatives pending a final settlement of the whole question in proper proceedings by the Supreme Court of the United States. Some of the members of the committee believe the "fundamental conditions" set forth in the reconstruction acts to be valid and the constitutions and election laws of these States to be in conflict with such conditions, and hence to be invalid.

Some of the members of the committee believe the "fundamental conditions" set forth in the reconstruction acts to be invalid and the constitutions and election laws of the States claimed to be in conflict with such conditions to be valid. Some members of the committee have formed no opinion and express no belief upon the subject.

Your Committee on Elections No. 1 therefore respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Alexander D. Dantzler was not elected a Member of the Fifty-eighth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to a seat therein."

The resolution was agreed to by the House without debate or division.

1135. The South Carolina election cases of Jacobs v. Lever, Myers v. Patterson, and Prioleau v. Legare, in the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The House will not count votes of persons alleged to have been illegally denied the right to vote, on the strength of mere lists of such persons kept loosely and not authenticated by testimony.

Affirmation of the conclusion that the House would not invalidate an election because a State had disregarded reconstruction legislation as to qualifications of voters.

Where the validity of a State's election system was questioned, the House merely declared contestant not elected, and did not declare sitting Member entitled to the seat.

On June 5, 1906,[1] Messrs. James R. Mann, of Illinois; Lewellyn Powers, of Maine, and H. Olin Young, of Michigan, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, respectively reported on the South Carolina election cases of Charles C. Jacobs v. Asbury F. Lever, Isaac Myers v. J. O. Patterson, and Aaron P. Prioleau v. George S. Legare.

Each of these cases involved the constitutional question passed on in the Fifty-eighth Congress in the case of Dantzler v. Lever,[2] and in each case the committee affirmed the conclusion arrived at in that case.

In the Prioleau case [3] this further question was decided:

At the Congressional election held in said district November 8, 1904, the contestant, Aaron P. Prioleau, received 234 votes. The contestee, George S. Legare, received 6,068 votes. This gave to the contestee, on the face of the returns, a majority of 5,834 votes.

To overcome this apparent majority, the contestant claims that 11,800 legal voters in said district applied to the managers of election in the different precincts for the right to vote and were denied that right; that all of said persons would have voted for contestant and that, as the refusal to permit them to vote was illegal, their votes should be counted for contestant. To sustain the claim of contestant, he has introduced in evidence lists of names purporting to be the names of persons who were those illegally refused the right to vote for contestant. These lists, as set forth in contestant's brief, are as follows:

Total rejected voters vote.				14,429
Vote counted				234
Total				14,663	6,068

Majority for A. P. Prioleau, 8,595.

The tabulation in contestant's brief makes a total of 14,429 rejected voters, which added to the 234 votes actually cast for contestant would, as he claims, make 14,663 votes which he is entitled to have counted for him, or a majority over contestee of 8,595.

It is claimed by contestant that these lists were kept by persons who were stationed for that purpose not far from the respective polls in a large number of precincts in the district and that the men whose names appear upon the lists, after attempting to vote and being denied the right, returned to the persons who were keeping the lists in the various precincts and either wrote their respective names upon the lists or gave their names to the persons in charge of the respective lists who wrote the names thereon. In some instances the person keeping a particular list was not near enough to the polls to know of his own knowledge whether the men whose names he placed upon the lists, or which were placed there by the men themselves, had, in fact, actually offered to vote. He could have no means of knowing how the rejected voters would have voted, if permitted to do so, except from their own statements, and in many cases he could not know whether they were, in fact, qualified voters.

Without expressing any opinion upon all of the lists offered in evidence, the committee is of the opinion that a considerable portion of the lists would have to be rejected in any event, because wholly lacking in any sort of identification of either the person offering to vote, his right to vote, or how he would have voted. Candidates can not be elected to office merely by having some one keep lists of names of persons who come near the polls. It is not necessary in this case to determine whether sufficient identification has been made in this case in regard to some of the lists to consider them as prima facie evidence, because, in any event, the lists as presented do not, in the opinion of the committee, make out a case in favor of contestant. The evidence is utterly lacking to show that contestant is entitled to the election on the facts presented by him.

A careful comparison of the tabulation of the lists set forth above with the lists themselves as they appear in the record shows that the tabulation made by contestant's counsel in his brief gives a number of persons far in excess of the number of names actually appearing on the lists themselves. The committee find from an examination of the lists that the correct tabulation would be as follows:

This reduces the footings of the lists from 14,229 to 9,026; but a large number of these lists must be rejected because of absolute failure to make any effort to properly prove the lists or identify the persons. For example, take the following cases:

R. B. Geddes, John Island; list, 620 name

Because Geddes's testimony shows that he did not keep all of this list, but was assisted so to do by one A. E. Croffort, who took part of the names and was not called as a witness, and the testimony utterly fails to show which of the names were taken by Geddes and which were taken by Croffort.

Frank Barnwell, Charleston; list, 194 names.

This list must be rejected because the testimony fails to show that any person on that list was refused the right to vote.

R. W. Sinchler, Summerville; list, 650 names.

This list must be rejected because the testimony shows that Sinchler did not keep all of the list; that he had no knowledge as to the persons" he did not himself place upon the list; that he fails to identify any of those he placed upon the list or state how many there were, and these omissions are not supplied by any other testimony.

J. C. Tingman, St. Steven; list, 560 names.

This list must be rejected for the reason that the testimony shows that "some two or three persons" kept this list, the names of whom are not given, and Tingman does not state how many of the names he placed upon the list, and no other testimony was produced for filling the gaps in his evidence.

R. W. Green, Biggins Church; list, 460 names.

This list is not authenticated by any testimony whatever, nor is it identified as a list of rejected voters.

R. G. Richardson, Tenmile Hill; list, 398 names.

It clearly appears that the precinct at Tenmile Hill had been abolished in 1898, and there is no evidence that any of the persons appearing upon this list offered or were refused the right to vote at the precinct in which they lived or at any legal precinct whatever.

J. E. Tentin, Charleston; list, 96 names.

The testimony shows that one John Graham, who was not called as a witness, assisted in keeping this list. Tentin could identify only seven names upon it as having been placed there by himself, nor is there any testimony in regard to the other names upon the list placed there by Graham or some one else.

James Collins, Mount Pleasant; list, 386 names.

This list was kept by Peter Johnson, who was not called as a witness. Collins could not read or write and so could not know and did not know that Johnson kept the list correctly, nor is there any other evidence to supply this omission.

There is another infirmity about all the above lists, namely, that it nowhere appears in the testimony or the lists themselves that the parties named thereon were voters in the particular precinct in which they attempted to vote.

John Gill, secretary of the county executive committee, Clarendon County; lists, 638 names.

The exhibits produced by Gill included those marked "D" to "J," inclusive, making a total of 638 names. These lists were left with Gill and are not authenticated by any testimony whatever, and the persons who kept the lists are not even named in the testimony, nor, indeed, that they were kept at all as a list of rejected voters.

Ira Learn, Manning, Harmony; list, 58 names.

John Dow, Manning, Panada; list, 168 names.

The list produced by Ira Learn and that produced by John Dow were not kept by the parties producing them, neither of whom could write, but both signed their testimony with a mark.

The deductions made in the examples of rejections of lists, asset forth above, amount to 4,228. The cases given as examples only indicate the various infirmities which attach to nearly all of the testimony in this case. The testimony which is not analyzed above is generally as defective as that so analyzed. But deducting the 4,228 votes comprised in the above lists, shown to be utterly worthless as testimony, from the total footing of all the lists, 9,026, there is left 4,798, which, if the 234 votes cast for Prioleau be added, makes a total of 5,032, or 1,036 less than the number of votes cast and counted for contestee.

The Committee on Elections No. 1 has shown every consideration to the contestant; has listened to long and exhaustive arguments in his behalf, and is of the opinion that the contestant, Aaron P. Prioleau, was not elected a Member of Congress at the election in question.

In the Myers case,[1] a similar question was thus decided:

At the Congressional election in the Second district of South Carolina, on the 8th day of November, 1904, the contestant, Isaac Myers, received in said district 419 votes. The contestee, J. O. Patterson, received 7,426 votes.

The contestant asserted in his notice of contest that 10,000 or more voters offered to vote for him at the election, but were refused the opportunity and deprived of their rights by the election officers, who resorted to unfair and fraudulent methods to bring about the election of the contestee. The contestant offered in evidence a number of lists of persons who were thus deprived of the opportunity to vote for contestant. The committee finds that these lists contain the names of 2,963 persons whom the contestant alleges would have voted for him had they not been deprived of their legal privileges, and contestant asserts that all of the persons whose names appear on the lists were entitled under the laws and Constitution of the United States to the right of suffrage at such election.

Your committee does not express any opinion as to whether these lists of names have any legal validity as evidence for the purpose of showing that the persons named therein were entitled to vote, were denied the right to vote, and would have voted for contestant if permitted to vote, except to say that such evidence at the best is unsatisfactory. If lists of persons offering to vote and refused the right to vote are to be considered as evidence in any case, that such persons were entitled to vote, and, if permitted, would have voted for a particular candidate (which is doubtful, unless a conspiracy to commit fraud be shown), then such lists should be kept by persons who know all the persons offering to vote, who see such persons offer to vote, and who testify as to their knowledge when called as witnesses where thorough cross-examination may be had.

But if all the lists offered in evidence in this case were accepted as legal evidence they only affect something less than 3,000 persons, not enough to overcome the majority of the contestee.

Your committee is of opinion therefore that the contestant, Isaac Myers, was not elected.

[1] Report No. 4780.

With each report the committee recommended a resolution similar to the following:

Resolved, That Charles C. Jacobs was not elected a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

The House, without debate or division, agreed to each of the resolutions.

It is to be noted that the decision in each case declares only that contestant was not elected, and does not-as is usual in cases of contested elections—pass on the title of sitting Member.

Form and history of Rule XIV, section 7, relating to decorum of Members.

The decorum of Members within the Hall is regulated in part by section 7 of Rule XIV:

> While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no Member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor, when a Member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no Member shall wear his hat, or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause. Neither shall any person be allowed to smoke upon the floor of the House at any time.

This rule, in very nearly its present form, was adopted in the revision of the Forty-sixth Congress.[1] It was derived from the old rule No. 65, which in its main provision dated from April 7, 1789.[2] The portions relating to wearing the hat was the fruit of a considerable agitation. In early years, following the custom of Parliament, Members wore their hats during the sessions.[3] As early as March 13, 1822.[4] Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, proposed this rule:

but it was not adopted. Again, on March 18, 1828,[5] the matter was laid on the table when presented by Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina. On December 3, 1833,[6] Mr. James K. Polk, of Tennessee, again suggested the change, but the objection was made successfully that Members would have no places in which to put their hats if they should not wear them, and also that the custom of wearing hats was the sign of the independence of the Commons of England, and therefore a good usage to preserve in the American House. Again in 1835 [7] Mr. James Parker, of New Jersey, urged the reform unsuccessfully. But on September 14, 1837,[8] the House adopted the rule that no Member should wear his hat during the session of the House or remain near the Clerk's table during a roll call.[8] The prohibition of smoking dates from February 28, 1871.[9] The last sentence, prohibiting smoking at any time, was added on January 10, 1896.[10]

1137. The Member should rise in objecting to a request for unanimous consent.—On April 24, 1902,[11] in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Chairman Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, declined to take notice of an objection made by a Member who did not rise to make it.

1138. On May 15, 1854,[1] Mr. Speaker Boyd insisted that a gentleman making an objection must rise in his place and do so.

1139. The House has discussed but not settled the question as to its power to compel a Member to accompany it without the Hall on an occasion of ceremony.—On June 2, 1797,[2] the House had completed consideration of its address in reply to the speech of the President, and had voted:

> That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do present the said address.

Mr. Matthew Lyon, of Vermont, at his own request, was excused from attending with the House.

Again, on November 29, 1797,[3] under similar circumstances, Mr. Lyon made the same request. The request was debated at some length, Messrs. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, and Albert Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, taking the ground that the House had no power to compel a Member to accompany it without its walls.

The motion was finally removed from consideration by a negative decision of the motion, "Shall the main question be now put?" [4]

1140. Origin of the title 11 Father of the House," as applied to the Member of longest continuous service.—On February 24, 1842,[5] Mr. John Quincy Adams, speaking of the death of Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, referred to his title of "Father of the House," and said that it was borrowed from the practice of the British House of Commons, where the oldest member was so called. Mr. Williams had served since 1814.

1141. A Senator having changed his name, the Senate instructed its Secretary to use the new name.—On January 12, 1846,[6] in the Senate, Mr. James D. Westcott, of Florida, announced that his colleague, Senator David Levy, of Florida, had been permitted by act of the Florida legislature to change his name to David Levy Yulee, and after having exhibited the journals of the legislature to show the action moved that hereafter the Secretary of the Senate, when he should have occasion to use the name of the gentleman, should designate him as Mr. Yulee. This motion was agreed to.

1142. Instance wherein leave of absence was granted by motion made and carried.—On May 2, 1906,[7] the Speaker laid before the House the request of a Member for leave of absence. Usually such leaves are granted by unanimous request, but in view of the fact that objection was being made to all requests for unanimous consent, the Speaker was proceeding to put the question on granting the leave.

Thereupon Mr. John S. Williams, of Mississippi, objected that no motion had been made.

The Speaker[1] thereupon entertained a motion made by Mr. Williams that the Member have leave of absence, and the motion was agreed to by the House.

1143. Requests for leaves of absence are sometimes opposed and even refused.—On December 11, 1816,[2] Mr. Joseph Hopkinson, of Pennsylvania, moved—that the House excuse John Sargeant, one of the Representatives for the State of Pennsylvania, for nonattendance on his duties in this House during the present session.

As Mr. Hopkinson first presented the motion it was to grant leave of absence. Objection was made both to the first form and to the modified form. Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, characterized the motion in its first form as unprecedented and incorrect, inasmuch as the Member had not yet attended during the session. Moreover, his duties to the House were paramount to any other, except those of necessity. In this case the Member was to depart for Europe.

It was urged in the debate that the Member's absence was a question between him and his constituents, but, on the other hand, it was replied that the House should not by vote sanction a relinquishment of public duties.

The motion was disagreed to—yeas 74, nays 81.

1144. On May 25, 1882,[3] a request for a leave of absence was opposed in the House, and on a yea-and-nay vote was denied, yeas 13, nays 134.

1145. On August 28, 1888,[4] the request of a Member for leave of absence was objected to, and the question on granting the leave was put to a vote.[5]

1146. Under a former rule a request for a leave of absence has been entertained as a privileged question.—On September 9, 1850,[6] Mr. Nathaniel S. Littlefield, of Maine, claiming the floor for a privileged question, asked the House to grant him a leave of absence from and after the 23d instant for the remainder of the session.

The Speaker,[7] after inquiring under what rule of the House the request was presented, and being referred to the sixty-sixth rule,[8] entertained the motion and put the question to the House.

1147. On December 19, 1882,[9] several requests for leave of absence were presented, and objection being made, the question was put on each, and on one there was a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, proposed, while the requests were being

[5] On January 30, 1828, the Speaker laid before the House a letter from John Randolph (of Roanoke), of Virginia, stating that he deemed it incumbent on him to inform the House that, without leave of absence, he had been detained from the House by sickness. submitted and acted on, to offer a resolution providing for the holiday recess of Congress.

The Speaker[1] declined to entertain the resolution until the requests were disposed of.

Mr. McLane made the point of order that such requests had no standing under the rules, and that it was only the practice of the House which gave them privilege.

The Speaker thereupon expressed the opinion that a motion to adjourn would have precedence, but declined to pass upon the question raised by Air. McLane.

1148. Rate and method of payment of compensation and mileage of Speaker and Members. The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 6, provides that—

> Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The statutes[2] fix the salaries of Members and Delegates at $7,500[3] per annum, computed from the 4th of March next succeeding the general election and payable thereafter monthly during the term of two years after the taking of the oath.[4]

[1] J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, Speaker.

[2] The subject of the compensation of Members has been treated of in several statutes. The act of September 22, 1789 (1 Stat. L., pp. 70, 71), provided for each Representative and Senator a compensation of "six dollars for every day he shall attend," and also an allowance "at the commencement and end of every session, six dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress." There was also provision for the salary of the Member when detained from the sessions by illness.

By the act of January 22, 1818 (3 Stat. L., p. 404), this compensation was changed to "eight dollars for every day he has attended, or shall attend, the House of Representatives." Senators received the same.

This per diem pay was continued until the act of August 16, 1856 (11 Stat. L., p. 48), when the compensation was changed to six thousand dollars for each Congress, which is the same as three thousand dollars a year, the term of a Congress being two years. The law of 1856 (11 Stat. L., p. 49) also provided that there should be a deduction of the proportionate amount due for each day for every day that the Member should be absent for any other reason than illness of himself or family. But this provision has been generally inoperative, although in 1894, at a time when peculiar conditions of obstruction prevailed, the deductions were actually made.

By the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat. L., p. 323), the compensation of each Senator and Representative was fixed at five thousand dollars a year, "and in addition thereto mileage at the rate of twenty cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually travelled in going to and returning from each regular session." (There is one regular session each year.) By the same act the salary of the Speaker was fixed at eight thousand dollars a year.

By act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat. L., p. 486), the compensation of Representatives and Senators was increased to seven thousand five hundred dollars per annum, and the salary of the Speaker to ten thousand dollars per annum, these sums to be in lieu of all pay and allowance except actual individual travelling expenses going to and returning from the seat of government. This law was obnoxious to the people, perhaps largely because of a provision giving certain back pay to the legislators who enacted it, and was repealed by the act of January 20, 1874 (18 Stat. L., p. 4).

So the pay and mileage continued until 1907 at the rates fixed by the act of July 28, 1866.

For an early and elaborate report on the compensation of Members see American State Papers (Miscell.), Vol. II, p. 403.

[3] Speaker raised from $8,000 and Members from $5,000 by legislative appropriation act of 1907. (34 Stat. L.)

The salary of the Speaker is $12,000 [1] per annum. In addition to the salary, Members receive mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session.

When a Member or Delegate dies the salary and traveling expenses due him at the time of his death are paid to his widow or heirs, and in such case the salary is computed and paid for a period not less than three months.[2] A Member's successor, whether the vacancy was occasioned by death or otherwise, receives compensation from the date the compensation of his predecessor ceased.[3]

When a Member is unseated in a contest he retains the compensation already received and is paid his salary to the day on which his case is decided. When the contesting Member is seated his salary is paid him for the entire term up to the day on which he is declared entitled to his seat. Both contestant and contestee are allowed a sum not exceeding $2,000 each for actual expenses of conducting the contest.[4]

The pay and mileage of Members are disbursed by the Sergeant-at-Arms,[5] or, in case of his disability, by the Treasurer of the United States.[6] The Speaker certifies the amounts due the Members during the sessions,[7] and the Clerk during the months when the House is not in session.[8]

The statutes also provide for deductions from the pay of Members who are absent from the sessions of the House for reasons other than illness of themselves or families, or who retire before the end of the Congress,[9] but this penalty is rarely enforced.[10]

No Member is entitled to any allowance for newspapers; [11] and books ordered for Members or Delegates by resolution of either or both Houses must be paid for by the Members, except when the books are ordered printed by the Congressional Printer.[12] Each Member and Delegate is entitled to ten charts of the coast survey for each regular session of Congress.[13]

1149. The statutes provide that a Member or Delegate withdrawing from his seat before the adjournment of a Congress shall suffer deductions from his compensation.—The act of July 17, 1862,[14] provides:

> When any Member or Delegate withdraws from his seat and does not return before the adjournment of Congress, he shall, in addition to the sum deducted for each day, forfeit a sum equal to the amount which would have been allowed by law for his traveling expenses in returning home; and such sum shall be deducted from his compensation, unless the withdrawal is with the leave of the Senate or House of Representatives, respectively.

1150. The statutes provide for deductions by the Sergeant-at-Arms from the pay of a Member or Delegate who is absent from his seat without a sufficient excuse.—The act of August 16, 1872,[1] provides:

The Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, respectively, shall deduct from the monthly payments of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he has been absent from the Senate or House, respectively, unless such Member or Delegate assigns as the reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.[2]

1151. The old and new systems of providing clerks for Members. On July 20, 1893, in response to a series of questions by the Clerk of the House, the First Comptroller of the Treasury rendered a decision[3] that the resolution of March 3, 1893,[4] authorizing the allowance of clerk hire to Members and Delegates, House of Representatives, authorized the following: (1) That Members and Delegates should employ clerks at and during the extra or called session of Congress; (2) that where a Member or Delegate pays the clerk the agreed compensation and certifies the amount thereof in compliance with the terms of the resolution, such Member or Delegate is to be paid the amount of such expenditure; (3) that where two or more Members certify that they have each employed the same clerk and each agreed to pay him a fixed amount, the total thereof being either less or greater than $100 per month, such person may be legally paid as clerk for each of said Members and the amount each certifies he has agreed to pay him; (4) payments may be made from the contingent fund of the House to the Members and Delegates of the amounts they have paid for clerical services or to the clerks employed by such Member or Delegate or of the agreed compensation, without such payments being first sanctioned by the Committee on Accounts of the House, under the requirements of the act of October 2, 1888;[5] (5) the clerks provided under the above resolution are not required to take the oath prescribed by section 1756, Revised Statutes.

The legislative appropriation act of 1907[6] changed the system, however, and provided for the payment to—each Member and Delegate for clerk hire, necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, one thousand five hundred dollars per annum, in monthly installments.

And further provided that—

Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31, Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation.

1152. The old law as to clerk hire for Members, and construction thereof.—On July 7, 1898, in response to a request of the Clerk of the House, the Comptroller of the Treasury [1] rendered a decision in the claim of Mr. H. H. Powers, of Vermont, chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads. This committee was entitled to a "session clerk," and Mr. Powers claimed that he was entitled to reimbursement, not to exceed $100 per month, for the amount expended by him for clerk hire necessarily employed in the discharge of his official and representative duties, notwithstanding he is chairman of a committee having a clerk.

The Comptroller decided:

The appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, as contained in the act of February 19, 1897 (29 Stat., 543), is as follows:

"To pay Members and Delegates the amount they certify they have paid or agreed to pay for clerk hire necessarily employed by them in the discharge of their official and representative duties, as provided in the joint resolution approved March third, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, during the session of Congress, and when Congress is not in session, as provided in House resolution passed May eighth, eighteen hundred and ninety-six, four hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

This joint resolution of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat., 757), and the House resolution of May 8, 1896,[2] referred to in the appropriation, are as follows:

"That on and after April first, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives of the United States may, on the first day of each month during sessions of Congress certify to the Clerk of the House of Representatives the amount which he has paid or agreed to pay for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties during the previous month, and the amount so certified shall be paid by the Clerk out of the contingent fund of the House on the fourth day of each month to the person or persons named in each of said certificates so filed: Provided, That the amount so certified and paid for clerical services rendered to each Member and Delegate shall not exceed one hundred dollars for any month during the session: And provided further, That the provisions of this resolution shall not apply to Members who are chairmen of committees entitled under the rules to a clerk.

"That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to each Member and Delegate for annual clerk hire an amount not exceeding the sum of one hundred dollars per mouth, to be certified by them on the first day of each calendar month in the manner provided in the joint resolution approved March third, eighteen hundred and ninety-three: Provided, That the provisions of this resolution shall not apply to Members who are chairmen of committees entitled under the rules to annual clerks."

It is to be noticed that the resolution of May 8, 1896, is not a law, but simply an order of the House to its Clerk directing him to make certain payments from the contingent fund. But in view of the fact that a specific appropriation has been made to meet the expenditures contemplated by the resolution, it is clear that that appropriation is exclusive; and as the House resolution is, in effect, made a part of the appropriation, it must be considered in connection with the laws on the subject of clerk hire.

The resolution of 1893 gives the right to clerk hire to each Member who is not chairman of a committee "entitled under the rules to a clerk," and limits that right to the time Congress is in session. The resolution of 1896 grants the clerk hire to each Member for every month in the year, but excludes Members who are chairmen of committees "entitled under the rules to annual clerks."

If those two resolutions were of equal force, there could be no doubt that the later would supersede the earlier one, so that the chairman of a committee entitled to a clerk during the session only could receive the clerk-hire allowance for the entire year. But the later resolution is of no force as law except as it must be considered in construing the language of the appropriation. In my opinion all doubt is removed when we examine the appropriation act. It specifically provides for payments when Congress is in session in accordance with the resolution of 1893 (i. e., to Members who are not chairmen of committees entitled to either an annual or a session clerk), and when Congress is not in session in accordance with the resolution of 1896 (i.e., to Members who are not chairmen of committees entitled to an annual clerk).

In the general deficiency appropriation act approved by the President to-day, there is the following clause:

"That hereafter Members of the House of Representatives who are chairmen of committees entitled to annual clerks shall be entitled to the same allowance for clerk hire as is authorized to other Members of the House of Representatives who are not chairmen of committees by the joint resolution approved March third, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, and by House resolution passed May eighth, eighteen hundred and ninety-six; and the appropriation for clerk hire to Members and Delegates made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year eighteen hundred and ninety-nine is hereby made available to pay such clerk hire as herein provided: Provided, That this provision shall apply to members [chairmen?] of committees entitled to annual clerks, during the vacation of Congress only."

This legislation refers only to chairmen of committees having annual clerks, and does not affect the claim made by Mr. Powers, whose committee has a session clerk. By this act chairmen of the first-named class of committees are placed in the same position in regard to personal clerk hire as are those of the second-named class-that is, they receive the allowance only during vacation.

For the reasons stated I have to advise you that you are not authorized to pay Mr. Powers's claim.[1]

1153. The pay of a Member may be deducted on account of absence.— In 1894[2] the provisions of section 40[3] of the Revised Statutes of the United States

[1] On May 15, 1894, Mr. Barnes Compton, chairman of the Committee on the Library, which has a clerk, resigned his seat in the House, and Mr. Franklin Bartlett, of New York, under the provisions of section 3 of Rule X of the House, became chairman and assumed the duties of the position. The question then arose as to whether Mr. Bartlett was entitled to the clerk hire provided by the joint resolution of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat. L., p. 757). The First Comptroller decided (Decisions of the First Comptroller (Bowler) 1893–94, p. 259) that Mr. Bartlett was not entitled to the clerk hire.

On March 14, 1895, the Comptroller of the Treasury decided (Decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury (Bowler), Vol. I, p. 299) that Members who were chairmen of committees of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress ceased to be such chairmen upon the expiration of that Congress on March 3, 1895, and were, under an act of March 2 (28 Stat., p. 864), extending for thirty days the allowance for clerk hire made by the joint resolution of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat., p. 757), entitled to payment on that account to the same extent as Members who had not been chairmen of committees.

On July 17, 1896, the Comptroller of the Treasury decided (Decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury (Bowler), Vol. III, p. 22) that under the appropriation in the act of June 8, 1896 (29 Stat., p. 302), a Member of the House of Representatives was entitled to clerk hire from June 12 (the day after the adjournment of the session) to June 30, 1896, notwithstanding the session clerk to the committee of which he was chairman was paid for the entire month of June.

On July 17, 1896, the Comptroller of the Treasury, in the case of Mr. C. J. Boatner, of Louisiana, decided (Decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury (Bowler), Vol. III, p. 20) that the act of June 8, 1896 (29 Stat., p. 302), for the payment of clerk hire to Members of the House of Representatives from the adjournment of the first session to the beginning of the second session, did not authorize payment to a Member-elect who had not qualified.

[2] Second session Fifty-third Congress, Reports H. of R., Nos. 704, 1218; Record, pp. 3797, 4130–4133. On February 19, 1897 (second session Fifty-fourth Congress, Record, pp. 2013, 2049–2057), a paragraph in the deficiency appropriation bill provided for reimbursement of those Members of the Fifty-third Congress whose pay had been deducted. This paragraph was fully debated, the method by which the Speaker made the deduction and the form of vouchers used being described; on February 20 the paragraph was stricken out by a vote of ayes 113, noes 55. On June 7, 1832 (first sessionTwenty-second Congress, Journal, p. 856; Debates, p. 3318), the Speaker made a statement of interest to the House in regard to the method of disbursement of the pay of Members.

The House voted that this statement should be printed in the Journal.

relating to the deduction of the pay of Members for absence was the subject of long and minute examination on the part of the Judiciary Committee of the House. The majority of the committee found that the statute was still in force, and recommended a resolution directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to enforce it. It does not appear that this resolution was actually adopted by the House, but the Speaker and the Sergeant-at-Arms proceeded to enforce the statute, and deductions were made from the pay of absent Members. The minority of the Judiciary Committee took the ground that the statute had been repealed, and in the reports there is an exhaustive review of the statutes relating to the pay of Members.

1154. The House has decided that the law relating to deductions from the pay of Members applies only to those who have taken the oath.—On December 16, 1869,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from S. G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, stating that the law of 1856[2] made it the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to deduct from the pay of Members the number of days which each Member should be absent during the session of Congress, except when detained by the sickness of himself or some member of his family. The Sergeant-at-Arms stated that the law was undoubtedly meant to apply to Members admitted and duly qualified at the opening of the first session; but its mandatory provisions raised a question as to whether he ought not to deduct from the pay of Members and Delegates who had been elected and taken their seats since the commencement of the present Congress the number of days the House was in session previous to their admission.

This communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on March 16, 1870, Mr. John A. Peters, of Maine, made from that committee this report:[3]

> That in the opinion of said committee, the act of 1856, which requires a per diem deduction from the pay of Members on account of absences, being intended as a forfeiture to compel the attendance of Members who were already sworn into their seats, has no application to such as were not admitted to seats, and that no deduction shall be made on that account; such a conclusion, however, not to be construed so as to allow compensation to the Representatives of States admitted under the acts of reconstruction for any period of time prior to their election under such acts.

On March 16, 1870,[4] this report was agreed to by the House.

1155. The question relating to the compensation of Ernest M. Pollard in the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The question as to the pay of a Member elected after the beginning of the term of the Congress to fill a vacancy caused by a declination or resignation of effect on the day the term of the Congress began.

On December 13, 1906,[5] Mr. Ernest M. Pollard, of Nebraska, as a question of privilege, offered this resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

> Whereas on July 18, 1905, Ernest M. Pollard was elected to fill the vacancy in the Fifty-ninth Congress caused by the resignation of Hon. E. J. Burkett; and
> Whereas the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives paid Ernest M. Pollard for the period intervening between March 4, 1905, the beginning of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and July 18, 1905, the date of his election thereto; and

Whereas Mr. Pollard's legal right to receive pay for this period has been questioned and his action in accepting it has been severely criticised by certain parties; and

Whereas section 51 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, under which payment was made, has never been construed by the courts in a case exactly like this: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That this whole matter be referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House with instructions to investigate the legal questions involved and report its conclusions to this House before the termination of the present Congress.

On February 21, 1907,[1] Mr. John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin, submitted the report of that committee:

[1] Report No. 8043.

Your committee have carefully examined the legal question involved as directed. The question turns, under section 51, Revised Statutes of the United States, upon whether or not there was a vacancy after the commencement of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and whether or not Mr. Pollard had a predecessor in the Fifty-ninth Congress, for, to entitle Mr. Pollard to the salary from March 4, 1905, to July 18, 1905, two things must concur. There must have been a vacancy after the commencement of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and Mr. Pollard must have had a predecessor in the Fifty-ninth Congress. Section 51 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that if the vacancy occurs after the commencement of the Congress to which Mr. Pollard was elected, he should be paid from the time the compensation of his predecessor ceased. To understand and apply the law, your committee state that it is found as undisputed facts that Hon. E. J. Burkett was elected to and served the full term of the Fifty-eighth Congress from the First district of the State of Nebraska; that he was elected to the Fifty-ninth Congress from the same district and State, but before the expiration of his term in the Fifty-eighth Congress, he was elected to the Senate of the United States from the State of Nebraska. Mr. Burkett received no compensation as a Member of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-ninth Congress. His compensation as a Member of the House ceased upon the close of the term of the Fifty-eighth Congress. He accepted the Senatorship before the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

On January 19, 1905, Mr. Burkett filed his resignation with the governor of the State of Nebraska as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to take effect March 4, 1905.

At a special election called for that purpose, Hon. Ernest M. Pollard was elected July 18, 1905, as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress, as successor to the Hon. E. J. Burkett. The President of the United States called a special session of the Senate to convene March 4, 1905, at 12 o'clock noon, and Mr. Burkett entered the Senate at that time and took the oath of office as a Senator of the United States.

The language of section 51, Revised Statutes of the United States, is as follows:

"Whenever a vacancy occurs in either House of Congress, by death or otherwise, of any Member or Delegate elected or appointed thereto, after the commencement of the Congress to which he has been elected or appointed, the person elected or appointed to fill it shall be compensated and paid from the time that the compensation of his predecessor ceased."

This statute was passed July 12, 1862, resolution No. 54, 12 Stat. L., 624.

It is very plain that there was a vacancy, but this concession does not determine the question, for the vacancy within the meaning of the statute must have occurred after the commencement of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and whether the words "commencement of the Congress" relate to the beginning of the term on March 4 or to the assembling of the Congress in December, is unnecessary for the committee to determine, because in this case no vacancy occurred after the term itself commenced.

If the vacancy occurred after the commencement of the Fifty-ninth Congress, the salary of Mr. Pollard would commence from the time the compensation of Mr. Burkett ceased, if Mr. Burkett was a predecessor of Mr. Pollard in the Fifty-ninth Congress. Unquestionably, speaking generally, Mr. Burkett was the predecessor of Mr. Pollard, but was not the predecessor within the meaning of section 51. The word "predecessor" there used means predecessor in the same Congress, when Mr. Pollard had no predecessor in the Fifty-ninth Congress. It can not be successfully urged that there might have been a small portion of time on March 4, 1905, when Mr. Burkett was a Member of this House, as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress—between the time when he ceased to be a Member of the Fifty-eighth Congress and became a Senator—and therefore a predecessor of Mr. Pollard and a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress, for the time was too short and the doctrine of relation and incompatibility would apply and prevent it.

Your committee fully agree with what the courts of the United States have said on this subject. This section (51) contemplates a vacancy occurring after the commencement of a Congress, not one existing at its commencement, and authorizes a reference back to the predecessor, who is to be found in some individual previously in the same, not a preceding Congress. (Page v. United States, 23 C. C. R., 4.)

"Section 51 refers only to a vacancy occurring after the commencement of a particular Congress and in the membership of that Congress," and the reference to a predecessor is plainly intended to apply only to a predecessor in that Congress. (Page v. United States, 127 U. S., 67.)

While no doubt the construction placed upon the statute is correct, the resignation of Mr. Burkett settles the matter beyond all question, conclusively showing that Mr. Burkett was only a Member-elect to the Fifty-ninth Congress; that there was no vacancy after the commencement of the Fifty-ninth Congress, no matter what those words mean; and that Mr. Pollard had no predecessor in the Fifty-ninth Congress. The resignation of Mr. Burkett took effect March 4, 1905, on the day of the commencement of the term of the Fifty-ninth Congress. Generally speaking, the law does not regard fractions of a day, but when important to the ends of justice or conflicting interests are involved the courts have, as in the case of the approval of a statute or an act done, ascertained the precise time of the approval of the statute or the doing of the act. This is not such a case. Mr. Burkett elected to have the resignation effective March 4, and when that day came the resignation went into effect. In such case the law can not and will not regard a fraction of a day. When March 4, 1905, came, Mr. Burkett ceased to be a Member of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and the time of day that the two separate acts became final and operative is immaterial.

Neither can your committee find any warrant for the payment of this compensation under section 38 of the Revised Statutes. The material part of this section is as follows:

"Representatives and Delegates-elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives in accordance with the provisions of section 31, may receive their compensations monthly from the beginning of their term until the beginning of the first session of each Congress, etc."

Undoubtedly the expression herein "from the beginning of their term "relates to the term for which each Member is elected. If it had been intended by this section that Members-elect should be paid by the Sergeant-at-Arms from the beginning of the term of the Congress to which they am elected, the Language would have been different. The use of the expression "the term" instead of "their term" would make some difference in the meaning of the section. What was the term of Mr. Pollard? Undoubtedly it was the unexpired term of the Fifty-ninth Congress, existing or remaining on the date of his election. He had nothing to do with and no relation to any part of this term that had expired before he was elected. His term commenced on July 18, 1905, the day of his election, and upon the proper filing of his certificate of election it was the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to pay him his salary from that day until the first assembling of the Fifty-ninth Congress. There was no warrant of law for the payment to him of any compensation for any period of time prior to his election. The payment to him, therefore, of compensation from Much 4, 1905, to July 18, 1905, was without authority of law.

Your committee concludes therefore that the Hon. Ernest M. Pollard was not entitled to compensation as a Member of this House from March 4, 1905, to July 18, 1905, under section 51 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

A bill (H. R. 25771) "to authorize the Treasurer of the United States to receive $1,861.84 from Ernest M. Pollard," etc., was introduced after the Judiciary Committee had reported, and was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. On February 22, 1907,[1] Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, from that committee reported the bill with the following recommendations:

Your committee is unable to concur in the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, without elaborating the argument, we find that the resignation of Mr. Burkett did not take effect until the 4th day of March, 1905, and that on that day his resignation created a vacancy in the membership of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and therefore coming within the statute, which is as follows:

"Whenever a vacancy occurs in either House of Congress, by death or otherwise, of any Member or Delegate elected or appointed thereto, after the commencement of the Congress to which he has been elected or appointed, the person elected or appointed to fill it shall be compensated and paid from the time that the compensation of his predecessor ceased."

We believe that Mr. Pollard was entitled to his pay and that the proper construction of the statute was put upon it by the disbursing officer of the House of Representatives. But inasmuch as Mr. Pollard insists on returning this money to the Treasury of the United States, and for the purpose of aiding him to that end, we advise the following amendments:

In line 8 strike out the words "without authority of law," and insert at the end of line 9 the following:

"prior to his election as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress to fill a vacancy, which salary the said Pollard desires to return to the Treasury, the said funds to be credited to the general funds of the United States."

No action was taken by the House.

1156. The Speaker during sessions and the Clerk during recesses of Congress certifies to the compensation of Members; and the Speaker certifies as to mileage.—The act of July 28, 1866,[1] provides:

The salary and accounts for traveling expenses in going to and returning from Congress of Senators shall be certified by the President of the Senate, and those of Representatives and Delegates by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Act of August 15, 1876,[2] provides:

The Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to sign, during the recess of Congress after the first session, and until the first day of the second session, the certificates of the monthly compensation of Members and Delegates in Congress, which certificates shall be in the form now in use and shall have the like force and effect as is given to the certificate of the Speaker.

The Act of March 3, 1873,[3] provides:

Representatives and Delegates-elect to Congress, whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31, may receive their compensation monthly from the beginning of their term until the beginning of the first session of each Congress, upon a certificate in the form now in use to be signed by the Clerk of the House, which certificate shall have the like force and effect as is given to the certificate of the Speaker.

1157. Certificates of salary and mileage of Members may be signed for the Speaker by a designated employee.

A joint resolution, approved November 12, 1903,[4] provides:

Resolved, That the Speaker is authorized to designate from time to time some one from among those appointed by him and appropriated for and employed in his office, whose duty it shall be under the direction of the Speaker to sign in his name and for him all certificates required by section forty-seven of the Revised Statutes for salary and accounts for traveling expenses in going to and returning from Congress of Representatives and Delegates.

1158. The statutes provide for Members a mileage of 20 cents a mile going to and coming from each regular session of Congress.—The statutes provide that Members shall receive mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session, the accounts to be certified by the Speaker,[1] and the mileage to be payable on the first day of each session.[2] In no case may "constructive mileage" be computed or paid.[3] In case a Member leaves his seat before the adjournment, of Congress without leave, and does not return thereto, he forfeits a sum equal to his mileage for his return home.[4] The certificate of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, as to the salary and mileage, is conclusive upon all departments of the Government, and the Comptroller has no jurisdiction to render a decision upon the amount due to a Member for salary or mileage.[5]

1159. The law relating to mileage of Members applies only to the regular sessions of Congress.—On July 22, 1893, the First Comptroller decided that section 17 of the act of July 28, 1866,[6] which provides for the pay of the mileage of Members, applied only to regular sessions, and would not apply to the extra session about to meet in the coming August.[7]

1160. An appropriation for mileage of Members at a regular session is authorized by law, although mileage may have been appropriated for a preceding special session.

In the later view an existing session ends with the day appointed by the Constitution for the regular annual session.

Citation of statutes relating to the pay and mileage of Members.

On January 29, 1904,[8] the urgent deficiency appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when this paragraph was read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For mileage of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, $145,000.

SENATE.

For mileage of Senators for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, $45,000.

Mr. John W. Maddox, of Georgia, made the point of order that the appropriation was not authorized by existing law.

The question of order was debated at length on this day and on January 30, with abundant citations of precedents and a discussion of the constitutional question involved.

At the conclusion of the debate the chairman held:[9]

The question raised by the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Maddox] does not involve the question of whether or not Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending Congress at this time should or should not receive mileage. That is a question for the Committee of the Whole to decide and not the Chair. The question presented to the Chair is the parliamentary question of whether or not there is any existing law authorizing the payment of the mileage for which it is proposed to appropriate the amount stated in this bill.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill passed at the last session of the Fifty-seventh Congress appropriated for the payment of mileage to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending the first annual session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. This appropriation, however, was not available until the day appointed by the Constitution for the assembling of this Congress at its first annual session.

The Fifty-eighth Congress was convened by proclamation of the President of the United States November 9, 1903. Soon thereafter it passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, etc., That the appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904, approved February 25, 1903, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for attendance on the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress."

By this resolution the money appropriated for the payment of mileage at the session of this Congress beginning on the first Monday of December last was paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending the session of this Congress convened by the President. By the wording of this resolution Congress declared that the session convened by the President was the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. It is now declared by the paragraph in this urgency deficiency appropriation bill that this is the second session of this Congress, and it is proposed to appropriate money for the payment of mileage to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending upon this second session.

The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order against this paragraph, claiming there is no existing law authorizing the appropriation, and that therefore the paragraph is not in order under section 2 of Rule XXI, which is as follows:

"2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provisions changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto."

The Chair has spent some time in endeavoring to ascertain what, if any, law there is governing the payment of mileage. As a result of this investigation it has been ascertained that under various statutes Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending the sessions of Congress have received mileage whether the session was convened by the President or assembled at the time fixed by the Constitution or by statute, the only exception being in the Fortieth Congress. When the act fixing the 4th of March for the assembling of Congress, in addition to the times fixed by the Constitution, was passed, by that act it was provided that Members and Senators of the previous Congress should not receive mileage for attendance upon the session beginning March 4, and for the information of the committee, and with its permission, the Chair will print, in connection with this ruling, these several statutes.

The act of 1874, repealing the increase of salaries of Members of Congress to $7,500 a year, revived the act of 1866, since which time there has been no legislation upon this subject. Therefore the act of 1866 is the law in force to-day in respect to the compensation to be paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, and also the law now in force governing the question of mileage. This law reads as follows:

"SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and in addition thereto mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session."

It will be observed that the language of this act in respect to mileage is significant, and from it there can be but one conclusion, and that is that the mileage authorized to be paid is intended as additional compensation without any particular reference to the expense incurred in traveling to and from the sessions of Congress, just as the law allows a certain per diem in addition to the salary paid to the officers and agents of the Government who are obliged to travel on the business of the Government or in the discharge of their duties. The language which follows is merely descriptive of how the mileage authorized to be paid is to be estimated. The law says it is "to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session." In the opinion of the Chair the words "regular session" do not mean alone the sessions of Congress convened under authority of the Constitution, but rather that this mileage is to be paid at any session of Congress lawfully convened, and the amount is to be estimated as stated in the act—that is, on the same basis that mileage is paid to Senators and Representatives when attending the regular or annual sessions provided for by the Constitution.

Of course no one contends that under this law Senators and Representatives and Delegates are entitled to more than one payment as mileage for attending one session of Congress. The question, therefore, of whether this paragraph is in order or whether there is any existing law authorizing the appropriation of this money turns upon the proposition of whether Congress is now in the session convened by the President of the United States or whether that session expired by operation of law, and Congress is now in session under and by virtue of that provision of the Constitution which designates the first Monday in December as the day when it shall assemble in annual session.

When this Congress convened on November 9 the business of the Congress proceeded as usual, and it was in session on Saturday, December 5, 1903, the last secular day before the first Monday in December. In the House of Representatives, at the close of that day, as appears from the Record, the simple motion to adjourn was agreed to, and the Speaker announced, "The House stands adjourned," without adding, as usual, the day to which the "House stands adjourned." No resolution to terminate the session was proposed. In the Senate on the same day it was voted to take a recess until 11.50 a.m., Monday, December 7. On that day and hour the Senate met, and after the transaction of the usual business and the adoption of the usual vote of thanks to the presiding officer, the hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the President pro tempore said:

"Senators, the hour provided by law for the meeting of the first regular session of the Fifty-eighth Congress having arrived, I declare the extraordinary session adjourned without day."

Immediately thereafter the President pro tempore called the session to order for the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

In the House at the same hour the Speaker called the House to order and, after prayer by the Chaplain, directed that the roll be called by States to ascertain the presence of a quorum, and business proceeded as at the beginning of a session. The usual resolution was passed, notifying the President of the United States that the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress was assembled and that a quorum of the two Houses was present and ready to receive any message which he might deem proper to submit.

This is a complete Statement, as shown by the Record, of what took place in the two Houses of Congress on December 5 and December 7.

On the following day the Journal of the House records the fact that on Monday, December 7, the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress assembled. The language of the Journal is as follows:

"JOURNAL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

"Begun and held at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Monday, the 7th day of December, in the year of Our Lord 1903, being the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, held under the Constitution of the Government of the United States, and in the one hundred and twenty-eighth year of the Independence of said States.

"MONDAY, December 7, 1903.

"On which day, being the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the meeting of Congress, Joseph G. Cannon, the Speaker (a Representative from the State of Illinois), and the following Members of the House of Representatives answered to their names."

This journal declaring this to be the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress was unanimously approved by the House. The Journal of the Senate reciting the same facts was likewise approved.

In the opinion of the Chair the question of whether this is a continuation of the session of Congress convened by the President or the second session convened under and by virtue of the provision of the Constitution fixing the time for the assembling of Congress is a mixed question of law and fact, and the Chair, as the presiding officer of this committee appointed by the Speaker of the House, in deciding this question is bound to take cognizance of what the House itself has done in determining whether or not this is or is not the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

As a matter of law, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the session of this Congress convened by the President of the United States terminated when the moment of time arrived for the Congress to convene in its regular annual session under the Constitution. That session of Congress there terminated by operation of law, not because there is any law fixing the limit of time that a session of Congress convened by the President should remain in session, but because of the constitutional provision fixing the time when the first regular annual session of this Congress should convene. The contention that because Congress was in session on the last secular day preceding the first Monday in December, and that there was no formal termination of this session at that time, and that therefore this is a continuation of that session, seems to the Chair untenable. It would, in the opinion of the Chair, be as reasonable to say that because there will be no formal ending of to-day and no formal beginning of to-morrow therefore Saturday will continue forever or throughout our existence.

The illustration used by the gentleman from Maine to prove his contention that this is a continuous session—namely, that if the House was in the act of calling the roll upon the passage of some bill when the hour arrived for the convening of Congress in its annual or constitutional session that the roll call could not be further proceeded with—does not prove anything. As a matter of fact, and as the records of Congress show, that incident or circumstance has occurred on several occasions when the time for the termination by operation of law of the second annual session of Congress arrived. The opinion of the Chair that the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress convened by the President terminated by operation of that provision of the Constitution which fixes the time for the beginning of the annual session of this Congress is not without precedent.

In the Fortieth Congress this same question arose. Just at the close of the extra session, Mr. Sherman, then a Senator from Ohio, said:

"I can not see any object in passing this concurrent resolution."

The concurrent resolution he referred to was that the presiding officers of the two Houses should at a specified time declare their respective Houses adjourned without day.

Said Mr. Sherman:

"The Constitution provides that the regular session of Congress shall be on the first Monday of December, and, according to law, I believe—or, at any rate, such is the usage—the hour for meeting on that day is 12 o'clock. We shall meet at that time in a new session. The recent law has not changed that regular time of meeting, and the result is that the next session of Congress will commence necessarily at noon on Monday."

Mr. Sumner, on the same occasion, said:

"And that brings me to the exact point as to whether the present session should expire precisely at the time when the coming session begins. I see no reason why it should not. I see no reason why we should interpose the buffer even for five minutes."

It was proposed to adjourn to 11 o'clock and 55 minutes.

"Let one session come right up close upon the other, and then we shall exclude every possibility of evil consequences from the character of the Chief Magistrate. * * * Now, I know not why when this session expires we may not at the same time announce the beginning of the new session."

These quotations, taken from the Globe, show that in the judgment of such men as Mr. Sherman and Mr. Sumner, two of the ablest men in either House of Congress at that time, if not since, the called session of the Fortieth Congress expired by operation of law when the time for the Congress to assemble under the Constitution arrived.

The proceedings of the Forty-fifth Congress have been referred to, and the Chair desires to present to the committee in support of its ruling the history of the matter from the precedents prepared by Mr. Asher C. Hinds, clerk at the Speaker's table.

On October 15, 1877, Congress met in extraordinary session on the call of the President and remained in session until the first Monday in December, the day appointed by the Constitution for the regular assembling of Congress.

On Saturday, December 1, 1877, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

"Resolved (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses, without delay, at 3 o'clock p.m. this day."

Later on the day of December 1 the House took a recess until 10 a.m. of the calendar day of Monday, December 3, the day prescribed by the Constitution for the meeting of the regular session of Congress.

On the same day, December 1, the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 3, at 10 a.m.

As soon as the Senate had approved its Journal on Monday, December 3, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, offered this resolution, which was agreed to without debate:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the judgment of the two Houses that the present session of Congress expires by operation of law at 12 o'clock meridian this day."

On the same day this resolution was agreed to by the House without debate.

After the above resolution had been agreed to the Senate took up the resolution of the House of December 1, and agreed to it with an amendment striking out the words "3 o'clock p.m. this day" and inserting "11 o'clock and 50 minutes a.m., Monday, the 3d of December, instant." The House concurred in that amendment.

Then the two Houses agreed to the usual resolutions authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President and inform him of the adjournment.

And at 11.50 a.m. the Speaker declared the House adjourned sine die in accordance with the resolution of the two Houses; and ten minutes later the Speaker, at 12 m., called the House together in the new session, the roll being called by States.

Some gentlemen have said that the value of this precedent is practically destroyed because the resolution declaring it to be the judgment of both Houses of Congress that the extra session expired by operation of law was agreed to without debate. The Record shows that there was considerable discussion over this proposition. There was some trouble or fear of trouble in the matter of securing a sine die adjournment, and at the last moment, in order that the question might be settled, Senator Edmunds offered the concurrent resolution expressing the judgment of the two Houses upon this question.

In the judgment of the Chair, therefore, the session of Congress convened by the President on November 9, 1903, terminated by operation of law; that this is a session of Congress separate and distinct from that one, and, as declared by the unanimously approved Journals of the House and Senate, is the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. It being the regular annual session, and as the law of 1866 authorizes the payment of mileage to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates attending this session, in the opinion of the Chair the paragraph appropriating the money for the payment of that mileage is clearly in order.[1]

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

1161. Each Member is allowed $125 annually for stationery and the Clerk maintains a stationery room for supplying articles.

The Clerk furnishes stationery to the several committees and to the offices of the House.

The stationery for the use of the House is contracted for by the Clerk.[2] The annual appropriation allows $125 to each Member for stationery, or commutation therefor. By resolution of the House[3] the clerk is required to deliver to every Member of the House the usual articles of stationery furnished to Members to an amount not exceeding in value that authorized by law, at the cost price, in the stationery room, or, at the option of the Members, to pay them the proper commutation in money; to keep a true and accurate account of all stationery which he may so deliver to the several Members of the House; and if in any case a Member shall receive a greater amount of stationery during any session than is above provided, the Clerk shall, before the close of such session, furnish to the Sergeant-at-Arms an account of such excess beyond the amount above specified, who is required to deduct the amount of such excess from the pay and mileage of such Member, and refund the same into the Treasury. This limitation is not intended to be made applicable to the use of wrapping paper and envelopes which may be required in the folding room.

The Clerk is also authorized and required to deliver to the chairman of each of the committees of the House, for the use of such committees, and to the Postmaster, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, for the use of their respective offices, at every session of Congress, similar articles of stationery, not exceeding in value an amount which from time to time shall be fixed upon by the Committee on Accounts and approved by the Speaker.

Stationery for the House and committees, except such as is purchased for sale in the stationery room, is furnished by the Public Printer on requisition from the Clerk.[1]

The act of February 12, 1868,[2] provided:

"From and after the 3d day of March, 1868, no Senator or Representative shall receive any newspapers except the Congressional Globe, or stationery, or commutation therefor, exceeding one hundred and twenty-five dollars for any one session of Congress."

1162. By the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of March 3, 1893, a sum was appropriated which would allow $125 to each Member for stationery for the fiscal year 1894. The question arose as to whether the commutation of $125 might be allowed during the extra session of Congress; and the First Comptroller decided that it might be, as there was no time fixed when the commutation should be made. A Member might avail himself of his right whenever he should see fit. Whether or not the Member would be entitled to additional stationery or commutation therefor during the regular session would depend upon whether Congress made an appropriation therefor and also upon such rules as the House might adopt.[3]

1163. Conditions under which the franking privilege is exercised by the Member.—No allowance is made the Member for postage;[4] but Members and Delegates and the Clerk may send and receive free through the mail all public documents printed by order of Congress, the name of the user and designation of the office being written thereon, this privilege continuing until the 1st day of December following the expiration of the user's term of office.[5] The Congressional Record or any part thereof, or speeches or reports contained therein, may, under the frank of a Member or Delegate, to be written by himself, be carried free under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe.[6] Seeds transmitted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, or by any Member or Delegate receiving seeds from the Department for transmission, are sent free in the mails under frank, and this privilege applies to ex-Members and ex-Delegates for a period of nine months after the expirations of their terms.[6] The Public Printer furnishes to the Department of Agriculture for the use of Members franks for the transmission of seeds.[7] Members, Members-elect, Delegates, and Delegates-elect may send free through the mails, under their franks, any mail matter to any Government official or to any person, correspondence not exceeding 2 ounces in weight upon official or departmental business.[1]

1164. Penalties are provided for attempts to bribe Members; and a Member may not be interested in a public contract.—The statutes of the United States prescribe severe penalties for whomsoever attempts to bribe a Member of either House of Congress with intent to influence his vote or decision on any matter pending in either House; and also for any Member who solicits or receives such a bribe, or who receives any valuable consideration for services in regard to contracts or offices under the Government or claims, etc., against the Government.[2] Neither may Members be interested in any public contract.[3]

1165. A Member who was interested in a contract forbidden to him by law was relieved by legislation.—In 1867 a joint resolution was passed (S. Res. 29) by Congress and signed by the President, canceling a contract into which a citizen who subsequently became a Member of Congress had entered before his election for the transportation of mails. The law forbade (act of Congress approved April 21, 1808) a member of Congress being interested in a contract.[4]

1166. Opinion of the Attorney-General as to construction of the statute forbidding Members from being interested in contracts.—On October 21, 1903,[5] the Attorney-General of the United States, P. C. Knox, submitted to the Secretary of War an opinion as to the provision of law relating to the interest of Members of Congress in contracts:

The provision of law referred to, as carried into the Revised Statutes (section 3739), reads as follows:

"No Member of or Delegate to Congress shall directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement made or entered into in behalf of the United States by any officer or person authorized to make contracts on behalf of the United States. Every person who violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined three thousand dollars. All contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be void; and whenever any sum of money is advanced on the part of the United States, in consideration of any such contract or agreement, it shall be forthwith repaid; and in case of refusal or delay to repay the same, when demanded by the proper officer of the Department under whose authority such contract or agreement shall have been made or entered into, every person so refusing or delaying, together with his surety or sureties, shall be forthwith prosecuted at law for the recovery of any such sum of money so advanced."

Your inquiry is this: If a contract under the jurisdiction of your Department is entered into in violation of the above section and is completely executed on both sides, the articles contracted for having been delivered and the consideration paid at the time of the delivery, what portion of the consideration, if any, is subject to a demand for repayment?

The answer, which seems clear, turns entirely on the sense in which Congress used the word "advanced" or some form of it. Did it use it in its legal sense, or in a broader sense, including not only "advances," strictly speaking, but payments made upon the delivery of the thing, or the performance of the work contracted for? The word, as you point out, has always had a definite and well-understood meaning in law. An "advance," in connection with a contract, is something paid in anticipation of the performance of the contract—a part of the consideration paid in "advance" of the delivery of the thing, or the performance of the work bargained for. It is therefore plain that the term is without meaning or significance except where the contract is in an executory state. If the thing contracted for was delivered and the consideration paid at the time of the delivery-in other words, if the contract has been executed—there can, of course, be no such thing as an "advance" in the legal sense of the word. Whence it follows that in the case you put, which is the case of an executed contract, the Government having received and paid for all it contracted for, you are not authorized by section 3739 of the Revised Statutes to demand the repayment of any portion of the consideration paid by the Government, if the term "advance," as used in that section, is to be understood in its general legal acceptation.

The issue, then, narrows down to this: Did Congress, in the enactment of the provision in question, use the word "advance" in any other than its generally accepted legal meaning? I am clear that it did not.

1167. In recent, as well as early, practice a Member frequently informs the House by letter that his resignation has been sent to the State executive, such letter being presented as a privileged question.—On January 4, 1887,[1] the Speaker[2] as a privileged question laid before the House a letter from Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, informing the House that he had tendered his resignation, to take effect on the 1st day of January, 1877.

1168. On January 17, 1887,[3] Mr. William McAdoo, of New Jersey, as a question of privilege, submitted to the House the letter of Mr. Robert S. Green, of New Jersey, in which the latter announced his resignation, which he had forwarded to the governor of New Jersey, to take effect on the date of the letter.

The letter, which was addressed to the Speaker, was read and ordered to lie on the table, in accordance with the usual custom.

1169. On April 16, 1830,[4] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. John M. Goodenow, of Ohio, informing the House that he had transmitted his resignation as Congressman to the governor of Ohio.

1170. On January 23, 1816,[5] Mr. Peter B. Porter, of New York, informed the House, by letter to the Speaker, that he had transmitted his resignation to the governor of New York.

1171. As early as 1797[6] it appears to have been the practice for a Member to transmit his resignation to the executive of his State.

1172. On January 4, 1858,[7] Mr. Speaker Orr laid before the House, by unanimous consent, a letter from Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, informing the House that he had transmitted his resignation to the governor of his State.

1173. On January 8, 1834,[8] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. H. A. Bullard, of Louisiana, informing the House, through the Speaker, that his seat had become vacant by resignation addressed to the State of Louisiana. The letter was read and laid on the table.

On January 15,[1] Mr. John Davis, of Massachusetts, informed the Speaker by letter that he had "signified to the government of the State of Massachusetts" his resignation of his seat in the House. This letter was read and laid on the table.

1174. On April 16, 1830,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. John M. Goodenow, of Ohio, informing the House that he had transmitted his resignation as Congressman to the governor of Ohio.

1175. On December 18, 1860,[3] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from Mr. Israel Washburn, jr., of Maine, informing the House that he had resigned his seat as a Member, the resignation to take effect on January 1, 1861.

1176. On January 7, 1884,[4] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. George D. Robinson, of Massachusetts, informing the House that, having been elected governor of Massachusetts, he had delivered to the governor of the Commonwealth his resignation of the office of Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of Massachusetts.

1177. Forms of letters tendering a Member's resignation to the House or the governor of a State.

Instance wherein a Member tendered his resignation to take effect at a future date.

On December 13, 1906,[5] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication, which was read and laid on the table:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
COMMITTEE ON INSULAR AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1906.

To the SPEAKER:

I herewith tender my resignation as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to take effect on the 15th day of January, 1907.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of a letter addressed to the Hon. John I. Cox, governor of Tennessee, notifying him of my said resignation.

I have the honor to be, respectfully,

M.R. PATTERSON,
Member of Congress, Tenth District, Tennessee.

DECEMBER 13, 1906.

His Excellency JOHN I. COX,

Governor of Tennessee.

SIR: I have the honor to notify you that I have this day tendered my resignation as a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, said resignation to take effect January 15, 1907.

A copy of said resignation is herein inclosed.

I have the honor to be, respectfully,

M. R. PATTERSON,
Member of Congress, Tenth District, Tennessee.

1178. On May 2, 1902,[1] the following communication was presented to the House by the Speaker, read, and laid on the table:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1902.

HON. DAVID B. HENDERSON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the Sixth Massachusetts district.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. MOODY.

1179. In a few instances Members have announced their resignations to the House verbally.—On July 14, 1856,[2] a resolution for the expulsion of Mr. Preston S. Brooks, of South Carolina, was disagreed to, and thereupon Mr. Brooks rose, and having by unanimous consent submitted remarks, announced that he—was no longer a Member of the Thirty-fourth Congress.

On July 16, 1856,[3] Mr. Lawrence M. Keitt, of South Carolina, who had been censured by the House, rose, and after submitting remarks, announced that—he was no longer a Member of this House.

The Globe indicates that he announced that he had sent his resignation to the governor of his State, but this does not appear from the journal.

1180. The journal of July 30, 1850,[4] has this entry:

Robert C. Winthrop, a Member from the First Congressional district, in the State of Massachusetts, rose and announced his resignation of his seat in the House.

The record of debates shows that Mr. Winthrop gave the reason for his resignation—his appointment to the Senate—requested that the fact of his resignation be announced in the usual form to the governor of Massachusetts, and took farewell of the House.

1181. A Member may resign his seat by a letter transmitted to the House alone.—On February 11, 1802,[5] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. Richard Sprigg, of Maryland, containing his resignation of his seat in the House.

On March 24[6] Mr. Walter Bowie, his successor, appeared and took the oath. March 25, the Committee on Elections, to whom were referred Mr. Bowie's credentials, reported that he appeared to have been duly elected, and that—the resignation of Richard Sprigg satisfactorily appears from his letter of the 10th of February last, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

1182. On March 28, 1796,[7] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Gabriel Duvall containing his resignation of a seat in the House as one of the Members for the State of Maryland. The letter was read and ordered to lie on the table.

1183. On August 17, 1850,[1] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from Charles M. Conrad, tendering his resignation as Representative from the Second Congressional district of Louisiana.

1184. On August 4, 1852,[2] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from Mr. Humphrey Marshall, resigning his seat in this House as a Member from the State of Kentucky.

1186. On July 27, 1846,[4] the President of the Senate laid before the Senate a letter from William H. Haywood, jr., resigning his seat as one of the Senators from North Carolina.

Some discussion arose, participated in by Messrs. Webster, Calhoun, and Berrien, as to the form of resignation. It seemed to be the opinion that it was according to usage for the Senator to send his resignation to the President of the Senate, and for the Senate, on motion made and carried, to authorize the President of the Senate to communicate the fact of the resignation to the executive of the State.

1187. When a Member resigns directly to the House, it is the practice to inform the State executive of the vacancy.—On April 9, 1806,[5] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Joseph Hopper Nicholson, esq., one of the Members from the State of Maryland, containing the resignation of his seat in the House.

On April 10—

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to inform the executive of the State of Maryland of the resignation of Joseph H. Nicholson, one of the Representatives from that State.

On November 23, 1804,[6] Mr. Samuel L. Mitchell, of New York, who had been elected a Senator of the United States, transmitted his resignation by letter to the Speaker, and the same having been laid before the House, the Speaker was directed to inform the executive of New York of the resignation.

1188. February 17, 1808,[7] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. David Thomas, of New York, containing his resignation as a Member. The House thereupon directed the Speaker to inform the executive of the State of New York.

1189. On May 19, 1830,[8] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. James W. Ripley, of Maine, resigning his seat in the House.

On May 29,[1] on the eve of the close of the session, the House directed the Speaker to inform the governor of Maine of the vacancy.

1190. On April 7, 1838,[2] the Speaker presented to the House a letter from Mr. John M. Patton, of Virginia, resigning his seat in the House to accept an appointment conferred on him by the legislature of his State. The letter having been read, it was ordered that the Speaker communicate to the governor of Virginia the fact that a vacancy had occurred.

1191. On March 23, 1842,[3] Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, who had been censured by the House, sent to the Speaker his resignation, which was laid before the House, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, March 22, 1842.

SIR: I hereby resign my office as Representative in the Congress of the United States from the Sixteenth Congressional district of Ohio.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. R. GIDDINGS.

HON. JOHN WHITE,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The letter having been read—

Ordered, That the said communication do lie on the table, and that the Speaker communicate a copy thereof to the governor of the State of Ohio.

1192. On September 9, 1850,[4] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from James Wilson, resigning his seat in the House as a Representative from New Hampshire. It was then Ordered, That the Speaker notify the governor of New Hampshire thereof.

1193. The executive of a State may inform the House that he has received the resignation of a Member.—On July 10, 1876,[5] the Speaker laid before the House a telegram from the governor of Maine, announcing that he had tendered to Hon. James G. Blaine the appointment as United States Senator, and that Air. Blaine had placed in his hands his resignation as Representative, to take effect Monday, July 10.

1194. On May 4, 1886,[6] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the secretary of state of the State of New York, informing the House that the resignation of Mr. Joseph Pulitzer as Representative of the Ninth Congressional district of that State was filed in the office of secretary of state on April 12.

1195. Sometimes the House learns of the resignation of a Member only by means of the credentials of his successor.—On December 5, 1796,[7] the first day of the session, the House was apprised of the resignation of Messrs. Jeremiah Crabb, of Maryland; James Hillhouse, of Connecticut, and Daniel Hiester, of Pennsylvania, through the presentation of the credentials of their successors.

1196. An instance wherein the State executive transmitted the resignation of a Member with the credentials of his successor.—On November 30, 1797,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the secretary of state of Pennsylvania, inclosing a letter from George Ege, containing his resignation of a seat in this House; also a return of the election of Joseph Hiester as successor of said Ege.

It was the practice at this time for Members to transmit their resignations to the governors of their States.[2]

1197. On unofficial information that a Member's resignation had been accepted and a successor elected, the Senate held that the Member's seat was vacated.

A Senator tendered his resignation to take effect at a future day.

On January 20, 1815,[3] the President of the Senate laid before that body a letter from Mr. Jesse Bledsoe, of Kentucky, stating that he had doubts as to his right to continue in his seat in the Senate. Previous to December 24, 1814, he had forwarded his resignation by mail to the governor of Kentucky, to take effect on December 24, 1814, and to be by him communicated to the legislature of the State, then, and so far as he was informed, still in session. The governor acknowledged the receipt of the resignation, but stated that he would withhold it in the hope of a change in Mr. Bledsoe's determination until the last of the month, when he would lay it before the legislature. Unofficial information indicated he did so, and that the legislature had chosen a successor.

Under these circumstances Mr. Bledsoe asked the decision of the Senate as to his right to continue in the seat.

Thereupon a resolution was proposed that the facts stated did not vacate the seat. The word "not" was stricken out by a vote of 25 to 8, and then, by a vote of 27 to 6, the amended resolution was agreed to. So the seat was declared vacant.

1198. It was long the practice to notify the executive of the State when a vacancy was caused by the death of a Member during a session.—On January 13, 1801,[4] the death of Mr. James Jones, of Georgia, was announced to the House. Besides the appointment of the usual committee, and the order for wearing crape and attending the funeral, it was—

Resolved, That the Speaker address a letter to the executive of Georgia, to inform him of the death of James Jones, late a Member of this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby.

The same resolution was passed on January 1, 1801,[5] upon the death of Thomas Hartley, of Pennsylvania.

1199. On January 12, 1805,[6]—

Resolved, That the Speaker address a letter to the executive of the State of North Carolina, communicating information of the death of James Gillespie, late a Member of this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply any vacancy occasioned thereby in the representation from that State.

1201. On January 19, 1828,[2] the House directed the Speaker to notify the executive of New Jersey of the death of George Holcombe, late a Member of the House.

1202. On February 28, 1838,[3] after Mr. Jonathan Cilley, of Maine, had been killed in a duel, the House, on motion of Mr. George Evans, of Maine—

Resolved, That the Speaker communicate to the governor of the State of Maine that a vacancy has occurred in its representation in the House of Representatives by the decease of Jonathan Cilley, late a Member thereof from that State.

1203. A seat being declared vacant the House directs that the executive of the State be informed.—On January 2, 1808,[4] it was—

Resolved, That the Speaker address a letter to the executive of the State of North Carolina, communicating information of the decision of this House vacating the seat of John Culpeper, one of the Members returned from that State to serve in this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby in the representation from that State.

1204. On April 20, 1870,[5] Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, offered as a question of privilege, and the House received as such, without objection, the following:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be directed to inform the governor of the State of Louisiana that there is a vacancy in the representation of that State in the First Congressional district thereof.

1205. On September 25, 1890,[6] the House having declared the Member from the Second district of Arkansas not entitled to his seat, the House, by resolution, directed the Clerk to inform the governor of that State of the fact by transmitting to him a copy of the resolution.

1206. Discussion as to the length of term of a Member elected to fill a vacancy caused by the House having declared a seat vacant.—On January 22, 1895,[7] Mr. W. I. Hayes, of Iowa, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report on the claim of Charles H. Page for a certain balance claimed to be due him as a Member of the Forty-ninth Congress from the Second district of Rhode Island. The regular election for Representatives to the Forty-ninth Congress was held in the Second Rhode Island district on November 4, 1884, and William A. Pirce received the governor's certificate of election. Mr. Page, who was the opposing candidate, contested the election, and on January 25, 1887, the House declared the seat vacant, no one having obtained the majority required by the State law. A new election was ordered, and occurred February 21, 1887. Mr. Page was elected by a majority over all, and took his seat February 25, 1887, within a few days of the expiration of the Forty-ninth Congress. He received the usual mileage, and pay from January 26, 1887 (the time Mr. Pirce was unseated), until the expiration of the Congress. He claimed, however, the pay for the whole term of the Congress, two years in all.

In considering this claim, the committee discussed the status of Mr. Pirce, who had been unseated:

The claim is based upon the following clause of the Constitution of the United States (section 5 of article 1):

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members."

And upon section 35 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of January 20, 1874, which fixes the salary or compensation of a Representative in Congress at $5,000 per annum.

In this case the House decided that William A. Pirce was not elected, as before stated. Mr. Page was elected to, sworn in, and took his seat as a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress, from the Second district of Rhode Island, and is the only one ever so entitled to act, and is entitled to full compensation.

A title to membership in the House of Representatives is only obtained by virtue of the clause in the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution, which says, "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members," and the laws passed in accordance therewith.

The certificate of the governor of Rhode Island, on which William A. Pirce was recognized, only justified the Clerk of the House in placing his name on the roll under the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes, which says:

"Before the first meeting of each Congress the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect and place thereon the names of those persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States, respectively, or the laws of the United States."

This section does not give the governor of any State the authority to judge of the constitutional or legal right of anyone to be a Member of the House. The governor's certificate is only good as to a Representative who, by virtue of such a certificate, is entitled to have his name placed on the Clerk's roll until such time as the House may judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of the person holding such certificate.

The House of Representatives, acting under the authority given it by this clause of the Constitution of the United States, declared that William A. Pirce was not elected, and by the laws of Rhode Island and under the facts as determined no one was then elected, and it follows that Mr. Page was the only one ever legally elected to that Congress or entitled to any standing as a Member. Its declaration was as follows:

"Resolved, That William A. Pirce was not elected a Member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress from the Second Congressional district of Rhode Island, and that the seat be declared vacant."

The House of Representatives knew its duty under the Constitution and as affected by the laws of Rhode Island, and asserted it, the certificate of the governor to the contrary notwithstanding. William A. Pirce was never, in legal contemplation, a Member of the Forty-ninth Congress, and no one but Mr. Page ever so legally represented this district.

The report then quotes section 51 of the Revised Statutes, wherein it provides that where a vacancy occurs after the commencement of the Congress, the person elected to fill it shall receive compensation from the time the salary of his successor ceased, and points out that it has no application, since there never was a vacancy except from the failure to elect, and therefore Mr. Page had no predecessor in the sense of the statute. A predecessor to a Member must be a Member, and to be a Member must have been elected. The vacancy therefore existed from the very beginning of the Congress, and Mr. Page, when elected, was chosen for the whole Congress and not to any fractional part thereof.

As to the practice of the House in the payment of Members who take seats after the sessions have commenced, the report says:

The Revised Statutes provide that Members of Congress shall be paid a salary of $5,000 per annum. There are no restrictions as to the time when the Member shall be elected, provided he is elected in accordance with law, to entitle him to the per annum salary. He may be elected before the Congress begins or at any time during the Congress if he is the only Member legally elected for a given district for that Congress. He is the Member mentioned in the Constitution and laws, and entitled to all the privileges and emoluments thereof.

The uniform practice has been that Members who were elected after the beginning of Congress were paid from the beginning of the Congress to which they were elected, or from the time the vacancy occurred, if there had been an actual predecessor. The cases are numerous in support of this practice, and it is not necessary to refer to those where, upon contest, the contestant is seated, and in those cases both draw salary, the contestant from the beginning of the Congress and the contestee for the time he holds, and the fact that Mr. Pirce so drew here need excite no comment and should make no difference.

There have been such cases where the seating of contestant was on the very last day of the Congress. The cases most nearly analogous to this one are the Sypher and Morey cases from Louisiana in the Forty-first Congress, where neither party was held entitled to a seat, and upon new elections each of these men were elected in their respective districts, and out of their pay was deducted what was allowed them for expenses of contest in the first instance, and in the Sypher case the Forty-sixth Congress determined practically in accordance with this resolution upon a resolution to reimburse him this deduction, and in the report the committee said:

"The decision of the question your committee believe depends upon the time from which the salary of a Congressman begins. We have examined the question and have come to the conclusion that the general practice has been to allow a Member his salary, without qualification or condition, for the whole Congress to which he was elected, although he may have taken his seat after the expiration of a portion of the term when such election was not held to fill a vacancy occurring after the commencement of the Congress. If Mr. Sypher was entitled to the salary of a Member of the Forty-first Congress, under the facts as found, we think it should have been allowed him freed from the conditions imposed by the resolutions of the 12th of December, 1870. [This condition was deducting what he had been paid as a contestant.] We are strengthened in the conclusion to which we have arrived by the action of the Forty-third Congress in allowing to Mr. Morey the amount which he had been compelled to refund by the terms of the same resolution—the case of Mr. Morey and that of Mr. Sypher being alike in every material particular. Should the doctrine of res adjudicata, be invoked as applicable to this case, and as a bar to the claimant's right to the allowance he asks, we would remark that the action of the Forty-third Congress in allowing to Mr. Morey the amount he had been compelled to refund we regard as a precedent directly applicable and decisive of the question involved.

"We therefore recommend that the claim of Mr. Sypher be favorably considered, and that the following resolution be adopted and referred to the Committee on Appropriations."

There seems to be no reason, law, or precedent to deny Mr. Page the relief asked.

This report was not acted on by the House.

1207. A Member's name remains on the roll until the House is officially notified of his resignation, or takes action respecting it.

A resolution relating to the status of one borne on the roll of membership of the House was held to be privileged.

On May 3, 1885,[1] Mr. Alphonso Hart, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report from the Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the following resolutions:

Whereas on October 14, 1884, Hon. James S. Robinson, a Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the ninth district of the State of Ohio, was elected to the office of secretary of state of the State of Ohio;

Whereas said Hon. James S. Robinson is still, to all intents and so far as any official notification of resignation to this House is concerned, a Member of this body, and that his name is still borne upon the roll as a representative in Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections of the House be ordered to investigate and report to this House at the earliest moment the status of the right of said Hon. James S. Robinson as Member of this body.

A question of order being raised, the Speaker[1] held[2] them to be privileged, as they related to the status of one borne on the roll as a Member.

The committee found the facts to be as stated in the preamble and that Mr. Robinson had at 11 o'clock on January 12, 1885, tendered his resignation as a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress to the governor of Ohio. This resignation was duly placed on file in the office of the governor, and on the day of the resignation Mr. Robinson duly qualified as secretary of state. Since that time he had not been a Member of the House, nor had he attempted to exercise any of the rights and privileges which would belong to a Member of the House. The committee therefore concluded that he was not and did not claim to be a Member of the House, and recommended that the Clerk be instructed to omit the name of James S. Robinson from the roll of Members.

This report was made within a few hours of the close of the Congress, and was not acted on.

1208. The fact of a Member's resignation not appearing, either from the credentials of his successor or otherwise, the House ascertained the vacancy from information given by other Members.—On December 31, 1800,[3] the Committee on Elections reported that Samuel Tenney was entitled to take his seat in the House in place of William Gordon, as the certificate of the governor of New Hampshire showed him duly appointed, and as "it is further made to appear by information from several Members of the House from the said State, that such appointment was made to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of William Gordon."

1209. An inquiry of the Clerk having elicited from the State executive the fact that a Member had resigned, the Speaker directed his name to be stricken from the roll.—On February 16, 1875.[4] the Speaker laid before the House the following letter from the Clerk of the House:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 16, 1875.

SIR: The secretary of state of Florida informs me by telegraph, in reply to an inquiry made of him by me, that Hon. William J. Purman resigned his seat in the Forty-third Congress on the 25th of January, 1875.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD MCPHERSON,
Clerk House of Representatives.

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The letter having been read, the Speaker said:

Upon this statement the chair directs the name of Mr. Purman to be stricken from the roll. It is the only notification the House has had of his resignation officially.

1210. Instances wherein Members have been reelected to fill the vacancies occasioned by their own resignations.—On May 5, 1842,[1] the Journal has this entry:

A new Member, viz, Joshua R. Giddings, from the State of Ohio, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Joshua R. Giddings (the same person who now appears), appeared, was sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and took a seat in the House.

1211. On August 1, 1856,[2] the Journal has this entry:

Mr. Preston S. Brooks, a Member-elect from the State of South Carolina, to supply the vacancy occasioned by his own resignation, appeared, was sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and took a seat in the House.

1212. On August 6, 1856,[3] the Journal has this entry:

Mr. Lawrence M. Keitt, a Member-elect from the State of South Carolina, to fill the vacancy occasioned by his own resignation, appeared, was sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and took a seat in the House.

1213. A Member who had resigned was not permitted by the House to withdraw his resignation.

The House declined to consider as privileged a resolution that a former Member be permitted to withdraw his letter announcing his resignation and resume his seat.

On February 28, 1870,[4] the Speaker laid before the House the following letter from Mr. Jacob S. Golladay, of Kentucky:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, February 28, 1870.

SIR: I enclose you a letter herewith tendering my resignation to the State of Kentucky as a Member of Congress from the Third district.

Very respectfully,

J. S. GOLLADAY.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE.

The inclosed letter, which was also read to the House, was as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 28, 1870.

DEAR SIR: I herewith tender you my resignation as a Member of Congress from the Third district of Kentucky.

Very respectfully,

J. S. GOLLADAY.

His excellency JOHN W. STEVENSON.

Of this resignation, and the resignation of another Member presented at the same time, the Journal had the following entry:

The Speaker laid before the House communications from Jacob S. Golladay and John T. Deweese, respectively, notifying the House that they had resigned their seats as Members of the House, the former from the State of Kentucky and the latter from the State of North Carolina; which were severally laid on the table.

On March 7, 1870, Mr. William B. Stokes, of Tennessee, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered the following:

Whereas on the 28th day of February, 1870, Jacob S. Golladay, a Member of this House, tendered his resignation to the governor of the State of Kentucky; and whereas he inclosed a copy of his communication to said governor to the Speaker of this House, by whom it was communicated to this House; and whereas the governor of the State of Kentucky peremptorily refused to accept the resignation tendered as aforesaid, and has requested a withdrawal of the same, which request has been complied with. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in view of said refusal of the governor of Kentucky to accept the resignation tendered to him, and in view of the withdrawal of his communication to said governor, Jacob S. Golladay be, and is hereby, permitted to withdraw his communication to the Speaker of the House, and resume his seat in this body.

The Speaker laid before the House letters received by him confirming the assertion of the preamble. Mr. Golladay had been charged with selling cadetships, and the governor had declined his resignation on the ground that he owed it to the State, to his constituency, and to himself to return to the House and demand a Congressional investigation.

A question arose as to the effect of the notification to the House that a resignation had been transmitted to the governor, and whether or not the fact that this notification had been recorded on the Journal and Mr. Golladay had been dropped from the rolls, constituted such a resignation to the House as prevented his return after he had withdrawn the actual resignation filed with the governor. It was urged especially by Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, that the governor, in declining to accept the resignation, had far exceeded his powers, and had neglected the constitutional mandate requiring him to issue writs for a new election. There was also discussion of the control of the House over the resignations of its Members, if any.

Finally, Mr. Noah Davis, of New York, made the point of order that the Whittemore case had determined that the right of resignation was purely personal to the Member; that when he has exercised this right he becomes ipso facto no longer a Member; that Mr. Golladay's resignation had been announced to the House, entered on the Journal after being accepted sub silentio, and thus became a complete resignation de jure. The gentleman retired from the House and ceased to act as a Member, and the House ceased to treat him as a Member. Therefore the pending resolution was a proposition to give a seat to an entire stranger, a man not entitled to a seat by virtue of any election.

Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, supported this point of order.

The Speaker [1] said:

The gentleman from Tennessee rose and stated that he had a question of privilege under the rules of the House. Whatever may be the opinion of the Chair, it is his duty to submit that question to the House. In the judgment of the Chair, Mr. Golladay is no more a Member of the House than any stranger in the gallery. That is his individual opinion; but the Chair can not interpose his individual judgment so as to preclude the gentleman from Tennessee presenting his question of privilege. Under the point of order presented by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair will submit the question to the House whether it will entertain the preamble and resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee as a question of privilege.

[1] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

The question was put, and the House, without division, decided that the preamble and resolution should not be entertained as a question of privilege.

Thereupon Mr. Davis offered the following, which was agreed to:

Whereas it is of grave importance to the constitution of this House that it should be determined whether a Member thereof during the session may resign his seat without the consent of the House, and thereby evade his duties and responsibilities: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report to this House, by bill or otherwise, at any time, what action or rule should be taken or established for the determination of that question.

It does not appear that any report was made.

1214. Only in a single exceptional case has the House taken action in the direction of accepting the resignation of a Member.—On May 20, 1876,[1] the Speaker pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication:

SALISBURY, CONN., May 18, 1876.

SIR: Having been elected by the legislature of Connecticut a Senator in Congress to fill the unexpired term of the late Hon. Orris S. Ferry, I hereby tender to you, and through you to the House of Representatives, my resignation as a Member of Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Connecticut.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. H. BARNUM.

TO MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

On motion of Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, the said letter was ordered to be entered on the Journal as an acceptance of the resignation of Mr. Barnum.

On July 19 the resignation of W. W. Ketcham, of Pennsylvania, transmitted, direct to the Speaker, was read, but no further action was taken.[2]

1215. In exceptional cases old Members have expressed in their letters of resignation their feelings toward the House—On February 15, 1844,[3] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, announcing that he had transmitted his resignation to the governor of the State of Virginia. Mr. Wise in his letter went on to express his feelings of attachment and respect for the Congress. The letter appears in full in the Journal.

1216. On March 6, 1844,[4] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. Samuel Beardsley, of New York, announcing that he had forwarded to the governor of New York his resignation of his seat in the House. Mr. Beardsley also went on to express his regret at leaving the associations of his membership in the House. The letter appears in full in the Journal.

1217. On December 13, 1815,[5] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Nathaniel Macon informing the Speaker and the House that he had that day, by letter to the governor of North Carolina, resigned his seat in the House of Representatives. Mr. Macon also expressed a grateful appreciation of his pleasant relations with Members of the House for many years.

1218. The withdrawal of Members caused by the secession of States.— On December 24, 1860,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Members from South Carolina, announcing the secession of their State, which had "thereby dissolved our connection with the House of Representatives." The letter was read and laid on the table.

On January 12, 1861,[2] a letter from the Mississippi Members announced the secession of their State, and announced their "withdrawal" from the House. On March 2[3] a vacancy on a committee caused by the withdrawal of one of the Mississippi Members was recorded in the Journal as caused by the Member's "declination." On January 21[4] the Alabama Members announced their "withdrawal." On January 23[5] the Georgia Members announced that they were no longer Members, except one, Mr. Joshua Hill, who tendered his resignation. On January 30[6] a letter from Mr. Williamson R. W. Cobb, of Alabama, announced that, as his State has seceded, he would "decline further participation" in the business of the House.

In all the above cases the Speaker presented the communications by unanimous consent, and the only action of the House was to lay them on the table, as in the case of letters of resignation.

1219. Senators having withdrawn from the Senate, the Secretary was directed to omit their names from the roll.

The Journal of the Senate made no mention of the withdrawal of Senators by reason of the secession of their States.

On January 22, 1861,[7] in the Senate, the Vice-President stated that no notice had been taken in the Journal of the withdrawal of certain Senators from the Chamber on yesterday, and that no paper had been filed with the presiding officer by those Senators notifying him that they had withdrawn from the Senate; and that he would like some instruction as to what vacancies existed in the committees, and whether the names of those Senators should continue to be called in taking the yeas and nays.

Thereupon Mr. Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, submitted the following motion:

Ordered, That the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be so corrected as to record the fact that the Senators from the States of Florida and Alabama, and the Hon. Jefferson Davis, Senator of the State of Mississippi, made announcement that the said States of Florida, Alabama, and Mississippi had seceded from the Union, had resumed the powers delegated by the said several States to the United States of America, and that they, the said Senators, considered themselves by reason of said action of said States as being no longer entitled to retain their seats as Senators, and accordingly thereupon withdrew from the Senate.

At once debate arose as to proper method of making up the Journal. It was urged that the Journal should contain only those things voted on, and that there would be great difficulty in determining and stating exactly the grounds of their action. Mr. Stephen A. Douglas contended that the Senate could with propriety enter only the fact of their withdrawal, and he moved as a substitute for the order the following:

That Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, Stephen R. Mallory and David L. Yulee, of Florida, C. C. Clay and Benjamin Fitzpatrick, of Alabama, having announced to the Senate their withdrawal from the same, Ordered, That their names be stricken from the list of Senators, and the Secretary directed no longer to call the same.

Finally the subject was laid on the table, yeas 32, nays 22.[1]

On March 13, 1861,[2] Mr. William Pitt Fessenden, of Maine, proposed the following:

Resolved, That Albert G. Brown and Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, Clement C. Clay, jr., of Alabama, Robert Toombs, of Georgia, and Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, having announced that they are no longer Members of the Senate, and having withdrawn therefrom, their seats in this body have thereby become vacant, and the Secretary is directed to strike their names from the roll of Members.

Considerable debate arose as to the effect of the action of the Senators in question and their States, and finally, after various propositions had been made and rejected, the resolution was amended and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the seats of Albert G. Brown and Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, Clement C. Clay, jr., of Alabama, Robert Toombs, of Georgia, and Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, as Members of the Senate, have become vacant: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to omit their names, respectively, from the roll.

1220. Members have presented their resignations to take effect at a future date, and until that time have sometimes participated in the proceedings.—On January 7, 1873,[3] the Speaker presented to the House the resignation of Mr. John L. Beveridge, of Illinois, to take effect January 4, 1873, the date the letter of resignation was written.

1221. The Journal of August 18, 1856,[4] the last day of the session, has the following entry:

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Hon. William A. Richardson, announcing that he had notified the governor of Illinois of his resignation of his seat as a Member of this House from the State of Illinois, to take effect on the 25th instant.

The House adjourned sine die on this day, but on the 21st of August Congress was convened again by proclamation of the President, but Mr. Richardson does not appear to have participated in proceedings during the remainder of the time before the 25th.

On May 3 there was a call of the roll, and it appears that the name of Mr. Caldwell was called.

The letter of resignation appears in full in the Journal.

1223. On December 24, 1846,[2] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 24, 1846.

SIR: I have the honor to announce that I have forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Illinois my resignation as a Member of the House of Representatives, to take effect from the 15th of January, or sooner if my successor shall appear and take his seat.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. BAKER.

To the Hon. J. W. DAVIS,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Baker remained a Member of the House and participated in its debates until December 30. At that time a question was raised as to the propriety of Mr. Baker holding a seat in the House and a commission in the Army, and in the course of the debate Mr. Baker tendered his resignation, which the Journal records as follows:

Mr. Edward D. Baker rose and said: "Mr. Speaker, I now resign my seat as a Representative from the Seventh district in the State of Illinois in the Twenty-ninth Congress."

1224. On January 25, 1906,[3] the Speaker laid before the House the following letter, which was read and laid on the table:

WASHINGTON, D.C., January 24, 1906.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I have this day transmitted to the governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia my resignation as a Member of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-ninth Congress for the Fifth district of Virginia, to take effect January 30, 1906.

Respectfully, yours,

CLAUDE A. SWANSON.

On January 26,[4] Mr. Swanson was present, participating in the proceedings by voting on a roll call and by introducing sundry private bills.

1225. On January 8, 1903,[5] the following communication was laid before the House:

Washington, D.C., January 8, 1903.

To the Hon. DAVID B. HENDERSON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have this day tendered my resignation as a Representative in Congress from the Eighth Congressional district of Texas to the Hon. Joseph D. Sayers, governor of the State of Texas, to take effect on the 15th instant.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. W. T. LANHAM,

Member of Congress, Eighth District, Texas.

1226. Instance wherein a Senator resigned, appointing a future date for the resignation to take effect.—On February 10, 1873,[2] the Vice-President laid before the Senate the following letter, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

TO SCHUYLER COLFAX, Vice-President of the United States.

SIR: On the 8th instant I transmitted to the governor of Massachusetts my resignation as a Senator of the United States, to take effect at the close of the Forty-second Congress, on the 3d of March next.

Your obedient servant,

HENRY WILSON.

SENATE CHAMBER, February 10, 1873.

Mr. Wilson was inaugurated as Vice-President on March 4.[3]

On March 17[4] Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, presented the credentials of Mr. George S. Boutwell, elected by the legislature of Massachusetts as Mr. Wilson's successor.

1227. After full consideration the Senate decided that a Member might resign, appointing a future date for his retirement—On December 6, 1852,[5] the credentials of Archibald Dixon, of Kentucky, were presented in the Senate. A question was at once raised as to whether or not a vacancy existed in the representation from that State. The peculiar circumstances of the case were clearly explained, on December 20, by Mr. William H. Seward, of New York:

The following facts make up the case: On the 17th of December, 1851, Henry Clay was a Senator from Kentucky, chosen by the legislature for six years, which would have expired on the 3d of March, 1855. Being so a Senator, he resigned by a communication to the legislature of Kentucky, declaring that it was to take effect on the first Monday in September, 1852. The legislature, then in session, received the resignation and chose Mr. Dixon to fill the vacancy thus to occur from the first Monday in September, 1852, to the 3d day of March, 1855. The legislature then adjourned. On the 29th day of June, 1852, during the recess of the legislature of Kentucky, Mr. Clay died, and the governor of that State made a "temporary appointment" of Mr. Meriwether as a Senator from Kentucky, to hold the seat until the first Monday of September, 1852. Mr. Meriwether immediately took the vacant seat, and held it until Congress adjourned on the last day of August, 1852. On the 6th of December, 1852, the Senate reassembles, Mr. Meriwether does not appear, and Mr. Dixon appears and presents his credentials, and claims the vacant seat.

Manifestly, Mr. Dixon is one of two Senators "chosen by the legislature" of Kentucky "for six years," and he was chosen to fill a vacancy which has happened in the term of Mr. Clay.

The whole question turns on the point, How did this vacancy happen? Mr. Clay resigned, fixing the first Monday of September as the day when he should vacate his seat, and died, nevertheless, a Senator before that day arrived. Mr. Dixon was appointed by the legislature when in session, before not only the day which Mr. Clay's resignation fixed for his retirement, but also before Mr. Clay's death.

We who maintain Mr. Dixon's title insist that the vacancy happened by Mr. Clay's resignation. On the contrary, those who deny Mr. Dixon's title insist that the vacancy happened by Mr. Clay's death.

Four questions arise:

First. Can a Senator resign?

Second. Can a Senator resigning appoint a future day for his retirement from the Senate?

[3] Senate Journal, pp. 594, 600.

[4] Senate Journal, p. 615.

[5] Second session Thirty-second Congress, Globe, pp. 2, 93, 96.

Third. Can the proper appointing power receive such a resignation and prospectively fill the vacancy?

Fourth. If the legislature so prospectively fill the vacancy, can the appointment be defeated by the death of the resigning Senator before the arrival of the day fixed for his retirement from the Senate?

If a Senator can resign, and can so resign prospectively, and if the legislature can so fill the vacancy prospectively, and if their action can not be defeated by the death of the resigning Senator, then Mr. Dixon's title is good, valid, and complete.

The first question is expressly decided by the Constitution, which declares that vacancies may "happen by resignation."

The second question is decided by an unbroken succession of precedents from the foundation of the Government. Mr. Bledsoe so resigned, fixing a future day; so did Mr. Clay in 1842; so did Mr. Berrien in 1852; and so did Mr. Foote in 1852.

The third question is answered with equal distinctness by precedents. The legislature of Kentucky prospectively filled the vacancy made by Mr. Clay's resignation in 1842, the governor of Georgia prospectively filled the vacancy of Mr. Berrien in 1852, and the governor or legislature of Mississippi prospectively filled the vacancy of Mr. Foote in 1852.

The only question remaining is the fourth: Can the death of the resigning Senator after the legislature has prospectively filled the vacancy, and before the day fixed for his retirement, defeat the appointment of his successor already made?

On December 20, after long debate, the Senate declined to refer the case to a committee, and by a vote of yeas 27, nays 16, adopted a declaration that Mr. Dixon had been duly elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Henry Clay, and that he was entitled to the seat.

1228. The Senate election case of Horace Chilton, of Texas, in the Fifty-second Congress.

A Senator may resign, appointing a future day for his resignation to take effect, and the State executive may by appointment fill the vacancy before that date.

On December 7, 1891,[1] the Vice-President laid before the Senate the credentials of Horace Chilton, appointed a Senator by the governor of the State of Texas to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John H. Reagan in the term expiring March 3, 1893; which were read and placed on file.

On the same day Mr. Chilton appeared. The oath prescribed by law was administered to him, and he took his seat.

On the same day, on motion of Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, Ordered, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire into the circumstances and validity of the appointment of Horace Chilton as a Senator from the State of Texas.

On January 25, 1892,[2] Mr. Hoar, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report as follows:

Mr. Reagan, elected Senator from the State of Texas for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1887, resigned his office, the resignation to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891. The executive of the State of Texas, on the 25th day of April, 1891, and after the receipt of the resignation of Mr. Reagan, appointed Mr. Chilton to fill the vacancy occasioned by said resignation. Mr. Chilton's credentials set forth the resignation of Mr. Reagan, and further declare—

"Now, therefore, I, J. S. Hogg, governor of the State of Texas, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Texas, do hereby appoint Horace Chilton, of Smith County, Tex., Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of

[2] Senate Report No. 105.

Texas, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. John S. Reagan. This appointment to take effect the 10th day of June, A. D. 1891."

The certificate bears date April 25, 1891.

Mr. Chilton is in all other respects duly qualified to be a Senator from the State of Texas. The only question is whether the governor might lawfully make this appointment before the resignation of Mr. Reagan actually took effect.

The provision of the Constitution affecting the question is as follows:

"Art. I, sec. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years, * * * and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

A similar state of facts has arisen in a number of instances since the Constitution went into operation.

The term of Uriah Tracy, Senator from Connecticut, expired March 3, 1801; he was appointed by the governor of Connecticut February 20, 1801, "from the 3d of March next until the next meeting of the legislature of said State," the legislature of the State not being in session at the time of said appointment or thereafter until after said 4th of March. Exception being taken to his credentials, he was admitted to the seat by a vote of 13 yeas to 10 nays, and held the seat during the special session of the Senate, March 4 and 5.

Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, was appointed by the executive February 6, 1809, to fill the vacancy which would result from the expiration of his term, March 3, 1809. He held the seat under these credentials during the special session of the Senate, March 4 to March 7, 1809.

John Williams, of Tennessee, was appointed by the executive to fill the vacancy which would result from the expiration of his own term, March 3, 1817. Under these credentials he held his seat from March 4 to 6, 1817.

John McPherson Berrien, of Georgia, resigned by letter dated Washington, May 28, 1852, addressed to the President pro tempore, and read in Senate same date. (Globe, first session Thirty-second Congress, p. 1493.)

Robert M. Charlton, his successor, appeared June 11, 1852, with credentials signed by the governor of Georgia, and dated May 18, 1852, to take effect from and after May 31, 1852. He was sworn and took his seat without objection. (Senate Journal, first session Thirty-second Congress, p. 468.)

March 4, 1825, James Lanman, of Connecticut, presented credentials showing an appointment made February 8, 1825, by the governor of the State to fill the vacancy about to result from the expiration of his term, March 3, 1825. Objection being made, Mr. Lanman was refused a seat by a vote of 23 to 13. There is no historical evidence from which we can determine on what ground the Senate rejected Mr. Lanman, whether it was on the ground that the governor could not fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of a term, or on the ground that the governor could not lawfully make the appointment in anticipation and before a vacancy occurred, and before he could possibly know whether the legislature might not be called together before that time. Judge Story (Const., sec. 727, n. 2) says:

"In the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, a question occurred whether the State executive could make an appointment in the recess of the State legislature in anticipation of the expiration of the term of office of an existing Senator. It was decided by the Senate that he could not make such an appointment. The facts were that Mr. Lanman's term as Senator expired on the 3d of March, 1825. The President had convoked the Senate to meet on the 4th of March. The governor of Connecticut, in the recess of the legislature (whose session would be in May), on the 9th of the preceding February appointed Mr. Lanman as Senator, to sit in the Senate after the 3d of March. The Senate by a vote of 23 to 18 decided that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred."

The following statement appears in the National Intelligencer of Tuesday, March 8, 1825:

"An important constitutional question was yesterday decided in the Senate by the refusal to admit Mr. Lanman to a seat in the Senate under a commission from the governor, granted before the expiration of Mr. Lanman's late term of service. This is the first time this question has been adjudicated under such circumstances as to form a precedent; and we presume it may now be considered a settled construction of the constitutional provision that a vacancy must have literally 'happened' or come to pass before an appointment can be made to fill it. The case has once been questioned and decided differently, but it was in strong party times, all the Federal Members voting for the Member's taking his seat and all the Democratic Members against it, under which circumstances the decision has not been much respected as a precedent. So far as it was a precedent it is now reversed."

Gorden's Digest of the Laws of the United States, 1827, appendix, note 1 B, states the ground of the decision in the same way, but manifestly bases the statement on the authority of the National Intelligencer.

On the other hand, Mr. Grundy, in his report from the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of Mr. Sevier, Senator from the State of Arkansas, who was appointed by the governor of Arkansas January 17, 1837, to fill the vacancy which would occur on the 3d of March following by the expiration of Mr. Sevier's previous term, declared that the decision in the Lanman case was on the ground "that the legislature must provide for all vacancies, which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution." He distinguished Mr. Sevier's case from the Lanman case by the fact that the time that Mr. Sevier was to go out of office was decided by lot, he having been one of the Senators appointed by the State on its admission.

Niles's Register of Friday, March 12, states the question in regard to the Lanman case:

"The question was whether the failure by the legislature to make a choice of Senator constitutes the contingency in which the governor may appoint a Senator."

Mr. Benton, in his Thirty Years' View, states that the principal argument against the admission of Mr. Lanman was made by Mr. Tazewell, that argument being that the word "happen" in the Constitution could not apply to a foreseen event, bound to occur at a fixed period, and that therefore it was the right of the legislature only to fill a vacancy which was foreseen, regular, and certain, and that there was no right in the governor to supply that omission.

Mr. Lanman was not admitted to the seat. There is nothing in the contemporary record of the debates or in the resolution which enables us to determine whether the majority of the Senate based its action on the ground stated by Mr. Benton to have been maintained by Ms. Tazewell, or on the ground stated by Judge Story and by the National Intelligencer. The case, therefore, is not an authority on either side of the question. So that it is impossible to determine whether the Senate meant to overrule the Tracy case on one ground or the other.

On the other hand, an examination of the very numerous cases where the executives of States have made appointments when the legislature was not in session shows that in a great many of them the executive has postponed action, where the resignations were made to take effect at a future time or where the previous term had expired by its own limitation, until after the vacancy existed. In all probability this postponement was caused by a belief on the part of the executive that he had no authority to provide for filling a vacancy until it actually occurred or, at any rate, that the question was so far in doubt that it would be unsafe to make the appointment in anticipation.

So far, then, as the precedents are concerned, it appears that in three cases persons so appointed have been admitted to their seats without question; that Mr. Tracy was admitted and Mr. Lanman rejected, where the executive made the appointment in anticipation of a vacancy, there being a discussion in the Senate, but no satisfactory evidence of the grounds of the judgment; that in one case, that of Mr. Sevier, a person so appointed has been admitted, when the validity of the appointment was questioned, upon other grounds, without raising this question specifically; and that in modern times, the practice has been uniform for the State executive to delay appointment until the actual happening of the vacancy.

Under these circumstances, it seems to us that the Senate may now determine the question, unhampered by any precedents of its own.

We suppose that where the power is given to fill vacancies in public offices, it has been the uniform practice to permit resignations of such offices to be made, to take effect at a future day, and to hold that the appointing power is entitled to make the appointment in advance to fill the vacancy, to take effect when the resignation becomes operative, unless the language of the constitutional or statute provision under which the authority is exercised forbids such construction.

The Constitution of the United States, Article II, section 2, in providing for the appointing power, enacts:

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

We believe it has been the uniform practice of the Executive from the beginning to accept resignations which are to take effect in the future, and to make appointments, also to take effect in the future, to fill them. We suppose that a like practice also prevails in regard to the heads of Departments in the exercise of the appointing power conferred by law upon them. The language of the provision of the Constitution under consideration, that "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature," seems to us to admit easily of a like construction. We do not suppose that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to establish different rules for these two cases.

The Senate has recently, after full consideration, determined that the constitutional provision that the Senate shall choose a president pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President permits the choice of an officer in advance of the actual occurrence of the contingency referred to, who may take the chair whenever the Vice-President may be absent, until the Senate otherwise order. In all these cases, including that which we are now considering, the important consideration is that it must have been the purpose of the framers of the Constitution, as it is clearly for the public interest, that the office as far as possible should always be filled. This consideration applies with peculiar force to the office of Senator. We should be very unwilling to establish a construction of the Constitution which would make it certain that in no case of the resignation of a Senator, however necessary that resignation might be, there should be a succession without a considerable interval.

This would bear with peculiar hardship upon States remote from the seat of government, and might determine the policy of the country in great emergencies and in matters peculiarly affecting particular States, when such States were but partially represented, or possibly not represented at all. The tendency of the opinion of the Senate, as evidenced by its more recent decisions, has been more and more to lean to a construction which, as far as possible, secures that the seats in the Senate should be filled without any interruption in the representation of the State. Thus, in the case of Mr. Bell and Mr. Blair, Senators from the State of New Hampshire, it has been held that the executive might fill the vacancy occurring at the beginning of the constitutional term in consequence of the failure or the inability of the legislature to elect a Senator for that term, in compliance with the statute of 1866 (Rev. Stat., secs. 14 and 19), in spite of very weighty and influential opinions to the contrary.

So it has been held and is now the settled construction, that if a vacancy occur during the recess of the Senate, and a person be regularly nominated to the Senate at its next session to fill it, and be rejected, and the Senate adjourn without the office being filled, the President is entitled to make a new appointment in the next vacation. So, if the officer died during the session, and his death be not known until after the adjournment, as is said by Attorney-General Taney in his able report (Opinions of Attorneys-General, vol. 2, p. 523):

"It is admitted by everyone that the President may appoint in such cases, and the practice of the Government has continually conformed to that construction."

"It was the intention of the Constitution," Mr. Taney further says, "that the offices created by law and necessary to carry out the operations of the Government should always be full, or, at all events, that the vacancy should not be a protracted one." (See also, to the same effect, the opinion of William Wirt, 1 Op. Attys. Gen., 631.)

It has been suggested that if this construction be established it will be in the power of the governor of the State to provide by appointment for the filling of future vacancies long before they occur, and, therefore, the will of the people of the State, as it exists at or near the time of filling the vacancy, fail of being carried into effect. But the instances must necessarily be very rare indeed where the vacancy can be anticipated beforehand under circumstances which will create such temptation to the executive. Against that, as against many other evils which axe possible under a popular government, as under other governments, the protection in general must be in the character and integrity of the persons clothed with high public office.

We therefore are of the opinion that Mr. Chilton was lawfully appointed by the executive of the State of Texas to the seat which he now holds, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. Horace Chilton, appointed by the executive of the State of Texas on the 25th day of April, 1891, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. John H. Reagan, which had been previously been made, to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891, is entitled to retain his seat.

On January 27 [1] the Senate agreed to the resolution reported by the committee.

1229. The Senate election case of James A. Hemenway, of Indiana, in the Fifty-ninth Congress.

A Senator may resign, appointing a future day for the resignation to take effect, and the State legislature may fill the vacancy before that date.

On February 21, 1905,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Albert J. Beveridge, of Indiana, presented the following credentials, to be placed on file:

In the name and by the authority of the State of Indiana. Executive department.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

This is to certify that on the 17th day of January, 1905, James A. Hemenway was duly chosen by the legislature of the State of Indiana a Senator to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the unexpired portion of the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1903, and to fill the vacancy occasioned therein by the resignation of the Hon. Charles W. Fairbanks.

Witness, his excellency our governor, J. Frank Hanly, and our seal hereto affixed at the city of Indianapolis, Ind., this 18th day of February, A. D. 1905.

By the governor:

J. FRANK HANLY, Governor.
DANIEL E. STORMS, Secretary of State.

[SEAL.]

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, said:

Mr. President, before the credentials are placed on file, I want to call the attention of the Senate to what I think is a fatal objection to this certificate of election and to the election itself.

The certificate shows that that election occurred in the legislature of Indiana during the month of January, and that Mr. Hemenway was chosen to fill a vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Senator Fairbanks, to take effect on the 4th of March. Thus the legislature of Indiana has asserted its right to fill a vacancy not only when no vacancy exists, but when it was possible under the law that no vacancy ever would exist. The courts have more than once held—and no court has held it more distinctly than the supreme court of Indiana—that a resignation to take effect at a future day is not a resignation at all, but simply a notice of an intention to resign, such resignation becoming effective if it remains with the officer authorized to receive it up to the time it was to take effect. But all the courts that have discussed the matter—possibly, that is too broad—I will say a large majority of the courts that have discussed the matter, hold that until the date indicated in the resignation the officer my withdraw it, and may thus prevent a vacancy.

Of course nobody believes that the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. Fairbanks] will withdraw his resignation in order to remain amongst us instead of accepting the call to preside over us, but the probability or the improbability of the withdrawal of a resignation does not affect the law of the case.

I do not, however, intend to insist upon any reference of this particular credential, because the Senate seems to have considered and decided the very question in the Chilton case. There a Senator from my own State was appointed in April to fill a vacancy which, by the terms of the resignation, was to occur in June. His credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that committee reported unanimously that he was entitled to his seat. But the remarkable thing is that, although that report was prepared and presented by so great and so accurate a lawyer as the late Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, it does not appear to have taken into consideration at all the very vital question in the case. The report devotes itself almost entirely to a line of reasoning upon the right of executives and legislatures to fill a vacancy which is certain to occur, in advance of its occurrence. But the report in no part of it, as I now recall—it has been some time since I examined it; I did examine it closely at the time, and remember distinctly to have believed, although I had no interest in it, that the Senate was wrong—the report, so far as I can now recall, does not consider the question as to whether a resignation may be withdrawn or not, and yet the courts have held over and over again that it may be.

I venture to say that the records of Congress will verify my statement that Senators have telegraphed their resignations to the governors of their States and afterwards withdrawn them. But, recognizing that—although it did not seem to consider the vital point in the case—the report and the action of the [1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 2971, 2972.

Senate in the Chilton case are on all fours with the present case, I am not going to ask that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but content myself with simply saying that if it were an important question, I should not want it to be understood as concluded by the action of the Senate here.

Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, referred to the precedents in the cases of Clay and Dixon; and Mr. Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, referred to the report in the Chilton case, saying:

Mr. President, I was chairman of the committee when the report was made. This matter was referred more particularly to Senator Hoar, who made the report. I was somewhat embarrassed at the time by the question from the fact that in 1882 1 had resigned my seat in the Senate to take another place, and I had resigned to take effect when my successor should be elected or appointed. I had remained in the Senate until the governor of the State had appointed and sent here my successor to be sworn in, and then I took the other place.

When this question came before the Committee on Privileges and Elections it was a new question to me, although I knew that some Senators had raised the question, but not until after I had gone out of the Senate, and I did not take any part in that discussion or in the report except pro forma.

The credentials were placed on file.

On March 4, 1905,[1] at the organization of the Senate, Mr. Hemenway appeared and took the oath and his seat without question.

1230. A Member-elect may resign before taking the oath.

A Member-elect having resigned, the House decided that the person elected as his successor was entitled to the seat.

The House very early found the law of Parliament inapplicable in the case of a resignation.

On November 9, 1791[2] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the governor of Maryland, inclosing a letter to him from William Pinckney, a Member returned to serve in this House from Maryland, containing his resignation of that appointment; also a return of John Francis Mercer, elected a Member to serve in this House in place of the said William Pinckney. These papers were referred to the Committee on Elections.

This Congress had organized on October 24, 1791. Mr. Pinckney did not appear that day, nor thereafter, and so did not qualify as a Member.

On November 18 Mr. Samuel Livermore, of New Hampshire, submitted the report of the Committee on Elections, which found that Mr. Mercer was entitled to the seat.

On November 22 the report was debated at considerable length, the discussion relating to the status of the Member-elect before he takes his seat, and whether such an one may resign. It was urged on one side that the usage of the British Parliament, which did not permit resignations, should be adhered to; and on the other, that there being no analogy between the House of Representatives and Parliament, and the Constitution not prohibiting resignation, it should be concluded that a Member may resign. Doubt was expressed, however, as to whether the present case should be termed a resignation.

On November 23 the House adopted the resolution reported by the committee, which was as follows:

It appears that, at an election held for the State of Maryland, on October 1, 1790, William Pinckney was duly elected a Representative for that State, to Serve in the House of Representatives of the United States; that the certificate of his election has been duly transmitted by the executive thereof, and heretofore so reported by your committee; that, by letter dated September 26, 1791, directed to the governor and council of that State, William Pinckney resigned that appointment; and that, in consequence of such resignation, the executive issued a writ for an election, to supply a vacancy thereby occasioned, and have certified that John Francis Mercer was duly elected, by virtue of that writ, in pursuance of the law of the State of Maryland in that case provided.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that John Francis Mercer is entitled to take a seat in this House, as one of the Representatives for the State of Maryland, in the stead of William Pinckney.

1231. An instance of the resignation of a Member who had not taken his seat.—In the Thirty-third Congress, Mr. Zeno Scudder, of Massachusetts, did not appear in the House, being detained away by an accident, and resigned without having taken his seat. His resignation appears from the fact that his successor appeared on April 17, 1854,[1] and was qualified. The Journal does not seem to have any other mention of the fact of resignation except for a resolution presented on June 23 to pay to Mr. Scudder his per diem and mileage to the date of his resignation.

1232. A Member-elect's letter of resignation, transmitted to the Speaker before the election of that officer, was laid before the House after organization.—On December 2, 1901,[1] at the organization of the House, after the Speaker had been elected and the Members sworn in, the Speaker laid before the House the following letter:

NEW YORK, November 19, 1901.

SIR: I hereby resign the office of Representative in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States in and for the Seventh Congressional district of the State of New York; this resignation to take effect the 1st day of December, 1901.

Yours, respectfully,

NICHOLAS MULLER.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. Muller's name had been called on the roll call of States, but he did not answer.

1233. A Senator-elect has resigned before taking the oath.—On March 15, 1893,[3] Mr. Asahel C. Beckwith, of Wyoming, presented his credentials as Senator, being appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy. There being a question as to the legality of the appointment, the oath was not administered to Mr. Beckwith, but his credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On March 27 Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, reported from that committee a resolution declaring Mr. Beckwith "entitled to be admitted to a seat as a Senator from the State of Wyoming."

On August 7, before this resolution had been acted on, the Vice-President laid before the Senate the following communication, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

[The Beckwith Commercial Company, merchants. Incorporated 1887.]

EVANSTON, WYO., July 11, 1893.

DEAR SIR: Owing to a combination of circumstances over which I had no control, I have been obliged to hand in my resignation to Governor Osborne of my appointment as United States Senator from Wyoming.

I beg to remain, your obedient servant,

A. C. BECKWITH.

Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, Washington, D. C.

1234. An instance wherein one who had been declared elected to a seat in the House declined to accept it.

One who had been declared elected to a seat in the House having failed to appear, the House directed the State executive to be notified of its action.

On March 9, 1830,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Silas Wright, Jr., stating that he declined to accept the seat in the House lately occupied by George Fisher, to which he had been declared to be entitled as one of the Representatives from the State of New York.

The letter was read and laid on the table.

Mr. Wright's memorial asking to be admitted to a seat in place of Mr. Fisher, had been presented December 15, 1829,[2] and on February 5, 1830,[3] the House had declared him entitled to the seat.

On February 13,[4] Mr. Wright having failed to appear and qualify, the House directed the Speaker to inform the executive of New York that the seat lately occupied by Mr. Fisher had been awarded to Mr. Wright.

On December 6, 1830,[5] at the opening of the next session, there appeared "Jonah Sanford, in the place of Silas Wright, jr., who declined to take the seat awarded to him at the last session."

1235. Instance wherein a Senator-elect notified the Senate that he had formally declined to accept an appointment to be a Senator.—On January 5, 1881,[6] the Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter of James A. Garfield, as follows:

"MENTOR, OHIO, December 23, 1880.

"SIR: On the 13th and 14th days of January, 1880, the general assembly of the State of Ohio, pursuant to law, chose me to be a Senator in the Congress of the United States from said State for the term of six years, to begin on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1881.

"Understanding that the lawful evidence of that fact has been presented to the Senate and filed in its archives, I have the honor to inform the Senate that I have by letter dated December 23, A. D. 1880, and addressed to the governor and general assembly of the State of Ohio, formally declined to accept the said appointment and have renounced the same.

"I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. A. GARFIELD.

"To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, D. C."

This letter was read and ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

Mr. Garfield was a Member of the House of Representatives in the Forty-sixth Congress, and participated in the proceedings of the second session, which adjourned on June 16, 1880.[1]

In the summer of 1880 he was nominated for President of the United States and was elected to that office in November, 1880. When the third session of the Forty-sixth Congress met, on December 6, 1880,[2] Mr. Garfield did not appear; and on December 13[3] the credentials of Ezra B. Taylor, "to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of James A. Garfield," were presented.

The credentials of Mr. Garfield as a Senator-elect were presented in the Senate on May 7, 1880,[4] for the term to begin March 4, 1881.

Chapter XLII.

PUNISHMENT AND EXPULSION OF MEMBERS.[1]

1236. The Constitution provides that the House may punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and expel a Member by a two-thirds vote.— The Constitution in Article I, section 4, provides:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

1237. Provisions of the parliamentary law in cases where charges arise against a Member from report of a committee on examination of witnesses in the House.—In Jefferson's Manual[3] certain principles are laid down regarding the conduct of Members:

No Member may be present when a bill or any business concerning himself is debating; nor is any Member to speak to the merits of it till he withdraws. (2 Hats., 219.) The rule is, that if a charge against a Member arise out of a report of a committee or examination of witnesses in the House, as the Member knows from that to what points he is to direct his exculpation, he may be heard to those points before any question is moved or stated against him. He is then to be heard and withdraw before any question is moved. But if the question itself is the charge, as for breach of order or matter arising in the debate, then the charge must be stated—that is, the question must be moved—himself heard, and then to withdraw. (2 Hats., 121, 122.)

Where the private interests of a Member are concerned in a bill or question he is to withdraw. And where such an interest has appeared his voice has been disallowed, even after a division.[4] In a case so contrary, not only to the laws of decency, but to the fundamental principle of the social compact, which denies to any man to be a judge in his own cause, it is for the honor of the House that this rule of immemorial observance should be strictly adhered to. (2 Hats., 119, 121; 6 Grey, 368.)

[4] See sections 5949–5963 of Volume V of this work for interpretation of the rule relating to personal interest.

1238. Proceedings when it is necessary to put a Member under arrest, or when on public inquiry matter arises affecting a Member.—Section III of Jefferson's Manual, on the subject of privilege, provides:

When it is found necessary for the public service to put a Member under arrest, or when, on any public inquiry, matter comes out which may lead to affect the person of a Member, it is the practice immediately to acquaint the House, that they may know the reasons for such a proceeding, and take such steps as they think proper. (2 Hats., 259.) Of which see many examples. (ib., 256, 257, 258.) But the communication is subsequent to the arrest. (1 Blackst., 167.)

1239. A Member having resigned, and expulsion therefore not being proposed, the House adopted a resolution censuring his conduct.—On February 28, 1870,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. John T. Deweese, of North Carolina, informing the House through the Speaker that he had, by letter and telegraph, tendered his resignation as a Member of the Forty-first Congress to the governor of North Carolina. The letter was read and laid on the table.

On March 1, Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That John T. Deweese, late a Representative in Congress from the Third Congressional district of North Carolina, did make an appointment to the United States Naval Academy in violation of law, and that such appointment was influenced by pecuniary considerations, and that his conduct in the premises has been such as to show him unworthy of a seat in the House of Representatives, and is therefore condemned as conduct unworthy of a Representative of the people.

Mr. Logan explained that the committee would have reported a resolution of expulsion had not the House by its action in a previous case decided against expelling a Member who had resigned.

The resolution was then agreed to, yeas 170, nays 0.

1240. A resolution of censure should not apply to more than one Member.—On February 27, 1873,[7] Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, proposed a resolution censuring several Members for alleged connection with the Credit Mobilier.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, raised the question of order that it was not in order to include in a resolution of censure more than one name.

The Speaker[3] said:

Upon all questions affecting the personal or representative character of a Member the gentleman from New York will himself see the propriety of each Member standing absolutely on his own merits.[4]

1241. Instance of the presentation in the Senate of a petition for the expulsion of a Senator.—On Friday, February 9, 1906,[1] in the Senate the Vice President presented the petition of C. W. Post, a citizen of the United States, praying for the expulsion from the United States Senate of Thomas C. Platt, a Senator from the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

This petition was signed by "C. W. Post" before a notary public, whose signature and seal appear thereon.

1242. The Senate declined to investigate charges against the Vice President, it being urged that he was subject to impeachment proceedings only.—On January 28, 1873,[1] the Vice-President (Mr. Colfax) asked the Senate for a committee to investigate certain charges made against his character. The proposition was opposed by Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, on the ground that the Vice-President was not a Member of the Senate who might be expelled, but an officer of the Government, who should be proceeded against by process of impeachment, if at all. The motion for the appointment of the committee was not agreed to.

1243. In a single instance the Senate annulled its action in expelling a Member.—On March 3, 1877,[2] the Senate annulled the action whereby on July 11, 1861, William K. Sebastian was expelled. The resolution of annulment was adopted on report from the Committee of Privileges and Elections, which held that the Senate possessed this right of review.

1244. Parliamentary law as to offenses committed by a Member in the House, especially in debate.—Section III of Jefferson's Manual, on the subject of privilege, provides:

> If an offense be committed by a Member in the House, of which the House has cognizance, it is an infringement of their right for any person or court to take notice of it till the House has punished the offender, or referred him to a due course. (Lex Parl., 63.)
> Privilege is in the power of the House, and is a restraint to the proceeding of inferior courts, but not of the House itself. (2 Nalson, 450; 2 Grey, 399.) For whatever is spoken in the House is subject to the censure of the House; and offenses of this kind have been severely punished by calling the person to the bar to make submission, committing him to the Tower, expelling the House, etc. (Seeb., 72; L. Parl., c. 22.)

1245. The House considered but did not act on propositions to expel or censure a Member who had published in a newspaper an article alleged to be in violation of the privileges of the House.—On February 21,1839,[3] Mr. Sergeant S. Prentiss, of Mississippi, rising to a question of privilege, moved the following resolutions:

> Resolved, That this House proceed forthwith to inquire—
> First. Whether Alexander Duncan, a Member of this House from the State of Ohio, be the author of a certain publication, or publications, under his name, in relation to the proceedings of this House and certain Members thereof, published in the Globe newspaper of the 19th instant;
> Second. Whether, by said publication or publications, the said Alexander Duncan has not been guilty of a violation of the privileges of this House; of an offense against its peace, dignity, and good order; and of such grossly indecent, ungentlemanly, disgraceful, and dishonorable misconduct, as renders him unworthy of a seat in this House, and justly liable to expulsion from the same.

After debate, Mr. Prentiss offered the following as a modification of his proposition:

> That, as Alexander Duncan has avowed himself the author of the publication in the Globe, he be, and is hereby, expelled from the House.

Debate arose over this proposition, Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, calling attention to the fact that it involved the constitutional power of the House to expel a Member. Finding opposition, Mr. Prentiss withdrew the proposition to expel.

On the succeeding day, Mr. Waddy Thompson, jr., of South Carolina, proposed a substitute, which was accepted by Mr. Prentiss, in the form of a preamble reciting the article from the Globe in full, with other matters pertinent to the controversy, and concluding with a resolution that Mr. Duncan had subjected himself to the just censure of the House, and should be reprimanded by the Speaker.

After debate, Mr. Sherrod Williams, of Kentucky, moved that the matter be laid on the table, and the motion was agreed to, yeas 117, nays 95.

1246. A Member was censured for presenting a resolution insulting to the House.

A Member against whom a resolution of censure was pending participated in the debate.

On May 14, 1866,[1] Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Resolved, That John W. Chanler, a Representative from the Seventh district of the State of New York, by presenting this day a resolution to be considered by this House, in the following terms:

"Resolved, That the independent, patriotic, and constitutional course of the President of the United States in seeking to protect by the veto power the rights of the people of this Union against the wicked and revolutionary acts of a few malignant and mischievous men meets with the approval of this House and deserves the cordial support of all loyal citizens of the United States," has thereby attempted a gross insult to the House, and is hereby censured therefor.

After debate, in the course of which Mr. Chanler spoke in his own behalf, the question was taken and there were yeas 72, nays 30, and so the resolution was agreed to.

1247. A Member who had used offensive words against the character of the House, and who declined to explain when called to order, was censured by order of the House.—On January 15, 1868,[2] during the consideration of the bill (H. R. 439) supplementary to the act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, when Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, was called to order for the use of the following words:

A monstrosity, a measure the most infamous of the many infamous acts of this infamous Congress.

On demand of Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, the words were taken down, and the Speaker[3] decided that they were not in order.

Mr. Wood having declined to explain, the question was put: Shall the Member be permitted to proceed? and decided in the negative, yeas 40, nays 108.

Thereupon, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Fernando Wood, a Member of this House from the State of New York, having this day used in debate, upon the floor of the House, the following words: "A monstrosity, a measure the most infamous of the many infamous acts of this infamous Congress," deserves therefor the censure of this House, and the Speaker is hereby directed forthwith to pronounce that censure at the bar of the House.

[3] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker.

A motion to lay on the table having been decided in the negative, the resolution was agreed to under the operation of the previous question, yeas 114, nays 39.

Thereupon Mr. Wood appeared at the bar of the House, and the Speaker said:

Mr. Fernando Wood: May's Treatise on the Law, Privileges, and Usages of Parliament, from which we derive the fundamental principles of our parliamentary law, in speaking of occurrences like that which has caused the vote the result of which has just been announced, thus speaks:

"It is obviously unbecoming to permit offensive expressions against the character and conduct of Parliament to be used without rebuke; for they are not only a contempt of that high court, but are calculated to degrade the legislature in the estimation of the people. If directed against the other House and passed over without censure, they would appear to implicate one House in discourtesy to the other; if against the House in which the words are spoken, it would be impossible to overlook the disrespect of one of its own Members. Words of this objectionable character are never spoken but in anger; and when called to order the Member must see the error into which he has been misled, and retract or explain his words and make a satisfactory apology. Should he fail to satisfy the House in this manner he will be punished by a reprimand or commitment."

Having violated this universally recognized rule of parliamentary law in all deliberative bodies, the House has ordered its censure to be pronounced upon you by its presiding officer. This duty having been performed, you will resume your seat.

1248. A Member having used words insulting to the Speaker, the House, on a subsequent day and after other business had intervened, censured the offender.

An insult to the Speaker has been held to raise a question of privilege not governed by the ordinary rule about taking down disorderly words as soon as uttered.

When the House was considering a resolution censuring a Member for an alleged insult to the Speaker, the Speaker called another Member to the chair.

On July 9, 1832,[1] during debate on a question of order, Mr. William Stanbery, of Ohio, in criticizing a ruling of the Chair, said:

I defy any gentleman to point me to a single decision to the contrary, until you presided over this body. And let me say that I have heard the remark frequently made, that the eyes of the Speaker are too frequently turned from the chair you occupy toward the White House.

Mr. Stanbery being called to order by Mr. Franklin E. Plummer, of Mississippi, sat down; and the debate proceeded.

The pending question being disposed of, Mr. Thomas F. Foster, of Georgia, moved that the rules be suspended in order to enable the House to consider[2] the following resolution:

Resolved, That the insinuations made in debate this morning by the honorable William Stanbery, a Member of this House from Ohio, charging the Speaker of House with shaping his course, as this presiding officer of the House, with the view to the obtainment of office from the President of the United States, was an indignity to the Speaker and the House, and merits the decided censure of this House.

The vote being taken, there were yeas 95, nays 62; so the House refused to suspend the rules.

[1] First session Twenty-second Congress, Journal, p. 1113; Debates, pp. 3876, 3877, 3887.

[2] The pressure of business had at this date become such as not to permit the regular order to be interrupted except by unanimous consent or by a vote to suspend the rules; but the system had not been instituted yet of admitting such resolutions as matters of privilege—or at least not in cases of this kind.

On July 10,[1] when the States were called for the presentation of resolutions,[2] Mr. James Bates, of Maine, presented the resolution again, with the slight modification of "words spoken" instead of "insinuations made."

Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, made the point of order against the resolution that the words of the gentleman from Ohio, were not taken down at the time they were spoken, nor at the close of the speech of the Member; because other business had occurred since the imputed insinuations were made; and because a day had elapsed since the words were used, without any action or proceeding of the House in relation thereto. Jefferson's Manual was quoted in support of this contention.[3]

The Speaker pro tempore[4] decided that the resolution was in order. This was a question concerning the privileges of the House; therefore the rules of ordinary debate did not apply.

Mr. Mercer appealed; but pending the discussion the hour expired, and although Mr. George MeDuffie, of South Carolina, insisted that the pending question had precedence, because it related to the dignity and privileges of the House, the House voted to proceed to the orders of the day. On the next day, however, when the question arose again, the Speaker pro tempore corrected his decision of the day before, and decided that a question of order involving the privileges of the House took precedence of all other business.

On July 11[5] debate on the appeal of Mr. Mercer was resumed. Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, said that this seemed to be a case of punishment for disorderly words spoken in debate. But in such a proceeding the words should be taken down, which had not been done in this case, although the Manual specifically provided such a course of procedure. That course was founded in reason and justice, and was, as expressly declared, "for the common security of all."

The decision of the Chair, on Mr. Mercer's appeal, was finally sustained, yeas 82, nays 48.

The question recurring on agreeing to the resolution of censure, Mr. Stanbery justified what he said as parliamentary by quoting Lord Chatham's words, which had passed without a call to order in open Parliament, "the eyes of the Speaker of that House were too often turned toward St. James's."

Mr. Samuel F. Vinton, of Ohio, raised a question as to whether or not interrogatories should not be propounded by the Chair to the Member about to be censured, to ascertain whether he admitted or denied the fact charged in the resolution; but the Speaker declined to do so.

The question being taken,[6] the resolution of censure was agreed to, yeas 93, nays 44.

Several Members asked to be excused from voting, on the ground that they had not heard the words spoken by Mr. Stanbery, but the House declined to excuse them. Mr. Adams, however, refused to vote.

1249. A Member in debate having declared the words of another Member "a base lie," the Speaker declared the words out of order and the House inflicted censure on the offender.

The Speaker having, by order of the House, censured a Member, the words of censure were spread on the Journal.

On January 26, 1867,[1] during debate on the bill (H. R. 543) for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, Mr. John W. Hunter, of New York, was called to order by Mr. Ralph Hill, of Indiana, for the use of the following words: "I say that, so far as I am concerned, it is a base lie," referring to a statement by Mr. James M. Ashley, of Ohio.

The Speaker[2] decided the words out of order.

Thereupon Mr. Hill submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the gentleman from New York, Hon. Mr. Hunter, in declaring during debate in the House, in reference to the assertions of the gentleman from Ohio, Hon. Mr. Ashley, "I say that, so far as I am concerned, it is a base lie," has transgressed the rules of this body, and that he be censured for the same by the Speaker.

The resolution having been agreed to—yeas 77, nays 33—Mr. Hunter appeared at the bar of the House and the Speaker administered the censure. This censure by the Speaker appears in full in the Journal.

1250. A Member having explained that by disorderly words which had been taken down he had intended no disrespect to the House, a resolution of censure was withdrawn.—On June 1, 1860,[3] on the request of Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, the following words spoken in debate were taken down:

By Mr. CHARLES R. TRAIN, of Massachusetts: "I am not in the habit of troubling the House much, and I never insist upon speaking when I am clearly out of order. I should consider myself guilty of gross impropriety, not only as a Member of the House, but as a gentleman, if I insisted upon addressing the Chair, and interpolating my remarks when I had no right to the floor."

By Mr. GEORGE S. HOUSTON, of Alabama: "I wish to know if the gentleman from Massachusetts applied that remark to me?"

By Mr. TRAIN: "I mean exactly what I did say, and I stand by what I said."

By Mr. HOUSTON: "I mean to say that if he applied that remark to me, he is a disgraced liar and scoundrel."[4]

Mr. Sherman submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Houston, be censured for disorderly words spoken in debate.

During the discussion of the resolution the point of order was made that the gentleman from Ohio did not call the gentleman from Alabama to order before asking that the words be taken down.

The Speaker overruled the point of order.

[5] William Pennington, of New Jersey, Speaker.

A motion was then made to amend the resolution by including the name of Mr. Train. Finally, after motions to lay the resolution on the table had been decided in the negative, and after the previous question had been ordered on the resolution and amendment, Mr. Sherman withdrew his resolution by permission of the House, and Mr. Houston made an explanation that he had intended no disrespect to the House.

1251. After abandoning a proposition to expel, the House arrested and censured a Member for gross personalities aimed at another Member, and for deception of the Speaker when the latter had proposed to prevent the utterances.—On February 4, 1875,[1] the House was considering the motion of Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, to recommit the bill (H. R. 7196) to protect all persons in their civil and political rights.

Pending the debate, Mr. John Young Brown, of Kentucky, was called to order for words used in debate, and the following were taken down:[2]

Now again that accusation has come from one—I speak not of men but of language, and within the rules of the House—that accusation against that people has come from one who is outlawed in his own home from respectable society; whose name is synonymous with falsehood; who is the champion, and has been on all occasions, of fraud; who is the apologist of thieves; who is such a prodigy of vice and meannesses that to describe him would sicken imagination and exhaust invective.

In Scotland years ago there was a man whose trade was murder, and who earned a livelihood by selling the bodies of his victims for gold. He linked his name to his crime, and to-day throughout the world it is known as "Burking."

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to be referring in this language to a Member of the House?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I am describing an individual who is in my mind's eye.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to refer to a Member of the House.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I call no names.

This man's name was linked to his crime, and to-day throughout the world it is known as "Burking." If I wished to describe all that was pusillanimous in war, inhuman in peace, forbidden in morals, and infamous in politics, I should call it "Butlerism."

Mr. Robert S. Hale, of New York, then offered the following:

Resolved, That the Member from Kentucky, Mr. John Young Brown, in the language used by him upon the floor and taken down at the Clerk's desk, as well as in the prevarication to the Speaker, by which he was enabled to complete the utterance of the language, has been guilty of the violation of the privileges of this House and merits the severe censure of the House for the same.

Resolved, That the said John Young Brown be now brought to the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and be there publicly censured by the Speaker in the name of the House.

Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, moved to amend by substituting a resolution of expulsion, but after debate withdrew it, saying it was evident that it could not receive a two-thirds vote.

Thereupon, after debate, the resolution of censure was agreed to, yeas 161, nays 79.

Thereupon the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar having in custody Mr. Brown, and the Speaker pronounced the censure of the House.[3] He was then discharged from custody.

[3] The Journal (p. 394) gives the remarks of the Speaker in full.

1252. It has been held in order to censure a Member for words alleged to be treasonable, even though they were not taken down at the time they were uttered.—On April 12, 1864,[1] the House was considering a preamble and resolution reciting that Alexander Long, a Representative from Ohio, had in Committee of the Whole declared himself in favor of recognizing the independence of the so-called Confederacy, thereby violating the oath required of all Members of the House, and providing for his expulsion from the House.

To this Mr. John M. Broomall, of Pennsylvania, offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, declaring that the said Long had by declarations in the national capitol and by publications in New York, shown himself disloyal and negligent of his oath by favoring the recognition of the so-called Confederacy, and then resolving as follows:

Resolved, That the said Alexander Long, a Representative from the Second district of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, declared to be an unworthy Member of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Speaker shall read these resolutions to the said Alexander Long during the session of the House.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, made the point of order that the amendment was out of order, on the ground that the words spoken by Mr. Long were not taken down in writing at the time of their utterance, nor was exception taken to them either in Committee of the Whole or in the House until after another Member had spoken and other business had intervened.

The Speaker pro tempore[2] overruled the point of order and decided that the amendment proposed was in order.

Mr. Eldridge having appealed, the decision of the Chair was sustained on the succeeding day, yeas 79, nays 66.

1253. After considering the question of expulsion, the House censured a Member for words alleged to be treasonable.

A Member, against whom a resolution of censure was pending, addressed the House without permission being asked or given.

Calling a Member to the Chair, Mr. Speaker Colfax offered from the floor a resolution for the expulsion of a Member.

On April 9, 1864,[3] Mr. Edward H. Rollins, of New Hampshire, was called to the chair, and the Speaker[4] as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas on the 8th of April, 1864, when the House of Representatives was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Alexander Long, a Representative from the Second district of Ohio, declared himself in favor of recognizing the independence and nationality of the so-called Confederacy, now in arms against the Union; and whereas the said so-called Confederacy thus sought to be recognized and established on the ruins of a dissolved or destroyed Union has as its chief officers, civil and military, those who have added perjury to their treason, and who seek to obtain success for their parricidal efforts by the killing of the loyal soldiers of the nation, who are seeking to save it from destruction; and whereas the oath required of all Members, and taken by the said Alexander Long on the first day of the present Congress, declares "that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States,"[1] thereby declaring that such conduct is regarded as inconsistent with membership in the Congress of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That Alexander Long, a Representative from the Second district of Ohio, having, on the 8th of April, 1864, declared himself in favor of recognizing the independence and nationality of the so-called Confederacy, now in arms against the Union, and thereby "giving aid, countenance, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States," is hereby expelled.

The resolution and preamble were debated at length, it being urged against them that the words actually spoken did not bear the interpretation put upon them, and that the expulsion of a Member for speech on the floor of the House was against the Constitution and the spirit of the institutions of the country. On the other hand, it was urged that the whole tenor of the speech had been such as to give encouragement to the enemies of the Government and make its author unworthy to sit in the House.

On April 14, on the suggestion of Mr. John M. Broomall, of Pennsylvania, who had proposed an amendment to the same effect, Mr. Colfax modified the resolution, as follows:

Whereas Alexander Long, a Representative from the Second district of Ohio, by his open declarations in the National Capitol and publications in the city of New York, has shown himself to be in favor of a recognition of the so-called Confederacy now trying to establish itself upon the ruins of our country, thereby giving aid and comfort to the enemy in that destructive purpose—aid to armed traitors in erecting an illegal government within our borders—comfort to them by assurances of their success and affirmations of the justice of their cause; and whereas such conduct is at the same time evidence of disloyalty and inconsistent with his oath of office and his duty as a Member of this body: Therefore,

Revolved, That the said Alexander Long, a Representative from the Second district of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, declared to be an unworthy Member of the House of Representatives.

Revolved, That the Speaker shall read these resolutions to the said Alexander Long during the session of the House.

The debate continuing, Mr. Long addressed the House, rising in his place as a matter of course, and obtaining no permission to be heard.

A motion to lay the preamble and resolution on the table was decided in the negative, yeas 70, nays 80.

The first resolution was then agreed to, yeas 80, nays 70.

Then, by a vote of yeas 71, nays 70, the House agreed to the motion of Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, that the second resolution be laid on the table.

The preamble was then agreed to, yeas 78, nays 63.

1254. For words alleged to be treasonable, the House censured a Member after a motion to expel him had failed.

A proposition for the punishment of a Member is presented as a question of privilege.

On April 9, 1864,[2] Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Hon. Benjamin G. Harris, a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the State of Maryland, has, upon this day used the following language, to wit: "The South asked you to let them live in peace. But no; you said you would bring them into subjection. That is not done yet; and God Almighty grant that it never may be. I hope that you will never subjugate the South;" and whereas such language is treasonable and a gross contempt of this House: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the said Benjamin G. Harris be expelled from this House.

The vote being taken, there appeared, yeas 84, nays 58; and so, two-thirds not concurring, the resolution was not agreed to.

Thereupon Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Resolved, That Benjamin G. Harris, a Representative from the Fifth district of the State of Maryland, having spoken words this day in debate manifestly tending and designed to encourage the existing rebellion and the public enemies of this nation, is declared to be an unworthy Member of this House and is hereby severely censured.

After the disposal of several intervening motions, the question recurred on the resolution, which was agreed to, yeas 98, nays 20.

1255. An attempt to censure a Member for presenting a petition alleged to be treasonable failed after long debate.

Discussion as to whether or not the principles of the procedure of the courts should be followed in action for censure.

An instance wherein a Member against whom a resolution of censure was pending was allowed to insert in the Journal his demand for a constitutional trial.

It is not the duty of the Speaker to construe the Constitution as affecting proposed legislation.

On January 24, 1842,[1] Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of 46 citizens of Haverhill, in the State of Massachusetts, praying Congress immediately to adopt measures peaceably to dissolve the Union of these States, for three reasons, which were set forth in the petition. Mr. Adams moved that the petition be referred to a select committee, with instructions to the committee to report to the House the reasons why the prayer thereof should not be granted.

Pending proceedings on the reception of this petition Mr. Thomas W. Gilmer, of Virginia, as a question of privilege, presented the following:

Resolved, That in presenting for the consideration of the House a petition for the dissolution of the Union, the Member from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) has justly incurred the censure of this House.

In the course of the consideration of this resolution, and on January 25,[2] Mr. Thomas F. Marshall, of Kentucky, proposed to amend the pending resolution by substituting the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Federal Constitution is a permanent form of government, and of perpetual obligation until altered or modified in the mode pointed out by that instrument, and the Members of this House deriving their political character and powers from the same are sworn to support it, and the dissolution of the Union necessarily implies the destruction of that instrument, the overthrow of the American Republic, and the extinction of our national existence, a proposition, therefore, to the Representatives of the people to dissolve the organic law framed by their constituents, and to support which they are commanded by those constituents to be sworn before they can enter upon the execution of the political powers created by it and intrusted to them, is a high breach of privilege, a contempt offered to this House, a direct proposition to the legislature, and each Member of it, to commit perjury, and involves necessarily, in its execution and its consequences, the destruction of our country and the crime of high treason:

Resolved, therefore, That the Hon. John Q. Adams, Member from Massachusetts, in presenting, for the consideration of the House of Representatives of the United States a petition praying for the dissolution of the Union, has offered the deepest indignity to the House of which he is a Member, an insult to the people of the United States, of which that House is the legislative organ, and will, if this outrage be permitted to pass unrebuked and unpunished, have disgraced his country, through their Representatives, in the eyes of the whole world.

Resolved, further, That the aforesaid John Q. Adams, for this insult, the first of the kind ever offered to the Government, and for the wound which he has permitted to be aimed, through his instrumentality, at the Constitution and existence of his country, the peace, the security, and liberty of the people of these States, might well be held to merit expulsion from the national councils; and the House deem it an act of grace and mercy when they only inflict upon him the severest censure for conduct so utterly unworthy of his past relations to the State and his present position. This they hereby do for the maintenance of their own purity and dignity, for the rest, they turn him over to his own conscience and the indignation of all true American citizens.

Motions to lay the subject on the table having been decided in the negative, and the debate having proceeded, on January 26[1] Mr. Adams raised the following question of order:

Has the House the right to entertain the resolution, because it charges him with crimes of which the House has no jurisdiction; and if the House entertain the jurisdiction, they deprive him of rights secured to him by the Constitution of the United States?

The Speaker[2] declined to decide the point submitted, it being a question which it was the peculiar province of the House to decide.

Mr. Marshall, in support of his proposition, referred to the precedent of John Smith in the Senate in 1807.

The question of consideration was put to determine whether the House would consider the matter, and it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 118, nays 75.

Mr. Adams then demanded the benefit of the sixth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and required that his demand be entered on the Journal. Without any vote being taken, the article was entered and appears on the journal as follows:

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

After further debate, and a further refusal of the House to lay the subject on the table, on February 2[3] Mr. Adams, as a part of his defense, presented four resolutions calling on heads of departments and the President to furnish certain specified information on subjects relating to slavery and the rule of the House excluding petitions for the abolition of slavery.

Mr. Gilmer objected to the reception of the resolutions as contrary to the regular order of business.

[2] John White, of Kentucky, Speaker.

[3] Journal, pp. 298–306; Globe, pp. 200–203.

The Speaker decided to receive them, as connected with the subject before the House.

The first resolution was agreed to, yeas 97, nays 96, the second, yeas 95, nays 84; but the third and fourth, relating to action of the President of the United States with regard to the rule relating to petitions, were laid on the table, yeas 111, nays 64, although Mr. Adams declared the information which they called for most important for his defense.

The debate then continued, Mr. Adams contending that as he was to be tried for crime he should have time and means to make his defense, and Mr. Marshall urging that the House had a right to censure, irrespective of the relations of the offense to the courts of justice.

On this day also Mr. George W. Summers, of Virginia, proposed the following proposition:

That a select committee be appointed to take into consideration the contempt and breach of privilege alleged to have been committed by John Quincy Adams, a Member of this House, in presenting a petition on the 24th day of January last purporting to be signed by certain citizens of Massachusetts praying that Congress should take suitable measures for the peaceable dissolution of the Union, and that it be the duty of said committee to consider and report whether any, and, if any, what further proceedings should be taken by the House in the matter of said alleged contempt and breach of privilege; and if the said committee shall be of opinion that any action on the part of the House in relation to the presentation of said petition by the said John Quincy Adams be proper and expedient, then that the said committee do further report what, in their opinion, will be the best and most appropriate mode of conducting the proceedings of the House in relation thereto, having respect to the powers and duty of the House, the precedents of parliamentary usage, and the rights of the Member accused.

The debate proceeded, Mr. Adams contending that, although he admitted the force of the precedent in the case of John Smith and realized the discretionary power of the House to try him on a question of privilege, the House should either send him before a court of justice or try him themselves, before proceeding to pass judgment upon him.

Finally, on February 7,[1] on motion of Mr. John M. Botts, of Virginia, who said that the House and the country were anxious to get rid of the subject, the whole matter was laid on the table, by a vote of 106 yeas, 93 nays.

1256. The House censured Joshua R. Giddings for presentation of a paper deemed incendiary and without hearing him in defense.

Instance wherein a Member resigned his seat, sought reelection, and appeared again to be sworn in during the same Congress.

The previous question applies to a question of privilege as to any other question.

On March 21, 1842,[2] Mr. John B. Weller, of Ohio, moved the following:

Whereas the honorable Joshua R. Giddings, the Member from the Sixteenth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, has this day presented to this House a series of resolutions touching the most important interests connected with a large portion of the Union, now a subject of negotiation between the United States and Great Britain of the most delicate nature, the result of which may eventually involve these two nations, and perhaps the whole civilized world, in war; and

[2] Second session Twenty-seventh Congress, Journal, pp. 573, 576; Cong. Globe, pp. 343, 345.

Whereas it is the duty of every good citizen, and particularly the duty of every selected agent and representative of the people, to discountenance all efforts to create excitement, dissatisfaction, and division among the people of the United States at such a time and under such circumstances, which is the only effect to be accomplished by the introduction of sentiments before the legislative body of the country hostile to the grounds assumed by the high functionary having in charge this important and delicate trust; and

Whereas mutiny and murder are therein justified and approved in terms shocking to all sense of law, order, and humanity: Therefore

Resolved, That this House hold the conduct of said Member as altogether unwarranted and unwarrantable, and deserving the severe condemnation of the people of this country, and of this body in particular.

Mr. Weller asked for the previous question, pending which Mr. Giddings inquired of the Chair whether the effect of that question, if sustained, would be to preclude him from giving his reasons why the resolution should not pass.

The Speaker decided that if Mr. Giddings desired to be heard in his defense, and claimed it as a matter of privilege, he would not entertain the previous question at this time, as it would cut him off from his right of defense.

Mr. Giddings then moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Thursday week next, to the end that he might prepare for his defense.

Debate arising on this motion, Mr. Millard Fillmore, of New York, submitted that debate was not in order, and that the motion for the previous question should be now entertained by the Speaker.

The Speaker [1] then decided that, in his judgment, the matter before the House was a question of privilege, and that on a question involving the privileges of a Member of the House the previous question could not be applied, and consequently that the motion for postponement was open to debate.

From this decision Mr. Fillmore appealed, and the House overruled the Speaker, 118 nays to 64 yeas.[2]

On March 22 the preamble and resolution were agreed to, the resolution by a vote of 125 yeas to 69 nays; the preamble by a vote of yeas 119, nays 66.[3]

On March 23 Mr. Giddings resigned his seat in the House, and on May 5 again appeared, having been elected his own successor, and was qualified and took his seat.[4]

1257. Unparliamentary words spoken in Committee of the Whole are taken down and read, whereupon the committee rises and reports them to the House.

Members who had indulged in unparliamentary language in Committee of the Whole escaped the censure of the House by making apologies.

On June 14, 1882,[5] in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the following words between Messrs. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, and John D. White, of Kentucky, were taken down on demand of Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana:

[1] John White, of Kentucky, Speaker.

Mr. WHITE. It is merely a question of veracity. I heard him make the statement myself.
Mr. KELLEY. And I denounce the statement as the ravings of a maniac or a deliberate lie.
Mr. WHITE. The gentleman may be scoundrel enough to make that statement.

The Chairman [1] directed the words to be read to the committee as taken down, and then under the rule caused the committee to rise and reported the words to the House.

The report having been made to the House, Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, offered a preamble reciting the words taken down, and continuing:

And whereas such language is disorderly and destructive of the dignity and honor of the House: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the Speaker do reprimand said Members for using said disorderly words in derogation of the good order and decorum of the House.

Thereupon, during debate, both Messrs. Kelley and White made explanations and apologies to the House, and the resolution and preamble were withdrawn.

1258. On March 1, 1883,[2] in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, during consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, Mr. John Van Voorhis, of New York, criticized a certain item as one that no one would have ever heard of if the chairman of the committee reporting the bill were not from a certain portion of the country, and said:

It is so outrageous, so damnable, that nobody but a gambler or cutthroat would have thought of tacking such a thing as that to such a bill as this.

The words were taken down, on motion of a Member, and the committee rose and reported them to the House.

Thereupon Mr. Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, proposed a preamble reciting the words reported and this resolution:

Therefore resolved, That for the use of said language said Van Voorhis is expelled from this House.

Pending debate Mr. Van Voorhis, on motion of Mr. McLane and on vote of the House, was allowed to explain. Mr. Van Voorhis then said that he did not mean to apply the words to the chairman of the committee, and that he regretted that exception should be taken to them, or that he should be under the necessity of withdrawing them. He did in fact ask leave to withdraw the words.

Mr. McLane thereupon withdrew the preamble and resolution.

Mr. Hilary A. Herbert, of Alabama, however, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Member from New York, Mr. John Van Voorhis, in the language used by him upon the floor and taken down by the Clerk's desk, has been guilty of a violation of the privileges of this House and merits the severe censure of the House for the same.

Resolved, That the said John Van Voorhis be now brought to the bar of the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms and be there publicly censured by the Speaker in the name of the House.

Mr. Van Voorhis stated that he apologized to the House for the use of the language.

[2] Second session Forty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 533; Record, pp. 3540–3543.

Thereupon a motion to lay the resolutions on the table was decided in the negative, and then, on the question of agreeing to them, there were ayes 66, noes 78. So the resolutions were not agreed to.

1259. For unparliamentary language in Committee of the Whole, William D. Bynum was censured by the House.

Unparliamentary language used in Committee of the Whole was taken down and read at the Clerk's desk, and thereupon the committee voted to rise and report it to the House.

The Committee of the Whole having reported language alleged to be unparliamentary, a resolution of censure was held to be in order without a prior decision of the Speaker that the words were, in fact, out of order.

The House having agreed to a resolution of censure, and the Member being brought to the bar by the Sergeant-at-Arms to be censured, it was held that he might not then be heard.

Form of censure administered by the Speaker to a Member by order of the House.

On May 17, 1890,[1] during the consideration of the tariff bill (H. R. 9416) in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. William D. Bynum, of Indiana, used these words:

> I desire simply to say that I did the other day, knowing full well the meaning of the words and that I was responsible for them, denounce Mr. Campbell as a liar and a perjurer. I want to say that I accept and am willing to believe that I have as great confidence in the character of Mr. Campbell as I have in the character of the gentleman who makes this attack upon me.

On the request of Mr. Byron M. Cutcheon, of Michigan, the chairman[2] directed the words to be taken down and read at the Clerk's desk.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Cutcheon, the committee rose, and the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had directed him to report to the House the following language, used by Hon. William D. Bynum in the course of debate, etc.

The Speaker[3] directed the Clerk to read sections 4 and 5 of Rule XIV,[4] which was done.

Thereupon Mr. W. C. P. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, made the point of order that "a Member can not be put on his defense except under the circumstances stated in the rule; that the record does not show that the words were spoken just before the committee rose, or at any particular time named in the record; so that the Speaker is assuming as a matter of fact that which the record does not show."

The Speaker overruled the point of order on the ground that the Chair can only pass upon the matter as reported to him by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and the presumption is that it is properly reported.

Mr. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, appealed from the decision of the Chair. Pending which Mr. Isaac S. Struble, of Iowa, moved to lay the appeal on the table; and the question being put, Shall the said appeal lie on the table? it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 126, nays 101. So the appeal was laid on the table.

And then Mr. Cutcheon submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Member from Indiana, Mr. William D. Bynum, in the language used by him in Committee of the Whole House and taken down and reported to the House and read at the Clerk's desk, has been guilty of a violation of the rules and privileges of the House, and merits the censure of the House for the same.

Resolved, That said William D. Bynum be now brought to the bar of the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and there the censure of the House be administered by the Speaker.

And the House having proceeded to their consideration, Mr. Cutcheon demanded the previous question.

Pending this, Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made the point of order against the resolutions on the ground that "no one has suggested that this language is out of order; and further, that the Speaker has not decided it to be unparliamentary language, and that the House has not been permitted to pass upon the naked question; and after the House shall pass upon it that it is the privilege of the Member to withdraw the language used or to make any explanation he desires before the House can proceed to pass such a resolution."

After debate, the Speaker overruled the point of order, making use of the following language:

The House will perceive at once from what has been stated how impossible it is for the Chair in such a case as this to pass upon the question of fact. The House can pass upon the question of fact in its vote upon the resolution; and the argument of the gentleman from Alabama will be very properly addressed to the House and to its discretion on the question of the passage of the resolution.

As to the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer], the Chair finds not merely the precedent which has been cited by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Cutcheon], but also the following, on page 390 of the Journal of the House of Representatives of February 4, 1875, Forty-third Congress, second session:

"Pending the debate thereon, Mr. John Young Brown was called to order for words used in debate. The words having been reduced to writing, Mr. Robert S. Hale submitted the following resolution," which was a resolution of similar character to that proposed in the House to-day, and thereupon it was voted on.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Springer made a further point of order, that the language used by the gentleman from Indiana was not unparliamentary and not out of order.

The Speaker decided that the point could not be made at this time and overruled the point of order.

Mr. Springer having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table, 121 yeas to 98 nays.

Then, motions to adjourn and to lay on the table being negatived, the question recurred on Mr. Cutcheon's demand for the previous question.

Pending that, Mr. Springer moved that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Rules, with instruction to inquire whether or not the language used was out of order and also whether there was not such provocation therefor as justified its use under all the circumstances.

Mr. David B. Henderson, of Iowa, made the point of order that it was not for the Committee of the Whole House or the Committee on Rules to pass upon the question at issue, but for the House itself to decide; and the further point that the motion of Mr. Springer was in the nature of a proposition to correct the record made in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that, the Speaker having held that the report made from that committee was presumed to be in all respects regular and in accordance with the rules of the House and the appeal from that decision having been sustained by the House, that question had been absolutely settled by the House.

The Speaker ruled that the resolution was not in order.

Mr. Springer appealed from the decision of the Chair, and on motion of Mr. Frederick T. Greenhalge, of Massachusetts, the appeal was laid on the table, yeas 114, nays 78.

The resolutions having been agreed to by the House, Mr. Bynum appeared at the bar with the Sergeant-at-Arms, and by direction of the Speaker the resolutions were read.

Mr. Bynum inquired if he might be heard.

The Speaker held that he could not.

Thereupon the Speaker pronounced the censure of the House:

Mr. William D. Bynum, you are arraigned at the bar of the House under its formal resolution for having transgressed its rules in your remarks. For this offense the House has directed that you shall be censured at this bar. In the name of the House, therefore, I pronounce upon you its censure. The Sergeant-at-Arms will discharge Mr. Bynum from custody.

1260. Prior rights of the House when a Member is accused of treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

A Member indicted for felony remains of the House until convicted. Section III of Jefferson's Manual, on the subject of privilege, provides:

And even in cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, to which privilege does not extend as to substance, yet in Parliament a Member is privileged as to the mode of proceeding. The case is first to be laid before the House, that it may judge of the fact and of the grounds of the accusation, and how far forth the manner of the trial may concern their privilege; otherwise it would be in the power of other branches of the Government, and even of every private man, under pretenses of treason, etc., to take any man from his service in the House, and so, as many, one after another, as would make the House what he pleaseth. (Dec'l of the Com. on the King's declaring Sir John Hotham a traitor. 4 Rushw., 586.) So, when a Member stood indicted for felony, it was adjudged that he ought to remain of the House till conviction;[1] for it may be any man's case, who is guiltless, to be accused and indicted of felony, or the like crime. (23 El., 1580; D'Ewes, 283, col. 1; Lex Parl., 133.)

1261. Two Members were expelled for treason, and the House ordered the governors of their respective States to be notified.—On December 2, 1861,[2] Mr. Francis P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, offered this resolution, which was agreed to by a two-thirds vote:

Resolved, That John W. Reid, a Member of the House of Representatives from the Fifth district of the State of Missouri, having taken up arms against the Government of the United States, is hereby expelled from the House, and the Speaker of the House is required to notify the Governor of the State of Missouri of the fact.

On December 3, 1861,[1] Mr. W. McKee Dunn, of Indiana, offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were agreed to by a two-thirds vote:

Whereas Henry C. Burnett, a Member of this House from the State of Kentucky, is in open rebellion against the Government of the United States; therefore,

Resolved, That said Burnett be, and he is hereby, expelled from this House, and that the governor of the State of Kentucky be notified of his expulsion.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be directed not to pay to said Burnett his salary accrued since the close of the extra session of this Congress.

1262. A Member-elect, who had not taken the oath, was expelled from the House for treason.—On July 13, 1861,[2] Mr. Francis P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas John B. Clark was elected a Representative in the Thirty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Missouri on the first Monday of August in the year 1860; and whereas since that time the said John B. Clark has taken up arms against the Government of the United States and holds a commission in what is known as the State guard of Missouri, under the rebel governor of that State, and took part in the engagement at Booneville against the United States forces; therefore,

Resolved, That John B. Clark has forfeited all right to sit as a Representative in the Thirty-seventh Congress, and is hereby expelled and declared to be no longer a Member of this House.

The debate was very brief, being limited by the previous question. Mr. Blair, upon his responsibility as a Member, affirmed that the allegation of the preamble was true. There was some objection that the case should be considered by a committee; but no one raised the point, which is apparent from the Journal, that Mr. Clark was a Member-elect merely, not having appeared and taken the oath.[3]

The resolution of expulsion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote, yeas 94, nays 45.

1263. William Blount, for a high misdemeanor inconsistent with his public trust and duty, was expelled from the Senate.

The Senate ordered a Senator to attend in his place when a report relating to charges against him was to be presented.

A committee having recommended the expulsion of a Senator, the Senate allowed him to be heard by counsel at the bar of the Senate before action on the report.

A Senator, impeached by the House of Representatives, was arrested by order of the Senate and released only on surety.

Impeachment proceedings against a Senator were continued after his expulsion.

The President of the United States transmitted to the Senate a letter impeaching the conduct of a Senator.

On July 3, 1797,[4] the Senate received a letter from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter purporting to have been written by William Blount, a Senator of the United States, for the purpose of laying plans for the cooperation of certain Indians of the South with British agents in an enterprise inimical to the interests of the United States and Spain. This letter was addressed to one Carey, an employee of the United States in the Indian country.

The message and papers having been read, the letter was again read to Mr. Blount, who was absent when it was read a first time. Being requested to declare whether he was the author of the letter or not, Mr. Blount observed that he wrote a letter to Carey, but was unable to say whether the copy was a correct one or not without recurrence to his papers. Therefore he desired a postponement until the next day, which was agreed to.

On July 4,[1] a letter was laid before the Senate from Mr. Blount, requesting further time. Thereupon the letter and message were referred to a select committee to consider and report what it was proper for the Senate to do thereon.

On July 5,[2] on report from this committee, it was—Ordered, That the Vice-President notify William Blount, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, by letter, to attend the Senate.

On July 6,[3] a further report being made by the committee, Mr. Blount read in his place a declaration, purporting that he should attend in his seat from time to time to answer any allegation that might be brought against him.

Then it was—

Resolved, That Mr. Blount be heard by counsel, not exceeding two, to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

It was further—

Ordered, That the Secretary furnish Mr. Blount with attested copies of such papers as he may point out respecting the subject this day reported on by the committee.

On July 7,[4] the subject being again before the Senate, Mr. Blount notified the Senate that Jared Ingersoll and Alexander J. Dallas were the counsel he had employed agreeably to the vote of the Senate.

The President requested Mr. Blount to declare whether or not he was the author of the letter in question. Mr. Blount declined to answer.

At this point a message was received from the House of Representatives presenting the impeachment of William Blount for high crimes and misdemeanors. Thereupon, in accordance with the request of the House, the said William Blount was sequestered from his seat and taken into custody. Subsequently he furnished sureties.

On July 8,[5] Mr. Blount was heard by his counsel, and then the question was taken on the report of the committee, which was as follows:

That Mr. Blount, having declined an acknowledgment or denial of the letter imputed to him, and having failed to appear to give any satisfactory explanation respecting it, your committee sent for the original letter, which accompanies this report, and it is in the following words: (Here follows the letter, the purport of which is given above.)

Two Senators now present in the Senate have declared to the committee that they are well acquainted with the handwriting of Mr. Blount, and have no doubt that this letter was written by him.

Your committee have examined many letters from Mr. Blount to the Secretary of War, a number of which are herewith submitted, as well as a letter addressed by Mr. Blount to Mr. Cocke, his colleague in the Senate, and to this committee, respecting the business now under consideration, and find them all to be of the same handwriting with the letter in question. Mr. Blount has never denied this letter, but, on the other hand, when the copy transmitted to the Senate was read in his presence, on the 3d instant, he acknowledged in his place that he had written a letter to Carey, of which he had preserved a copy, but could not then decide whether the copy read was a true one. Your committee are therefore fully persuaded that the original letter now produced was written and sent to Carey by Mr. Blount. They also find that this man Carey to whom it was addressed is, to the knowledge of Mr. Blount, in the pay and employment of the United States, as their interpreter to the Cherokee Nation of Indians, and an assistant in the public factory at Tellico Blockhouse. That Hawkins, who is so often mentioned in this letter as a person who must be brought into suspicion among the Creeks, and if possible driven from his nation, is the superintendent of Indian affairs for the United States among the southern Indians, Dinsmore is agent for the United States for the Cherokee nation, and Dyer one of the agents in the public factory at Tellico Blockhouse.

The plan hinted at in this extraordinary letter, to be executed under the auspices of the British, is so capable of different constructions and conjectures that your committee at present forbear giving any decided opinion respecting it, except that to Mr. Blount's own mind it appeared to be inconsistent with the interests of the United States and of Spain, and he was therefore anxious to conceal it from both. But, when they consider his attempts to seduce Carey from his duty as a faithful interpreter, and to employ him as an engine to alienate the affections and confidence of the Indians from the public officers of the United States residing among them, the measures he has proposed to excite a temper which must produce the recall or expulsion of our superintendent from the Creek Nation, his insidious advice tending to the advancement of his own popularity and consequence, at the expense and hazard of the good opinion which the Indians entertain of this Government, and of the treaties subsisting between us and them, your committee have no doubt that Mr. Blount's conduct has been inconsistent with his public duty, renders him unworthy of a further continuance of his present public trust in this body, and amounts to a high misdemeanor. They therefore unanimously recommend to the Senate an adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That William Blount, esq., one of the Senators of the United States, having been guilty of a high misdemeanor, entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States.

The question being taken this report was agreed to, yeas 25, nays 1.[1]

The impeachment proceedings against Mr. Blount were proceeded with after the expulsion.

1264. The Senate failed, by one vote, to expel John Smith, charged with participation in a treasonable conspiracy.

A discussion as to whether or not the principles of the procedure of the courts should be followed in action for expulsion.

The Senate allowed a member threatened with expulsion to be heard by counsel, but did not grant his request for a specific statement of charges or compulsory process for witnesses.

The Senate having allowed a member to be heard by counsel, exercised the power of approving his selections.

The written answer of a Senator to charges made against him was returned by the Senate because it contained irrelevant matter.

The Senate ordered a Senator to attend in his place when a report relating to charges against him was to be presented.

[1] It is evident from the articles of impeachment that Blount was a Senator at the time of the offense. (Second session Fifth Congress, House Journal, p. 151.)

The Senate did not pursue inquiry as to the charge that Senator John Smith had sworn allegiance to a foreign power, the said oath having been taken before his election as Senator.

Nature and limitations of the constitutional power of expulsion discussed.

Discussion of the decision of the Senate in the matter of charges against Humphrey Marshall, a Senator.

On November 27, 1807,[1] the Senate, after debate, adopted after amendment the following resolution proposed by Mr. Samuel Maclay, of Pennsylvania:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether it be compatible with the honor and privileges of this House that John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, against whom bills of indictment were found at the circuit court of Virginia, held at Richmond in August last, for treason and misdemeanor, should be permitted any longer to have a seat therein; and that the committee do inquire into all the facts regarding the conduct of Mr. Smith as an alleged associate of Aaron Burr, and report the same to the Senate.

The following-named Senators were appointed as the committee: John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts; Samuel Maclay, of Pennsylvania; Jesse Franklin, of North Carolina; Samuel Smith, of Maryland; John Pope and Buckner Thurston, of Kentucky, and Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee.

On December 31,[2] Mr. Adams announced that the committee were ready to report, and made the following motion, which was read and agreed to:

Ordered, That John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio., be notified by the Vice-President to attend in his place.

The Vice-President accordingly notified Mr. Smith in the words following:

Sir: You are hereby required to attend the Senate in your place without delay.
By order of the Senate.

GEO. CLINTON,
President of the Senate.

JOHN SMITH, Esq.,
Senator from the State of Ohio.

And Mr. Smith attended.

Thereupon Mr. Adams reported as follows:

Your committee are of opinion that the conspiracy of Aaron Burr and his associates against the peace, union, and liberties of these States is of such a character, and that its existence is established by such a mass of concurring and mutually corroborative testimony that it is incompatible not only with the honor and privileges of this House, but with the deepest interests of this nation, that any person engaged in it should be permitted to hold a seat in the Senate of the United States.

Whether the facts, of which the committee submit herewith such evidence as, under the order of the Senate, they have been able to collect, are sufficient to substantiate the participation of Mr. Smith in that conspiracy, or not, will remain for the Senate to decide.

The committee submit also to the consideration of the Senate the correspondence between Mr. Smith and them, through their chairman, in the course of their meetings. The committee have never conceived themselves invested with authority to try Mr. Smith. Their charge was to report an opinion relating to the honor and privileges of the Senate and the facts relating to the conduct of Mr. Smith. Their opinion, indeed, can not be expressed in relation to the privilege of the Senate without relating, at the same time, to Mr. Smith's right of holding a seat in this body; but, in that respect, the authority of the committee extends only to proposal, and not to decision. But as he manifested a great solicitude to be heard before them, they obtained permission from the Senate to admit his attendance, communicated to him the evidence in their possession, by which he was inculpated, furnished him, in writing, with the questions arising from it which appeared to them material, and received from him the information and explanations herewith submitted as part of the facts reported. But Mr. Smith has claimed as a right to be heard in his defense by counsel, to have compulsory process for witnesses, and to be confronted with his accusers, as if the committee had been a circuit court of the United States. But it is before the Senate itself that your committee conceived it just and proper that Mr. Smith's defense of himself should be heard. Nor have they conceived themselves bound in this inquiry by any other rules than those of natural justice and equity, due to a brother Senator on the one part and to their country on the other.

Mr. Smith represents himself on this inquiry as solitary, friendless, and unskilled, contending for rights which he intimates are denied him; and the defender of senatorial privileges which he seems apprehensive will be refused him by Senators, liable, so long as they hold their offices, to have his case made their own. The committee are not unaware that, in the vicissitudes of human events, no member of this body can be sure that his conduct will never be made a subject of inquiry and decision before the assembly to which he belongs. They are aware that, in the course of proceeding which the Senate may now sanction, its members are marking out a precedent which may hereafter apply to themselves. They are sensible that the principles upon which they have acted ought to have the same operation upon their own claims to privilege as upon those of Mr. Smith; the same relation to the rights of their constituents which they have to those of the legislature which he represents. They have deemed it their duty to advance in the progress of their inquiry with peculiar care and deliberation. They have dealt out to Mr. Smith that measure, which, under the supposition of similar circumstances, they would be content to find imparted to themselves; and they have no hesitation in declaring that, under such imputations, colored by such evidence, they should hold it a sacred obligation to themselves, to their fellow-Senators, and to their country, to meet them by direct, unconditional acknowledgment or denial, without seeking a refuge from the broad face of day in the labyrinth of technical forms.

In examining the question whether these forms of judicial proceedings, or the rules of judicial evidence, ought to be applied to the exercise of that censorial authority which the Senate of the United States possesses over the conduct of its members, let us assume, as the test of their application, either the dictates of unfettered reason, the letter and spirit of the Constitution, or precedents, domestic or foreign, and your committee believe that the result will be the same; that the power of expelling a member must, in its nature, be discretionary, and in its exercise always more summary than the tardy process of judicial tribunals.

The power of expelling a member for misconduct results, on the principles of common sense, from the interest of the nation, that the high trust of legislation should be invested in pure hands. When the trust is elective it is not to be presumed that the constituent body will commit the deposite to the keeping of worthless characters. But when a man, whom his fellow-citizens have honored with their confidence, on the pledge of a spotless reputation, has degraded himself by the commission of infamous crimes, which become suddenly and unexpectedly revealed to the world, defective indeed would be that institution which should be impotent to discard from its bosom the contagion of such a member; which should have no remedy of amputation to apply until the poison had reached the heart.

The question upon the trial of a criminal cause, before the courts of common law, is not between guilt and innocence, but between guilt and the possibility of innocence. If a doubt can possibly be raised, either by the ingenuity of the party or of his counsel, or by the operation of general rules in their unforeseen application to particular cases, that doubt must be decisive for acquittal, and the verdict of not guilty, perhaps, in nine cases out of ten, means no more than that the guilt of the party has not been demonstrated in the precise, specific, and narrow forms prescribed by law. The humane spirit of the laws multiplies the barriers for the protection of innocence, and freely admits that these barriers may be abused for the shelter of guilt. It avows a strong partiality favorable to the person upon trial, and acknowledges the preference that ten guilty should escape rather than that one innocent should suffer. The interest of the public that a particular crime should be punished is but as one to ten compared with the interest of the party that innocence should be spared. Acquittal only restores the party to the common rights of every other citizen; it restores him to no public trust; it invests him with no public confidence; it substitutes the sentence of mercy for the doom of justice; and in the eyes of impartial reason, in the great majority of cases, must be considered rather as a pardon than a justification.

But when a member of a legislative body lies under the imputation of aggravated offenses, and the determination upon his cause can operate only to remove him from a station of extensive powers and important trust, this disproportion between the interest of the public and the interest of the individual disappears; if any disproportion exist, it is of an opposite kind. It is not better that ten traitors should be members of this Senate than that one innocent man should suffer expulsion. In either case, no doubt, the evil would be great. But, in the former it would strike at the vitals of the nation; in the latter it might, though deeply to be lamented, only be the calamity of an individual.

By the letter of the Constitution the power of expelling a Member is given to each of the two Houses of Congress, without any limitation other than that which requires a concurrence of two-thirds of the votes to give it effect.

The spirit of the Constitution is, perhaps, in no respect more remarkable than in the solicitude which it has manifested to secure the purity of the Legislature by that of the elements of its composition. A qualification of age is made necessary for the Members, to insure the maturity of their judgment; a qualification of long citizenship, to insure a community of interests and affections between them and their country; a qualification of residence, to provide a sympathy between every Member and the portion of the Union from which he is delegated; and to guard, as far as regulation can guard, against every bias of personal interest, and every hazard of interfering duties, it has made every Member of Congress ineligible to office which he contributed to create, and every officer of the Union incapable of holding a seat in Congress. Yet, in the midst of all this anxious providence of legislative virtue, it has not authorized the constituent body to recall in any case its representative. It has not subjected him to removal by impeachment; and when the darling of the people's choice has become their deadliest foe can it enter the imagination of a reasonable man that the sanctuary of their legislation must remain polluted with his presence until a court of common law, with its pace of snail, can ascertain whether his crime was committed on the right or on the left bank of the river; whether a puncture of difference can be found between the words of the charge and the words of the proof; whether the witnesses of his guilt should or should not be heard by his jury; and whether he was punishable, because present at an overt act, or intangible to public justice, because he only contrived and prepared it? Is it conceivable that a traitor to that country which has loaded him with favors, guilty to the common understanding of all mankind, should be suffered to return unquestioned to that post of honor and confidence, where, in the zenith of his good fame, he had been placed by the esteem of his countrymen, and in defiance of their wishes, in mockery of their fears, surrounded by the public indignation, but inaccessible to its bolt, pursue the purposes of treason in the heart of the national councils? Must the assembled rulers of the land listen with calm and indifference, session after session, to the voice of notorious infamy, until the sluggard step of municipal justice can overtake his enormities? Must they tamely see the lives and fortune of millions, the safety of present and future ages, depending upon his vote, recorded with theirs, merely because the abused benignity of general maxims may have remitted to him the forfeiture of his life?

Such, in very supposable cases, would be the unavoidable consequences of a principle which should offer the crutches of judicial tribunals as an apology for crippling the Congressional power of expulsion. Far different, in the opinion of your committee, is the spirit of our Constitution. They believe that the very purpose for which this power was given was to preserve the Legislature from the first approaches of infection. That it was made discretionary because it could not exist under the procrastination of general rules; that its process must be summary, because it would be rendered nugatory by delay.

Passing from the constitutional view of the subject to that which is afforded by the authority of precedent your committee find that, since the establishment of our present National Legislature, there has been but one example of expulsion from the Senate. In that case the Member implicated was called upon, in the first instance, to answer whether he was the author of a letter, the copy of which only was produced, and the writing of which was the cause of his expulsion. He was afterwards requested to declare whether he was the author of the letter itself, and declining in both cases to answer, the fact of his having written it was established by a comparison of his handwriting, and by the belief of persons who had seen him write, upon inspection of the letter. In all these points the committee perceive the admission of a species of evidence which in courts of criminal jurisdiction would be excluded, and, in the resolution of expulsion, the Senate declared the person inculpated guilty of a high misdemeanor, although no presentment or indictment had been found against him, and no prosecution at law was ever commenced upon the case.

This event occurred in July, 1797. About fifteen months before that time, upon an application from the legislature of Kentucky, requesting an investigation by the Senate of a charge against one of the Members from that State, of perjury, which had been made in certain newspaper publications, but for which no prosecution had been commenced, the Senate did adopt, by a majority of 16 votes to 8, the report of a committee, purporting that the Senate had no jurisdiction to try the charge, and that the memorial of the Kentucky legislature should be dismissed. There were, indeed, very sufficient reasons of a different kind assigned in the same report for not pursuing the investigation, in that particular case, any further; and your committee believe that in the reasoning of that report some principles were assumed and some inferences drawn which were altogether unnecessary for the determination of that case, which were adopted without a full consideration of all their consequences, and the inaccuracy of which were clearly proved by the departure from them in the instance which was so soon afterwards to take place. It was the first time that a question of expulsion had ever been agitated in Congress since the adoption of the Constitution. And the subject, being thus entirely new, was considered perhaps too much with reference to the particular circumstances of the moment and not enough upon the numerous contingencies to which the general question might apply. Your committee state this opinion with some confidence, because of the sixteen Senators who, in March, 1796, voted for the report dismissing the memorial of the Kentucky legislature, eleven, on the subsequent occasion, in July, 1797, voted also for that report, which concluded with a resolution for the expulsion of Mr. Blount. The other five were no longer present in the Senate. Yet, if the principles advanced in the first report had been assumed as the ground of proceeding at the latter period, the Senate would have been as impotent of jurisdiction upon the offense of Mr. Blount as they had supposed themselves upon the allegation against Mr. Marshall.

Those parts of the fifth and sixth articles, amendatory to the Constitution, upon which the report in the case of Mr. Marshall appears to rely for taking away the jurisdiction of the Senate, your committee suppose, can only be understood as referring to prosecutions at law. To suppose that they were intended as restrictions upon powers expressly granted by the Constitution to the Legislature, or either of its branches, would, in a manner, annihilate the power of impeachment as well as that of expulsion. It would lead to the absurd conclusion that the authority given for the purpose of removing iniquity from the seats of power should be denied its exercise in precisely those cases which most loudly called for its energies. It would present the singular spectacle of a legislature vested with powers of expelling its members, of impeaching, removing, and disqualifying public officers for trivial transgressions beneath the cognizance of the law, yet forbidden to exert them against capital or infamous crimes.

Those two articles were in substance borrowed from similar regulations contained in that justly celebrated statute which for so many ages has been distinguished by the name of the Great Charter of England. Yet in that country, where they are recognized as the most solid foundations of the liberties of the nation, they have never been considered as interfering with the power of expelling a member, exercised at all times by the House of Commons; a power which there, however, rests only upon parliamentary usage, and has never been bestowed, as in the Constitution of the United States, by any act of supreme legislation. From a number of precedents which have been consulted, it is found that the exercise of this authority there has always been discretionary, and its process always far otherwise than compendious in the prosecutions before the judicial courts. So far, indeed, have they been from supposing a conviction at law necessary to precede a vote of expulsion, that, in one instance, a resolution to demand a prosecution appears immediately after the adoption of the resolution to expel. In numerous cases the Member submits to examination, adduces evidence in his favor, and has evidence produced against him, with or without formal authentication; and the discretion of the House is not even restricted by the necessary concurrence of more than a bare majority of the votes.

The provision in our Constitution which forbids the expulsion of a Member by an ordinary majority, and requires for this act of rigorous and painful duty the assent of two-thirds, your committee consider as a wise and sufficient guard against the possible abuse of this legislative discretion. In times of heat and violent party spirit, the rights of the minority might not always be duly respected, if a majority could expel their Members under no other control than that of their own discretion. The operation of this rule is of great efficacy, both over the proceedings of the whole body and over the conduct of every individual Member. The times when the most violent struggles of contending parties occur—when the conflict of opposite passions is most prone to excess—are precisely the times when the numbers are most equally divided. When the majority amounts to the proportion of two-thirds, the security in its own strength is of itself a guard against extraordinary stretches of power; when the minority dwindles to the proportions of one-third, its consciousness of weakness dissuades from any attempts to encroach upon the rights of the majority, which might provoke retaliation. But if expulsion were admissible only as a sequel to the issue of a legal prosecution, or upon the same principles and forms of testimony which are established in the criminal courts, your committee can see no possible reason why it should be rendered still more imbecile by the requisition of two-thirds to give it effect.

It is now the duty of your committee to apply the principles which they have here endeavored to settle and elucidate to the particular case upon which the Senate have directed them to report. The bills of indictment found against Mr. Smith at the late session of the circuit court of the United States at Richmond (copies of which are herewith submitted) are precisely similar to those found against Aaron Burr. From the volume of printed evidence communicated by the President of the United States to Congress, relating to the trial of Aaron Burr, it appears that a great part of the testimony which was essential to his conviction, upon the indictment for treason, was withheld from the jury upon an opinion of the court that Aaron Burr, not having been present at the overt act of treason alleged in the indictment, no testimony relative to his conduct or declarations elsewhere, and subsequent to the transactions on Blennerhassett's Island, could be admitted. And in consequence of this suppression of evidence the traverse jury found a verdict "that Aaron Burr was not proved to be guilty, under that indictment, by any evidence submitted to them." It was also an opinion of the court that none of the transactions, of which evidence was given on the trial of Aaron Burr, did amount to an overt act of levying war, and, of course, that they did not amount to treason. These decisions, forming the basis of the issue upon the trials of Burr, anticipated the event which must have awaited the trials of the bills against Mr. Smith, who, from the circumstances of his case, must have been entitled to the benefit of their application; they were the sole inducements upon which the counsel for the United States abandoned the prosecution against him.

Your committee are not disposed now to question the correctness of these decisions on a case of treason before a court of criminal jurisdiction. But whether the transactions proved against Aaron Burr did or did not amount, in technical language, to an overt act of levying war, your committee have not a scruple of doubt on their minds that, but for the vigilance and energy of the Government and of faithful citizens under its directions, in arresting their progress and in crushing his designs, they would in a very short lapse of time have terminated not only in a war, but in a war of the most horrible description, in a war at once foreign and domestic. As little hesitation have your committee in saying that, if the daylight of evidence, combining one vast complicated intention, with overt acts innumerable, be not excluded from the mind by the curtain of artificial rules, the simplest understanding can not but see what the subtlest understanding can not disguise—crimes before which ordinary treason whitens into virtue; crimes of which war is the mildest feature. The debauchment of our Army, the plunder and devastation of our own and foreign territories, the dissolution of our national Union, and the root of interminable civil war, were but the means of individual aggrandizement, the steps to projected usurpation. If the ingenuity of a demon were tasked to weave into one composition all the great moral and political evils which would be inflicted upon the people of these States, it could produce nothing more than a texture of war, dismemberment, and despotism.

Of these designs, a grand jury, composed of characters as respectable as this nation can boast, have, upon the solemnity of their oaths, charged John Smith with being an accomplice. The reasons upon which the trial of this charge has not been submitted to the verdict of a jury have been shown by your committee, and are proved by the letter from the attorney of the United States for the district of Virginia, herewith reported. And your committee are of the opinion that the dereliction of the prosecution on these grounds can not, in the slightest degree, remove the imputation which the accusations of the grand jury have brought to the door of Mr. Smith.

Your committee will not permit themselves to comment upon the testimony which they submit herewith to the Senate, nor upon the answers which Mr. Smith has given as sufficient for his justification. Desirous as the committee have been that this justification might be complete, anxiously as they wished for an opportunity of declaring their belief of his innocence, they can neither control nor dissemble the operation of the evidence upon their minds; and, however painful to their feelings, they find themselves compelled, by a sense of duty, paramount to every other consideration, to submit to the Senate, for their consideration, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, by his participation in the conspiracy of Aaron Burr against the peace, union, and liberties of the people of the United States, has been guilty of conduct incompatible with his duty and station as a Senator of the United States. And that he be therefore, and hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States."

Mr. Adam also submitted a further report, made in response to a supplemental direction of the Senate, in relation to an allegation that John Smith had taken the oath of allegiance to the King of Spain. But as inquiry had shown the oath to have been taken previously to the election of Mr. Smith, no further order was taken on this charge.

Mr. Smith at this time submitted an answer, but as a portion of this answer contained irrelevant charges against Judge Nimmo, the answer was returned in order that those portions might be expunged.

On January 4 [1] the President of the Senate communicated the revised answer of Mr. Smith in the form of a letter. This letter was read on the 7th, and represented that all the evidence adduced by the committee, excepting two bills of indictment, was either taken ex parte or without allowing Mr. Smith sufficient time to interrogate the witnesses. It asked for the aid of counsel, for time, and for the means of adducing proof in his defense. It admitted that there was no necessity for a legal conviction previous to the expulsion of a Member from the Senate, but contended that proof of the facts charged must be first established in a legal way, and that then the Senate could only exercise its legal right of expulsion.

Mr. Smith thereupon arose and submitted his request in the form of the following motion:

That John Smith be informed specifically of the charges against him; that he be allowed to make a defense against such charges, and have process to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the privilege of being heard by counsel.

After debate on this request, the Senate unanimously agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. Smith be heard by counsel, not exceeding two, to show cause why the report of the committee should not be adopted.

The other requests were not allowed, the debate showing the opinion on the part of Senators that they were not in accordance with the dignity of the Senate and the propriety of proceeding.

On January 13 [2] Mr. Smith informed the Senate that he had engaged Luther Martin and Francis S. Key as his counsel. A question being taken on agreeing to these as counsel, Mr. Key was accepted by the Senate and Mr. Martin was rejected. Subsequently Mr. R. G. Harper was admitted as counsel.

Mr. Smith then by his counsel offered an affidavit setting forth the facts which he claimed he could prove in exculpation, and also submitted a request for an extension of time in which to obtain testimony.

Time was allowed and the case continued, with the presentation of testimony and affidavits, until April 5 and 6,[3] when the case was argued before the Senate by counsel. Thereafter the case was debated at length until April 9,[1] when the vote was taken on the resolution proposed by the committee. And there were yeas 19, nays 10, not the required two-thirds, and the resolution was not agreed to.

1265. In the early days of the secession movement a question arose as to the right to expel a defiant Senator representing a seceding State.—On March 8, 1861,[2] Mr. Lafayette S. Foster, of Connecticut, proposed the following in the Senate:

Whereas L. T. Wigfall, now a Senator of the United States from the State of Texas, has declared in debate that he is a foreigner; that he owes no allegiance to this Government, but that he belongs to and owes allegiance to another and foreign state and government; Therefore Resolved, That the said L. T. Wigfall be, and he hereby is, expelled from this body.

Mr. Thomas L. Clingman, of North Carolina, moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "whereas" and in lieu thereof inserting:

It is understood that the State of Texas has seceded from the Union and is no longer one of the United States: Therefore

Resolved, That she is not entitled to be represented in this body.

A debate arose over the question, it being contended by Mr. Clingman and others that expulsion was punitive and that it was improper to expel a Senator for words spoken in debate; that if Mr. Wigfall actually was a foreigner it was a question going to qualifications and should be dealt with by another process.

Finally, by a vote of yeas 28, nays 16, the Senate proceeded to executive business.

1266. By a single resolution the Senate expelled several Senators for a treasonable conspiracy against the Government.—On July 10, 1861,[3] Mr. Daniel Clark, of New Hampshire, proposed the following in the Senate:

Whereas a conspiracy has been formed against the peace, union, and liberties of the people and Government of the United States, and in furtherance of such conspiracy a portion of the people of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Texas have attempted to withdraw those States from the Union, and are now in arms against the Government; and

Whereas James M. Mason and Robert M. T. Hunter, Senators from Virginia; Thomas L. Clingman and Thomas Bragg, Senators from North Carolina; James Chestnut, jr., a Senator from South Carolina; A. O. P. Nicholson, a Senator from Tennessee; William K. Sebastian and Charles B. Mitchel, Senators from Arkansas, and John Hemphill and Louis T. Wigfall, Senators from Texas, have failed to appear in their seats in the Senate, and to aid the Government in this important crises, and it is apparent to the Senate that said Senators are engaged in said conspiracy for the destruction of the Union and Government, or with full knowledge of such conspiracy have failed to advise the Government of its progress or aid in its suppression: Therefore

Resolved, That the said Mason, Hunter, Clingman, Bragg, Chestnut, Nicholson, Sebastian, Mitchel, Hemphill, and Wigfall be, and they hereby are, each and all of them, expelled from the Senate of the United States.

On July 11 the resolution was debated, and Mr. Milton S. Latham, of California, moved to amend the resolution by inserting before the word "said," in the second line, the words "names of," and by striking out the words "expelled from the Senate of the United States," and inserting "stricken from the roll, and their seats declared vacant," so that the resolution will read:

Therefore resolved, That the names of said Mason, Hunter, Clingmam, Bragg, Chestnut, Nicholson, Sebastian, Mitchel, Hemphill, and Wigfall be, and they hereby are, each and all of them, stricken from the roll, and their seats declared vacant.

This amendment was disagreed to, yeas 11, nays 32.

Then the resolution as originally presented was agreed to, yeas 32, nays 10.

1267. For bearing arms against the Government John C. Breckinridge was summarily expelled from the Senate.—On December 4, 1861,[1] Mr. Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan, in the Senate, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That John C. Breckinridge be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate.

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the resolution; and the same having been amended, on the motion of Mr. Trumbull, to read as follows:

Whereas John C. Breckinridge, a Member of this body from the State of Kentucky, has joined the enemies of his country, and is now in arms against the Government he has sworn to support: Therefore Resolved, That said John C. Breckinridge, the traitor, be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate.

On the question to agree to the resolution as amended it was determined in the affirmative, yeas 37, nays none.

1268. "For sympathy with and participation in the rebellion" a Senator was expelled, after examination of his case by a committee.—On December 10, 1861,[2] Mr. Solomon Foote, of Vermont, presented the following resolution, which on the subsequent day was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into the facts:

Resolved, That Waldo P. Johnson, a Senator from the State of Missouri, by his sympathy with and participation in the rebellion against the Government of the United States has been guilty of conduct incompatible with his duty and station as a Senator; and that he be therefor, and hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States.

On January 9, 1862, Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, presented the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution for the expulsion from the Senate of Waldo P. Johnson, a Senator from the State of Missouri, submit the following report:

Previous to his election to the Senate Mr. Johnson was known in Missouri as entertaining secession proclivities, and to sympathize and cooperate with the prominent citizens of that State who are now in open rebellion against the Government. He was elected to the Senate by a legislature which has since sought to array the State against the Union. Since his election he is reported to have made a speech evincing a spirit hostile to the Government, which speech was extensively published in the State of Missouri without public contradiction from him. He has not appeared in his seat in the Senate since the session began; and though the resolution for his expulsion was proposed in the Senate on the 10th day of December and referred to this committee on the 12th day of December, 1861, and has been extensively published in Missouri and other parts of the Union, the said Johnson has wholly failed to furnish any reason for his absence, or explanation of the charges of disloyalty urged against him.

The failure of said Johnson for so long a period to appear in his place to discharge the high duties incumbent upon him for the preservation of the Republic in this time of rebellion against its authority, and his silence under the imputations upon his loyalty which, from their publicity, could not have escaped his notice if within a loyal portion of the Union, of themselves furnish strong presumptive grounds against his fidelity to the Government.

His whereabouts at this time the committee have been unable, with actual certainty, to ascertain. They are satisfied that, had he been so disposed, there was nothing to prevent his attendance on the Senate at its commencement; and when last heard from he was reported to have gone voluntarily within the lines of rebels in arms against the Government.

Under these circumstances, the committee are of the opinion that he ought to be expelled from the body, and they accordingly report the resolution back to the Senate with a recommendation that it do pass.

The resolution was agreed to by the Senate, yeas 35, nays 0.

1269. For a letter implying friendship with the foes of the Government Jesse D. Bright was expelled from the Senate.

The nature and method of exercise of the power of expulsion discussed by the Senate.

A Senator was present during consideration of a resolution for his own expulsion, and participated in the debate.

On December 16, 1861,[1] Mr. Morton S. Wilkinson, of Minnesota, presented the following in the Senate:

Whereas the Hon. Jesse D. Bright heretofore, on the 1st day of March, 1861, wrote a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"WASHINGTON, March 1, 1861.

"MY DEAR SIR: Allow me to introduce to your acquaintance my friend, Thomas B. Lincoln, of Texas. He visits your capital mainly to dispose of what he regards a great improvement in firearms. I commend him to your favorable consideration as a gentleman of the first respectability, and reliable in every respect.

"Very truly, yours,

"JESSE D. BRIGHT.

"To His Excellency JEFFERSON DAVIS,

"President of the Confederation of States."

And whereas we believe the said letter is evidence of disloyalty to the United States, and is calculated to give aid and comfort to the public enemies: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said Jesse D. Bright be expelled from his seat in the Senate of the United States.

At the same time another letter of Air. Bright, explanatory of his opposition to coercive measures by the Government, and declaring his support of the Union, was presented, and, with the resolution, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On January 13, 1862,[2] Mr. Edgar Cowan, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution to expel the Hon. Jesse D. Bright from his seat in the United States Senate, respectfully report:

That they are of opinion that the facts charged against Mr. Bright are not sufficient to warrant his expulsion from the Senate; and they therefore recommend that the resolution do not pass.

[2] Globe, P. 287.

The committee, however, were not unanimous. Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, chairman, stated in debate [1] that the letter seemed to imply, not an expression of opinion, but a distinct act of hostility to the Government in time of war.

Speaking on January 21,[2] Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, cited the cases of Blount and Smith in support of his contention that in a case of expulsion the Senate was not governed by judicial rules, and was at liberty to exercise a discretion unknown to judicial bodies.

Speaking on January 25,[3] Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, said:

> Whenever a Member of this House forms opinions, and in his official character and acts carries out those opinions, positively or negatively, in such a manner as to render him an unfit and unsafe member of the Senate, he becomes a proper subject of removal from the body. * * * There is no common law, no statutory law, there is no parliamentary law that binds the Senate to any particular definition of crime or offense in acting in this or any other case of the kind.

Mr. Davis, acting in harmony with these principles, proposed the expulsion fully as much because Mr. Bright opposed the conduct of the Administration as for the writing of the letter. Those opposing expulsion, notably Mr. Edgar Cowan, of Pennsylvania,[4] urged that the issue should be confined strictly to the letter, and that it should be interpreted in view of the state of affairs existing when it was written. Mr. Sumner had conceived that Jefferson Davis and his associates were public, open, unequivocal traitors at the time the letter was written, and that the letter was intended to aid the treason. Mr. Cowan conceived that it was a mere letter of introduction given without treasonable intent.

Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, speaking on February 5,[5] while admitting that by the terms of the Constitution the power of expulsion was absolute in two-thirds of the members, held that it was none the less a judicial action, and the great leading principles of evidence could not be abandoned. Difference of opinion would not justify expulsion. In the case of Smith and Blount they were charged with distinct and specific acts of criminal misconduct. They were also defended by counsel. In this case Mr. Bayard conceived that there was no treasonable intent or act.

The debate on the report extended through January 20–31, and February 4 and 5.[6] Mr. Bright had no counsel, but was present during the debate and participated in it freely.

On March 5 the question was taken on agreeing to the resolution proposed by Mr. Wilkinson, and it was agreed to, yeas 32, nays 14. So Mr. Bright was expelled.

The following was then agreed to:

> Ordered, That the Vice-President be requested to transmit to the executive of the State of Indiana a copy of the resolution expelling Jesse D. Bright from the Senate, attested by the Secretary of the Senate.

1270. For expressions hostile to the Government, absence from his seat, and presence within the lines of the enemy, Trusten Polk was expelled from the Senate.

A Member of the Senate being expelled, the Senate notified the governor of his State.

On December 18, 1861,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That Trusten Polk, of Missouri, now a traitor to the United States, be expelled, and he hereby is, expelled, from the Senate.

On January 9, 1862, Mr. John C. Ten Eyck, of New Jersey, presented, from the Committee on the Judiciary, the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate for the expulsion of Trusten Polk, a Senator from the State of Missouri report:

That it appears to the satisfaction of the committee that Trusten Polk recently, and since the commencement of the present rebellion, in a letter transmitting pecuniary means to aid in the publication of a secession newspaper in southwestern Missouri, among other disloyal and treasonable expressions used the following: "Dissolution is now a fact; not only a fact accomplished, but thrice repeated. Everything here looks like inevitable and final dissolution. Will Missouri hesitate a moment to go with her Southern sisters? I hope not. Please let me hear from you. I would be glad to keep posted as to the condition of things in southwest Missouri. I like Governor Jackson's position. It looks like adherence to the 'Jackson resolutions.'"

That a copy of this letter was published in full in the Congressional Globe of the 19th of December last, the day after the resolution of expulsion in this case was introduced in the Senate, and has also, both before and since that time, been published and referred to in several other newspapers in Missouri and elsewhere and widely circulated throughout the country, which publication could hardly have failed to come to the notice of Senator Polk; and yet neither he nor any other person in his behalf has appeared before the committee to deny the authenticity of the letter referred to, or attempted in any other way to deny or explain it, so far as the committee are aware; a course of conduct deemed to be wholly incompatible with the idea of his innocence; since an innocent man in his position, according to the first impulses of a true and loyal heart, would not have suffered a moment to elapse without flying to his place to deny, if false, so grave and foul a charge.

That besides this he has not only failed to appear in his seat during the whole time of the continuance of the present session, now a period of six weeks, to perform his duty to his State and to the Union on an occasion of the greatest possible urgency, when the votes as well as counsel of every true and loyal Senator were eminently needed in providing for the public welfare and in putting down a fierce rebellion threatening the very existence of the Union, but, on the contrary, as the committee are fully satisfied on information derived from reliable official and other sources in Missouri, has left his home in St. Louis and gone clandestinely within the lines of the enemy, now in open armed rebellion against the United States, whose Constitution he, as Senator, has solemnly sworn to support.

The committee, under this state of facts, are of opinion that justice to the Senate, to rid its roll of his name as well as the Chamber of his presence; justice to the State of Missouri, whose high commission he has dishonored, and justice to the Union, which he has sought to betray, all require that he should no longer continue a member of this body.

They therefore respectfully report the resolution for the expulsion of Trusten Polk, a Senator from Missouri, back to the Senate, with the unanimous recommendation that the same do pass.

On agreeing to the resolution, there appeared—yeas 36, nays 0.

[1] Second session Thirty-seventh Congress; Election Cases, Senate Document No. 11, special session, p. 960.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois—

Ordered, That the Vice-President be requested to transmit to the governor of the State of Missouri copies of the resolutions expelling Waldo P. Johnson and Trusten Polk from the Senate, attested by the Secretary of the Senate.

1271. The Senate did not consider Lazarus W. Powell worthy of expulsion because he had formerly counseled his State to be neutral between the Government and its enemies.—On February 20, 1862,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Morton S. Wilkinson, of Minnesota, proposed the following, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas Lazarus W. Powell, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, after 11 States had published their ordinances of secession by which to sever themselves from the Government of the United States, had formed a confederation and provisional government, and made war upon the United States, did, on the 20th day of June last, at the city of Henderson, in the State of Kentucky, attend a large Southern States' rights convention, over which he was called to and did preside; and, on taking his seat as president thereof, made a speech, in which he stated the object of said convention, and then appointed a committee, which reported to said convention a long series of resolutions that were unanimously adopted by it. Among those resolutions are the following:

"2. That the war being now waged by the Federal Administration against the Southern States is in violation of the Constitution and laws, and has already been attended with such stupendous usurpations as to amaze the world and endanger every safeguard of constitutional liberty.

* * * * * * *

"That the recall of the invading armies and the recognition of the separate independence of the Confederate States is the true policy to restore peace and preserve the relations of fraternal love and amity between the States.

* * * * * * *

"6. That we heartily approve the refusal of Governor Magoffin to furnish Kentucky troops to subjugate the South; and we cordially indorse his recent proclamation defining the position of Kentucky, in accordance with the sentiment of her people, and forbidding the invasion of Kentucky by Federal or Confederate troops.

"7. That, although Kentucky has determined that her proper position at present is that of strict neutrality between the belligerent sections, yet, if either of them invade her soil against her will, she ought to resent and repel it by necessary force."

The pith of Governor Magoffin's proclamation, which that convention so cordially approved, is embodied in this paragraph: "I hereby notify and warn all other States, separate or united, especially the United and Confederate States, that I solemnly forbid any movement upon Kentucky soil, or occupation of any part or place therein, for any purpose whatever, until authorized by invitation or permission of the legislative and executive authorities. I especially forbid all citizens of Kentucky, whether in the State guard or otherwise, from making any hostile demonstration against any of the aforesaid sovereignties; to be obedient to the orders of lawful authorities; to remain quietly and peaceably at home when off of military duty, and refrain from all words and acts likely to provoke a collision, and so otherwise to conduct themselves that the deplorable calamity of invasion may be averted; but, in the meantime, to make prompt and efficient preparation to assume the paramount and supreme law of self-defense, and strictly of self-defense alone."

The closing speech of this convention was made by Senator Powell, and the resolutions passed by it and a summary statement of its proceedings were signed by him as its president.

On the 10th of September last, whilst the legislature of Kentucky was in session in the town of Frankfort, and after her territory had been invaded at two distant points by the Confederate armies, and whilst Humphrey Marshall was employed in organizing and drilling an aimed body of rebels in the contiguous county of Owen, a large Southern States' rights convention assembled and held its sessions in Frankfort for the apparent purpose of overawing the legislature, controlling its deliberations. and deterring it from passing measures to support the Union and the Government of the United States, Lazarus W. Powell was a delegate to that convention from the county of Henderson, and was appointed on its committee of resolutions. Among other resolutions, that committee reported these:

"Resolved, That every material interest of Kentucky, as well as the highest dictates of patriotism, demand that peace should be maintained within her borders, and this convention solemnly pledges the honor of its members to do all in their power to promote this end.

"2. That it is the deliberate sense of this convention, and it is believed of an overwhelming majority of the people of Kentucky, that the best and perhaps the only mode of effecting this great object is by adhering strictly, rigidly, and impartially to her chosen and often declared position of neutrality during the existence of the deplorable war now raging between the sections, taking sides neither with the Government nor with the seceding States, and declaring her soil must be preserved inviolate from the armed occupation of either.

"9. That we consider it incompatible with the neutrality avowed by Kentucky to vote money for the prosecution of the civil war, or to tax the people of the State, or augment its debt for a purpose so unwise and for a cause so hopeless as the military subjugation of the Confederate States."

This was a convention of most intense secessionists, and was attended by John C. Breckinridge and many of the leaders of that party from generally over the State. William Preston and R. W. Wooley, esqs., made speeches to it fraught with the rankest treason and denouncing the fiercest war against the United States. Its resolutions were unanimously adopted, and its business closed with the following one, offered by Senator Powell:

"Resolved, That Col. William Preston, George W. Johnson, esq., General Lucius Desha, Capt. Richard Hawes, and Thomas P. Porter, esq., be, and they are hereby, appointed a committee of organization, in order to carry out the purposes of this convention, and full powers are conferred upon them for that object."

Those men were thus commissioned in the cause of conspiracy, treason, and rebellion. By the warrant given them, on the motion of Senator Powell, they went forth and organized or advised and assisted in the organization of armed bands of traitors, and soon thereafter led them into the Confederate camps, where they are yet struggling to consummate the disruption of the Union and the overthrow of the Constitution and laws of the United States. From the beginning of this great rebellion to the present time Senator Powell has neither done nor said anything in Congress or out of Congress to strengthen or sustain the United States in this mighty struggle for national life. Whilst the true and loyal men of his own State were engaged in an arduous and protracted struggle to bring her to perform her duty to the Nation and its government, he not only withheld from them all assistance and sympathy, but gave to the rebels the moral force of his disloyal position and opinions, and all the aid and comfort which he could render them short of the commission of technical treason. His purposes, if not his acts, have been treasonable. Being an ex-governor of the State of Kentucky and one of her Senators in Congress, his example and counsel have doubtless been potential with her people and of mischievous tendency in other States. Under the false and delusive cry of neutrality and peace, and the absurd purpose to protect the soil of the State against invasion from the military force of the United States, he has doubtless assisted to seduce hundreds and hundreds from loyalty and duty into rebellion and treason. He has not supported the Constitution of the United States, but he has sounded the charge to his recruits, and they have made the overt attack upon it. Wherefore—

Be it resolved, That the said Lazarus W. Powell be, and he is hereby, expelled from the Senate.

March 7[1] there was reference to the subject in debate, and on March 12 Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, chairman of the committee, reported back the resolution with the recommendation that it do not pass. On March 14,[2] at the conclusion of the debate, Mr. Trumbull gave the reasons for the report:

I consider it due to the committee, whose organ I was in reporting adversely to the passage of this resolution, simply to state, not by way of argument, or of provoking reply, the ground upon which the committee reported adversely to the passage of this resolution. It was not because the committee approved of the doctrine of neutrality in Kentucky. In my judgment that was a most mischievous position and one wholly untenable, either in April, or June, or September; but it is known that the people of Kentucky very generally assumed that ground, and the Government of the United States, if they did not recognize the neutrality of Kentucky, we may at least say paid some respect to it. The resolutions that were adopted, in which they declared that the United States had no right to pass its troops over the soil of Kentucky, were, in my judgment, preposterous. It was downright opposition to the constituted authorities of the Government; wholly unjustifiable. I have no excuse for it. I think it is without excuse. But, sir, such was the position of the great body of the people of that State; and many persons now believe that it was owing to this position of neutrality which was then assumed that Kentucky has at last arrayed herself on the side of the Union. I do not think so, but good Union men doubtless did take that position.

Well, sir, the time came when, notwithstanding Kentucky had assumed this false attitude, it was necessary that her people should take sides either with the Government or against those arrayed for its protection. Some men who got upon this neutrality platform left it sooner than others; some in June, if you please; some earlier; some stood on it till September; but when the time came that Kentuckians had to meet this thing face to face, go with the Government or against it, fight for one or the other, then, sir, the traitors arrayed themselves, and undertook to get up a provisional government in the State of Kentucky. Breckinridge and the traitors alluded to by the Senator on my right [Mr. Davis] went into the organization; they joined the rebels; the Senator from Kentucky, whose case is under consideration, came here—came to the Government of the United States to discharge his duties here. He does not agree with me in sentiment; his opinions axe not my opinions; I do not agree with the views that he has so often announced here; but he is entitled to his own opinions, and no man is to be expelled from this body because he disagrees with others in opinion. Since Kentucky assumed this position and took sides with the Union nothing has been shown to satisfy the committee, at least, that the Senator from Kentucky has had any communication or done anything to favor the cause of the rebellion. I think neutrality did favor it; but, sir, that is over now.

On March 13 and 14[1] Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, urged the expulsion. He began by showing that the legislature of Kentucky bad requested Mr. Powell to resign and urged that he had ceased to represent the will of the loyal people of that State. He also charged that he was against coercing the seceding States and in favor of their recognition. He then proceeded to review his record in view of the events of the war.

On March 14[2] the resolution of expulsion was disagreed to, yeas 11, nays 28.

1272. A Senator having used words which might incite treason, a resolution of expulsion was proposed, but withdrawn after explanation.—In January, 1864,[3] a proposition was made in the Senate to expel Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, for introducing in the Senate a resolution containing a sentence as follows:

> The people North ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands.

Mr. Davis explained that he did not mean thereby to incite insurrection. The resolution of expulsion was withdrawn.

1273. The attempt to expel and the censure of B. F. Whittemore in the Forty-first Congress.

The House provided that a Member whom it was proposed to expel should be heard in his own defense.

A Member whose expulsion was proposed was permitted to present a written defense, but not to depute another Member to speak in his behalf.

The Speaker, being officially notified that a Member who was addressing the House had resigned, caused him to cease, and declined to recognize him further.

A Member may resign without the consent of the House.

A Member threatened with expulsion having resigned, the House ceased the proceedings of expulsion and censured him.

On February 21, 1870,[1] Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the alleged sale of appointments to the Military and Naval Academies by Members of Congress, submitted a report,[2] in writing, accompanied by the following resolution, vi:

Resolved, That B. F. Whittemore, a Representative in Congress from the First Congressional district of South Carolina, be, and is hereby, expelled from his seat as a Member of the House of Representatives in the Forty-first Congress.

The same having been read, together with the testimony accompanying the report, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and, under the operation of the previous question, agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That B. F. Whittemore, a Member of this House, be permitted to appear at the bar of the House, on Wednesday next, at 2 o'clock p.m., to be heard in his defense, and show cause, if any he have, why sentence of expulsion should not be passed against him, as recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs.

On February 23 the Speaker[3] ruled that Mr. Whittemore might, under the resolution, be heard either orally or in writing. So his affidavit was presented and read, in denial of the charge. After it had been read, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, desired to be heard in behalf of the accused Member, having been deputed by him to make his defense.

The Speaker ruled that Mr. Whittemore in person was entitled to the floor for one hour, but that he could not depute the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] to act for him. Should the member of the committee give such a direction to the matter as to open discussion, the gentleman from Massachusetts might be recognized in his own right. But to allow any gentleman to appear and address the House on the ground that he had been deputed by the gentleman from South Carolina would take the matter out of the line of parliamentary proceeding. If one Member might be so deputed, fifty might be. The matter was entirely within control of the House, which, by refusing the previous question, could throw the matter open.

The Chair recognized the right of Mr. Whittemore to speak in person as superior to that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Logan], who reported the matter from the committee, this superior right being given by the resolution.

[4] Congressional Globe, p. 1523.

Mr. Whittemore then arose and yielded to Mr. Butler to represent him, which the latter proceeded to do, making the argument.

The point was raised that Mr. Whittemore, being in the position of one accused, was not bound by the hour rule of debate. The Speaker overruled this point, however.

On February 24, as the House was considering the resolution of expulsion, the Speaker laid before the House a communication from B. F. Whittemore, informing the House that he had transmitted to the governor of South Carolina his resignation of his seat in Congress. The same having been read, Mr. Whittemore was about to address the House, when the Speaker decided that, in view of the communication just read to the House, he could not recognize him as any longer a Member of the House or entitled to address the same.

Mr. Whittemore's notice to the Speaker that he had resigned did not reach the desk until after the speech had begun.[1] The Speaker, as soon as he read the notice of resignation, caused Mr. Whittemore to suspend his remarks, and ruled that it was not within the power of the Chair to recognize anyone not a Member of the House. Therefore he ruled that Mr. Whittemore might proceed only by unanimous consent of the House.

Question then arose as to the adoption of the resolution of expulsion. The precedents in the cases of Messrs. Gilbert and Matteson[2] were cited, in both of which the resolutions of expulsion were not passed after the resignations were tendered. It was stated by Mr. Logan as a precedent that in the case of Mr. Matteson the Speaker of the House refused to decide that the resignation was accepted and submitted the question to the House. Finally it was decided that the Member had resigned, and the resolution of expulsion was laid on the table. But resolutions condemning the conduct of the Member were adopted.

It was urged[3] that a member of a parliamentary body could not resign without the consent of that body, since the contrary doctrine would menace the very existence of the body.

The Speaker said:

> The uniform practice of the House of Representatives from the foundation of the Government has been that when the resignation of a Member has been handed in at the Clerk's desk the Chair must then cease to recognize him as a Member. * * * As this case may be cited as a precedent hereafter the Chair begs to make one further remark with regard to the decision as to Mr. Whittemore. It is that during the Thirty-sixth Congress, when there were the highest reasons of State, reasons of national importance against accepting resignations, when the Members from the States then going into rebellion resigned, their right to resign was in no instance questioned.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, appealed from the decision that Mr. Whittemore should not be recognized as a Member of the House after the tender of his resignation. The appeal was laid on the table.[4]

The resolution of expulsion having been laid on the table, Mr. Logan then reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, as a question of privilege, the following resolution, which was adopted by a vote of 187 yeas to 0 nays, 34 not voting.

Resolved, That B. F. Whittemore, late Member from the first district of South Carolina, did make appointments to the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis in violation of law; and that such appointments were influenced by pecuniary considerations; and that his conduct in the premises has been such as to show him unworthy of a seat in the House of Representatives, and is therefore condemned as conduct unworthy of a representative of the people.

1274. The House refused to expel but censured a Member who had accepted money for appointing a cadet at the Military Academy.

A report of a committee is not necessarily signed by all those concurring in it.

An amendment proposing expulsion of a Member was agreed to by a majority vote, but on the proposition as amended a two-thirds vote was required.

The change of a single word in the text of a proposition is sufficient to prevent the Speaker ruling it out of order as one already disposed of by the House.

On March 16, 1870,[1] Mr. William L. Stoughton, of Michigan, as a question of privilege, submitted a report of the Committee on Military Affairs, recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House declares its condemnation of the action of Hon. Roderick R. Butler, Representative from the First district of Tennessee, in nominating Augustus C. Tyler, who was not an actual resident of his district, as a cadet at the Military Academy at West Point, and in subsequently receiving money from the father of said cadet for political purposes in Tennessee, as an unauthorized and dangerous practice.

This report was signed by 4 members only, but it was explained that 6 members had concurred in the vote on it, thus making it the report of the majority of the committee.

The minority also presented views, signed by 4 Members, recommending the adoption of this resolution as a substitute:

Resolved, That Roderick R. Butler, a Representative in Congress from the First Congressional district of Tennessee, be, and he is hereby, expelled from his seat as a Member of this House.

When the resolution recommended by the majority came up for consideration, Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, moved to amend by substituting the minority resolution. This amendment was agreed to, yeas 101, nays 68—a majority vote.

The amendment having been agreed to, the question recurred on agreeing to the resolution as amended, which had thereby become a resolution of expulsion. The Speaker stated that under the Constitution a two-thirds vote would be required.

There were yeas 102, nays 68—not a two-thirds vote—and the resolution was rejected.

Mr. Stoughton then offered a resolution which was the resolution originally reported by the majority of the committee, with the addition of these words:

and he is hereby censured therefor.

[1] Second session Forty-first Congress, Journal, pp. 481, 485, 487, 498; Globe, pp. 2002, 2031–2037.

Mr. Thomas W. Ferry, of Michigan, made the point of order that the House, upon the proposition of censuring the Member or expelling him, both ideas being separately before the House, had by a majority vote chosen expulsion and rejected censure, failing to finally carry the former by a two-thirds vote. This resolution was therefore not substantially a different proposition.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman might not be able to offer the resolution in precisely the same words, but this is a different resolution, differently worded, and it is a question of privilege, and is in order at any time. * * * The difference of a single word would bring it within the rule of the House.

The resolution of censure was then agreed to, yeas 158, nays 0.

1275. Published charges of corruption sustained by declaration of a Member caused the House to investigate its membership.

A committee selected to investigate charges against Members generally did not ask special authority to proceed against one who was found to be implicated.

Members indicted by the report of a committee were allowed to file written statements to be printed with the reports.

Form of resolution for investigating charges of corruption among Members.

Instance wherein the Member proposing a committee of investigation was appointed chairman.

In proceedings for expulsion the House declined to give the Members a trial at the bar.

A Member against whom was pending a resolution of expulsion was permitted to address the House by unanimous consent.

The written protest of a Member against his proposed expulsion does not go onto the Journal except by order of the House.

Members accused of corruption having resigned, proceedings to expel them were discontinued.

A Member threatened with expulsion having resigned, the House nevertheless adopted resolutions censuring his conduct.

Whether or not it was proper to censure a Member who had resigned was held to be a question for the House and not the Chair.

On January 9, 1857,[2] Mr. William H. Kelsey, of New York, as a question of privilege, presented this resolution, which was agreed to:

Whereas certain statements have been published charging that Members of this House have entered into corrupt combinations for the purpose of passing and of preventing the passage of certain measures now pending before Congress; and

Whereas a Member of this House has stated that the article referred to "is not wanting in truth:" Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of 5 Members, be appointed by the Speaker, with power to send for persons and papers, to investigate said charges; and that said committee report the evidence taken, and what action, in their judgment, is necessary on the part of the House, without any unnecessary delay.

[1] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

[2] Third session Thirty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 201; Globe, pp. 274–276.

The Speaker appointed on this committee Mr. Kelsey, and Messrs. James L. Orr, of South Carolina; H. Winter Davis, of Maryland; David Ritchie, of Pennsylvania, and Hiram Warner, of Georgia.

On February 19, 1857, the committee made several reports [1] affecting severally the following Members: William A. Gilbert, of New York; William W. Welch, of Connecticut; Francis S. Edwards, of New York, and Orsamus B. Matteson, of New York. Each report was accompanied by resolutions for the expulsion of the Member.

Mr. Kelsey submitted a minority report,[2] in which he dissented from the several reports on the ground that, according to the rules of the House and parliamentary law, the committee had no power to institute proceedings against any Member of the body under the resolution by which the committee was appointed. He quoted the rule of Jefferson's Manual: [3]

> When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a Member prove to be involved, they can not proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon the Member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him.

In their replies [4] the accused Members insisted on this rule, quoting the opinions expressed at the time of the investigation of the Graves-Cilley duel. They also insisted that, as they had not been present when the testimony against them was given, they had been deprived of the proper opportunities for confronting their accusers. When the case of Mr. Gilbert was taken up in the House, on February 25, these objections of the accused were considered at length.[5] It was urged by Mr. Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, among others, that the accused should not be expelled without a public trial at the bar of the House.

Mr. Samuel A. Purviance, of Pennsylvania, moved this resolution [6] as an amendment to the resolutions of expulsion:

> Resolved, That this House will forthwith proceed with the trial of Hon. W. A. Gilbert, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to summon F. F. C. Triplett, James R. Sweeney, and other witnesses to the bar of the House; and that the said Gilbert be heard by himself or counsel.

Mr. Henry Winter Davis spoke at length in defense of the procedure of the committee, and cited as a controlling precedent the action of the Senate in the case of John Smith in 1807, quoting the entire report of Mr. John Quincy Adams in that case.[7] He also quoted the precedents in the Brooks case in the House.

Mr. Purviance's resolution was disagreed to on February 27 by a vote of 110 nays to 82 yeas. The resolutions of expulsion were then considered, and Mr. Gilbert, by unanimous consent, addressed the House,[8] and concluded his remarks by sending to the Clerk's desk to be read a paper in which he protested against the action of the House, impeached the proceedings, and finally announced that he resigned his seat in the House.[1]

Mr. James L. Seward, of Georgia, protested against the putting of the paper in the Journal.

The Speaker[2] said:

The paper will not go upon the Journal unless by direct order of the House. The only thing that will appear on the Journal will be the fact stated by the Member from New York, in his place, that he resigned his seat as a Member of this House.

Mr. Gilbert having resigned, the resolutions of expulsion, which recited also the charges, were laid on the table.

Mr. Edwards also resigned, and the resolutions of expulsion were laid on the table.[3]

In the case of Mr. Welch the resolutions of expulsion were amended by, the following substitute, offered by Mr. William Smith, of Maryland:

Resolved, That there has been no sufficient evidence elicited by the committee having charge of this subject and reported to this House in the case of William W. Welch, a Member thereof, and that no further proceeding should be had against said Member.

The case of Mr. Welch was debated at length,[4] both as to the evidence and the propriety of the course of procedure. The opinion of John Quincy Adams, given in a similar case,[5] was quoted:

It is the privilege of every Member to be heard and tried by the House itself.

Mr. Welch was also heard at length in his own behalf. The substitute was adopted by a vote of 119 yeas to 42 nays.

The resolutions in the case of Mr. Matteson were as follows:

Resolved, That Orsamus B. Matteson, a Member of this House from the State of New York, did incite parties deeply interested in the passage of a joint resolution for construing the Des Moines grant to have here and to use a large sum of money and other valuable considerations corruptly for the purpose of procuring the passage of said joint resolution through this House.

Resolved, That Orsamus B. Matteson, in declaring that a large number of the Members of this House had associated themselves together and pledged themselves each to the other not to vote for any law or resolution granting money or lands unless they were paid for it, has falsely and willfully assailed and defamed the character of this House and has proved himself unworthy to be a Member thereof.

Resolved, That Orsamus B. Matteson, a Member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled therefrom.

Before the consideration of these resolutions[6] had begun, a communication was presented announcing the resignation of Mr. Matteson from the House.

[1] On February 20 Mr. Thomas L. Clingman proposed as a question of privilege that "such Members of this House as are implicated by the special report of the select committee, submitted yesterday, have leave to file with the Clerk written answers to the allegations contained in said reports, which shall be printed with the said reports, provided that the printing of the reports shall not be delayed thereby."

The Speaker said that this should be submitted to the decision of the House, and the question being put, the proposition was agreed to. (Journal, p. 478; Globe, p. 785.)

A motion to lay the resolutions on the table having failed, the Speaker stated that the question recurred upon the resolutions.

Mr. Henry Bennett, of New York, made the point of order that it was not competent for the House to take any further action on the resolutions, on account of the resignation of Mr. Matteson.

The Speaker said:

> The gentleman from New York raises the question of order that the resolutions can not be further considered by the House because the gentleman to whom they refer is no longer a Member of the House. The Chair admits the fact stated by the gentleman from New York, but states that he has no authority to determine that the House has no power to proceed further in the matter. That is a question which the House must determine for itself.

After debate on the appeal, it was laid on the table; and so the decision of the Chair was sustained.[1]

The question next recurred on the resolutions, and the first resolution was agreed to, yeas 145, nays 17. The second resolution was also agreed to, without division. The third resolution was then laid on the table, without division. In the debate the position was taken that as Mr. Matteson was no longer a Member of the House there was nothing to be acted on; but it was urged, on the other hand, that the House might, by acting on the first two resolutions, express its opinion as to whether or not the facts reported by the committee were true.

1276. An investigating committee of the House having taken testimony affecting a Member of the Senate, the House transmitted the same to the Senate.

A Senator's term having expired before a pending resolution of expulsion was agreed to, the Senate discontinued the proceedings.

A citizen who, while a Member of the Senate, had been subjected to investigation, was allowed to submit a paper to be filed and printed with the report.

The Senate declined to permit an ex-Member to print in the Journal or Record a defense of his conduct.

On February 4, 1873,[2] in the Senate, the presiding officer laid before that body the following message:

Thereupon Mr. James W. Patterson, of New Hampshire, who was named in the message, proposed this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of 5 Senators, be appointed by the presiding officer, to whom shall be referred the communication this day received from the House of Representatives in relation to matter affecting Members of the Senate, together with a copy of the evidence accompanying the same, and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a clerk.

On February 5[1] the Chair appointed the committee, Mr. Lot M. Morrill, of Maine, being chairman.

On February 6[2] Messrs. John W. Stevenson, of Kentucky, and John P. Stockton, of New Jersey, severally asked to be relieved from service on the committee, and the Senate by vote in each case refused to excuse them.

On February 27[3] Mr. Morrill, of Maine, from the select committee to whom was referred the communication of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, in relation to certain matter affecting Members of the Senate, together with a copy of the evidence accompanying the same, submitted a report (No. 519) accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That James W. Patterson be, and he is hereby, expelled from his seat as a Member of the Senate.

On March 1 and 3[3] the propriety of taking up the report was debated, but the Congress expired without action, and Mr. Patterson's term expired.

On March 14, 1873,[4] at the special session of the Senate in the next Congress, Mr. Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island, submitted the following:

Whereas at the last session of the Senate a resolution was reported from the select committee on evidence affecting certain Members of the Senate, "that James W. Patterson be, and he is hereby, expelled from his seat as a Member of the Senate;" and

Whereas it was manifestly impossible to consider this resolution at that session without serious detriment to the public business; and

Whereas it is very questionable if it be competent for the Senate to consider the Fame after Mr. Patterson has ceased to be a Member of the body: Therefore,

Resolved, That the failure of the Senate to take the resolution into consideration is not to be interpreted as evidence of the approval or disapproval of the same.

Resolved further, That Mr. Patterson have leave to make a statement, which shall be entered upon the Journal of the Senate and published in the Congressional Record.

On March 25[5] Mr. Anthony modified the resolution by striking out the portion relating to the Journal, but there was opposition to allowing the privilege of publication in the Record to a private individual, and on March 23[6] the resolution was amended to read as follows, and as amended was adopted:

Whereas at the last session of the Senate a resolution was reported from the select committee on evidence affecting certain Members of the Senate, "that James W. Patterson be, and he is hereby, expelled from his seat as a Member of the Senate;" and

Whereas it was manifestly impossible to consider this resolution at that session without serious detriment to the public business; and

Whereas it is very questionable if it be competent for the Senate to consider the same after Mr. Patterson has ceased to be a Member of the body: Therefore,

1277. A Member being charged with the crime of manslaughter, the House declined to determine whether or not a question of privilege was raised and did not investigate.

It being claimed that a charge of crime against a Member involved a question of privilege, the Speaker submitted the question to the House.

The House has laid on the table a question submitted by the Speaker as to whether or not a question of privilege was involved in a pending proposition.

On May 15, 1856,[1] Mr. Ebenezer Knowlton, of Maine, submitted the following resolution and preamble, claiming the same to be a matter of privilege:

Whereas a difficulty occurred at Willard's Hotel, in this city, on the 8th instant, between Hon. Philemon T. Herbert, a Member of this House from the State of California, and Thomas Keating, a waiter at said hotel, which resulted in the death of said Keating from a pistol shot fired by said Herbert; and whereas upon the examination of said case before Justices Smith and Birch, of the District of Columbia, the said justices were divided in their opinion as to the propriety of allowing said Herbert to obtain bail; and whereas said Herbert was then taken, on a writ of habeas corpus, before Thomas H. Crawford, judge of the criminal court of the District of Columbia, and the decision of said judge was as follows: "That the prisoner enter into a recognizance, with one or more good surety or sureties, in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for his appearance at the next term of the criminal court of the District of Columbia, to be holden on the third Monday of June next, to answer to the charge of manslaughter on Thomas Keating, and not to depart the jurisdiction of the court without the leave thereof;" and whereas the Constitution provides "that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the qualifications of its own Members, and may punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of this House be, and they are hereby, instructed to take the case of the above-named Philemon T. Herbert into consideration; that they have the power to send for persons and papers, and report to this body at their earliest convenience what action the House shall take in the premises.

Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, raised the question of order that a question of privilege was not involved in the said preamble and resolution.

The Speaker[2] said:

It is not for the Chair to determine whether the facts assumed are true, or whether it be a question of privilege or not. But if it be claimed by the gentleman from Maine that it involves a question of privilege, the Chair will submit the question to the House whether it will entertain the resolution as a question of privilege.

"Is a question of privilege involved therein?" was then submitted to the House, whereupon, on motion of Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, and by a vote of yeas 79, nays 70, the question was laid on the table.[3]

1278. A Senator being indicted for fraud made a personal explanation and withdrew from the Senate pending the trial.—On January 17, 1905,[1] in the Senate, Mr. John H. Mitchell, of Oregon, rising to a question of privilege, said:

Mr. President and Senators, recent events, with which you are all familiar, make it incumbent on me to come into your presence at this time and make answer to charges made against me in the public press and by a grand jury, and which charges, if true, unfit me to occupy this seat longer.

The charges, as spread broadcast through the public press, throughout the length and breadth of the United States—and this is in substance and effect the indictment reported—we to the effect that in January, 1902, in the State of Oregon, I entered into a conspiracy with Binger Hermann, then Commissioner of the General Land Office, and with one S. A. D. Puter, Horace G. McKinley, D. W. Tarpley, Emma L. Watson, Salmon B. Ormsby, Clark E. Loomis, William H. Davis, and others to defraud the United States out of a portion of its public lands, situated in township 11 south, of range 7 east, Walamette Meridian, in the State of Oregon, by means of false and forged applications, affidavits, and proofs of homestead entries and settlement; and, further, it is charged, that in furtherance of said alleged conspiracy, and to effect the objects thereof, said S. A. D. Puter did on the 9th day of March, 1902, pay and deliver to me the sum of $2,000 in money of the United States, the same being paid to me, as asserted by Puter, in two bills of the denomination of $1,000 each, to induce me to use my influence as a Senator with the said Binger Hermann, Commissioner of the General Land Office, to induce him, as such Commissioner of the General Land Office to pass to patent 12 homestead entries, then pending before the General Land Office, covering lands in the State of Oregon, and each and all of which entries, it is alleged, were based upon false and forged homestead applications, affidavits, and proofs, and that in pursuance of such corrupt conspiracy, it is alleged, I did use my influence with said Binger Hermann, Commissioner of the General Land Office, to induce him to pass to patent said 12 homestead entries, knowing they were fraudulent.

These are the charges made against me, and which I am called upon to answer. My answer is as follows:

Having given his answer, Mr. Mitchell concluded:

In conclusion, permit me to declare that the representatives of any government who will tolerate or permit this, much less sanction it, are unworthy of the exalted positions they occupy.

As for myself, I defy them here and now to produce any evidence, worth a moment's consideration, which will connect me in any wrongful manner whatever with any land frauds in Oregon or elsewhere.

Now, having said this much in explanation of and in answer to the charges against me, and thanking you all sincerely for your courteous attention, I will not further intrude on your presence.[2]

1279. The Senate election case of Alexander Caldwell, from Kansas, in the Forty-second Congress.

The election of a Senator being thoroughly tainted with bribery, the Senate was proceeding to unseat him when he resigned.

Discussion of the effect of the participation of the candidate himself in bribery and its relation to the amount and the proven effect.

A Senator having resigned, the Senate desisted from proceedings to declare his seat vacant or to expel him.

On February 17, 1873.[3] Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, in the Senate submitted the following report:

On the 11th day of May, 1872, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to investigate the election of Senator S. C. Pomeroy by the legislature of Kansas in 1867, and the election of Senator Alexander Caldwell in 1871; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers; that the chairman or acting chairman of said committee or any subcommittee thereof have power to administer oaths; and that the committee be authorized to sit in Washington or elsewhere during the session of Congress and in vacation."

In obedience to this resolution the Committee on Privileges and Elections have had under consideration the election of Alexander Caldwell to the Senate of the United States in January, 1871, have taken testimony, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It is testified by Mr. Len. T. Smith, a former business partner of Mr. Caldwell, his active friend at the time of his election and during this investigation, that he made an agreement with Thomas Carney, of Leavenworth, by which, in consideration that Mr. Carney should not be a candidate for United States Senator before the legislature of Kansas, and should give his influence and support for Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Caldwell should pay him the sum of $15,000, for which amount notes were given and afterwards paid, at the same time taking from Mr. Carney a written instrument in which he pledged himself in the most solemn manner not to be a candidate for the office of Senator in the approaching election.

This instrument is in the words following:

"I hereby agree that I will not under any condition of circumstances be a candidate for the United States Senate in the year 1871 without the written consent of A. Caldwell, and in case I do to forfeit my word of honor hereby pledged. I further agree and bind myself to forfeit the sum of $15,000, and authorize the publication of this agreement.

"THOS. CARNEY.

"TOPEKA, January 18, 1871."

Mr. Smith's testimony is fully corroborated by that of Mr. Carney, who admits the execution of the paper, the making of the arrangement, the taking of the notes, and the subsequent receipt of the money. The notes for the money were signed by Mr. Smith, but paid by Mr. Caldwell; and one of them, for $5,000, was made contingent upon Mr. Caldwell's election. The substance of the whole agreement, only a part of which was expressed in the writing, was that Mr. Carney should not be a candidate for the Senate against Mr. Caldwell; that he should use his influence for Mr. Caldwell, go to Topeka, meet the legislature, and do all he could to secure his election.

The first question to be considered is: Was this arrangement corrupt? Was it the use of corrupt means on the part of Mr. Caldwell to procure his election? The committee are of opinion that it was corrupt; was against public policy; was demoralizing in its character; directly contributed to destroy the purity and freedom of election, and not to be tolerated by the Senate of the United States as a means of precuring a seat in that body.

To understand the full nature of the transaction we must consider the character and position of Mr. Carney. He had been a governor of Kansas; he had once been elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of that State, but the election was premature, being at the wrong session; he had been a candidate for the Senate at another time, and had come within 10 votes of being elected. He was well known throughout the State, had a large body of active friends, many of whom were warmly devoted to his political fortunes. His being a candidate would greatly endanger the success of Mr. Caldwell, if not certain to result in his defeat. He was from the same city with Mr. Caldwell, and his candidacy would be the more dangerous on that account. When Mr. Caldwell agreed to give him $15,000 under this arrangement it was an attempt to purchase the votes of the friends of Mr. Carney. He doubtless expected that Mr. Carney, through his influence over his friends, could bring them over to his support. They would naturally become friends to the man with whom Mr. Carney was friendly. It was, at least, a tacit part of this arrangement that Mr. Carney should conceal the mercenary part of the transaction, and place his withdrawal from the canvass and his support of Mr. Caldwell upon personal and political considerations that were honorable to himself and would be attractive to his friends; and this he did. Mr. Carney went to Topeka before the Senatorial election and remained there until it was over, working industriously for Mr. Caldwell, and exerting all his personal and political influence to secure his election. Looking at the transaction in its real character it was a sale upon the part of Mr. Carney of the votes of his personal and political friends in the legislature, to be delivered by him to Mr. Caldwell as far as possible. If it were legitimate for Mr. Caldwell to buy off Mr. Carney as a candidate, it was equally legitimate to buy off all the other candidates and have the field to himself, by which he would exert a quasi-coercion upon the members of the legislature to vote for him, having no other candidate to vote for. It was an attempt to buy the votes. of members of the legislature, not by bribing them directly, but through the manipulations of another. The purchase money was not to go to them but to Mr. Carney, who was to sell and deliver them without their knowledge. That Mr. Caldwell did procure the votes of members of the legislature, friends of Mr. Carney, ignorant of the fact that Mr. Carney was making merchandise of his political character and influence, and of their friendship for him, for which he was to receive a large sum of money, the evidence leaves no reasonable doubt.

Buying off opposing candidates, and in that way securing the votes of all or the most of their friends, is in effect buying the office. It recognizes candidacy for office as a merchantable commodity, a thing having a money value, and is as destructive to the purity and freedom of elections as the direct bribery of members of the legislature.

A candidate for the Senate without strength or merit may by purchasing the influence and support of all or a part of his competitors and withdrawing them from the canvass succeed in an election, thus not only committing a fraud upon the friends of the candidates who were purchased off, but a greater fraud upon the people of the State, who may be thus saddled with a representative in the Senate of the United States about whom they know little, for whom they care nothing, and who possesses little ability to represent their interests.

Mr. Smith, the friend of Mr. Caldwell, testifies that he paid Mr. Carney the further sum of $7,000 while at Topeka and just before the Senatorial election to meet Mr. Carney's alleged expenses while there, and through fear that Mr. Carney would after all withdraw from the arrangement and become a candidate.

Upon the check for this sum the money was drawn from the bank at Topeka in the evening by one T. J. Anderson, who testified that he gave it to Mr. Carney, and that he was ignorant of the consideration for which it was paid. Other testimony impeaches that of Mr. Anderson and raises a strong presumption that he was engaged in the purchase of votes for Mr. Caldwell, and for which this $7,000 was used, and that for his services he afterwards received the sum of $5,000 from Mr. Caldwell. Mr. Carney swears positively that he did not receive this $7,000 or any part of it, but he indorsed the check at the request of Mr. Smith to enable him to procure the money from the bank; that the money was to be used in procuring votes for Mr. Caldwell, and that a package containing this money, as he believes, was placed by Mr. Anderson on a table in Mr. Carney's room, where it could be and was conveniently carried off by the parties for whom it was intended.

Taking all the testimony together, the probability is that Mr. Carney did not get the $7,000, as no good reason was presented by Mr. Smith why, when Mr. Caldwell was holding Governor Carney's written promise not to be a candidate and Mr. Carney holding notes to be paid by Mr. Caldwell for $15,000, a new arrangement should be made by which Mr. Smith should pay Mr. Carney $7,000 more, making $22,000 in all.

We now come to the consideration of the transaction with Mr. Sidney Clarke. He had been a Member of Congress, had been a candidate for the United States Senate during the preceding canvass before the people, and many members of the legislature were elected upon personal pledges to vote for him for Senator. When the first vote was taken in the separate houses Mr. Clarke received 27 votes, the largest number given for any candidate but one; but the votes satisfied him and his friends that he could not be elected. An arrangement was concluded between Mr. Caldwell and a Mr. Stevens, a friend of Mr. Clarke, at a late hour in the night before the joint convention of the two houses, by which Mr. Caldwell was to pay Mr. Clarke's expenses in the canvass, estimated at from $12,000 to $15,000, and Mr. Clarke was to withdraw in favor of Mr. Caldwell. At a caucus of the friends of Mr. Clarke, held at 9 o'clock on the morning of the joint convention when Mr. Caldwell was elected, Mr. Clarke made a speech and urged them to vote for Mr. Caldwell, and in joint convention his name was withdrawn and all his friends but one voted for Mr. Caldwell. Subsequently in this city Mr. Clarke had several conferences with Mr. Caldwell, in which the latter promised to comply with his engagement with Mr. Stevens and pay Mr. Clarke's expenses, estimated at from $12,000 to $15,000, but never did. Mr. Clarke was unwilling to admit that he had made an agreement to transfer his friends to Mr. Caldwell in consideration of the latter's promise to pay this money, but taking all the testimony together the committee have no doubt that the transaction between him and Mr. Clarke was as has been stated. Mr. Caldwell's subsequent refusal to pay the money to Mr. Clarke does not relieve the character of the transaction, and very probably resulted in the exposure of Mr. Caldwell and the institution of this examination.

There was nothing in the evidence to show that Mr. Clarke's expenses in the Senatorial canvass or in the preceding canvass before the people amounted to half the sum which Mr. Caldwell was to pay him.

Mr. Carney and Mr. Clarke each testifies that Mr. Caldwell told them after the election that his election had cost him $60,000. Mr. Anthony, the mayor of the city of Leavenworth, testified that Mr. Caldwell admitted to him that the election had cost him over $60,000. Mr. Burke, editor of the Leavenworth Herald, and a supporter of Mr. Caldwell in his canvass, testifies that after the election Mr. Caldwell told him that the money he had paid Mr. Carney was not more than 10 per cent of the whole amount which the election had cost him, and on another occasion that the election had cost him more than twice his entire salary.

The committee have had much difficulty in tracing the money transactions; but the evidence shows that various sums, amounting to over $50,000, were drawn under circumstances that make it probable they were used to procure Mr. Caldwell's election. The sum of $15,000, paid to Mr. Carney, has already been stated. The second sum of $7,000, which Mr. Len. T. Smith swears was paid to Mr. Carney, and which Mr. Carney denies receiving, and testifies to circumstances showing it was used for the bribery of members of the legislature, has also been referred to. It is further shown that three or four days before the election took place Mr. Caldwell's agent went into the banking house of Scott & Co., at Leavenworth, and drew the sum of $10,000 upon Mr. Caldwell's check for the a vowed purpose of taking the money to Topeka by the train that morning, which was given as the reason for presenting the check before bank hours. Mr. Jacob Smith, banker at Topeka, testified that at 9 o'clock in the evening before the election took place Doctor Morris, of Leavenworth, a very active friend of Mr. Caldwell, drew $5,000 from his bank, and that Judge Crozier, of Leavenworth, an influential supporter of Mr. Caldwell, and then at Topeka laboring for his election, drew $1,200 from the bank after banking hours at the request of Mr. Smith, which was handed over to Mr. Smith. The testimony left no doubt upon the minds of the committee that the bankers who honored these different checks at Topeka after banking hours understood that the money was to be used for political purposes. The evidence further shows that Mr. T. J. Anderson subsequently received from Mr. Caldwell the sum of $5,000 for his services in the election. A draft for $10,000, drawn by the solicitor of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company upon the treasurer of that company, was presented at the Kansas Valley Bank, of Topeka, by Mr. T. J. Anderson on the 23d of January, the day before the election, and the money drawn upon it under circumstances which, taken in connection with other testimony, make it probable that the money was used for Mr. Caldwell's election. The committee have no reason to believe that they have traced all the money that was used, and in the foregoing statement have taken no account of several small sums shown to have been paid by Mr. Caldwell for the expenses of his friends while at Topeka.

Mr. William Spriggs, a former treasurer of Kansas, testified in regard to a self-constituted committee of six of Mr. Caldwell's leading friends who met from time to time at Topeka during the day and evening for five or six days before the election to confer and report progress in electioneering for Mr. Caldwell; that during the meetings of this committee it was reported by Mr. Smith what members of the legislature had been secured to vote for Mr. Caldwell, how much was offered to others, and how much was asked by others. We quote from his testimony:

"We usually met at 10 o'clock in the morning. We had a roll of the senate and of the house and kept them, and we would compare notes, and then such a member of the committee would be sent that day or at such a time to see such members of the house and such another one to see somebody else—whoever we thought would be the best man for that particular place; and then we would meet again at such another hour and report what we had done and what success we had had, and in some quite a number of times—I do not know how many. In making the report and comparing notes there was one member of the committee would report; in calling over the names he would come to such and such a man and he would say, "We had better not count that man yet; that is under negotiation and he is a little too high; I think I can bring him down some."'

This witness testified to several interviews with Mr. Caldwell, and we quote from his testimony:

"I will just tell you what Mr. Caldwell said tome about it. He asked me if I knew any members of the legislature that could be influenced by the use of money for their votes, and I told him that I knew two members I believed that had the reputation of having been influenced in their votes on former occasions."

And further on:

"He said if I found any members that wanted a little money for votes to send them to him and to Len. Smith.

"Mr. Caldwell said there was another class of high-toned gentlemen there in the legislature that would not sell their votes, but they put it in this way: That they had been to a pretty heavy expense in carrying their election and they would want their expenses paid, and if I met with any of that class to send them to him or to Len."

The testimony of Mr. Spriggs is very full and shows that the canvass of Mr. Caldwell was thoroughly corrupt and that money was the chief argument relied upon. Among many other things, he stated that T. J. Anderson told him that he had paid Mr. Crocker, a member of the house, $1,000 for his vote; that Mr. Crocker afterwards backed out and handed the money over to a Mr. Carson to be returned to Mr. Anderson; that Carson got on the cars, went home, and kept the money. Carson was afterwards called by the committee and corroborated the statement, admitting that he had received the $1,000 back from Mr. Crocker to be returned to Mr. Anderson, but that he had kept the money himself for his services to Mr. Caldwell. Mr. Carney testifies that in an interview with Mr. Caldwell after the election, in which he was urging him to procure an appointment for one of Mr. Carney's friends who had voted for him, Mr. Caldwell took from his pocket a memorandum book and appeared to run over a list of names, and coming to the man referred to said, "That man has been paid;" and Mr. Carney understood from his manner that he had in this memorandum book a list of members, with the sums paid to each; that Mr. Caldwell told him upon another occasion that he had paid Mr. Bayers the sum of $2,500 for his vote and Mr. James F. Legate the sum of $1,000 for his vote. Mr. Anthony also swears that in a conversation with Mr. Caldwell that gentleman admitted to him that he had paid $2,500 for the vote of Mr. Bayers. There is much testimony showing that Len. T. Smith, Frank Drenning, James L. McDowell, George A. Smith, and T. J. Anderson, among the most active friends of Mr. Caldwell during the canvass, admitted at different times that they had offered money to members of the legislature to vote for Mr. Caldwell, in some cases specifying the members to whom it was offered and paid and in other cases that offers had been made that had not been accepted, and that negotiations were on hand with others which had not been completed. These men have denied before the committee all conversations and admissions of this character and all payment of money to members or offers to pay them, and several members of the legislature who were implicated have expressly denied that they received the money or that offers were made them.

Mr. Caldwell offered testimony showing that Mr. Carney had made threats to have him ousted from the Senate; that Mr. Anthony was hostile to him; that Mr. Burke had a lawsuit with him growing out of money furnished to Mr. Burke about the time of the election; and to contradict several statements of Mr. Clarke. The most important contradictions of the testimony produced against Mr. Caldwell are made by members of the legislature who were themselves implicated or by the agents of Mr. Caldwell who were directly charged with taking a part in these corrupt practices, and there are some contradictions made by witnesses against whom there is no cause of suspicion. But taking the testimony altogether, the committee can not doubt that money was paid to some members of the legislature for their votes and money promised to others which was not paid and offered to others who did not accept it.

By the Constitution each House of Congress is made the judge of elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members.

If a person elected to the Senate has not the constitutional qualifications, or if the election is invalid by reason of fraud or corruption, the jurisdiction to examine and determine is expressly vested in the Senate.

Another clause of the Constitution authorizes the Senate to expel a Member by a two-thirds vote. The causes for which a Senator may be expelled are not limited or defined, but rest in the sound discretion of the Senate.

It has been a subject of discussion in the committee whether the offenses of which they believe Mr. Caldwell to have been guilty should be punished by expulsion or go to the validity of his election, and a majority are of the opinion that they go to the validity of his election and had the effect to make it void. Wherefore the committee recommend to the Senate the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Alexander Caldwell was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the legislature of the State of Kansas.

This report was the subject of a long and learned debate, extending from March 10 to 22, 1873.[1] At first the theory of the report in regard to the common law of England was assailed, and it was denied that, even were the English law as stated, it was of effect in a case like this. The doctrine that participation of the candidate in bribery voided the election even though the amount of bribery proven was not sufficient to change the result was strongly antagonized. It was pointed out that Mr. Caldwell had a majority of 25 votes, and that only a few of these at most could be impeached. It was further urged that the Senate might not inquire into the qualifications of the members of the legislature, and one Senator even took the ground that if every legislator had been bribed, their act of electing a Senator would yet be unassailable. On March 13[2] Mr. James L. Alcorn, of Mississippi, proposed for action at a future time this resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate, acting as the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, has the power under the Constitution to reject Senators-elect whose election shall have been proved to the satisfaction of the Senate to have been tainted by bribery, fraud, or intimidation.

On March 21[3] Mr. Orris S. Ferry, of Connecticut, moved—to amend the resolution by striking out the following words, "was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the legislature of the State of Kansas," and in lieu thereof inserting "be, and he hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States."

The debate continued until March 24,[4] when the Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter from Mr. Caldwell, showing that he had resigned his seat in the Senate.

Thereupon Mr. Morton said:

It is hardly competent for the Senate to expel a man who is not a Member, or to declare a seat vacant that is already vacant by resignation.

Therefore he ceased to press the question.

1280. Instances of expulsion proposed in the Senate but not effected.

On February 27, 1873,[5] a special committee of the Senate who had investigated charges against Senator James W. Patterson, of New Hampshire, reported a resolution for his expulsion. The resolution was not acted on.

1281. In 1862[6] the Senate considered the case of James F. Simmons, Senator from Rhode Island.

July, 2, 1862, near the end of Mr. Simmons's second term in the Senate, a resolution was submitted that he be expelled from the Senate. The preamble stated that it appeared from a report of the Secretary of War that Mr. Simmons had exercised his official influence over certain of the heads of the Departments in procuring an order authorizing a certain person to manufacture rifles in behalf of the Government for the Army and Navy, and that Mr. Simmons had agreed to receive as a compensation for such services the sum of $50,000, and that he had already received two promissory notes amounting to $10,000. July 8 the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary by a vote of 31 yeas to 7 nays. July 14 the committee reported that the facts were substantially as above given, and that they were of opinion that "such a practice is entirely indefensible, and that it was highly improper for a Senator of the United States to have acted thus, even when the Government sustained no loss thereby;" that it was manifest that Congress disapproved of such conduct from the fact that they had promptly passed a law making it a penal offense thereafter; but that to visit a severe penalty upon an act which at the time of its commission was not punishable or forbidden by public law would be retroactive in its effect, and render the step liable to that objection to which all post facto laws are justly subject. The committee unanimously reported back the resolution, accompanied by the statement of facts, that the Senate might take such action as they might think fit. No action was taken. Congress adjourned within three days after the report was made, and Mr. Simmons had resigned his seat in the Senate before the next session.

1282. The Senate case of Joseph R. Burton, in the Fifty-ninth Congress.

A Senator convicted in the courts resigned after the Senate had ordered an inquiry.

Summary and discussion of laws regulating the conduct of Representatives and Senators.

The Congress may by law impose certain restrictions on the conduct of Senators and Representatives without conflicting with the fundamental idea of the Constitution.

There is no necessary connection between the conviction of a Senator under Sec. 1782, R. S., and the right of the Senate to punish one of its Members.

A final judgment of conviction under section 1782, R. S., does not operate ipso facto to vacate the seat of a convicted Senator or compel the Senate to expel him.

Senators can not properly be said to hold their places "under the Government of the United States."

The Senate took steps looking to punishment of a convicted Senator, although an application for rehearing of an appeal was pending.

Instance wherein the Senate was informed by the governor of a State that one of the Senators of that State had resigned.

On May 22, 1906,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and are hereby, directed to examine into the legal effect of the late decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Joseph R. Burton, a Senator from the State of Kansas, and, as soon as may be, to report their recommendation as to what action, if any, shall be taken by the Senate.

Mr. Burton had been convicted under sections 3929, 4041, and 1782 of the Revised Statutes, which provide against the use of the mails for fraudulent purposes and forbid Senators or Representatives from receiving compensation for services rendered before any department, etc., of the United States Government. He had been twice convicted, and this decision was rendered on Mr. Burton's appeal from the second conviction. The Supreme Court refused to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

The opinion of the court, rendered May 21, 1906,[1] by Mr. Justice Harlan, among other features, examined section 1782, which is as follows:

Sec. 1782. No Senator, Representative, or Delegate, after his election and during his continuance in office, and no head of a Department, or other officer or clerk in the employ of the Government, shall receive or agree to receive any compensation whatever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered, or to be rendered, to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested, before any Department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever. Every person offending against this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not more than two years, and fined not more than ten thousand dollars, and shall, moreover, by conviction therefor, be rendered forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.[2]

1. The first question to be considered is whether section 1782 is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. This question has been the subject of extended discussion by counsel. But we can not doubt the authority of Congress by legislation to make it an offense against the United States for a Senator, after his election and during his continuance in office, to agree to receive or to receive compensation for services to be rendered or rendered to any person, before a Department of the Government, in relation to a proceeding, matter, or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested.

The principle that underlies section 1782 is not wholly new in our legislative history. For instance, by the act of March 3, 1863,[3] it was declared that Members of Congress shall not practice in the Court of Claims. Later Congress by statute declared that no Member of or Delegate to Congress shall directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement made or entered into in behalf of the United States by any officer or person authorized to make contracts on behalf of the United States; and every person violating this section was to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined $3,000.[4]

Counsel for the accused insists that section 1782 is in conflict with the fundamental idea of the Federal system, namely, that the Government is one of "limited powers, with duties and restrictions imposed, and no authority is lodged anywhere to change those duties or restrictions, except the power reserved by the people." The proposition here stated is certainly not to be disputed; for it is settled doctrine, as declared by Chief Justice Marshall and often repeated by this court, that "the Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication."[5] We do not, however, perceive that there has been in the statute before us any departure from that salutary doctrine.

It is said that the statute interferes, or by its necessary operation will interfere, with the legitimate authority of the Senate over its members, in that a judgment of conviction under it may exclude a Senator from the Senate before his constitutional term expires; whereas, under the Constitution, a Senator is elected to serve a specified number of years, and the Senate is made by that instrument the sole judge of the qualifications of its members, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, may expel a Senator from that body. In our judgment there is no necessary connection between the conviction of a Senator of a public offense prescribed by statute and the authority of the Senate in the particulars named. While the framers of the Constitution intended that each Department should keep within its appointed sphere of publication, it was never contemplated that the authority of the Senate to admit to a seat in its body one who had been duly elected as a Senator, or its power to expel him after being admitted, should in any degree limit or restrict the authority of Congress to enact such statutes, not forbidden by the Constitution, as the public interests required for carrying into effect the powers granted to it. In order to promote the efficiency of the public service and enforce integrity in the conduct of such public affairs as are committed to the several Departments, Congress, having a choice of means, may prescribe such regulations to those ends as its wisdom may suggest, if they be not forbidden by the fundamental law. It possesses the entire legislative authority of the United States. By the provision in the Constitution that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States," it is meant that Congress, keeping within the limits of its powers and observing the restrictions imposed by the Constitution, may, in its discretion, enact any statute appropriate to accomplish the objects for which the National Government was established. A statute like the one before us has direct relation to those objects, and can be executed without in any degree impinging upon the rightful authority of the Senate over its members or interfering with the discharge of the legitimate duties of a Senator. The proper discharge of those duties does not require a Senator to appear before an Executive Department in order to enforce his particular views or the views of others in respect of matters committed to that Department for determination. He may often do so without impropriety, and, so far as existing law is concerned, may do so whenever he chooses, provided he neither agrees to receive nor receives compensation for such services. Congress, when passing this statute, knew, as, indeed, everybody may know, that executive officers are apt, and not unnaturally, to attach great, sometimes perhaps undue, weight to the wishes of Senators. Evidently the statute has for its main object to secure the integrity of executive action against undue influence upon the part of members of that branch of the Government whose favor may have much to do with the appointment to or retention in public position of those whose official action it is sought to control or direct. The evils attending such a situation are apparent and are increased when those seeking to influence executive officers are spurred to action by hopes of pecuniary reward. There can be no reason why the Government may not, by legislation, protect each Department against such evils—indeed, against everything, from whatever source it proceeds, that tends or may tend to corruption or inefficiency in the management of public affairs. A Senator can not claim immunity from legislation directed to that end, simply because he is a member of a body which does not owe its existence to Congress, and with whose constitutional functions there can be no interference. If that which is enacted in the form of a statute is within the general sphere of legitimate legislative, as distinguished from executive. and judicial, action, and not forbidden by the Constitution, it is the supreme law of the land—supreme over all in public stations, as well as over all the people."No man in this country," this court has said, "is so high that he is above the law. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance with impunity. All the officers of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, are creatures of the law and are bound to obey it."[1] I Nothing in the relations existing between a Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress and the public matters with which, under the Constitution, they are respectively connected from time to time, can exempt them from the rule of conduct prescribed by section 1782. The enforcement of that rule will not impair or disturb those relations or cripple the power of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates to meet all rightful or appropriate demands made upon them as public servants.

Allusion has been made to that part of the judgment declaring that the accused, by his conviction, "is rendered forever hereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States." That judgment, it is argued, is inconsistent with the constitutional right of a Senator to hold his place for the full term for which he was elected and operates, of its own force, to exclude a convicted Senator from the Senate, although that body alone has the power to expel its Members. We answer that the above words, in the concluding part of the judgment of conviction, do nothing more than declare or recite what, in the opinion of the trial court, is the legal effect attending or following a conviction under the statute. They might well have been omitted from the judgment. By its own force, without the aid of such words in the judgment, the statute makes one convicted under it incapable forever thereafter of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States. But the final judgment of conviction did not operate, ipso facto, to vacate the seat of the convicted Senator nor compel the Senate to expel him or to regard him as expelled by force alone of the judgment. The seat into which he was originally inducted as a Senator from Kansas could only become vacant by his death or by expiration of his term of office or by some direct action on the part of the Senate in the exercise of its constitutional powers. This must be so for the further reason that the declaration in section 1782 that any one convicted under its provisions shall be incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit "under the Government of the United States" refers only to offices created by or existing under the direct authority of the National Government as organized under the Constitution and not to. offices the appointments to which are made by the States acting separately, albeit proceeding, in respect of such appointments, under the sanction of that instrument. While the Senate, as a branch of the legislative department, owes its existence to the Constitution and participates in passing laws that concern the entire country, its members are chosen by State legislatures and can not properly be said to hold their places "under the Government of the United States."

We are of opinion that section 1782 does not by its necessary operation impinge upon the authority or powers of the Senate of the United States nor interfere with the legitimate functions, privileges, or rights of Senators.

Mr. Justice Brewer made a dissenting opinion, in which Messrs. Justices White and Peckham concurred; but this dissent did not deal with this feature of the case.

Mr. Burton appealed for a rehearing, which could not be heard and decided before the probable termination of the session of Congress at which Mr. Hale offered the resolution directing the investigation. This appeal had been made at the time Mr. Hale's resolution was agreed to.

On June 5, 1906,[1] the Vice-President laid before the Senate the following telegram,[2] which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

TOPEKA, KANS., June 4, 1906.

HON. CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS,

Vice-President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

Hon. J. R. Burton has this day tendered his resignation as United States Senator from Kansas, and I have accepted the same.

E. W. HOCH, Governor of Kansas.

1283. The case of King and Schumaker, in the Forty-fourth Congress. The majority of the Judiciary Committee concluded that a Member might not be tried or punished by the House for an offense alleged to have been committed against a preceding Congress.

In the Forty-third Congress the Committee on Ways and Means made an investigation of the charges that a large sum of money was used to secure the passage through Congress of an increased annual appropriation to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company in the nature of a subsidy. They ascertained from the evidence that about $900,000 was disbursed upon the allegation that it was used in aid of the passage of the act. About $565,000 of this was found to have been paid to the use of persons having no official connection with such legislation. The remaining sum remained in doubt because of the "refusal of William S. King to testify to the truth and to the failure or refusal of John G. Shumaker to present all the facts which the committee believe it was in his power to give." The committee recommended that the evidence taken be transmitted to the Clerk of the House, to be by him laid before the Forty-fourth Congress, and also that a copy be sent to the United States district attorney, to be by him presented to the grand jury of the District. These recommendations were carried out, and when the Forty-fourth Congress took the case up for consideration the subject was before the United States court.

Messrs. King and Schumaker were Members of the Forty-fourth Congress, and the Judiciary Committee inquired "what action should be taken by the House in reference to the persons now Members of this House charged with complicity in the alleged corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy in the China mail service during the Forty-second Congress and with giving false testimony in relation thereto before the Committee on Ways and Means of the Forty-third Congress. The report [1] of the committee finds as follows:

Your committee are of the opinion that the House of Representatives has no authority to take jurisdiction of violations of law or offenses committed against a previous Congress. This is a purely legislative body and entirely unsuited for the trial of crimes. The fifth section of the first article of the Constitution authorizes "each House to determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member." This power is evidently given to enable each House to exercise its constitutional function of legislation unobstructed. It can not vest in Congress a jurisdiction to try a Member for an offense committed before his election. For such offense a Member, like any other citizen, is amenable to the courts alone. Within four years after the adoption of the first ten amendments to the Constitution, Humphrey Marshall, a Senator of the United States from Kentucky, was charged by the legislature of his State with the crime of perjury, and the memorial was transmitted by the governor to the Senate for its action. The committee to whom it was referred reported against the jurisdiction of the Senate, and say:

"That in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State or district wherein the crime shall have been committed. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And they are also of opinion that, as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate, the consent of the party can not give it, and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed."

This report was adopted by a vote of 16 to 7. This is the construction given to said section in the first case presented to either House after its adoption by the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and we think it an authority which should control the case before the committee. We know of no public interest which will be promoted by further investigation. Your committee therefore recommend that the House leave these charges where they now are, in court, to be finally adjudicated and disposed of without any interposition or further action of the House.

Messrs. Scott Lord, William Lawrence, George F. Hoar, and B. G. Caulfield submitted views of the minority, denying that the case of Marshall was parallel to the present cases, where the crimes were not alleged to have been committed in a State court, but related directly to the attempted corruption of Members of Congress of the United States, which crime or crimes, wherever originated, were consummated, as alleged, in the District of Columbia or within the halls of the Capitol. In the State of New York, in the case of George G. Barnard, one of the justices of the supreme court, he was held liable to impeachment for offenses committed by him before he was elected to the term of office which he then held. The senate of that State has asserted the same principle. The Senate of the United States had recently held jurisdiction in a case in which the alleged limitation, if any, forbidding it, is found in the words of the Constitution. The fact that the questions involved as to the guilt of the accused Members had been referred to the courts of the District of Columbia did not and could not affect the question of jurisdiction, nor in any manner release the House from its duty in the premises, as had been held in the cases of Kilbourn and Belknap.

George W. McCrary also expressed the opinion in a supplemental report that the House might properly assume jurisdiction in a case where a Member had received money to be used in corrupting legislation in Congress for which offense no indictment had been found, even though the offenses were charged prior to his election.

1284. In 1799 the House declined to expel Matthew Lyon for an offense committed while a Member but before his reelection to the then existing House.—On February 20, 1799,[1] Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That Matthew Lyon, a Member of this House, having been convicted of being a notorious and seditious person, and of a depraved mind, and wicked and diabolical disposition; and of wickedly, deceitfully, and maliciously, contriving to defame the Government of the United States; and of having with intent and design to defame the Government of the United States, and John Adams, the President of the United States, and to bring the said Government and President into contempt and disrepute, and with intent and design to excite against the said Government and President the hatred of the good people of the United States, and to stir up sedition in the United States—wickedly, knowingly, and maliciously, written and published certain scandalous and seditious writings or libels, be therefore expelled from this House.

On February 22 the House considered the resolution. Mr. Bayard contended that the House had unlimited power of expulsion, and could expel a Member for any crime or any cause which, in their discretion, they conceived had rendered him unfit to remain a Member of the body. It was a fallacious doctrine that the House could not take notice of acts done by its Members out of the House.

It appeared from the debate that Mr. Lyon, a Member from Vermont, had been convicted in that State under the recently enacted sedition law. It was urged by Mr. John Nicholas, of Virginia, that Mr. Lyon's constituents, with a full knowledge of his prosecution, had reelected him. Mr. Lyon addressed the House in his own behalf,[2] no special permission being given by the House. The discussion developed into a discussion of the sedition laws.

The question being taken there were yeas 49, nays 45. So two-thirds of the Members present not concurring, the resolution was not agreed to.

1285. After a discussion of the subject of qualifications and expulsion the House laid on the table a question as to the conduct of a Member in the preceding Congress.—On January 15, 1858,[3] Mr. Thomas L. Harris, of Illinois, rising to a question of privilege, presented this resolution:

Resolved, That Orsamus B. Matteson, a Member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled from this House.

[2] Mr. Lyon was a Member of the House at the time he was fined and imprisoned. On November 13, 1811, a memorial was presented to the House asking that the fine be repaid. Annals, first session Twelfth Congress, p. 345.

[3] First session Thirty-fifth Congress, Globe, pp. 311, 878–889, 1389–1392; Journal, p. 559.

The preamble of this resolution recited that in the preceding Congress the conduct of Mr. Matteson had been investigated and he had resigned to escape expulsion.[1]

On February 25, the resolution introduced by Mr. Harris was considered at length. It was urged by Mr. Harris that the act of expulsion was proper, not as a punishment but as a purification of the House. The Senate had, in the case of Mr. Blount, of Tennessee, shown that it considered itself competent to expel for an offense committed before the offender had been sworn in as a Member of the body. In the case of Senator John Smith, of Tennessee, the report,[2] made by John Quincy Adams had taken the ground that—by the letter of the Constitution, the power of expelling a Member is given to each of the two Houses of Congress, without any limitation other than that which requires a concurrence of two-thirds of the votes to give it effect.

In opposition it was contended that the power of expulsion was limited. Mr. Miles Taylor, of Louisiana, held that the House could expel only for disorderly conduct in violation of the rules of order. It was held by others that the House had no right to expel for an offense committed before the Member took his seat, the Wilkes case being cited in support.

By a vote of 93 yeas to 87 nays the House referred the subject to a special committee, which reported on March 22.[3] Messrs. James L. Seward, of Georgia, Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, and John Huyler, of New Jersey, signed the majority report, which was embodied in this resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for this House to take any further action in regard to the resolutions proposing to expel O. B. Matteson.

The committee in their report took the ground that the proceedings in the previous Congress constituted no disqualification, and that in Mr. Matteson's case there was no constitutional or legal hindrance to his being elected, and no personal disqualification excluding him either permanently or temporarily from being a Representative. The legislative power to punish Members could not be used in regard to matters having no legal recognition. According to Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, "Expulsion from a former or from the same legislative assembly can not be regarded as a personal disqualification, unless specially provided by law." The Wilkes case was cited in support of this authority. The power of the House of Representatives in each Congress was ample and complete to punish its Members for disorderly behavior or misconduct. The House of the last Congress had tried Mr. Matteson; but what offense had he committed against this House? With what act of disorderly behavior was he charged? The fact that he had been elected to the Thirty-fifth Congress before the resolutions of censure were passed in the Thirty-fourth Congress, if material, did not, in the committee's opinion, change the case, since the charges against Mr. Matteson were known to the people of his district before they reelected him. With the judgment pronounced by the House in the Thirty-fourth Congress, its power ended. Mr. Matteson was thenceforth amenable only to the people of his district.

The views of the minority, signed by Mr. Samuel R. Curtis, of Iowa, expressed the opinion that the House had the inherent power to protect itself against external and internal corruption; and that, under the Constitution, the House might expel for whatever reasons might seem necessary to guard against blight, decay, or destruction. The power was plenary; restrained by the two-thirds vote in order to prevent tyrannical exercise. The power to expel was not merely the power to inflict punishment. It was the power to remove an obstacle to the progress of legitimate business and secure a wholesome exercise of the House's function.

The report of the committee was considered on March 27, and during consideration of the resolution recommended by the majority the whole subject was laid on the table, yeas 96, nays 69.

1286. Members being charged with bribery committed several years before the election of the then existing House, the House preferred censure to expulsion, but declined to express doubt as to the power to expel.

Discussion of the power of expulsion in its relations to offenses committed before the Member's election; and in relation to the power of impeachment.

A Member against whom a resolution of expulsion was pending was permitted to address the House as a matter of right.

Charges having been made against the Speaker, he called another Member to the chair and from the floor moved a committee of investigation.

The Speaker being implicated by certain charges, a Speaker pro tempore selected from the minority party was empowered to appoint a committee of investigation.

On December 2, 1872,[1] the Speaker[2] called Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, a member of the minority party on the floor, to the chair, and having taken the floor on a question of privilege[3] addressed the House on the subject of certain charges, made against himself and other Members of the House, in connection with the Credit Mobilier corporation and the Union Pacific Railroad Company. He concluded his remarks by moving a resolution that a special investigating committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker pro tempore to ascertain whether any Members had been bribed.

The Speaker pro tempore[4] named the following committee: Luke P. Poland, of Vermont; Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts; James B. Beck, of Kentucky; William E. Niblack, of Indiana; and George W. McCrary, of Iowa. On December 3, Mr. Beck asked to be excused, and the question being put the House excused him from service. The Speaker thereupon called Mr. Cox to the chair again, and the latter appointed Mr. William M. Merrick, of Maryland, to the vacancy.

[3] The language of the Journal (p. 8) is: "Mr. Blaine, by unanimous consent (Mr. Cox occupying the chair), submitted," etc. As the matter was evidently privileged the unanimous consent was apparently asked to enable the Speaker to participate in debate. See sections 1367–1376 of this volume.

[4] Samuel S. Cox, of New York, Speaker pro tempore.

The committee made its report on February 18, 1873, embodying its findings of fact and recommendations in the following resolutions: [1]

1. Whereas Mr. Oakes Ames, a Representative in this House from the State of Massachusetts, has been guilty of selling to Members of Congress shares of stock in the Credit Mobilier of America for prices much below the true value of such stock, with intent thereby to influence the votes and decisions of such Members in matters to be brought before Congress for action: Therefore,

Resolved, That Mr. Oakes Ames be, and he is hereby, expelled from his seat as a Member of this House.

2. Whereas Mr. James Brooks, a Representative in this House from the State of New York, did procure the Credit Mobilier Company to issue and deliver to Charles H. Neilson, for the use and benefit of said Brooks, 50 shares of the stock of said company at a price much below its real value, well knowing that the same was so issued and delivered with intent to influence the votes and decisions of said Brooks as a Member of the House in matters to be brought before Congress for action, and also to influence the action of said Brooks as a Government director in the Union Pacific Railroad Company: Therefore,

Resolved, That Mr. James Brooks be, and he is hereby, expelled from his seat as a Member of this House.

The statement of facts in the report shows that these transactions occurred before Messrs. Brooks and Ames were elected to the Forty-second Congress. The report says:

In considering what action we ought to recommend to the House upon these facts, the committee encounters a question which has been much debated: Has this House power and jurisdiction to inquire concerning offenses committed by its Members prior to their election, and to punish them by censure or expulsion? The committee are unanimous upon the right of jurisdiction of this House over the cases of Mr. Ames and Mr. Brooks, upon the facts found in regard to them. Upon the question of jurisdiction the committee present the following views:

The Constitution in the fifth section of the first article, defines the power of either House as follows: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a Member."

It will be observed that there is no qualification of the power, but there is an important qualification of the manner of its exercise—it must be done "with the concurrence of two-thirds."

The close analogy between this power and the power of impeachment is deserving of consideration.

The great purpose of the power of impeachment is to remove an unfit and unworthy incumbent from office, and though a judgment of impeachment may to some extent operate as punishment, that is not its principal object. Members of Congress are not subject to be impeached, but may be expelled, and the principal purpose of expulsion is not as punishment, but to remove a Member whose character and conduct show that he is an unfit man to participate in the deliberations and decisions of the body, and whose presence in it tends to bring the body into contempt and disgrace.

In both cases it is a power of purgation and purification to be exercised for the public safety, and, in the case of expulsion, for the protection and character of the House. The Constitution defines the causes of impeachment, to wit, "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." The office of the power of expulsion is so much the same as that of the power to impeach that we think it may be safely assumed that whatever would be a good cause of impeachment would also be a good cause of expulsion.

It has never been contended that the power to impeach for any of the causes enumerated was intended to be restricted to those which might occur after appointment to a civil office, so that a civil officer who had secretly committed such offense before his appointment should not be subject upon detection and exposure to be convicted and removed from office. Every consideration of justice and sound policy would seem to require that the public interests be secured, and those chosen to be their guardians be free from the pollution of high crimes, no matter at what time that pollution had attached.

If this be so in regard to other civil officers, under institutions which rest upon the intelligence and virtue of the people, can it well be claimed that the law-making Representative may be vile and criminal with impunity, provided the evidences of his corruption are found to antedate his election?

[1] Journal, p. 429; Globe, pp. 1462–1468; House Report No. 77, Third session Forty-second Congress.

The committee then discuss the cases of Smith [1] and Marshall in the Senate, of Wilkes in the English Parliament, and of Matteson [2] in the House of Representatives, and continues:

The committee have no occasion in this report to discuss the question as to the power or duty of the House in a case where a constituency, with a full knowledge of the objectionable character of a man, have selected him to be their representative. It is hardly a case to be supposed that any constituency, with a full knowledge that a man had been guilty of an offense involving moral turpitude, would elect him. The majority of the committee are not prepared to concede such a man could be forced upon the House, and would not consider the expulsion of such a man any violation of the rights of the electors, for while the electors have rights that should be respected, the House as a body has rights also that should be protected and preserved. But that in such case the judgment of the constituency would be entitled to the greatest consideration, and that this should form an important element in its determination, is readily admitted.

It is universally conceded, as we believe, that the House has ample jurisdiction to punish or expel a Member for an offense committed during his term as a Member, though committed during a vacation of Congress and in no way connected with his duties as a Member. Upon what principle is it that such a jurisdiction can be maintained? It must be upon one or both of the following: That the offense shows him to be an unworthy and improper man to be a Member, or that his conduct brings odium and reproach upon the body. But suppose the offense has been committed prior to his election, but comes to light afterwards, is the effect upon his own character, or the reproach and disgrace upon the body, if they allow him to remain a Member, any the less? We can see no difference in principle in the two cases, and to attempt any would be to create a purely technical and arbitrary distinction, having no just foundation. In our judgment the time is not at all material, except it be coupled with the further fact that he was reelected with a knowledge on the part of his constituents of what he had been guilty, and in such event we have given our views of the effect.

It seems to us absurd to say that an election has given a man political absolution for an offense which was unknown to his constituents. If it be urged again, as it has sometimes been, that this view of the power of the House, and the true ground of its proper exercise, may be laid hold of and used improperly, it may be answered that no rule, however narrow and limited, that may be adopted can prevent it. If two-thirds of the House shall see fit to expel a man because they do not like his political or religious principles, or without any reason at all, they have the power, and there is no remedy except by appeal to the people. Such exercise of the power would be wrongful, and violative of the principles of the Constitution, but we see no encouragement of such wrong in the views we hold.

As to this general subject of the jurisdictional power of the House, Messrs. Niblack and McCrary preferred to express no opinion, but the entire committee were united upon the following:

The subject-matter upon which the action of Members was intended to be influenced was of a continuous character, and was as likely to be a subject of Congressional action in future Congresses as in the Fortieth. The influences brought to bear on Members were as likely to be operative on them in the future as in the present, and were so intended. Mr. Ames and Mr. Brooks have both continued Members of the House to the present time, and so have most of the Members upon whom these influences were sought to be exerted. The committee are, therefore, of opinion that the acts of these men may properly be treated as offenses against the present House, and so within its jurisdiction upon the most limited rule.

On February 24, before the resolutions of the investigating committee had been acted on by the House, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report [1] on the testimony taken by the investigating committee, particularly on the question whether or not it warranted articles of impeachment of any officer of the United States. This report reviewed the argument of the investigating committee on the subjects of impeachment and expulsion, and reached opposite conclusions. The members of the Judiciary Committee who joined with Mr. Butler in this report were Messrs. John A. Bingham, of Ohio; Charles A. Eldredge, of Wisconsin; John A. Peters, of Maine; Lazarus D. Shoemaker, of Pennsylvania, and Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana. Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, dissented from the report; and Mr. Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana, concurred in so much of the report as related to impeachment but expressed no opinion on the subject of expulsion.

The report combats the idea that impeachment and expulsion are similar or analogous proceedings. Impeachment disqualified the impeached from ever after holding office; the expelled Member might be reelected after expulsion. Neither impeachment nor expulsion should be invoked for offenses committed before election. The report continues:

> The plain words of the Constitution seem to us clearly to indicate that the power of expulsion is a protective, not a primitive, provision of the Constitution. It is found in section 5 of Article I: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member." Expel for what? For disorderly behavior, i.e., for that behavior which renders him unfit to do his duties as a Member of the House, or that present condition of mind or body which makes it unsafe or improper for the House to have him in it. We submit, with some confidence, that the House might expel an insane man, because it might not be safe or convenient for the House to have him within the legislative Hall. They can also expel a man for disorderly proceedings in the body, or for such acts outside of the body as render it at the time manifestly improper for him to be in the House. But your committee are constrained to believe that the power of expelling a Member for some alleged crime, committed, it may be, years before his election, is not within the constitutional prerogative of the House.
> We do not overlook the argument presented by the learned committee, upon whose report we are observing, by the phrase: "Every consideration of justice and sound policy would seem to require that the public interests be secured and those chosen to be their guardians be free from pollution of high crimes, no matter at what time that pollution had attached." But the answer seems to us an obvious one that the Constitution has given to the House of Representatives no constitutional power over such considerations of "justice and sound policy" as a qualification in representation. On the contrary, the Constitution has given this power to another and higher tribunal, to wit, the constituency of the Member. Every intendment of our form of government would seem to point to that. This is a Government of the people, which assumes that they are the best judges of the social, intellectual, and moral qualifications of their representatives, whom they are to choose, not anybody else to choose for them; and we, therefore, find in the people's Constitution and frame of government they have, in the very first article and second section, determined that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the States," not by Representatives chosen for them at the will and caprice of Members of Congress from other States according to the notions of the "necessities of self-preservation and self-purification," which might suggest themselves to the reason or the caprice of the Members from other States in any process of purgation or purification which two-thirds of the Members of either House may "deem necessary" to prevent bringing "the body into contempt and disgrace."
> Your committee are further emboldened to take this view of this very important constitutional question, because they find that in the same section it is provided what shall be the qualifications of a representative of the people, so chosen by the people themselves. On this it is solemnly enacted, unchanged during the life of the nation, that "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

[1] Third session Forty-second Congress, House Report No. 81.

Your committee believe that there is no man or body of men who can add or take away one jot or title of these qualifications. The enumeration of such specified qualifications necessarily excludes every other. It is respectfully submitted that it is nowhere provided that the House of Representatives shall consist of such Members as are left after the process of "purgation and purification" shall have been exercised for the public safety, such as may be "deemed necessary" by any majority of the House. The power itself seems to us too dangerous, the claim of power too exaggerated, to be confided in any body of men; and, therefore, most wisely retained in the people themselves, by the express words of the Constitution.

The report then discusses the dangers that might arise from the contrary view, the precedents in the Smith, Marshall, and Wilkes cases, and concludes the argument as follows:

Our opinion upon the whole matter, therefore, is that the right of representation is the right of the constituency, and not that of the Representative, and, so long as he does nothing which is disorderly or renders him unfit to be in the House while a Member thereof, that, except for the safety of the House, or the Members thereof, or for its own protection, the House has no right or legal constitutional jurisdiction or power to expel the Member. We see no constitutional warrant for his expulsion upon any other ground, and especially not upon the ground of purgation and purification as set forth in the report of the learned committee, against which your committee most earnestly and respectfully protest.

Your committee do not feel called upon to discuss in this connection the legal consequences following from the doctrine of continuation of the offense in a man once receiving a bribe, because, if it may be laid with a continuando at all, the offense must continue to affect him ever after, and therefore, having once taken a bribe, he is always deemed to be under the effect of it, for the reason that we are inclined to believe that at some time the effect of the bribe might have spent its force, and it would hardly be a safe rule of legal action to undertake to determine whether that would not happen in five years and might happen in ten. Certainly such considerations would not apply to one who had given a bribe, because the virtue thereof all went out of him when he parted with his money, and there was nothing left in him save the loss of it.

For the reasons so hastily stated, and many more which might be adduced, your committee conclude that both the impeaching power bestowed upon the two Houses by the Constitution and the power of expulsion are remedial only, and not punitive, so as to extend to all crimes at all times, and are not to be used in any constitutional sense or right for the purpose of punishing any man for a crime committed before he became a Member of the House, or in case of a civil officer, as just cause of impeachment; but we agree the analogy stated by the learned committee on Credit Mobilier is in so far perfect. Both are alike remedial, neither punitive.

On February 25, 1873,[1] the consideration of the report began in the House. On that day the Speaker said:

The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Ames, affected by this report, desires to be heard. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. Ames thereupon sent his remarks to the desk to be read.[2]

On February 26 Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California, offered a substitute for the resolutions, which, after modification, was as follows:

Whereas by the report of the special committee herein it appears that the acts charged as offenses against Members of this House in connection with the Credit Mobilier occurred more than five years ago, and long before the election of such persons to this Congress, two elections by the people having intervened; and whereas grave doubts exist as to the rightful exercise by this House of its power to expel a

Member for offenses committed by such Member long before his election thereto, and not connected with such election: Therefore

Resolved, That the special committee be discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

Resolved, That the House absolutely condemns the conduct of Oakes Ames, a Member of thisHouse from Massachusetts, in seeking to procure Congressional attention to the affairs of a corporation in which he was interested, and whose interest directly depended upon the legislation of Congress, by inducing Members of Congress to invest in the stocks of said corporation.

Resolved, That this House absolutely condemns the conduct of James Brooks, a Member of this House from New York, for the use of his position of Government director of the Union Pacific Railroad and of Member of this House to procure the assignment to himself or family of stock in the Credit Mobilier of America, a corporation having a contract with the Union Pacific Railroad, and whose interests depended directly upon the legislation of Congress.

A motion to lay the whole subject on the table was negatived on February 27 by a vote of yeas 58, nays 165.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the substitute, which was agreed to, yeas 115, nays 110.

Thereupon voting began on the original resolutions as amended by the substitute, the first vote being taken on the resolution condemning Oakes Ames. This was adopted, yeas 182, nays 36. Then the resolution condemning James Brooks was agreed to, yeas 174, nays 32.

The resolution discharging the committee having been disagreed to, yeas 104, nays 114, the question recurred on the preamble. Mr. Charles A. Eldredge, of Wisconsin, called for a separate vote on the two propositions of the preamble.

The Speaker ruled that the preamble was not divisible.

The question recurring on the adoption of the preamble, a motion to lay on the table was disagreed to, yeas 78, nays 134. Then the preamble was disagreed to, yeas 98, nays 113.[1]

1287. The Speaker has questioned the right of a Member to discuss as privileged charges relating to his conduct at a period before he became a Member.—On May 23, 1884,[2] Mr. William Pitt Kellogg, of Louisiana, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, after remarks submitted the following:

Whereas in the investigation as to the prosecution of the star route cases before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice evidence has been given which reflects upon the character of William Pitt Kellogg, a Member of this House: Therefore,

Resolved, That said committee be directed to investigate the subject of said Kellogg's alleged connection with the "star route" service, and whether he received money for services rendered in a matter pending before one of the Departments of the Government, or whether he paid money to any officer of the Government on account of or in connection with said service; and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, etc.

Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, made the point of order, as Mr. Kellogg proceeded with his remarks, that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[3] called attention to the fact that the transactions occurred in 1879, and said:

The Chair has intimated heretofore that this House has no right to punish a Member for any offense alleged to have been committed previous to the time when he was elected as a Member of the House. That has been so frequently decided in the House that it is no longer a matter of dispute. The resolution which the gentleman sends up directs the committee to investigate certain charges made against the Member from Louisiana, but does not state the time when the alleged offense was committed, if at all, so that the resolution may be entirely in order, but the gentleman from Louisiana is discussing matters which he admits occurred several years ago and before his election. He can not proceed to discuss such matters without unanimous consent, as was decided in the Forty-sixth Congress in the case of Mr. Chalmers, of Mississippi.

Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, urged that the House should not investigate the conduct of a Member at a time prior to his election to the House. On the other hand, it was urged that the report in the Credit Mobilier cases, as well as in the case of Blount, in the Senate, justified such an investigation. Finally, on motion of Mr. Hammond, by a vote of ayes 82, noes 49, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No report appears to have been made.[1]

1288. In the case of Humphrey Marshall, accused of committing a crime before his election, the Senate declined to proceed in the absence of prosecuting action from the constituency.

The Senate held, in 1796, that for a crime alleged to have been committed before his election, but for which the courts had not held him to answer, a Senator should not be tried by the Senate.

On February 26, 1796,[2] the Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter from the governor of Kentucky, with a memorial, making serious charges against the character of Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from Kentucky. On February 29 these papers were, on motion of Mr. Marshall, referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. Samuel Livermore, of New Hampshire; James Ross, of Pennsylvania; Rufus King, of New York; John Rutherfurd, of New Jersey, and Caleb Strong, of Massachusetts.

On March 17 the committee submitted a report, which, after being amended by the Senate in slight particulars where personal questions might be raised, stood as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the letter of the governor and the memorial of the representatives of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, report:

That the representatives of the freemen of Kentucky state in their memorial that in February, 1795, a pamphlet was published by George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian (who were two judges of the court of appeals), in which they say that Humphrey Marshall had a suit in chancery in the said court of appeals, in which it appearing manifest from the oath of the complainant, from disinterested testimony, from records, from documents furnished by himself, and from the contradictions contained in his own answer, that he had committed a gross fraud, the court gave a decree against him; and that in the course of the investigation he was publicly charged with perjury. That Mr. Marshall, in a publication in the Kentucky Gazette, called for a specification of the charge; to which the said George Muter and Benjamin Sebastian, in a like publication, replied that he was guilty of perjury in his answer to the bill in chancery exhibited against him by James Wilkinson, and that they would plead justification to any suit brought against them therefor. That no such suit, as the said representatives could learn, had been brought. The said representatives further say that they do not mean to give an opinion on the justice of the said charge, but request that an investigation may immediately take place relative thereto.

[2] Election Cases, Senate Document No. 11, special session Fifty-eighth Congress, p. 168.

Your committee observe that the said suit was tried eighteen months before Mr. Marshall was chosen a Member of the Senate, and that previous to his election mutual accusations had taken place between him and the judges of the said court relating to the same suit.

The representatives of Kentucky have not furnished any copy of Mr. Marshall's answer on oath, nor have they stated any part of the testimony, or produced any of the said records or documents, or the copy of any paper in the cause, nor have they intimated a design to bring forward those or any other proofs.

Your committee are informed by the other Senator and the two Representatives in Congress from Kentucky that they have not been requested by the legislature of that State to prosecute this inquiry, and that they are not possessed of any evidence in the case, and that they believe no person is authorized to appear on behalf of the legislature.

Mr. Marshall is solicitous that a full investigation of the subject shall take place in the Senate, and urges the principle that consent takes away error, as applying, on this occasion, to give the Senate jurisdiction; but, as no person appears to prosecute, and there is no evidence adduced to the Senate, nor even a specific charge, the committee think any further inquiry by the Senate would be improper. If there were no objections of this sort, the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained. They think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If, in the present case, the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged by the memorialists why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offense. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And the committee are compelled, by a sense of justice, to declare that in their opinion the presumption in favor of Mr. Marshall is not diminished by the recriminating publications which manifest strong resentment against him.

And they are also of opinion that as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate the consent of the party can not give it; and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed.

Resolved, That the Vice-President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing report to the governor of Kentucky.

A motion to expunge the last clause was disagreed to, yeas 7, nays 16.

On the question to expunge these words "If there were no objections of this sort, the committee would still be of opinion that the memorial could not be sustained," it passed in the negative.

On the question to expunge the following words: "They think that in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. If in the present case the party has been guilty in the manner suggested, no reason has been alleged why he has not long since been tried in the State and district where he committed the offense. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent"—it passed in the negative.

Also by a vote of yeas 7, nays 17, the Senate decided in the negative a motion to postpone the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter from the governor and the memorial of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, with the papers accompanying them, together with the motions of amendment made thereon, in order to consider the following resolution:

Whereas the honorable legislature of the State of Kentucky have, by their memorial, transmitted by the governor of the said State, informed the Senate that Humphrey Marshall, a Senator from the said State, had been publicly charged with the crime of perjury, and requested that an inquiry might be thereupon instituted, in which request the said Humphrey Marshall has united; and it being highly interesting, as well to the honor of the said State as to that of the Senate, and an act of justice due to the character of the said Humphrey Marshall that such inquiry should be had, therefore

Resolved, That the Senate will proceed to the examination of the said charge on the ———— day of the next session of Congress; that, in the opinion of the Senate, a conviction or acquittal in the ordinary courts of justice of the said State would be the most satisfactory evidence on this occasion; but that, if this should not be attainable, by reason of any act of limitation or other legal impediment, such other evidence will be received as the nature of the case may admit and require.

Resolved, That the Vice-President be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to the governor of the said State.

On March 22, the Senate by a vote of yeas 16, nays 8, agreed to the report in the form given above.

1289. In the case of William N. Roach, charged with a crime alleged to have been committed before his election, the Senate discussed its power in such a case but took no action.—In 1893[1] the Senate discussed the case of William N. Roach, Senator from North Dakota.

On the 28th day of March, 1893, Mr. Hoar submitted a resolution providing for an investigation of certain allegations charging Mr. Roach with the offense of criminal embezzlement. On the 10th day of April, 1893 a substitute for this resolution was introduced by Mr. Hoax, and on the 14th day of April, 1893, a substitute for the resolutions then pending in said matter was introduced by Mr. Gorman. The resolution and the substitutes were the subject of debate in the Senate, but no action was had or taken thereon.

It appears from the debates that the case presented the question as to the right of the Senate to take cognizance of an accusation against a Senator of an offense committed before his election to the Senate.[2]

Chapter XLIII

DELEGATES

1290. Each Territory sends to the House a Delegate having the right of debating but not of voting.

The statutes specify the qualifications of the electors of Delegates.

A Delegate is elected by a plurality of votes, and the governor is required to declare the election, in accordance with which a certificate is issued.

Section 1862 of the Revised Statutes says:

> Every Territory shall have the right to send a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress, who shall be elected by the voters in the Territory qualified to elect members of the legislative assembly thereof. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected, and a certificate shall be given accordingly. Every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right of debating, but not of voting.[4]

The words "right of debating, but not of voting," were taken from the act of March 3, 1817,[5] but that act in turn had taken them verbatim from the "ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio" passed by the Continental Congress July 13, 1787.[6]

1291. Delegates from the Territories have the right to make motions.— On February 22, 1849,[1] Mr. Henry H. Sibley, of Wisconsin Territory, moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of enabling him to move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate (No. 152) entitled "An act to establish the Territorial government of Minnesota."

This motion being decided in the affirmative, two-thirds voting in favor thereof, Mr. Sibley made the motion to discharge the committee, etc., and the House proceeded to consider the bill.

The question being upon agreeing to amendments, Mr. Sibley moved the previous question.

Mr. Nathaniel Boyden, of North Carolina, raised the point of order that a Delegate from a Territory, not having the right to vote, clearly had not the right to move the previous question.

The Speaker[2] stated that—

By the act of March 3, 1817, it is provided—

"That in every Territory of the United States in which a temporary government has been or hereafter shall be established, and which, by virtue of the ordinance of Congress of the 13th of July, 1787, or of any subsequent act of Congress passed or to be passed, now hath or hereafter shall have the right to send a Delegate to Congress, such Delegate shall be elected every second year, for the same term of two years for which Members of the House of Representatives of the United States are elected; and in that House each of the said Delegates shall have a seat with the right of debating, but not of voting.[3]

It is clear that the gentleman from Wisconsin has no right to vote. The Chair has had some doubt whether the gentleman has the right to make a motion. It has, however, been the uniform practice of the House to allow Delegates to make motions. The gentleman from Wisconsin himself made the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of bringing the question before the House. That is a motion quite as important as the previous question, as it sets aside all the rules of the House relating to the order of business. Gentlemen from the Territories are habitually called for petitions and resolutions, under an express rule of the House, and always have been allowed to move the reference of them.[4] The Chair believes, upon the whole, that delegates from the Territories could not subserve the purposes for which they are sent here unless they have the right to make motions; and as the law does not expressly deny them that right, the Chair is disposed to accord to them the largest liberty.

From this decision Mr. Boyden appealed. The House sustained the Chair.

1292. A Delegate may make any motion which a Member may make, except the motion to reconsider.—On August 20, 1850,[5] Mr. Samuel R. Thurston, of Oregon Territory, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the legislative assembly of Oregon, praying for a donation of land to settlers, etc. Mr. Thurston moved that the said memorial be referred to the Committee on Territories. Mr. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, made the point of order that, under a decision of the Committee of the Whole,[6] in affirmance of a decision of its Chairman, it was not competent for a Delegate from a Territory to make a motion, and, consequently, that the motion submitted by the Delegate from Oregon [Mr. Thurston] could not be entertained by the House.

The Speaker[1] stated that, if the point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Thompson] was an original question, for the first time presented for consideration, he should be strongly inclined to hold, under the provisions of the Constitution and the law of 1817, that the Delegate could not make a motion. But the long-continued practice of the House, commencing with the first organization of Territorial governments, in connection with the express provisions of the rules—one of which provided that the Territories shall be called for resolutions on each alternate Monday during the session—had, in his judgment, settled this question. Unless a Delegate could offer a resolution it would be a useless provision to call his Territory for resolutions; and the Chair was unable to discriminate between motions relating to Territorial business and any others, except a motion to reconsider, which, being dependent upon the right to vote, could not be exercised by a Delegate. The Chair therefore overruled the point of order.

Mr. Armistead Burt having appealed from the decision of the Chair, the ruling was sustained by a vote of 111 yeas to 62 nays.

1293. A Delegate may not object to the consideration of a measure.— On June 6, 1866,[2] Mr. Henry J. Raymond, of New York, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported Senate Joint Resolution No. 69, making appropriation to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes.

Mr. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from the Territory of Dakota, insisted that the bill, making an appropriation, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Speaker[3] said:

> The Chair is of the opinion that a Delegate is not entitled to make such an objection as will prevent the joint resolution from being now considered. * * * The gentleman is sent here as a Delegate to discuss the merits of all questions in regard to the Territory of Dakota or elsewhere, but he is not entitled to a vote.

1294. On March 2 1901,[4] Mr. John H. Stephens, of Texas, asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 213) setting aside certain lands within the Mescalero Indian Reservation, in New Mexico, for the use of the Indians thereon, and providing for the sale of the residue of the lands therein for the benefit of said tribe of Indians.

Mr. Stephens having stated that the Delegate from New Mexico was opposed to the bill, Mr. Eugene F. Loud, of California, said that he would object, as the Delegate was not in a position to oppose.

1295. A Delegate may call a Member to order in debate.—On January 14, 1811,[5] Mr. Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts had the floor, and was debating the bill to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of such State into the Union.

For words spoken, Mr. George Poindexter, Delegate from Mississippi Territory, called Mr. Quincy to order.

Mr. Joseph Lewis, Jr., of Virginia, asked for a decision as to whether or not "a Delegate, holding a seat in this House by courtesy alone,[1] without a right to vote, has a right to call any Member of the House to order."

The Speaker[2] decided that the Delegate might call the Member to order.

1296. The House declined to allow a Delegate to introduce an interpreter on the floor.—On February 27, 1854,[3] a proposition was made to authorize Hon. Jose M. Gallegos, Delegate from New Mexico, to introduce an interpreter on the floor. Although it was shown that Mr. Gallegos could not understand a word of English, the House did not favor the proposition, and it failed to be agreed to.

1297. Delegates are appointed as additional members of certain committees, where they possess the same powers and privileges as in the House, and may make any motion except to reconsider.

Different views of the House as to the propriety of permitting a Delegate to serve on a committee.

Form and history of section 1 of Rule XII.

Rule XII, section 1, provides:

> The Speaker shall appoint from among the Delegates one additional Member on each of the following committees, viz: Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Agriculture; Military Affairs; Post-Office and Post-Roads; Public Lands; Indian Affairs; Private Land Claims; Mines and Mining, and two on Territories; and they shall possess in their respective committees the same powers and privileges as in the House, and may make any motion except to reconsider.

This rule is in the form of the revision of 1880,[4] except that the Committee on Private Land Claims was added on December 21, 1887,[5] and the number of Delegates on the Committee on Territories was increased to two on February 1, 1892.[6] The form of 1880 was taken from the old rule No. 162, which dated from December 12, 1871,[7] when a rule was adopted giving Delegates places on the Committee on Territories and District of Columbia.[8] The rule was regarded as an innovation, and the propriety of permitting a Delegate to have a place on a committee was questioned.[9] On December 6, 1872,[10] Mr. Jerome B. Chaffee, of Colorado, proposed that Delegates be named on the Committees of Indian Affairs, Mines and Mining, Public Lands, and Private Land Claims; but it was not until March 29, 1876,[11] that the enlargement was actually effected.

1298. Delegates have sometimes been appointed on committees other than those mentioned in Rule XII.—On December 23, 1891,[1] at the time of the appointment of the committees of the House, Mr. Speaker Crisp named Mr. John T. Caine, of Utah, a Delegate, on the committees on Pacific Railroads and Irrigation of Arid Lands, although those were not among the committees specified by Rule XII as committees on which Delegates shall be appointed by the Speaker. On February 8, 1892,[2] the Speaker assigned committee places to Delegates in accordance with Rule XII, Mr. Caine being appointed to Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and Private Land Claims. He continued to hold these places with the two to which he was appointed December 23.[3]

1299. A Delegate has been appointed chairman of a select committee.—On December 21, 1811,[4] Mr. George Poindexter, Delegate from Mississippi Territory, moved that the letter of Cowles Mead, speaker of the house of representatives of the Mississippi Territory, with the presentment of the grand jury of Baldwin County, in said Territory, against Harry Toulmin, judge of the superior court of Washington district, be referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon to the House.

The motion being agreed to, Mr. Poindexter was appointed chairman of the committee, and in due time made the report from the committee to the House.

1300. In the earlier practice Delegates appear to have voted in committees; but such is not the later rule.—On February 23, 1884,[5] a proposition was made to allow Delegates the right to vote in committees of which they were members. It was referred to the Committee on Rules, with no result.

1301. On September 3, 1841,[6] in a report on the qualifications of David Levy, Delegate from Florida, the Committee on Elections incidentally say in their report:

> With the single exception of voting, the Delegate enjoys every other privilege and exercises every other right of a Representative. He can act as a member of a standing or special committee and vote on the business before said committees, and he may thus exercise an important influence on those initiatory proceedings by which business is prepared for the action of the House. He is also required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

1302. An instance wherein a Delegate was appointed a teller.—On January 13, 1904,[7] during consideration of the legislative appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. J. S. Wilson, Delegate from Arizona, offered an amendment relating to the salaries of certain officials in that Territory.

After debate the question was put on agreeing to the amendment, and tellers were ordered.

Thereupon the Chairman[1] appointed as tellers Mr. Henry H. Bingham, of Pennsylvania, the Member in charge of the bill, who had opposed the amendment, and Mr. Wilson, the Delegate, who had proposed it.

1303. Impeachment proceedings have been moved by a Delegate.

A Delegate was appointed chairman of a committee to inquire into the conduct of a judge, and was authorized by the House to cause testimony to be taken.

On April 11, 1808,[2] the Speaker presented to the House sundry resolutions of the legislative council and house of representatives of the Mississippi Territory, instructing George Poindexter, the Delegate in Congress from the said Territory, to impeach Peter B. Bruin, presiding judge of that Territory, on the charges of neglect of duty and drunkenness on the bench.

Thereupon Mr. Poindexter offered this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Peter B. Bruin, one of the judges of the superior court of the Mississippi Territory; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Objection being made to proceeding to impeachment proceedings without further investigation, and especially to doing so on the instance not of a State but of a Territorial legislature, Mr. Poindexter, "at the suggestion of experienced gentlemen," modified his resolution by striking out the words "prepare and report" and inserting in their place "inquire into the expediency of preferring."

On April 18,[3] the House considered the resolution and agreed to a substitute as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of Peter B. Bruin, judge, etc., and report whether, in their opinion, he hath so acted, in his official capacity, as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Mr. Poindexter was appointed chairman of this committee, and on April 21,[4] the House by resolution authorized him to have depositions taken according to the terms of this resolution:

Resolved, That George Poindexter, chairman of said committee, be authorized to cause to be taken before a magistrate or other proper officer such depositions in relation to the official conduct of the said judge as, in his judgment, may be material to the inquiry, having first notified the said Bruin of the time and place, or places, of taking such depositions, so that he may give his attendance; and that the depositions so taken be laid before Congress at their next session.

1304. A Delegate resigns his seat in a communication addressed to the Speaker.—On February 21, 1831,[5] Mr. John Biddle, Delegate from the Territory of Michigan, by a letter addressed to the Speaker, communicated his resignation of his seat in the House.

The letter was read, ordered to lie on the table, and appears in full in the Journal.

1305. A Delegate who had used insulting language in debate and declined to retract it was, by order of the House, arrested, brought to the bar, and censured by the Speaker.

A declaration by a Member in debate that another Member has knowingly stated that which is false is unparliamentary and censurable.

On February 4, 1869,[1] during consideration of the bill (H. R. 1738) making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian department, Mr. E. D. Holbrook, Delegate from Idaho, was called to order for the use of the following words:

> And after the gentleman having charge of this bill saw fit to silence Delegates here by raising points of order and making assertions which he knew at the time he made them to be unqualifiedly false.

The words having been taken down on the demand of a Member, and the ruling of the Chair having been asked, the Speaker[2] said:

> The Chair rules that these words are out of order, both as being unparliamentary and as being indecorous. Where a Member states that what another Member has said is not true that is not unparliamentary, because it is possible that the Member may have been mistaken. But when a gentleman states that a Member on this floor has declared that which he knew to be unqualifiedly false, that is the most insulting language that can be uttered in a parliamentary body.

Mr. Holbrook having declined to retract, Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution:

> Resolved, That E. D. Holbrook, Delegate from the Territory of Idaho, having uttered the following words in debate: "and after the gentlemen having charge of this bill saw fit to silence Delegates here by raising points of order and making assertions which he knew at the time he made them to be unqualifiedly false," distinctly in the presence of the House, and having refused to retract the same, be, and he is hereby, immediately arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms to be brought to the bar of the House and severely censured by the Speaker.

During these proceedings attention was called to a former ruling of the Speaker when Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, used similar language, but the Speaker replied that this case must be settled by itself.

The resolution was agreed to under operation of the previous question, and Mr. Holbrook, being brought to the bar in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and censured, the Speaker saying:

> Mr. Holbrook, oftentimes in a deliberative body, in the discussion of exciting questions, language is used which, when attention is called to it, is promptly withdrawn. We are all fallible, and hence are liable to yield sometimes to the temptation to indulge in language not seemly or proper; but when the language employed is offensive in its character, and apparently, from the construction of the sentence, intended to be insulting, and when, an opportunity being given for its withdrawal, that opportunity is not taken advantage of, thus reiterating the insult to a fellow-member, uttered upon the floor of the House, it has always been deemed by deliberative assemblies censurable by the body with which both Members are connected. This instance is, in the opinion of the House, of that character, and the House has instructed its Speaker to censure you at its bar. I therefore, by order of the House, pronounce upon you its censure for the language which you have uttered in its hearing. You will resume your seat.

1307. Dignity of the Speaker's office and principles governing its administration.—On December 1, 1823,[1] Mr. Speaker Clay, in taking the chair, thus described the principles regulating the duties of the Speaker:

They enjoin promptitude and impartiality in deciding the various questions of order as they arise; firmness and dignity in his deportment toward the House; patience, good temper, and courtesy toward the individual Members, and the best arrangement and distribution of the talent of the House, in its numerous subdivisions, for the dispatch of the public business, and the fair exhibition of every subject presented for consideration. They especially require of him, in those moments of agitation from which no deliberative assembly is always entirely exempt, to remain cool and unshaken amidst all the storms of debate, carefully guarding the preservation of the permanent laws and rules of the House from being sacrificed to temporary passions, prejudices, or interests.

1308. On March 3, 1893,[2] in presenting the usual resolution of thanks to the Speaker, ex-Speaker Reed [3] said of the office of Speaker:

No factional or party malice ought ever to strive to diminish his standing or lessen his esteem in the eyes of Members or of the world. No disappointments or defeats ought ever to be permitted to show themselves to the injury of that high place. Whoever at any time, whether for purposes of censure or rebuke or from any other motive, attempts to lower the prestige of that office, by just so much lowers the prestige of the House itself, whose servant and exponent the Speaker is. No attack, whether open or covert, can be made upon that great office without leaving to the future a legacy of disorder and of bad government. This is not because the Speaker is himself a sacred creation; it is because he is the embodiment of the House, its power and dignity.

1309. On taking the chair, on March 4, 1871,[4] Mr. Speaker Blaine said:

Chosen by the party representing the political majority in this House, the Speaker owes a faithful allegiance to the principles and policy of that party; but he will fall far below the honorable requirements of his station if he fails to give to the minority their full rights under the rules which he is called upon to administer.[5]

[4] First session Forty-second Congress, Globe, p. 6.

[5] On February 2, 1905, a question arose as to the social rank of the Speaker. The President had invited the Speaker to a state dinner to the Supreme Court, and asked him if he would object to a seat below the Attorney-General. The Speaker (Mr. Cannon) replied that were it a private dinner he would be content with any place the host might assign to him; and were he a private individual he would be equally pleased with whatever course the host might take; but he felt that in attending a state dinner as Speaker of the House he might not waive the position to which he was entitled officially. At the dinner in question, the Chief Justice, as the guest of honor, would of course sit on the right of the host. The Vice-President, if there were one, on the left, and the Speaker of the House in the third place. And in the failure of a Vice-President the Speaker should have the second place. Rather than waive this the Speaker asked to be excused from attending. (See Benton's Thirty Years' View, Vol. I, p. 118, for Speaker Macon's assertion of his position.)

The rules of the House, in section 1 of Rule I, prescribe:

The Speaker shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting, immediately call the Members to order,[1] and on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read,[2] having previously examined and approved the same.[3]

This is the form reported by the Committee on Rules, who made the revision in the Forty-sixth Congress.[4] The substance was derived from old rule No. 1, which dated from the first rules, April 7, 1789,[5] and which, with unimportant changes, forms all of the present rule except the portion relating to the examination and correction of the Journal. That was taken from old Rule No. 5, which dated from December 3, 1811,[6] and May 26, 1824.[7]

1311. Rule as to form in which the Speaker shall put the question and method of determining the result.

Rule for taking a vote by tellers.

Form and history of Rule I, section 5.

The forms for putting the question by the Speaker are specified in section 5 of Rule I:

He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting; and shall put questions in this form, to wit: "As many as are in favor (as the question may be) say Aye;" and after the affirmative voice is expressed, "As many as are opposed say No;" if he doubts, or a division is called for, the House shall divide; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and then those in the negative; if he still doubts, or a count is required by at least one-fifth of a quorum, he shall name one from each side of the question to tell the Members in the affirmative and negative; which being reported he shall rise and state the decision.

This rule, in its present form, dates from the revision of 1880,[8] when it was made up from the old Rules Nos. 3 and 4. The first clause, "He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting," was Rule 3, and dated from April 7, 1789.[9] The latter portion of the rule is very nearly verbatim from the old Rule No. 4, which came down from the revision of March 15, 1860.[10] But the form of 1860 was simply the former rule stated more clearly.

[1] On March 22, 1844 (second session Twenty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 635; Globe, p. 434), Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, proposed under suspension of the rules to adopt a rule providing that when the Speaker should have called the House to order, the roll should be called and the names of those present be entered on the Journal. The proposition was defeated, yeas 85, nays 86.

[2] Rule 16 of the Continental Congress (May 26, 1778) was: "Every morning the minutes of the preceding day shall be read before Congress enters on new business."

[3] This being the requirement of the rule the reading can be dispensed with only by a suspension of the rules. (First session Twenty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 148.)

[4] See Cong. Record, second session Forty-sixth Congress, p. 204. This revision was very complete and thorough, and the report was the unanimous action of the committee, who were: Samuel J. Randall (Speaker), Alexander H. Stephens, J. C. S. Blackburn, James A. Garfield, and William P. Frye. The present classification, order, and numbering date from that revision.

[8] Second session Forty-sixth Congress, Record p. 204.

[9] First session First Congress, Journal, p. 9.

[10] Cong. Globe, first session Thirty-sixth Congress, p. 1178. The revision of 1860 was important, and the Committee on Rules making it were: William Pennington (N. J.) (the Speaker), Israel Washburn, jr. (Me.), Thomas S. Bocock (Va.), Galusha A. Grow (Pa.), and Warren Winslow (N. C.).

The old rule dated from April 7, 1789, and September 15, 1837. The rule of 1789 provided at first that in case the Speaker doubted or a division was called for, those in the affirmative should pass to the right of the Chair and those in the negative to the left, and if he still doubted or a count was required, the Speaker should name two Members, one from each side, to tell the Members in the affirmative, and then two others, one from each side, to tell those in the negative. After a few months of trial, this rule was modified by doing away with the passing of Members to the right and left of the Chair, and substituting the division by rising.[1] In 1837 Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, proposed and the House adopted the provision requiring one-fifth of a quorum to order the tellers.[2]

1312. The question, if in order, must be put.—Jefferson's Manual, in Section III, on the general subject relating to privilege, has the following:

> It is a breach of order for the Speaker to refuse to put a question which is in order.

1313. The Speaker decides all questions of order, subject to appeal.

A Member may not speak more than once on an appeal, except by permission of the House.

The Speaker signs all acts, addresses, writs, warrants, and subpoenas. Form and history of Rule I, section 4.

In section 4 of Rule I it is provided:

> He shall sign all acts, addresses, joint resolutions, writs, warrants, and subpoenas of, or issued by order of, the House, and decide all questions of order, subject to an appeal by any Member, on which appeal no Member shall speak more than once, unless by permission of the House.

This form was adopted in the revision of 1880.[3] The first portion, relating to the signing of acts, addresses, etc., was taken from the old Rule No. 8, dating from November 13, 1794,[4] and providing:

> All acts, addresses, and joint resolutions shall be signed by the Speaker; and all writs, warrants, and subpoenas issued by order of the House shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the Clerk.[5]

The portion relating to questions of order is from the old Rule No. 2, dating from April 7, 1789,[6] and provided that the Speaker might "speak to points of order in preference to other Members, rising from his seat for that purpose; and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House by any two Members."

On December 23, 1811,[7] the following words were added: "On which appeal no Member shall speak more than once, except by leave of the House."

1314. It is not the duty of the Speaker to decide any question which is not directly presented in the course of the proceedings of the House.— On February 28, 1885,[8] Mr. James B. Belford, of Colorado, claiming that a question of personal privilege was involved, referred to the fact that on the evening before, while he was making a speech, the gentlemen from Indiana, Mr. Thomas M. Browne, had insisted that he should speak from his seat and not from the aisle. Therefore, Mr. Belford asked the Speaker for a construction of the rule relating to this subject.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Chair does not see that the gentleman from Colorado presents any matter of personal privilege. * * * The gentleman is asking the Chair to give an opinion merely upon the construction of a rule which is not now presented as a practical question. There is no matter now before the House involving the construction of that rule. * * * The Chair decides questions as to the construction of the rules when they properly arise in the course of business. It is not the province of the Chair to determine any question which is not directly presented in the course of the proceedings of the House.

1315. The Speaker of his own initiative has submitted to the House for decision a question as to procedure.—On February 28, 1840,[2] the Speaker[3] submitted to the House a question as to how the House should proceed under its rule for the order of business. He stated that he wished a decision of the House to settle its future practice under similar circumstances. Although Mr. Rice Garland, of Louisiana, suggested that the Speaker ought to put his own construction on the rules, and leave the House to pass on an appeal, the House acquiesced in the mode proposed by the Speaker and by vote decided the question submitted.

1316. On March 24, 1880,[4] question not provided for by rule or previous decision arising as to the reading of the Journal, the Speaker[5] said:

It is an accepted parliamentary rule, governing all legislative bodies, and is a practice of the House, that the House shall regulate the manner of its proceedings. The Chair therefore submits the question whether the Journal of yesterday shall first be read.

On March 25[6] Mr. H. Casey Young, of Tennessee, criticised this practice of referring matters to the House for decision.

Thereupon the Speaker cited the precedent of 1840, and also had read sections of Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies to show the English practice.

1317. The Chair is constrained in his rulings to give precedent its proper influence—On January 10, 1842,[7] Chairman George W. Hopkins, of Vinginia, in the course of a ruling made in the Committee of the Whole, said:

A chairman does not sit here to expound rules according to his own arbitrary views. A just deference for the opinions of his fellows should constrain him to give to precedent its proper influence; and until the House shall reverse them, to give them all the consideration which is due to cases heretofore settled by a solemn decision of the House.

1318. It is not the duty of the Speaker to construe the Constitution as affecting proposed legislation.—On April 22, 1878,[8] Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, moved that the rules be suspended to pass a bill relating to the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors.

Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, made the point of order that under the Constitution, section 8, Article I, regulating commerce between the States, this bill was not in order.

The Speaker[1] overruled the point of order, on the ground that it was not the duty of the Chair to construe the Constitution as affecting or touching any proposed legislation.[2]

The rules were suspended and the bill passed, 166 yeas to 66 nays.

1319. On May 21, 1879,[3] while the House was considering the bill (H. R. 564) relating to coinage and coin, etc., Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, made the point of order that a certain section was in violation of that article of the Constitution which provides that the validity of the public debt of the United States shall not be questioned.

The Speaker[1] said:

> The Chair rules that it is not the duty of the Chair to rule upon the construction of a law. That belongs to the House, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

1320. On March 3, 1859,[4] the House was considering the Senate amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had reached an amendment providing for reviving the power of the President to issue Treasury notes conferred by the act of December 23, 1857.

Mr. Wilson Reilly, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the amendment was out of order, on the ground that it virtually provided for raising revenue, which, under the Constitution, it was not competent for the Senate to originate.

The Speaker[5] said:

> The Chair does not perceive how the question of order could be made upon the amendment. It would devolve upon the Chair the necessity of disposing, by his volition, of an amendment sent here by the Senate of the United States. * * * The Chair decides that he has nothing to do with the question, whether the amendment is in order or constitutional or not. That is a question for the House to determine by their votes.

Mr. Reilly having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table, yeas 122, nays 36.

1321. The competency of the House to take a proposed course of action is a matter for the decision of the House rather than the Speaker.—On April 19, 1852,[6] Mr. James L. Orr, of South Carolina, moved to recommit a report to the Committee on Printing with instructions.

Mr. Willis A. Gorman, of Indiana, made the point of order that it was not competent for the House alone to instruct a joint committee created by act of Congress, and that the motion submitted by Mr. Orr was consequently out of order.

The Speaker[7] overruled the point of order on the ground that it was not his place, but rather that of the House, to decide upon the effect of their action.[8]

[8] Again, on May 5,, 1852 (first session Thirty-second Congress) Globe, p 1251, Mr. Speaker Boyd affirmed this position.

On appeal, the decision was sustained.

1322. It is for the House and not the Speaker to decide whether or not a Senate amendment to a revenue bill violates the privileges of the House. As to time of making points of order on constitutional questions.

On February 11, 1901,[1] the House had voted to disagree to the Senate amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to the bill (H. R. 12394) to reduce the war revenue, and the pending question was on a motion to ask for a conference with the Senate.

Thereupon Mr. James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, raised a question that the Senate had no constitutional power to originate a substitute for a revenue bill, and therefore that the House could not ask for a conference on this substitute measure without becoming a party to the violation of the Constitution.

In the course of the debate Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the question was raised too late, since the House had already considered the Senate amendment and disagreed to it.

The Speaker[2] said:

There are two questions before us—first, the point of order made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Tawney], which involves the question of the constitutionality of the action of the Senate in its treatment of the bill sent to that body by the House.

A second point of order has been made by the gentleman from Tennessee that the point of order of the gentleman from Minnesota comes too late. The Chair is of opinion, referring to the latter point of order, that the gentleman from Minnesota can make his point at any time, and the Chair would be slow to shut out a point of order involving a constitutional question, especially when the action of the House on a division of the question on which a disagreement was declared on the amendment is in logical harmony with the course taken by the gentleman from Minnesota. It is only left for the Chair to decide whether the other question is one for him to decide or for the House to decide, whether the action of the Senate has violated its constitutional right or not. This question is no longer open in the House of Representatives. It has been decided again and again, in many cases, that when you reach that question it is a decision for the House to make. The question, therefore, before the House is on the second part of the resolution pending, namely, that the House ask for a conference. That is debatable. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

After debate as to the right of the Senate to amend, and as to whether or not the House would, after nonconcurring to the amendment, sacrifice any of its prerogatives by asking for a conference, it was decided, yeas 198, nays 38, to ask a conference.

1323. It is for the House and not the Speaker to decide on the legislative effect of a proposition.—On March 22, 1869,[3] while the House was considering a resolution in regard to the disposal of contested election cases, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the resolution would bind the House in its subsequent action as to payment of contestants.

The Speaker[4] said:

That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair must decline to rule on the effect of the resolution. It is for the House to judge as to that.

[4] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

1324. On July 8, 1850,[1] the House was considering the report of the committee appointed to consider the conduct of the Secretary of War, the Hon. George W. Crawford, with reference to the Galphin claim, when Mr. Winfield S. Featherston, of Mississippi, moved to amend the resolution pending by adding thereto the following:

> And that the House does not approve of the conduct of the Secretary of War in continuing to be interested in the prosecution of it when it was to be examined, adjusted, and paid by one of the Departments of the Government, he himself being at the same time at the head of another of those Departments; but the House considers that such connection and interest of a member of the Cabinet with a claim pending and prosecuted before another Department would be improper, dangerous as a precedent, and ought not to be sanctioned. And, consequently, that the House also totally dissents from the opinion which the Secretary of War has said the President of the United States expressed to him, viz, "that his (the said Crawford) being at the head of the War Department and the agent of the claimants did not take from him any rights he may have had as such agent, or would have justified him in having the examination and decision of the claim by the Secretary of the Treasury suspended;" and that this House decidedly disapproves of and dissents from the opinion given by the Attorney-General in favor of an allowance of interest on said claim, and from the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in payment of the same.

Mr. William Duer, of New York, objected to so much of the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. Featherston) as related to the conduct of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General, and submitted as a point of order that as the House was then engaged in an inquiry into the conduct of the Secretary of War, it was not in order to connect with that inquiry an examination of the conduct of other officers not on trial, and who had not had an opportunity to make a defense; and also that so much of said amendment was out of order, as being on a subject different from that under consideration.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order, and decided that the amendment was germane to the subject under consideration, and that the objections of the gentleman from New York were considerations for the House in its decision on the amendment, but could not be entertained as a point of order.

Mr. Duer having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

1325. The fact that the subject of a pending bill has already been acted on in another form is a matter for the consideration of the House, but does not justify the Speaker in ruling the bill out.—On February 8, 1897,[3] during consideration of business presented by the Committee for the District of Columbia, Mr. Joseph W. Babcock, of Wisconsin, from that committee, presented House resolution No. 212, to suspend the operation of an act approved February 13, 1895, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes,' approved June 16, 1880."

Mr. Alexander M. Dockery, of Missouri, raised the point of order that several days before the House had passed legislation repealing that act and prohibiting further payments of judgments.

[2] Howell Cobb, of Georgia, Speaker.

[3] Second session Fifty-fourth Congress, Record, p. 1663; Journal, p. 155.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Chair would suggest * * * that the action taken by the House was on an amendment to the appropriation bill. It might very well be that the House might desire to amend the appropriation bill, or, failing in that, it might desire to suspend the act. The action of the House on last Thursday can only be made effective by the action of the Senate. It might well be that the Senate would prefer not to have it on an appropriation bill, either for technical reasons or because of its modification of the appropriation bill. The action now proposed is entirely different. The former action of the House can not become effectual except by the action of the Senate. If the House is satisfied with its action and thinks that that disposed of the question, the present proposition can be met by raising the question of consideration or by finally disposing of the bill after discussion. * * * The House might think it was desirable to have a provision passed which had no reference whatever to the appropriation bill, and it could not be precluded by any action of the Speaker from taking that course. The matter is fully in charge of the House, and if the question of consideration is raised and consideration is refused, why, the House expresses its opinion in that way. If, on the contrary, it considers the bill, its expression may take another form.

1326. Under the early practice the Speakers used to rule subjects out of order because they were already before the House in another form.

In theory, at least, in the early practice a subject laid on the table was not regarded as disposed of adversely.

On January 31, 1826,[2] Mr. Thomas Metcalf, of Kentucky, called up a resolution asking information of the President concerning the proposed Congress at Panama.

Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order, since the same subject, although stated in different language, was before the House in the form of a resolution offered by Mr. James Hamilton, of South Carolina, and laid on the table December 16.[3]

The Speaker[4] decided that it was not in order to entertain Mr. Metcalf's resolution, since the subject-matter thereof was already before the House in the resolution of Mr. Hamilton.

1327. The fact that the provision of a proposed amendment is contained in a later portion of the bill constitutes no reason why it should be ruled out by the Speaker.—On May 19, 1902,[5] the naval appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when Mr. Ernest W. Roberts, of Massachusetts, offered as an amendment a provision relating to the construction of naval vessels in navy-yards.

Mr. Charles K. Wheeler, of Kentucky, called attention to the fact that this provision was substantially the same as a paragraph in a portion of the bill not yet reached.

The Chairman[6] said:

If certain language is adopted by the Committee of the Whole in one part of the bill and subsequently the same language is reached in another part of the bill, the repetition of the language can be struck out. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

[3] The motion to lay on the table did not at that time have its present significance. (See secs. 5389, 5390 of Vol. V of this work.) It was the frequent practice of the Speakers formerly to rule out resolutions or propositions on the ground that the subject-matter thereof was already before the House in another form. 1328. The fact that a proposed amendment is inconsistent with the text or embodies a proposition already voted on, constitutes a condition to be passed upon by the House and not by the Speaker.—On May 19, 1882,[1] the House was considering the bill (H. R. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence.

Mr. William W. Crapo, of Massachusetts, had offered an amendment as a new section, which was pending.

Mr. Thomas M. Bayne, of Pennsylvania, offered as an amendment to the pending amendment the following:

Provided, however, That said banks may withhold said bonds in whole or in part for one year upon notifying the Secretary of the Treasury of their intention so to do, in which event said bonds shall not be redeemable until the expiration of the year.

Mr. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, made the point of order that substantially this same proposition had already been voted on.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the House by an affirmative vote had determined that the bonds when called should be surrendered by the banks within thirty days.

The Speaker[2] said:

There has been no affirmative vote upon inserting the proposed new section. The vote has been taken merely upon striking out certain words in that provision. While the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Bayne) is essentially different from that already pending, and may be inconsistent with it, the Chair thinks it is for the House to determine whether this proposition shall be adopted or not. The point of order is overruled.

1329. On April 12, 1828,[3] the tariff bill being under consideration, Mr. Andrew Stewart, of Pennsylvania, proposed an amendment.

Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, made the point of order that the amendment could not be received, being inconsistent with one already adopted by the House.

The Speaker[4] decided that it was not the province of the Chair to decide what the effect of the amendment would be.

Mr. McDuffie appealed, but after examination withdrew the appeal.

1330. On December 14, 1900,[5] the bill (H. R. 12394) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures and for other purposes," was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the section relating to beer was before the committee.

Mr. John K. Stewart, of New York, offered this amendment:

Provided further, That the beer shall be pure beer, made exclusively from malt and hops, so pronounced by inspectors to be appointed by the Government for that purpose, the inspectors to be appointed by the Treasury Department and paid at the rate of $3,000 per year: Provided further, That violation of the above provision shall be a misdemeanor, punishable upon conviction by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court; and if such beer is found on such inspection to be impure, then a tax of $2 shall be imposed.

[5] Second session Fifty-sixth Congress, Record, pp. 319, 320.

Mr. George W. Steele, of Indiana, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane.

After debate the Chairman [1] said:

As the Chair understands, there an two classes of beer contemplated by this amendment, and it provides a different tax for each. It provides the instrumentalities by which beer shall be classified for purposes of taxation. In that portion of the bill referring to cigars there is not only a clause fixing the amount of taxation, but there are provided instrumentalities for carrying out the operations of the law, and also an appropriation to aid in that purpose. It seems to the Chair——

At this point Mr. Sereno E. Paine, of New York, called attention to the fact that the committee had already adopted a proposition fixing one tax on all kinds of beer, and therefore that the amendment could not be in order.

The Chairman concluded:

The Chair thinks the gentleman's position is not tenable, and has no doubt as to the germaneness of this proposition.

1331. On February 7, 1901,[2] during the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, an amendment was offered relating to the discretion of the Postmaster General in using the appropriation for special facilities on trunk lines of railroad.

Mr. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, made the point of order that the proposed amendment was in conflict with the provisions of an amendment just voted on.

After debate the chairman [3] held:

The point of order is made upon this amendment that it would accomplish substantially, if adopted, what has already been provided for in the text of the bill which has just been voted upon.

Now, it is not, certainly, for the Chair to decide as to the effect of this amendment, although the reading of the text of the bill, which has been adopted and the amendment, will commend themselves, so far as that question is concerned, to the committee. The Chair desires to have read from Jefferson's Manual the following:

"If an amendment be proposed inconsistent with one already agreed to, it is a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress as if it were against order; for were he permitted to draw questions of consistence within the vortex of order, he might usurp a negative or important modification, and suppress, instead of subserving, the legislative will."

The Chair concurs in the extract just read from the Manual, and therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment.

1332. On April 3, 1902,[4] while the bill (S. 1025) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, the following amendment was offered by John F. Lacey, of Iowa:

Add, at the end of section 3, the following: "Provided, That the same reduction of pay shall be made for shore duty as in corresponding grades in the Navy."

Mr. James S. Sherman, of New York, raised the question of order "that precisely the same amendment, only in different phraseology," had just been voted down.

[3] Henry S. Boutell, of Illinois, chairman.

The chairman [1] held:

The motion just voted down was the motion of the gentleman from Colorado to strike out the word "Army," and insert in lieu thereof the word "Navy." The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is to add at the end of the section the following words:

"Provided, That the same reduction of pay shall be made for shore duty as in corresponding grades of the Navy."

The language of the pending amendment is certainly very different from that of the amendment already rejected. The Chair can not say, from anything appearing in the bill or anything that has been submitted, that it is the same amendment. In terms it is a very different amendment. What the effect may be of adopting the amendment is for the committee to consider and not for the Chair to decide. The point of order is therefore overruled.

1333. On March 10, 1902,[2] while the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering the bill (H. R. 11728) relating to the rural free delivery service, Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, offered on amendment providing a system of payment by contract.

Mr. Claude A. Swanson, of Virginia, made the point of order that the amendment was not in order, the committee having already by amendment provided that the service should be carried on by salaried carriers and not by contract.

The Chairman [3] said:

The Chair is of the opinion that although the committee may have expressed its intentions in the former paragraph as to the general principle, yet that would not be inconsistent with a wish to experimentally try the contract system as is proposed in this amendment. It is not for the Chair to determine that the committee would hold the two inconsistent. That is for the committee.

1334. On February 26, 1904,[4] the naval appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when Mr. Gilbert M. Hitchcock, of Nebraska, proposed as a new section, but at a place in the bill wherein were included other sections relating to the same subject, the following:

That no money appropriated in this bill for armor shall be used to purchase armor not yet contracted for from any manufacturer or manufacturers who constitute in whole or in part a trust or trade conspiracy to control the price of steel products in violation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. Alston G. Dayton, of West Virginia, made a point of order, and Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, elaborated it by pointing out that the amendment would modify conditions prescribed in an amendment already agreed to.

The Chairman [5] said:

It is not within the discretion of the Chair to pass upon the consistency of amendments. This proposed amendment does not limit, relate, nor apply to the $12,000,000 appropriation contained in the paragraph already passed. It seems to the Chair to be merely a limitation upon the appropriation to purchase additional armor not covered by that paragraph, and is therefore in order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

1335. On January 11, 1871, while the Senate was considering amendments of the House to the Senate joint resolution (S. Res. 262) authorizing the appointment of Commissioners in relation to the Republic of Dominica, a proposition was made in the form of an amendment to name certain persons as Commissioners. The point of order was made that the text to which both Houses had agreed provided that the Commissioners should be named by the President, and therefore that the proposed amendment was out of order.

The Vice-President [1] said it was correct that the text of the joint resolution had been removed from the consideration of both Houses, both Houses having agreed to it, with the single exception of the amendment now pending between the two Houses.[2]

The amendment proposed now would be inconsistent with a part of the joint resolution which had been agreed to by both Houses, but in Jefferson's Manual the doctrine was laid down which had always been held as parliamentary law:

> If an amendment be proposed inconsistent with one already agreed to it is fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress, as if it were against order.

As the text in this case proposed one thing, and the amendment proposed another and inconsistent thing, there might be ground for the Senate to reject it, but not for the Chair to rule it out of order.[3]

1336. On April 20, 1906,[4] the District of Columbia appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when this paragraph was read:

> Court-house, District of Columbia: For the following force necessary for the care and protection of the court-house in the District of Columbia, under the direction of the United States marshal of the District of Columbia: Engineer, $1,200; three watchmen, at $720 each; three firemen, at $720 each; five laborers, at $480 each, and three assistant messengers, at $720 each; in all, $10,080, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General.

The words "three assistant messengers, at $720 each" were stricken out on a point of order, and then an amendment was offered as follows:

> Insert "three messengers, at $720 each.

An amendment to this amendment to strike out "three" and insert "seven" was disagreed to, and then the amendment was agreed to.

On April 21,[5] the same paragraph being under consideration, Mr. Edgar D. Crumpacker, of Indiana, proposed this amendment:

> Insert after the words "five laborers, at $480 each" the words "four messengers, $720 each," so that the paragraph in this portion would read "four messengers, $720 each; three messengers, $720 each."

Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, made the point of order that this amendment proposed in effect to insert a proposition which on the day before the House had disagreed to, when the amendment to strike out "three" and insert "seven" was disagreed to.

After debate the Chairman [1] said:

The Chair thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is an independent amendment. Whether it makes consistent text or grammatical text or anything else is not a question of order that the Chair can determine, but is a question of good sense, to be determined by the committee itself. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

1337. The Speaker does not rule out a pending legislative proposition, even though the lapse of time may have rendered it futile.—On August 8, 1846,[2] the House was considering a resolution to terminate debate upon the message from the President of the United States, recommending an appropriation of $2,000,000 to aid in settling difficulties with Mexico.

Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, raised the question of order that the resolution proposed to fix the hour of "2 o'clock this day" as the time at which debate should terminate. That hour having passed the resolution was in itself a nullity, and ought not to be further entertained by the Chair.

The Speaker pro tempore [3] decided that the resolution being in order when offered could not, by mere lapse of time, be rendered out of order, and that while the fact that the hour fixed had passed might be a good reason for voting against it, it was no reason why the Chair should interfere in its regular progress. He therefore overruled the point of order made by Mr. Davis.

Mr. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, having appealed, Mr. James J. McKay, of North Carolina, moved that the whole subject be laid on the table. There were on this motion, yeas 123, nays 26. So the appeal and the resolution were laid on the table.

1338. A question as to whether or not a committee in its report has violated its instructions is passed on by the, House and not the Speaker.—On May 26, 1836,[4] the House was considering the report of a select committee in relation to the disposition of petitions relating to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, when Mr. Stephen C. Phillips, of Massachusetts, submitted, in writing, the following point of order:

Can a committee, specially instructed to report two resolutions, the form of which was given by the House, report another resolution changing the rules and orders of the House in regard to the management of its business and depriving citizens of the privilege of obtaining the usual consideration for petitions upon subjects other than that referred to the committee?

The Speaker [5] stated that it was not within the competency of the Chair to draw within the vortex of order the question raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Questions relating to the jurisdiction of the committees of the House or whether they had or had not exceeded that jurisdiction or transcended the authority conferred upon them by the House were for the House and not the Speaker to determine. If gentlemen were of opinion that committees in their reports had exceeded the authority given them by the House, there were other modes of correcting what they had done; as, for example, the report might be recommitted with instructions, or the House, on that, as well as other grounds, might refuse to concur in their report.

The point now raised could not therefore be considered as a point of order to be decided by the Chair. It was in some respects analogous to the case of inconsistent amendments proposed, in which case it was well settled that "if an amendment be proposed inconsistent with one already agreed to it is a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress as if it were against order; for were he permitted to draw questions of consistence within the vortex of order he might usurp a negative on important modifications and suppress instead of subserving the legislative will."

So in this case, if the House should be satisfied that the committee were not clothed with authority, by the order of the House under which they were appointed, to report this resolution, "it may be a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress as if it were against order."

1339. It is for the House and not the Speaker to decide as to the efficiency of a report made in writing by a committee.—On January 12, 1888,[1] the bill (H. R. 1733) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations was called up for consideration.

Mr. J. B. Weaver, of Iowa, made the point of order that the report accompanying the bill, containing nothing further than a recommendation of its passage, was not a sufficient compliance with the rule.

After debate, the Speaker[2] said:

> The Chair can only say what has been frequently said before upon similar points—that it is not within the province of the Chair to decide upon the sufficiency of a report made by a committee of the House. All that the rule requires is that a report shall be submitted in writing, without specifying the nature of the report, and if that provision of the rule is complied with the Chair must entertain the report.
> The argument of the gentleman from Iowa may be a very proper one to address to the House itself upon a motion to recommit the bill for a report containing further and more specific information; but the gentleman will see at once that if the Chair should undertake to decide such questions the reception of all reports would depend upon the judgment of the Chair as to whether they were full or sufficiently explanatory of the measure to which they referred. So that point of order must be overruled.

1340. Discussion and ruling in the Senate as to decisions of questions of order by the presiding officer.

Reference to discussions of the powers of the Vice-President as presiding officer of the Senate and as to calling to order.

On February 25, 1907,[3] in the Senate, a question of order was raised as to an amendment proposed to the pending agricultural appropriation bill, and Mr. Albert J. Beveridge, of Indiana, suggested that the Vice-President might submit the decision to the Senate instead of making a ruling, which would be subject to appeal.

In the course of the debate which followed, Mr. Jacob H. Gallinger, of New Hampshire, submitted precedents made by former presiding officers of the Senate:

As far back as the Thirty-first Congress, Mr. Howe made a point of order against an amendment proposed by Mr. Conkling, and the point of order, beyond a question, was good, but it was submitted to the Senate. A little later on, in the Forty-sixth Congress, the Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, Mr. Plumb offered to amend it by adding "for mileage of Senators at the extra session." Mr. Wallace raised the point of order that the amendment, not having been moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of a Department, was not in order. The question was submitted to the Senate.

In the Forty-third Congress Mr. Allen offered to amend the agricultural appropriation bill by inserting:

"For the purpose of purchasing and distributing seeds and seed grains among the drought-stricken inhabitants of the United States by the Secretary of Agriculture, and in his discretion and under such rules as he may prescribe, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be made immediately available."

Mr. Vilas raised the point of order that the amendment was not moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments, and was therefore not in order under the first clause of Rule XVI. The then Vice-President, Mr. Stevenson, submitted the question to the Senate.

In the Fifty-third Congress the telegraph cable company matter came up, when Mr. Blackburn raised the question of order, and it was submitted to the Senate by the Vice-President, Mr. Stevenson.

In the Thirty-second Congress a bill to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1852, was pending, and an amendment was proposed to that which it was argued was not a proper amendment. Mr. William R. King, who was a very distinguished Senator and who occupied the chair at that time, submitted the question to the Senate.

In the Fifty-first Congress an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill was offered, and Vice President Stevenson submitted it to the Senate, the same point being made that is made today. In the Fifty-fourth Congress an amendment was offered to the Indian appropriation bill, and Mr. Faulkner, who was a most excellent presiding officer, submitted the question to the Senate.

The pension appropriation bill being under consideration in the Fiftieth Congress, an important amendment was offered to it, and a point of order was raised that it proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill. The question was submitted to the Senate.

After further debate, the Vice-President[1] ruled:

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Warren] makes several points of order against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Beveridge]. The Chair will consider but one, and that is that the amendment proposes general legislation. The rules of the Senate with respect to amendments proposed to appropriation bills are comprehensive and specific. Subdivision 3 of Rule XVI provides that—

"No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill."

The question arises whether the amendment offered proposes general legislation. The Chair doubts whether there is a Senator within the Chamber who, upon the most casual reading of the amendment proposed, would not hold that it did distinctly and clearly propose general legislation. If it does propose general legislation and is in contravention of the rule, the Chair believes that it is his duty and in the interest of orderly procedure to hold that the point of order is well taken and that the amendment is out of order.

The precedents to which the attention of the Chair has been directed with respect to the submission of questions of order to the Senate have no application to the pending question. The presiding officers have in past years occasionally submitted questions of order to the Senate. It has been done under the authority conferred by Rule XX, in the discretion of the Chair and not from suggestions from the floor. During the present session the Chair has frequently been invited by Senators to submit to the [1] Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, Vice-President.

Senate points of order on amendments which were not in order, and in every case of such invitation the Chair has felt obliged to decline to do so. To assent to such suggestions is to break down the rules which the Senate has deliberately adopted for the conduct of public legislation.

The Chair feels that it is not for him lightly to break the rules and safeguards which the Senate has adopted for his and its guidance. The Chair, of course, has nothing to do with the merits of the amendment which is proposed. Whether the amendment is one of general public interest or otherwise is a matter with which the Chair can not concern himself. The Senators interested in the amendment are not remediless. The Chair, in holding that under the rule an amendment is not in order, does not kill the amendment. The Senate has provided against such a contingency by the rules which were long since adopted. If a majority of the Senate are of opinion that the ruling of the Chair is not in consonance with the spirit of the rules of the Senate, they may hold that the amendment is in order; or, if the Senate should be of opinion that in the large public interest an amendment should be received regardless of the rule, it is competent for the Senate so to decide, and a majority of the Senate may determine it.[1]

This amendment, which was offered by the Senator from Indiana on the 14th of February, was embodied in a bill introduced by him on the 6th of last December. The Chair is of opinion that if the measure is of such large consequence in the opinion of the Senate, as is now claimed, the Senate could have expressed itself upon that subject long prior to the closing hours of the present session and in an orderly and appropriate way.

For these considerations the point of order is sustained. The Chair would say further that under the rules of the Senate an appeal lies from this decision, and the Chair would invite such an appeal if he is in error in the view he entertains of the force and effect of the rule.

1341. The Speaker held it his duty to proceed in accordance with the mandatory provision of a law in the enactment of which the then existing House had concurred.—On March 1, 1877,[2] the House resumed consideration of the objections to the counting of the vote of Henry N. Solace as a Presidential elector from the State of Vermont, and a resolution relating thereto having been adopted, Mr. Wm. J. O'Brien, of Maryland, claimed the floor to submit a resolution notifying the Senate of the action of the House.

The Speaker[3] stated that he had allowed a vote to be taken on every legislative motion. He had allowed the motion to reconsider to be voted upon whenever it had been made, so that the House might have an opportunity to correct any error it might have committed. The House had had an opportunity to vote on the motion to lay on the table the propositions themselves, and on the motions to reconsider the vote upon those propositions. Now, when the House had advanced to a declaration of its judgment on the objection to counting the vote from the State of Vermont, it was brought to the following paragraph of the [electoral] law (which had been passed in the then existing Congress with the concurrence of the then existing House)[4] as its guide and its mandatory instructions:

When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

The Senate has notified the House of its action upon the objection to counting the vote from Vermont. The House has now reached its judgment upon the objection, and, as far as the Chair is concerned, it is his duty, by the terms of the act, mandatory and ministrial, to notify the Senate to that effect, and he would therefore direct the Clerk accordingly, and that the House is now ready to meet the Senate to proceed with the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice President.

1342. By request of the House, the Speaker has named himself as one of the members of a commission authorized by law.—On March 2, 1895,[1] a Speaker pro tempore being in the chair, Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, offered a resolution providing that the Speaker (Mr. Crisp) be requested to appoint himself as one of the delegates to the international monetary conference provided for by the sundry civil appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1896. This resolution was agreed to, and on the same day, when the Speaker announced the three delegates to be appointed on the part of the House, he announced himself as the third. This delegation consisted of two from the majority and one from the minority side of the House.

1343. The Speaker preserves order on the floor and in the galleries and lobby.

Form and history of Rule I, section 2.

The rules of the House, Rule I, section 2, among the duties of the Speaker, provide:

> He shall preserve order and decorum, and, in case of disturbance or disorderly conduct in the galleries, or in the lobby, may cause the same to be cleared.

This is the form established by the revision of the Forty-sixth Congress.[2] The clause "He shall preserve order and decorum" was taken from the old rule No. 2, which dated from April 7, 1789.[3] The latter portion, relating to the galleries and lobby, was old rule No. 9, and dated from March 14, 1794,[4] when a resolution was offered from the floor and adopted, that the Speaker or chairman of the Committee of the Whole should have power to cause the galleries or lobby cleared in case of disorder therein.

1344. The Speaker may name any Member persisting in disorderly conduct.

The parliamentary law provides that the House shall deal with a Member named by the Speaker.

C.), James Madison (Va.), Roger Sherman (Conn.), Benj. Goodhue (Maw.). All of these, excepting Messrs. Hartley, Lee, and Goodhue, had served in the Continental Congress.

[4] Third and Fourth Congresses, Journal, p. 92 (Gales & Seaton ed.).

Jefferson's Manual, in Section XVII, provides:

If repeated calls do not produce order,[1] the Speaker may call by his name any Member obstinately persisting in irregularity; whereupon the House may require the Member to withdraw. He is then to be heard in exculpation and withdraw. Then the Speaker states the offense committed, and the House considers the degree of punishment they will inflict.[2]

"Sir, I well remember the august and solemn appearance of this body some twenty years ago, when the fathers sat here. Then it was a majestic body indeed. There was something awful in its appearance. The solemn stillness, the gravity of Senators, the propriety of conduct, the silent auditory—all impressed the spectator with a solemn awe when he entered this Chamber or came into its galleries or lobbies. The House of Representatives, too, was silent. If there a voice was heard in the galleries, instantly the eye of the Speaker rested upon the Sergeant-at-Arms, and a messenger or the Sergeant in person immediately repaired to the individual in the gallery and touched him, and there was silence. If a Member sat in an indecorous position, or laid his foot upon his desk, the Speaker sent his page with this message: "The compliments of the Speaker to Mr. ———, and he will please take down his foot;" and he never put it up a second time. There was grandeur about legislation then."

1345. The Speaker represses a Member who is out of order, but except naming him may not otherwise censure or punish him.—On March 15, 1882,[3] while Mr. Frank Hiscock, of New York, had the floor in debate, and was refusing to yield, Mr. Hernando De S. Money, of Mississippi, insisted on speaking, and did proceed to utter sentences, although Mr. Hiscock still refused to Yield. Thereupon the Speaker[4] said:

The Chair wishes to state if gentlemen think they can impose on the House and the Chair by undertaking to make speeches in violation of the rules, the Chair will take pains to reprimand them, at least.

At once Mr. Money, while not objecting to being called to order, raised a question as to the right of the Speaker to reprimand.

The subject was debated on this day, and on the next day Mr. Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, proposed a resolution condemning any attempted exercise of such power. This resolution was withdrawn after the Speaker had made the following statement:

After all that has been said, there should be no misunderstanding the position taken by the Chair. It never has proposed to assume the powers of the House in punishing a Member for any past disorderly conduct; it has only asserted its right as a presiding officer to preserve order and do all that may be necessary within parliamentary usage to secure that end. The duty of the Chair in this respect is one settled not only by long parliamentary usage, but by the imperative terms of the rules of the House. The Chair used the word "reprimamd" in its ordinary and proper sense, not in its technical sense. The meaning of the term "reprimand" is well defined and well understood. To "reprimand" is to check and repress a Member when out of order. Beyond this a presiding officer should not go in administering a reprimand; less than this the Chair can not do and discharge its duty to the House. The Chair never assumed to reprimand a Member for what he had done; that is for the House. The Chair should check, repress, or reprimand a Member while persisting in being out of order. The Chair desires to repeat that in all that took place yesterday; in all that was said, it never undertook to reprimand a Member for any past act;

[1] This procedure has rarely, if ever, occurred in the House. Members who offend are usually called to order by some other Member or by the Speaker, and when called to order the House in case of flagrant offense takes the matter under consideration.

[2] On February 11, 1857 (Third session Thirty-fourth Congress, Globe, p. 649), Mr. Sam Houston, of Texas, while speaking in the Senate, asked for order, saying:

[3] First session Forty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 1941, 1967–1969.

[4] J. Warren Keffer, of Ohio, Speaker.

but if to call a Member to order and remind him that he is not in order is to reprimand him, then the Chair simply did what the rules require him to do.

The highest parliamentary reprimand known to the Parliament of England is to mention a member's name, which puts him then in parliamentary disgrace. Our manual of practice allows that to be done here. That was not done on yesterday; nor was any person reprimanded beyond the mere calling him to order and insisting upon the preservation of order. The Chair has the right in extreme cases to order the Sergeant-at-Arms to forcibly preserve order; even to the extent of arresting a Member if he persists in violating order, and may it not first use less violent means?[1]

1346. The mace is the symbol of the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, and is borne by that officer while enforcing order on the floor.

Present form and history of section 2 of Rule IV.

Section 2 of Rule IV provides:

The symbol of his office shall be the mace, which shall be borne by him while enforcing order on the floor.

This rule dates from 1789.[2] It was originally proposed, following the parliamentary usage, that the mace should be placed on the Clerk's table during the sitting of the House and under it when the House should be in committee, but the House recommitted the proposition, and it was not carried.[3] The mace during the sessions of the House is kept in an upright position on a marble pedestal at the right of the Speaker's chair. It is not taken down during a recess, but is taken down, however, when the House resolves into Committee of the Whole and is replaced in position when the Speaker resumes the chair. It is taken from its pedestal and borne by the Sergeant-at-Arms while enforcing order on the floor under direction of the Speaker or chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

The first mace, a representation of the Roman fasces, was made of ebony rods bound transversely with a silver band, and each tipped with a silver spearhead. From the center of the bundle of rods a silver stem supported a globe of silver, upon which was an eagle of massive silver. The height was about 3 feet. This mace was destroyed at the burning of the Capitol on August 24, 1814. For twenty five years a hastily constructed mace of common pine wood, painted, did service; but in 1842 the mace now in use was procured. It is of about the size and nearly the design of the old mace.

1347. The Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms having attempted, without the mace, to enforce an order of the Speaker on a Member, a question of privilege arose therefrom.—On February 7, 1885,[4] Mr. John D. White, of Kentucky, while addressing the House, was called to order, and the Speaker pro tempore directed him to resume his seat.

Mr. White disregarding this order, the Speaker pro tempore directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to see that the order was obeyed by Mr. White.

[1] On April 3, 1850, Vice-President Millard Fillmore addressed the Senate at length concerning the power of the Vice President to call to order. His conclusion was that he shared this power with the Members of the Senate, and that the duty was even more incumbent on him than on them. (First session Thirty-first Congress, Globe, pp. 631, 632.)

For consideration of this subject by other Vice-Presidents, see Debates, first session Twentieth Congress, pp.278341. Also "Order," in index to debates, first session Nineteenth Congress.

The Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms thereupon proceeded up the aisle without the mace and took hold of Mr. White, who refused to take his seat. The deputy Sergeant-at-Arms thereupon procured the mace and returned up the aisle to Mr. White, who took his seat.

Mr. White then, as a question of personal privilege, stated that the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, without authority or semblance of authority, had undertaken to arrest him.

The Speaker pro tempore [1] stated that Mr. White, being called to order by Members and directed by the Chair to take his seat, had disregarded said order, whereupon the Chair had directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to enforce the said order, which was then executed by the said officer.

Later, after the yeas and nays had been taken on a pending proposition, Mr. White claimed the floor on a question of privilege, and stated that a citizen, without any semblance of authority or power, had approached him on the floor of the House and laid violent hands on him and in an offensive manner demanded that he take his seat.

Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, made the point of order that the identical matter presented by Mr. White had been passed upon by the Chair; and no appeal from said decision being made, further discussion was out of order.

The Speaker pro tempore sustained the said point of order, and held the question presented by Mr. White not now in order as a question of privilege.

1348. Extreme disorder arising in the Committee of the Whole, the Speaker may take the chair "without order to bring the House into order."

Disorderly words spoken in Committee of the Whole are to be taken down as in the House, but are to be reported to the House, which alone may punish.

Jefferson's Manual has these provisions in relation to disorder in the Committee of the Whole:

In Section XII:

In a Committee of the Whole, the tellers on a division differing as to numbers, great heats and confusion arose, and danger of a decision by the sword. The Speaker took the chair, the mace was forcibly laid on the table; whereupon, the Members retiring to their places, the Speaker told the House "he had taken the chair without an order, to bring the House into order." Some excepted against it; but it was generally approved as the only expedient to suppress the disorder. And every Member was required, standing up in his place, to engage that he would proceed no further in consequence of what had happened in the grand committee, which was done. (3 Grey, 128.)

A Committee of the Whole being broken up in disorder and the chair resumed by the Speaker without an order, the House was adjourned. The next day the committee was considered as thereby dissolved, and the subject again before the House; and it was decided in the House, without returning into committee. (3 Grey, 130.)

In Section XVII:

Disorderly words spoken in a committee must be written down as in the House; but the committee can only report them to the House for animadversion. (6 Grey, 46.)

In Section XXX:

A committee can not punish a breach of order in the House or in the gallery.[2] (9 Grey, 113.) It can only rise and report it to the House, who may proceed to punish.

[2] A rule allows the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to have the gallery cleared. (See section 4704 of Vol. IV, of this work.)

1349. In 1880 the Speaker took the chair to quell disorder in Committee of the Whole, but that being accomplished, yielded the chair to the Chairman, that the committee might rise in due form before the House should adjourn.

On December 31, 1880,[1] the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the bill (H. R. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the public debt, Mr. James W. Covert, of New York, being Chairman.

During the proceedings a controversy arose between Messrs. William A. J. Sparks, of Illinois, and J. B. Weaver, of Iowa, and on account of menacing words and actions of the two Members, the members of the committee generally rose to their feet, and many came to the front, some interposing between the two.

At this point the Speaker took the chair and called the House to order, saying:

The Speaker has taken the chair for the purpose of restoring order, believing that parliamentary propriety and practice justify him in so doing.

The Sergeant-at Arms (by direction of the Speaker), with his mace of office, moved about the floor of the House, and order was restored.

The Speaker then said:

The Speaker will now yield the chair to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, order being restored.

Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair would prefer to have the Committee of the Whole rise in due form.

Mr. Covert, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, then took the chair, the committee immediately voted to rise, and, after it had risen and reported, the House adjourned.

1350. A Member having defied the authority of the Chairman in Committee of the Whole, the latter directed the committee to rise, and, after the Speaker had taken the chair, reported the occurrence to the House.

The Committee of the Whole having risen informally because of disorder created by a Member, the Speaker directed the committee to resume its sitting after the Member had explained and when no further action in relation thereto was proposed.

On March 29, 1897,[3] the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the tariff bill (H. R. 379). Mr. Henry U. Johnson, of Indiana, who had risen to a point of order, was, after brief debate, directed by the Chairman[4] to take his seat. The gentleman from Indiana not taking his seat, but persisting in his remarks, the Chairman said:

The committee will rise informally until the House can enforce order.

The Committee of the Whole rose, the Speaker took the chair, and the Chairman reported:

Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having under consideration House bill No. 379, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Johnson] declined to recognize the ruling of the Chair and be governed by the rules of the House; and the committee rose for the purpose of enforcing the rules.

Thereupon Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, made a point of order that the report made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole could not be taken cognizance of by proceedings in the House. The committee itself was the proper forum to enforce its orders and direct its business. The Speaker of the House had no control in such matters as had progressed no further than this did.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair thinks that when the Committee of the Whole makes report that there has been disorder in the committee the House is competent to attend to administering whatever justice it deems necessary.

Thereupon Mr. Johnson, there being no objection, was allowed to make an explanation.

Then the Speaker said:

The Chair thinks it is proper to say to the House—and the Chair is quite sure that the House will agree—that one of the first duties of a Member is to obey the directions of a presiding officer until they have been reversed by proper authority, because the presiding officer, however humble an individual he may be, does not act of his own volition or of his own motion, but he acts as the representative of the House of which he is Speaker, or of the Committee of the Whole, of which he is Chairman; and certainly the very foundation and basis of order in the House is the recognition of the authority of the one who is appointed to be in authority; and whatever objections any Member may have to the unfortunate methods of procedure, still he will, if he thinks a moment, recognize the necessity of prompt obedience to whomsoever presides over the body.

Now, it is true that our debates—I do not speak of these debates, because I have not heard much of them, but, judging that they are like debates in the past to which I have listened for nearly twenty years, they are somewhat irrelevant. They seem to be a waste of time, and probably a more strict rule than has been the custom of the House with regard to relevancy would be a much better thing. Nevertheless, it would be a long time before the House would accustom itself to that new departure, and it would require very cordial action on the part of all Members to prevent the waste of time. Time is undoubtedly wasted in all these debates, and if there were a month accorded to the House, we should simply have a month more of just the same kind of debate. I speak as a matter of experience, being sorry that it is experience. That being the case, nothing can be done except in the regular way, and if the result of it is that we do not reach some parts of the bill, it is, perhaps, owing to our unfortunate constitution and habits. But what we ought to do is, perhaps, not to strive for an ideal condition of things, but to do about the best we can. That being the case, the Chair really hopes that the gentleman from Indiana will recognize the suitableness of what has been said. * * * If there be no objection, the Committee will resume its sitting.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its sitting.

1351. The Committee of the Whole having risen and reported that its proceedings had been disturbed by disorder, the Speaker restored order and the committee resumed its sitting.—On April 5, 1860,[2] the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and after some time spent therein the Speaker resumed the chair, when Mr. Israel

[1] Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, Speaker.

Washburn, jr., reported that the proceedings of the committee were interrupted by disorder prevailing therein.

The Speaker[1] having restored order, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

1352. Rigid enforcement of the rule relating to disturbance in the galleries.—In the early history of the House the rule relating to order in the galleries was very rigidly enforced. In 1801[2] a spectator who applauded by clapping his hands was, by direction of the Speaker, taken from the gallery and kept in confinement by the Sergeant-at-Arms for two hours. The confinement of the offender was the subject of some criticism on the floor. On February 11, 1836, during a session of the Committee of the Whole, a spectator in the gallery applauded. The committee having risen, the Chairman communicated this fact to the Speaker, who gave orders to the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear the gallery. It was also proposed by an old Member[3] that a warrant be issued for the arrest of the offender; but this proposition was not carried into execution. In the later history of the House applause in the galleries has been repressed, but not with such extreme strictness.[4]

1353. The Speaker having declined to order the galleries to be cleared, a motion to effect that purpose was offered from the floor and entertained.—On March 1, 1877,[5] during proceedings of the count of the electoral vote, Mr. William J. O'Brien, of Maryland, asked that the galleries be cleared of spectators.

The Speaker not granting the request, although reenforced by the demand of other Members, Mr. Bernard G. Caulfield, of Illinois, moved that the galleries be cleared.

The Speaker[6] entertained the motion, which was put to the House and decided in the negative.[7]

1354. The Speaker has general control of the Hall, corridors, and unappropriated rooms in the House wing of the Capitol.

Form and history of Rule I, section 3.

The rule relating to the control by the Speaker of the Hall and its surroundings is section 3 of Rule I:

> He shall have general control, except as provided by rule or law, of the Hall of the House and of the corridors and passages and of the unappropriated rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the use of the House until further order.

[6] Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, Speaker.

[7] The rule in relation to clearing the galleries was substantially the same then as now. As printed in the Record on the above date (p. 2056), it might be inferred that the rule specifically provided that the House could order the galleries cleared. The rule did not, however, provide this in terms. (Journal p. 702.) But of course if the people in the galleries disturbed the proceedings the House might order them out as a matter of privilege.

The origin of this rule was on December 23, 1811,[1] when a rule was adopted containing this sentence relating to the Speaker's duties: "He shall have general direction of the Hall." On May 26, 1824,[2] Mr. John W. Taylor, of New York, from a committee appointed to apportion the rooms among the officers of the House and the standing committees, reported also a resolution that "the unappropriated rooms shall be subject to the order and disposition of the Speaker until the further order of the House."[3] This rule was in existence in 1880[4] when the general revision occurred, and its substance was incorporated in the present form of the rule. In the Forty-ninth Congress[5] the corridors and passages were added to the charge of the Speaker, with the idea, says the report of the Committee on Rules, of restoring to the Speaker an authority which he exercised prior to the revision of 1880.

1355. The statutes require the Speaker to appoint certain visitors and trustees of public institutions.—Certain duties[6] are prescribed for the Speaker by the Statutes. Before the termination of the last session of each Congress he shall appoint a temporary Committee on Accounts, of three Members, to exercise the duties of such committee until after the meeting and organization of the next House of Representatives.[7] At the session of Congress next preceding the annual examinations of the Military Academy he shall appoint three Members of the House as visitors to that institution,[8] and also at the session next preceding the annual examinations at the Naval Academy, three Members of the House as visitors[9] to that institution also. He shall also appoint a Member of the House as consulting trustee for two years of the Reform School of the District of Columbia,[10] two Members of the House as directors for the term of a single Congress, with eligibility for reappointment, of the Columbia Hospital for Women,[11] two Members for a like term with like eligibility for reappointment as directors of the Columbia Institu-

[3] On January 14, 1876, Speaker Kerr was, by unanimous consent, relieved of "the duty required of him by the rules to regulate the assignment of the committee rooms," and the duty was transferred to the Committee on Accounts for the remainder of the Congress. (First session Forty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 188.) On January 20, 1817, rooms were allotted to committees by a joint committee of both Houses. (Second session Fourteenth Congress, Annals, pp. 611, 639, Journal, p. 238.) Again, on May 21, 1824, a select committee of the House was appointed to assign rooms. tion for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb.[1] On every alternate fourth Wednesday of December he shall appoint three Members of the House as Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.[2] Annually he appoints two citizens of the District of Columbia as members of the Memorial Association of the District of Columbia.[3]

1356. Mr. Speaker Clay announced to the House his resignation of the Speakership, but his resignation as a Member appears only from the credentials of his successor.—On March 26, 1814,[4] the Speaker laid before the House a letter addressed to him, inclosing the certificate of the election of Joseph H. Hawkins, to serve in this House, as one of the Members of the State of Kentucky, in the place of Henry Clay, resigned.

On January 19, 1814,[5] Mr. Clay, who was Speaker, resigned that office, "the distinguished station of this House, with which I have been honored by your kindness," as he described it. But he did not at the same time, in terms at least, resign his seat. Nor does an inspection of the Journal show that at any time a notice of his resignation was laid before the House until the presentation of the credentials of his successor, on March 26.

1357. Resolutions censuring the conduct of the Speaker being presented unexpectedly, he was excused from deciding a point of order in relation thereto.—On May 31, 1882,[6] Mr. Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, presented a preamble and resolution reciting the proceedings of the House on the prior day, and the refusal of the Speaker to entertain certain motions and appeals, and concluding with this resolution:

Resolved, That the said decisions and rulings of the Speaker and his refusal to allow appeals therefrom were arbitrary, and are hereby condemned and censured by the House.

Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, moved that the preamble and resolutions be laid on the table.

A point of order being made that the resolutions did not present a question of privilege, the Speaker[7] said in reference to them:

The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Maryland advised the Chair that he had certain resolutions which he wished to offer; * * * but had the present occupant of the chair had any information that they had a personal application to himself, he would have taken occasion to leave the chair. In this situation, and having made the rulings to which reference is made in these resolutions, the Chair would rather now not rule upon the point of order, but allow the motion of the gentleman from Maine to be submitted to the House.

The preamble and resolutions were then laid on the table, yeas 143, nays 88.[8]

[7] J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, Speaker.

[8] On January 18, 1882 (first session Forty-seventh Congress, Record, p. 491), Mr. Speaker Keifer, because the point of order arose over a proposition to take the appointment of committees from the Speaker, submitted it to the House, and the House decided it.

1358. The Speaker, having remained in the chair while a question relating to himself was pending, was excused from deciding a question of order.—On February 20, 1801,[1] a motion was made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House in directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to order and expel from the gallery of this House Samuel Harrison Smith, a citizen of the United States, has assumed a power not given him by the rules of this House, and deprived the said Samuel Harrison Smith of a right which can only be forfeited by disorderly behavior.

It was resolved unanimously that the Speaker[2] be excused from deciding whether the said motion was in order or not.

The question being taken, "Is this motion in order?" it passed in the negative, yeas, 49, nays 54.

1359. The Speaker leaves the chair during the transaction of any business concerning himself, even the reference of a paper.—On December 13, 1843,[3] the Speaker[4] having left the chair and substituted Mr. Linn Boyd, of Kentucky, as Speaker pro tempore, it was, on motion of Mr. Lucius Q. C. Elmer, of New Jersey, Ordered, That all the documents in the possession of the Clerk of this House relating to the case of John M. Botts, who contests the right of John W. Jones to a seat as a Member of this House; and to the case of William L. Goggin, who contests the right of Thomas W. Gilmer to a seat as a Member of this House, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

1360. The Speaker's seat being contested, he requested that the House relieve him of the appointment of the Committee on Elections; and the request was granted.

The Speaker, by unanimous consent, addressed the House on a subject relating to his election.

A matter concerning himself being before the House, the Speaker called a Member to the chair.

A Member called to the chair by the Speaker was permitted to appoint a committee by vote of the House.

On December 7, 1843,[5] the Speaker[6] by general consent, stated that a memorial having this day been presented by John M. Botts, of the State of Virginia, contesting the right of the Speaker to a seat in the House, it appeared to him proper that he should ask the House that, in any order which might hereafter be taken for the appointment of the standing committees, he might be relieved from that portion of the duty, which might otherwise devolve upon him, of appointing a committee of elections, which would have to pass on his own case. He was impelled to this course both from a sense of justice to his opponent and because of the delicacy of the position in which he was himself placed.

The Speaker then left the chair and substituted Mr. Samuel Beardsley, of New York, as Speaker pro tempore.

On motion of Mr. William Parmenter, of Massachusetts, it was then

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to appoint the standing committees named in the seventy-sixth rule of the House of the Twenty-seventh Congress, except the Committee of Elections.

Mr. George W. Hopkins, of Virginia, then moved that the House proceed viva voce to elect a committee of elections to consist of nine members.

On motion of Mr. Charles H. Carroll, of New York, this motion was amended to provide that the committee be appointed by the Speaker pro tempore, and as amended, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Beardsley thereupon appointed the committee.[1]

1361. The seat of the Speaker being contested, the Committee on Elections were appointed by resolution of the House.—On December 12, 1887,[2] the Speaker[3] called Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, to the chair, and from the floor requested that he be relieved of the duty of appointing the Committee on Elections, in view of the pending contest for his seat in the House.

Thereupon Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That at 1 o'clock p. m. to-morrow the House will proceed to elect, by resolution or otherwise, fifteen Members who shall constitute the Committee on Elections for the present Congress.

Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, proposed the following substitute:

That at I o'clock p. m. to-morrow there shall be selected by the House of Representatives a select committee of fifteen Members, to whom shall be referred the election contest of Thoebe v. Carlisle.

After debate the substitute was disagreed to, and the original resolution was agreed to.

On the succeeding day, at the appointed time, Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, a member of the minority, offered a resolution providing that certain Members therein should constitute the Committee on Elections. Mr. Cannon stated that the majority had named the first nine and the last six were named by the minority.

The resolution was agreed to.

From January 17 to 23 the Speaker was away from the House, detained by illness, and during that time the report in the contest was made, and acted on, the House deciding that Mr. Carlisle was entitled to the seat.

1362. Charges being made by a Member against the official conduct of Mr. Speaker Clay, he appealed to the House for an investigation, which was granted.

In asking an investigation of his conduct Mr. Speaker Clay addressed the House from the chair, but immediately left it when the House was to act.

The Speaker having appealed to the House for an investigation, the House ordered his address to be entered on the Journal.

[3] John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Speaker.

In 1825 the House ordered that the select committee to investigate the conduct of the Speaker should be chosen by ballot.

A Member making charges which result in an investigation, the committee usually call upon him first to present the facts within his knowledge.

On February 3, 1825,[1] the Speaker,[2] rising in his place, made a statement concerning insinuations[3] against himself, implicating his conduct with regard to the approaching election of a President by the House. These charges were made in the public prints under the authority of a Member of the House, and were therefore entitled to grave attention. It might be worthy of consideration whether the character and dignity of the House itself did not require a full investigation and an impartial decision. For if he were base enough to betray the solemn trust which the Constitution had confided to him and by yielding to personal views and considerations compromise the highest interests of his country, the House would be scandalized by his continuance to occupy the chair, and he merited instantaneous expulsion. Without, however, presuming to indicate what the House might conceive it ought to do, on account of its own purity and honor, he hoped that he should be allowed respectfully to solicit in behalf of himself an inquiry into the truth of the charges to which he referred. Standing in the relations to the House, which both the Member from Pennsylvania and himself did, it appeared to him that here was the proper place to institute the inquiry, in order that, if guilty, here the proper punishment might be applied, and if innocent, here his character and conduct might be vindicated. If the House should think proper to raise a committee he trusted that some other than the ordinary mode pursued by the practice and rules of the House would be adopted to appoint the committee.

The Speaker then called Mr. John W. Taylor, of New York, to the chair.[4]

Thereupon Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, proposed the following:

Ordered, That the Speaker's communication be entered on the Journal.

Considerable debate arose as to the manner of the presentation. Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, thought the better way to have brought the subject before the House would have been for the Speaker to have addressed a letter to the Speaker pro tempore, and that letter might be referred. There seemed to be difficulty about entering an oral address of the Speaker in the Journal. But Mr. Forsyth thought there was no difficulty, and that this address, like the addresses of the Speaker when entering and leaving the speakership,[5] both of which were oral, and both of which

[3] Insinuations of a corrupt bargain to support Mr. Adams as President in return for an appointment as Secretary of State.

[4] The Journal has no mention of this, but the Debates record it; and it would seem to be the course demanded by propriety.

[5] These addresses are entered on the Journals as a matter of course, without vote of the House. The remarks of the first Speaker, Mr. Muhlenburg, on taking the chair in 1789, are referred to but not given in full in the Journal; but his farewell remarks at the end of the Congress, in response to the vote of thanks, appear. The address of the second Speaker, Mr. Trumbull, on taking the chair, appears in full, and such is yet the general, though not invariable custom.

were always entered on the Journals, might by the Clerk and Speaker be entered on the Journal without trouble.

The House finally agreed to the order, and the appeal of the Speaker was spread in full on the Journal.

Mr. Forsyth then moved to refer the Speaker's communication to a select committee, and on February 4,[1] after debate, this motion was agreed to, yeas 125, nays 167.

The objection to the reference to a committee was made principally on the alleged ground that no act of the House could result from it; but in reply it was urged that the penalty of expulsion could be visited for a breach of privilege.

It was then—

Ordered, That the committee consist of seven Members, and that it be appointed by ballot.

On February 6,[2] the committee were chosen by ballot, a second ballot being necessary to complete the number. The members were Messrs. Philip P. Barbour, of Virginia; Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts; Louis McLane, of Delaware; John W. Taylor, of New York; John Forsyth, of Georgia; Romulus M. Saunders, of North Carolina, and Christopher Rankin, of Mississippi.

On February 9,[3] the committee reported that they had informed Hon. George Kremer that they would be ready at a particular time to receive evidence touching the charges made by him. In reply Mr. Kremer sent to them a communication, in which he declined to appear before the committee alleging that he could not do so without appearing either as an accuser or a witness, both of which he protested against. In this posture of affairs, the committee could take no further steps. It was of course competent for the House to invest them with the power to send for persons and papers, and by that means enable them to make an investigation. But not knowing any reasons for such an investigation, of their own knowledge, they felt it only their duty to lay before the House the letter of Mr. Kremer, which they added to their report.

1363. A charge by a Member that the Journal of the House had been mutilated by the Speaker was made a question of privilege.

Charges being made against the Speaker, he called a member of the minority party to the chair during their consideration.

Instance wherein a bill was originated in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

In a rare instance the House committed a bill directly to the Committee of the Whole before sending it to a standing or select committee (footnote).

On March 26, 1850[4] Mr. Preston King, of New York, rose to a question of privilege, which he reduced to writing, as follows, viz:

I charge that the Journal of the House has been mutilated by erasing a motion that I did make, and substituting, by interlineation, one that I did not make, in the Journal of the 13th instant. My motion was to close debate on the California bill; these words are changed, and "message" substituted.

The said charge having been submitted to the consideration of the House, the Speaker[1] called Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, to perform the duties of the Chair.[2]

After debate,[3] and after two propositions had been submitted and considered, Mr. Isaac E. Holmes, of South Carolina, moved that a committee of nine be appointed by the gentleman now presiding over the House, to investigate the charges made against the honorable Speaker by the Hon. Preston King, a Member of this House.

The Speaker (Mr. Cobb), after unanimous consent of the House had been given, made from the floor an explanation of the occurrence. The California message had been committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but the California bill, to which Mr. King referred, had never appeared in the House, but had originated in the Committee of the Whole during the consideration of the message and was still in the committee. The Speaker explained that Mr. King offered the resolution to close debate on the bill as well as on the message; but when the Speaker came to read the journal before its admission to the House for approval he found that such a resolution to close debate was not privileged, except as it referred to a matter committed to the Committee of the Whole by the House. The bill had not been so committed,[4] and the House had no parliamentary knowledge of it. The Journal as corrected was read to the House. The alteration of the Journal was, he contended, proper, since the resolution had been entertained as a privileged proposition and the alteration had only been made to make it conform to the privileged form.

This motion having been agreed to, the Speaker pro tempore appointed the committee, Mr. Holmes being made chairman.

The special committee, on March 29, 1850[5] made a report exonerating the Speaker. The House unanimously approved the report.

1364. A newspaper having made certain charges against the official character of the Speaker, he called a Member to the chair and moved an investigation, which was voted.

A select committee being authorized to investigate the conduct of the Speaker, they were appointed by the Member called to the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The report of a select committee on the conduct of the Speaker was voted on by the House, although it contained no order or resolution; and was spread on the Journal without direction of the House.

On February 27, 1879,[6] the Speaker[7] called Mr. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, a member of the majority, to the chair, and as a question of privilege presented to the House an extract from a newspaper, purporting to make, on the authority of a certain special agent of the Treasury Department, whose name was given, a charge that the Speaker had used his influence to the advantage of a paper mill in which he was a stockholder by continuing a profitable contract with the Government. The Speaker denied the charge, and offered a resolution providing that a select committee of five be appointed to investigate the matter.

This resolution was agreed to unanimously, and Mr. Carlisle, as Speaker pro tempore, appointed the committee, the chairman and two others from the majority side of the House, and two from the minority side.

On March 3 the committee made an unanimous report, exonerating the Speaker. This report, apparently without order of the House, was inserted in full in the Journal. The report was also voted on by the House and agreed to by the House, although it was a simple statement, without any proposition attached, such as a resolution.

1365. The Speaker of the House being the Vice-President-elect, called a Member to the chair during discussion of a question relating to the electoral count.

A Member called to the chair to preside temporarily was given special authority by the House to appoint a committee.

On February 10, 1869, the counting of the electoral votes showed Ulysses S. Grant, of Illinois, chosen President of the United States, and Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Vice-President. It had been ordered that a committee should be appointed on the part of the House to join a similar committee of the Senate, to notify the President-elect and Vice President-elect of their election. There had also arisen a question of privilege relating to the electoral count, and the Speaker (who was also the Vice-President-elect) had left the chair to participate in the debate. On the succeeding day, February 11,[1] the Speaker announced his intention to designate Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, as Speaker pro tempore[2] during the consideration of the question of privilege, which had come over as unfinished business from the day before.

Before leaving the chair he asked the House to grant authority to the Speaker pro tempore to appoint the committee of notification.

This authority was granted without objection, and Mr. Dawes, having assumed the chair, made the appointment.

1366. During consideration of a resolution to censure a Member for disrespect for the Speaker, the Member likewise assailed the Speaker pro tempore, whereupon the Speaker resumed the chair, while the House acted on the latest breach of privilege.

Pending consideration of a resolution to censure a Member, the Speaker informed the Member that he should retire.

[1] Third Session Fortieth Congress, Journal, p. 324; Globe, p. 1094.

[2] The Journal says that the Speaker, "by unanimous consent, named Mr. Dawes to perform the duties of the Chair." This must mean the appointment of the committee, since the rule already gave the power of designation.

On July 11, 1832,[1] the House was considering an appeal from a decision of the Chair in relation to a resolution censuring Mr. William Stanbery, of Ohio, for words spoken in debate.

Mr. Stanbery, having the floor in the debate on the appeal, said:

I will make one motion that is in order: I make a motion that you [the Speaker pro tempore] leave the chair.

On demand of Mr. Augustin S. Clayton, of Georgia, the words were taken down and read.

Thereupon Mr. James K. Polk, of Tennessee, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the words spoken in this House this morning by William Stanbery, a Member from Ohio, and which words have been taken down by the Clerk of the House, and his conduct in the face of the House, were disorderly, and deserve the censure of the House.

The speaker pro tempore,[2] leaving the chair from motives of delicacy, the Speaker[3] took the chair, and decided that the words of Mr. Stanbery were disorderly.

After further debate, participated in by Mr. Stanbery, who insisted that what he had said was parliamentary, the Speaker said that the words having been taken down and admitted, and a resolution of censure having been moved, it was the duty of the Member from Ohio to Withdraw.

After further debate, request was made of Mr. Polk that he withdraw his resolution in order that the House might bring to a conclusion the pending appeal, and the original resolution censuring Mr. Stanbery.

Mr. Polk accordingly withdrew his resolution, and the original resolution of censure was agreed to. The original resolution of censure was for words spoken disrespectfully of the Speaker.

1367. The Speaker may of right speak from the chair on questions of order and be first heard.

Except on questions of order the Speaker may speak from the chair only by leave of the House and on questions of fact.

On occasions comparatively rare, Speakers have called Members to the chair and participated in debate, usually without asking consent or the House.

According to a former custom,, now fallen into disuse, the Speakers participated freely in debate in Committee of the Whole.

The Speaker sits while rendering decisions on points of order or when participating in debate thereon.

Section XVII of Jefferson's Manual has this provision:

But if the Speaker rise to speak, the Member standing up ought to sit down, that he may be first heard. (Town., col. 205; Hale Parl., 133; Mem. in Hakew., 30, 31.) 'Nevertheless, though the Speaker may of right speak to matters of order,[4] and be first heard, he is restrained from speaking on any other subject, except where the House have occasion for facts within his knowledge; then he may, with their leave, state the matter of fact.[1]

1368. The seat of the Speaker as a Member being contested, consent of the House was obtained to permit him to speak on the report, although he had called a Member to the chair.

A contestant for a seat being heard on the floor in his own behalf is subject to all the rules of debate applying to the Member.

[1] This rule was formerly construed to prevent the Speaker from speaking from a place on the floor when a Speaker pro tempore was presiding. It did not apply to Committee of the whole. In later years, in the rare instances when Speakers have left the chair and debated, they have done so without obtaining leave of the House, in explicit terms at least. On April 9, 1864, (first session Thirty-eighth Congress). Journal, p. 505; Globe, p. 1503) Mr. Speaker Colfax left the chair to move the expulsion of Mr. Alexander Long, of Ohio; again, on February 10, 1869 (third session Fortieth Congress, Journal, p. 322; Globe, p. 1066), Mr. Colfax left the chair. On March 16, 1871 (first session Forty-second Congress, Globe, p. 124), Mr. Speaker Blaine left the chair to reply to Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts (the Journal in this case makes no reference to the action, the Globe indicates that no request for the consent of the House was made, while Mr. Blaine—Globe, p. 125—apologized for the proceeding which he justified by the early precedents); on February 4, 1872 (third session Forty-second Congress, Globe, pp. 1092,1115), Mr. Speaker Blaine left the chair without consent to propose and advocate a private bill granting a pension to a daughter of President Taylor, widow of an army officer; and on December 2, 1872, the same Speaker (third session Forty-second Congress, Journal, p. 8; Globe, p. 11) left the chair to move the Credit Mobilier investigation, the Journal indicating that the consent of the House may have been obtained; and on February 4, 1875 (second session Forty-third Congress, Record, p. 899), he debated a proposed amendment to the rules. Of the more recent Speakers, Mr. Crisp, on March 29, 1894 (second session Fifty-third Congress, Record, p. 3335), took the floor without express leave of the House.

On April 19, 1878 (second session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 2665), Mr. Speaker Randall called Mr. Robert B. Vance, of North Carolina, to the chair as Speaker pro tempore, and then from the floor made a personal explanation; on April 9, 1879 (first session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 336), Mr. Speaker Randall participated in debate in the House on a report from the Committee on Rules, and on May 1 (Journal, p. 224; Record, p. 1018) the same Speaker left the chair without consent of the House to present a report from the Committee on Rules. Again, on February 4, 1880 (second session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 1079), Mr. Speaker Randall, without asking consent, left the chair to debate in a case of personal explanation into which his name had been brought by a Member. On June 14, 1906 (first session Fifty-ninth Congress, Record, pp. 8528, 8529), Mr. Speaker Cannon, without asking consent of the House, left the chair to reply to remarks reflecting on his conduct made by a Delegate in debate.

On January 5, 1826, on the subject of a proposed rule relating to the duties of the Speaker in the presentation of memorials, Mr. Speaker Taylor, from the chair, spoke at some length on his understanding of the duty of the Chair (first session Nineteenth Congress, Debates, pp. 880–883).

On January 10, 1896, Mr. Speaker Reed participated briefly from the chair in debate on the theory of the quorum present as related to the rules (first session Fifty-fourth Congress, Record, p. 579).

In the modern practice of the House the Speakers quite frequently vote in Committee of the Whole, but rarely participate in the debate. On March 27, 1906 (first session Fifty-ninth Congress, Record, p. 4355), Mr. Speaker Cannon interposed briefly in reply to a criticism of his conduct by a Member in the debate; but for a quarter of a century such participation in debate had been rare. Mr. Speaker Randall, however, was a frequent participant in debates in Committee of the Whole. (Congressional Record, second session Forty-sixth Congress, p. 1705; third session Forty-sixth Congress, pp. 303, 1525.) In the earlier history of Congress a Speaker (Mr. Dayton) participated in debate in Committee of the Whole to the extent of being called to order by the chairman for improper utterances. (Annals of Congress, first session Fifth Congress, p. 1004.) In fact, the early Speakers frequently debated in Committee of the Whole. Thus Mr. Clay spoke on nine measures in one session. (First session Twelfth Congress. See Annals.)

Also, on February 14, 1826, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Speaker Taylor spoke on an appeal from the decision of the Chairman, and expressed the opinion that the decision was wrong. (First session Nineteenth Congress, Debates, p. 1358.)

On June 6, 1844,[1] the Speaker[2] having left the chair and substituted Mr. John B. Weller, of Ohio, as Speaker pro tempore, the House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections upon the memorial of John M. Botts, who contested the right of John W. Jones to a seat as a Member of this House (the consideration of the report having been, on the 31st of May ultimo, postponed until this day), the question being on agreeing to the resolution accompanying the report, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That John W. Jones is entitled to his seat in this House as a Representative from the Sixth Congressional district in Virginia.

On motion of Mr. George W. Hopkins, of Virginia (by unanimous consent)—

Ordered, That the Speaker of this House, whose right to a seat as a Member of this House is contested, have leave to speak upon this resolution, notwithstanding that clause of the Manual which restrains the Speaker from addressing the House except upon questions of order.

Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, submitted the inquiry whether Mr. Botts, in debating the resolution, would be subject to the provisions of the rule which declares that "no Member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in committee."

The Speaker pro tempore decided that, although the word "Member" is used in this rule, it is also in many other rules relative to order and debate, and that any person not a Member of this House who is permitted to appear at the bar and address the House must necessarily be governed by all the rules of debate which are applicable to Members, subject to the rule limiting a speech to one hour.

From this decision Mr. Davis appealed. This appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 102 to 76.

1369. A Member having criticized the past conduct of the Speaker, the House consented that the latter should explain from the chair.—On January 22, 1836,[3] Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, having the floor in debate, criticized the conduct of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the preceding Congress, and called upon him to make an explanation.

The former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee being at this time the Speaker of the House,[4] and occupying the chair at the time Mr. Wise made the demand, said that, while considering the proceeding out of order, he had not arrested it, as he was personally referred to. He would make a statement if the House would permit.

The. consent of the House being given, the Speaker, evidently without leaving the chair, made an explanation.

1370. The Speaker has spoken briefly from the chair on a question of privilege relating to himself.—On March 15, 1902,[5] Mr. E. S. Minor, of Wisconsin, rising to a question of privilege, denied the truth of a newspaper report that he had, in his duty as a Representative, been threatened with coercion by the Speaker.

At the conclusion of Mr. Minor's remarks, the Speaker [1] said:

The Chair thinks proper to say, in view of the fact that he is referred to in the article read, that so far as the article is concerned and its statements, the averments of the gentleman from Wisconsin are absolutely true. There is not one word or shadow of truth in any statement made in that article.

1371. Instance wherein the Speaker left the chair to reply to a speech reflecting on his conduct.—On June 14, 1906,[2] the House was considering the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, when Mr. Marcus A. Smith, of Arizona, in the course of debate said:

The less said about the way this original bill has been pressed the better for the history of this Congress, and I refrain from going into that part of it. There is a law in Arizona that if one legislator trades with another on the legislation before that body he is guilty of a very high misdemeanor, and if the governor shall attempt in that benighted land to influence legislation by promises of veto or the withholding of veto to secure other legislation he goes to the penitentiary under the laws of that land.

At the close of Mr. Smith's remarks the Speaker [3] called Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, to the chair, and going upon the floor and addressing the House, in the course of his remarks said:

That remark could not have had but one motive and one meaning, and that meaning is that some one in the House has sought to affect legislation in the House as a matter of traffic in order to secure action upon this matter in the Senate or in the House. That imputation implied, so far as it reflects upon the Speaker of this House and, so far as I know or believe, upon any other Member of this House, is unworthy of the gentleman that uttered it and without foundation in fact. If it were necessary to furnish proof of this statement, I look about me here on my own side of the House on Members with whom I disagreed touching the progress of this bill from time to time, and upon that side of the House, and I pause and invite any Member present who has the least intimation, knowledge, or even belief that the statement implied in the insinuation of the gentleman is true to so state.

1372. By leave of the House the Speaker was permitted to make a statement from the chair as to proceedings in the recent joint meeting to count the electoral vote.—On February 10, 1869,[4] after the completion of the electoral count and after the Senate had retired, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, rising to a question of privilege, introduced a resolution relating to certain proceedings in the joint convention.

The resolution having been held to be in order for consideration, the Speaker [5] asked leave of the House to make a statement in relation to what occurred in joint convention.

There being no objection, the Speaker, from his place, made a statement.

1373. The Speaker sometimes makes a brief explanation from the chair without asking the assent of the House.—On December 18, 1873,[1] Mr. Speaker Blaine, from the chair, explained in debate a proposed rule justifying himself in this action by the fact that he was a member of the Committee on Rules reporting the rule.

1374. On December 10, 1880,[2] Mr. Speaker Randall, from the chair, intervened in a case where a member was making a personal explanation to explain the position of the Chair in the matter.

1375. In very rare cases the Speaker takes the floor to make a motion.—On April 9, 1864,[3] Mr. Speaker Colfax came down from the chair to move a resolution to expel T. Alexander Long, of Ohio; and during the debate which followed there was some criticism of this action of the presiding officer. Mr. Colfax justified his course by citing the fact that during the Congress of 1812 and 1813 Mr. Speaker Clay came down from the chair fifteen times to make speeches on the floor.[4]

1376. On March 16, 1854,[5] Mr. Speaker Boyd, by unanimous consent, gave notice of his intention, at the proper time, to submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill of the House (H. R. 1) to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and a other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of 160 acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified, and to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands; which was ordered to be printed.

Chapter XLV.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

1377. A Speaker pro tempore is appointed by the Speaker or elected by the House.

Form and history of Rule I, sec. 7.

The rule relating to the Speaker's appointment of a Speaker pro tempore is section 7 of Rule I:

He shall have the right to name any Member to perform the duties of the Chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.[3] Provided, however, That in case of his illness, he may make such appointment for a period not exceeding ten days, with the approval of the House at the time the same is made; and in his absence and omission to make such appointment, the House shall, proceed to elect a Speaker pro tempore to act during his absence.

On December 23, 1811,[4] a rule was proposed which included a provision that the Speaker "shall, when pressing occasion calls him from the chair, have the right to name any Member to substitute him and to perform the duties of the Chair temporarily, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment." As finally adopted in the Twelfth Congress the rule was in these words:

He shall have the right to name any Member to perform the duties of the Chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.

[2] See also section 229 of Volume 1.

[3] January 14, 1828, Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, commenting on changes in the usages of the House, said that the old Speakers and old Chairmen of the Committees of the Whole never asked the privilege of calling others to the chair. He recalled seeing Chairman John Cotton Smith continue in the chair seventeen hours. (First session Twentieth Congress, Debates, p. 1004.) The Speakers in later years have usually called only Members of the majority party to preside temporarily, although there are a few exceptions.

On April 16, 1878 (second session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 2576), Speaker Randall called Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, a Member of the minority, to the chair during consideration of a bill relating to the government of the District of Columbia. Again on May 6, 1878 (second session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 3211), Mr. Hale was called to the chair.

[4] First session Twelfth Congress, Report No. 38.

On April 28, 1876, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, "at the personal request of the Chair," as he explained, submitted a resolution to amend the rule so that "in case of the personal illness of the Speaker he may make such appointment for a period not exceeding ten days, with the approval of the House at the time the same is made." [1]

In the general revision of 1880 the rule was reported from the Committee on Rules in its present form and adopted.[2]

1378. Form of Speaker's designation of a Speaker pro tempore.—On February 7, 1907,[3] the House was called to order at 12 m. by Mr. Dalzell, who directed the Clerk to read the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Febuary 7, 1907.

I hereby designate Hon. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, to act as Speaker pro tempore to-day.

J. G. CANNON.

1379. The Speaker does not always name in open House the Member whom he calls to the chair temporarily during the day's sitting.—On April 22, 1834,[4] during a session of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, a quorum failed, and the Committee, by direction of the Chairman, rose.

The Speaker being absent, Mr. Jesse Speight, of North Carolina, took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A point of order having been raised by Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, the question of Mr. Speight's occupancy of the chair was brought up for discussion on the succeeding day, on a motion to correct the Journal. Mr. Adams held that the proceeding had been irregular, the Speaker pro tempore having really been named by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole instead of by the Speaker, as the rule required.

The Speaker,[5] after debate had proceeded, said he owed it to himself to explain the circumstances under which he had been in the habit of appointing the Speaker pro tempore to preside in his absence. He did not consider, by the rule, that he was bound to nominate by name to the House the individual whom he selected. It was not a fact that the Chairman of the Committee had nominated Mr. Speight in his absence. It was a fact that he was nominated by himself, and, having been suffering under some indisposition, he had, previous to his leaving the House, who were then in Committee, informed the Clerk of the Member whom he had named. After referring to the practice and usage of the British Parliament on the matters involved, he concluded by saying it was competent for the House to express their decision on them.

The House laid on the table Mr. Adams's motion to amend the Journal.

1380. A Speaker pro tempore is sometimes elected for a temporary absence of the Speaker within the legislative day.—On May 15, 1906,[1] when the House met at 12 o'clock, the Speaker was not present, and the House was called to order by the Clerk.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, moved that Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, be elected Speaker pro tempore. The motion was agreed to, and Mr. Dalzell took the chair.

During the reading of the Journal the Speaker entered the Hall and took the chair.

Mr. John S. Williams, of Mississippi, suggested a question as to the length of time for which the House had elected a Speaker pro tempore; but the point was not pressed.[2]

1381. For an absence extending beyond the legislative day and not caused by illness, the Speaker may designate a Speaker pro tempore only with consent of the House.—On Friday, April 23, 1897,[3] the Speaker,[4] desiring to be absent to attend the ceremonies at the tomb of General Grant, designated Mr. Charles W. Stone, of Pennsylvania, to be Speaker pro tempore for the succeeding week, having previously asked and obtained unanimous consent of the House authorizing him to make the designation. The House had previously constituted a committee, of which the Speaker was made chairman, to attend the ceremonies. The House, by unanimous consent, had previously arranged to adjourn to Monday, and on that day to adjourn again to Thursday, and on Thursday to adjourn again to the succeeding Monday.

1382. In rare instances in the later practice members of the minority party have been called to preside in the Committee of the Whole or as Speakers pro tempore.—Mr. Speaker Blaine, in 1875,[5] called members of the minority party to the chair. Thus, on January 6, Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, presided in Committee of the Whole during consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill; on February 9, Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, presided in Committee of the Whole during the consideration of the Private Calendar; and on March 3, 1875, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, was called to the chair as Speaker pro tempore.[6]

On February 22, 1901,[7] during the consideration of pension bills in the House, the Speaker called to the chair for a time Mr. Jasper A. Talbert, of South Carolina, a member of the minority side of the House.

1383. Instance wherein a member of the minority party was designated as Speaker pro tempore for an occasion of ceremony.—On February 25, 1907,[8] the Speaker[9] designated Mr. William A. Jones, of Virginia, a member of the minority, as Speaker pro tempore during eulogies on the late John F. Rixey, of Virginia, who had been a member of the minority party in the House.

1385. In the Senate a temporary President pro tempore sometimes designates another.—On May 28, 1902,[2] in the Senate, the following designation was presented:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D.C., May 28, 1902.

To the Senate:

The undersigned, performing the duties of the Chair during the absence of the President pro tempore, names Hon. Jacob H. Gallinger, Senator from New Hampshire, to perform said duties during Wednesday, the 28th day of May, 1902.

O. H. PLATT.

1386. In the absence of the Speaker, the House, unless it adjourn, elects a Speaker pro tempore for the day or part of the day.

A Speaker pro tempore elected only for the temporary absence of the Speaker is not sworn.

It is proper to inform the Senate of the election of a Speaker pro tempore.

In the absence of the Speaker the Clerk calls the House to order.

On February 7, 1846,[3] at five minutes after 10 o'clock, the Speaker not being present, at the request of several Members, the Clerk called the House to order.

Mr. Charles J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, moved that Mr. James J. McKay, of North Carolina, be appointed Speaker pro tempore until the Speaker should arrive.

And the question being put by the Clerk, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. McKay accordingly took the chair.

A call of the House was then ordered, during which the Speaker appeared, and took the chair.

The Journal does not record that the Speaker pro tempore was sworn, or that any notice was sent to the Senate.

1387. On several occasions in 1888[4] the House elected Speakers pro tempore in the absence of the Speaker. In each instance the resolution specified that the election was during the "temporary absence of the Speaker," and in each instance a resolution directing the Clerk to inform the Senate was agreed to, but no similar instruction was given in regard to the President.

1388. On May 19 and 20, 1812,[5] the Speaker being indisposed and unable to attend, the House at once adjourned.

1389. On June 19, 1848,[1] the regular hour of meeting having arrived, the Clerk called the House to order, and stated that in consequence of the indisposition of the Speaker, he could not attend the session of the House and that therefore it became necessary that the House should choose a presiding officer pro tempore.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. George Ashmun, of Massachusetts—

Resolved, That Mr. Burt, of South Carolina, should preside as Speaker of the House this day.

Mr. Burt accordingly took the chair.

It does not appear that any message was sent to the Senate informing them of the election of a Speaker pro tempore.

1390. A Speaker about to be absent sometimes obtains the consent of the House to name a Speaker pro tempore.

In the earlier practice a Member of the minority party was sometimes named as Speaker pro tempore.

On April 18, 1850,[2] the Speaker stated to the House that he would probably be absent for the next two days, and the House gave its unanimous consent, to the appointment of a Speaker pro tempore. Thereupon the Speaker appointed Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts. The Speaker was Howell Cobb, of Georgia, a Democrat, and Mr. Winthrop, who was an ex-Speaker, was a Whig.

1391. On Monday, June 2, 1856,[3] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, named Hon. William Aiken, of South Carolina, to perform the duties of the Chair until Thursday next. The Speaker was a Republican, and Mr Aiken a Democrat.

1392. On March 17, 1864,[4] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, was authorized to name a Member, on Friday of each week, who should perform the duties of the Chair at the Saturday sittings of the House.

1393. On March 22, 1867,[5] Mr. Speaker Colfax asked leave of absence for the ensuing day, and also the privilege of designating a Speaker pro tempore. Both requests were granted.

1394. A Speaker pro tempore is not sworn.—On June 20, 1848,[6] the Clerk called the House to order and stated that the Speaker was still so much indisposed as to prevent him from resuming the duties of the Chair.

And thereupon, on motion of Mr. Daniel P. King, of Massachusetts, it was unanimously

Resolved, That Mr. Armistead Burt, of South Carolina, be appointed Speaker pro tempore to discharge the duties of the Chair during the present week, if the Speaker shall remain so long unable to give his attendance.

Mr. Burt, before taking the Chair, suggested that it might be necessary that he should be sworn before entering upon the temporary duties of the office, but it being shown that the Speaker took no other oath than that taken by other Members at the beginning of the session, the only difference between him and the others being that he was sworn first, the point was not pressed.

On motion of Mr. George Ashmun, of Massachusetts, by leave it was Resolved, That the Clerk inform the Senate that in the absence of the Speaker, by reason of illness, the House has made choice of the Hon. Armistead Burt, one of the Representatives from the State of South Carolina, as Speaker protempore.

1395. A Speaker pro tempore by designation merely asks consent of the House before appointing committee.—On February 5, 1903,[1] Mr. Theodore F. Kluttz, of North Carolina, announced the death of his colleague, Mr. J. M. Moody, and proposed the usual resolutions providing a committee to take order concerning the funeral.

The resolutions having been agreed to, the Speaker pro tempore,[2] asking and obtaining the consent of the House, appointed the committee.

1396. A Speaker pro tempore by designation merely asks consent of the House before appointing conferees.—On June 12, 1906,[3] the House further insisted on its disagreement to the Senate amendments to the bill (H.R. 12987) relating to regulation of railway rates, and agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate.

Thereupon the Speaker pro tempore[4] (who had not been chosen by the House, but had been temporarily called to the Chair by the Speaker) asked and received the unanimous consent of the House empowering him to name the managers for the House.

1397. On February 18, 1903,[5] the House insisted on its disagreement to the Senate amendments to the army appropriation bill, and asked a further conference.

By unanimous consent the Speaker pro tempore[6] (by designation merely) appointed the conferees.

1398. On February 9, 1903,[7] the House voted to further insist and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1425) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia.

Thereupon the Speaker pro tempore[8] (by designation merely), by the unanimous consent of the House, appointed the conferees.

1399. A Member called to the Chair during the day's sitting does not usually sign enrolled bills.—On March 29, 1867,[9] Mr. Speaker Colfax announced that he would not be able to be present during the day, and under the rule would designate Mr. George S. Boutell, of Massachusetts, to preside in his absence. He would, however, return to the House during the day to sign enrolled bills.

1400. On December 22, 1869,[10] Mr. Speaker Blaine "named Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, to perform the duties of the Chair during the remainder of the present day's sitting of the House."

Soon after several enrolled bills were reported from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and the Speaker pro tempore signed the same. It does not appear that any question was raised as to this proceeding.

1401. There being doubt about the signing of enrolled bills by a Speaker pro tempore designated by the Speaker, the House proceeded to elect.

A Speaker pro tempore being elected, the Senate and President are informed.

Form of designation of Speaker pro tempore.

On July 7, 1898,[1] the House was called to order at 12 o'clock m. by Hon. Alexander McDowell, its Clerk, who read the following communication:

I hereby designate Hon. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, to preside over the House this day.

T. B. REED, Speaker.

JULY 7, 1898.

Mr. Payne took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Later in the day, there being doubt whether or not a Speaker pro tempore thus designated, and of whose incumbency neither the President nor the Senate had official knowledge, might sign the enrolled bills, the following proceedings occurred: Mr. William P. Hepburn, of Iowa, being temporarily called to the chair by Mr. Payne, Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolutions, which were successively adopted:

Resolved, That Hon. Sereno E. Payne, a Representative from the State of New York, be, and hereby is, elected Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to notify the Senate that the House has elected Hon. Sereno E. Payne, a Representative from the State of New York, as Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to inform the President of the election of Hon. Sereno E. Payne, a Representative from the State of New York, as Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives during the temporary absence of the Speaker.[2]

1402. The Senate, by resolution, empowered its acting President pro tempore to sign enrolled bills.—On May 20, 1902,[3] the Senate agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. O. H. Platt, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, designated by the President pro tempore to perform the duties of the Chair during his temporary absence, be empowered to sign as acting President pro tempore the enrolled bills and joint resolutions coming from the House of Representatives for presentation to the President of the United States, and that the President be notified hereof.

1403. The Senate, by rule, empowers a presiding officer by designation to sign enrolled bills.—On January 4, 1905,[4] in the Senate, Mr. Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, presented this resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. George C. Perkins, a Senator from the State of California, designated by the President pro tempore to perform the duties of the Chair during his temporary absence, be empowered to sign as acting President pro tempore the enrolled bills and joint resolutions coming from the House of Representatives for presentation to the President of the United States, and that the President be notified thereof.

In explanation, Mr. Platt said:

I think there is a question as to whether the designation by the President pro tempore of a Senator to act in his place and discharge the duties devolving upon the Chair carries with it the right to sign enrolled bills. The precedent of the Senate is that a resolution should be passed in such a case. In 1892, 1 think, the President pro tempore designated me to act as presiding officer during his absence of perhaps a fortnight. The question then arose as to whether, under such designation, I would have the same power to sign enrolled bills as the President pro tempore has under the rules. There being a doubt about it, a resolution similar to the resolution which I have now presented was prepared and passed at that time.

There is no constitutional power devolved upon the President pro tempore of the Senate to sign enrolled bills, and I do not know of any law which requires him to sign such bills. There may be, but I think there is not; so that he signs bills by virtue of a custom which has sprung up, and that custom has certainly come to be an unwritten law.

The rule authorizes the designation by the President pro tempore of a Senator to act as presiding officer during his absence, who shall perform all the duties of the Chair. It is quite possible that that is of itself sufficient to authorize the Senator acting as presiding officer under such circumstances to sign bills, but on a former occasion it was thought better that there should be an actual authority given by the Senate, and I think it is better that there should be.

After debate the resolution was amended and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That whenever a Senator shall be designated by the President pro tempore to perform the duties of the Chair during his temporary absence he shall be empowered to sign, as acting President pro tempore, the enrolled bills and joint resolutions coming from the House of Representatives or presentation to the President of the United States.

1404. A Speaker pro tempore whose designation has received the approval of the House signs enrolled bills and appoints committees.—On April 26, 1880,[1] Mr. Speaker Randall asked and received the consent of the House to name Mr. J. S. C. Blackburn, of Kentucky, as Speaker pro tempore for the next three days. Mr. Speaker Randall stated that it was necessary that messages be sent to inform the Senate and the President of this, and such messages were ordered to be sent. The Speaker pro tempore thus appointed, signed enrolled bills and appointed Members on committees of conference, and also on a select committee.

1405. A Speaker pro tempore being elected by the House, the Senate is notified.—On April 20, 1798,[2] the Speaker being indisposed[3] and unable to attend, it was, on motion,

Resolved, That this House do now proceed, by ballot,[4] to the choice of a Speaker pro tempore, to perform the duties assigned to the Chair, during the absence of the Speaker.

The House accordingly, after some discussion as to the propriety of the action, proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Speaker pro tempore; and the ballots being taken, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of George Dent, one of the Representatives for the State of Maryland.

[3] This was before the present rule relating to sickness of Speaker. (See section 1377 of this chapter.)

[4] Speakers are now elected viva voce (see section 187 of Volume I this work) and Speakers pro tempore by resolution.

After the Speaker pro tempore had been conducted to the chair,

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify them of the said appointment; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.[1]

Again, on May 28, 1798, a similar proceeding took place.[2]

1406. When the House elects a Speaker pro tempore for any considerable time, it is usual to notify the Senate and sometimes the President of the United States also.—On June 26, 1876,[3] when the House elected Mr. Milton Sayler, of Ohio, Speaker pro tempore, a resolution was adopted notifying the Senate and President.

1407. On May 18, 1878,[4] the House chose Milton Sayler, of Ohio, Speaker pro tempore, the Speaker having announced that he would be absent for a few days. The House also passed a resolution directing that the Senate be notified. No notification was sent to the President. The Speaker did not ask leave of absence.

1408. On July 5, 1884,[5] the House took a recess, and at the end of the recess, the Speaker being absent, the Clerk called the House to order, and Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Hon. J. C. S. Blackburn, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, be, and he is hereby, elected Speaker pro tempore during the present absence of the Speaker.

Also a resolution was adopted instructing the Clerk to inform the President of the United States and the Senate of the election of the Speaker pro tempore.

The Speaker pro tempore received a vote of thanks for his services, this being the last day of the session, and adjourned the House sine die.

The Speaker had already received the thanks of the House.

1409. On January 31, 1885,[6] the Clerk having called the House to order in the absence of the Speaker, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, offered a resolution, which was agreed to, electing Hon. J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky, Speaker pro tempore. No other resolution instructing the Clerk to inform the Senate or the President appears from the records to have been adopted, but it appears that at the next sitting of the Senate the Clerk of the House did inform the Senate of the election.

1410. On September 3, 1890,[7] the House having elected a Speaker pro tempore, a resolution was adopted directing the Clerk to notify the Senate and President of this fact.

1411. On March 19, 1886,[8] Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, in the absence of the Speaker, took the chair and called the House to order, and before the prayer by the Chaplain or the reading of the Journal, presented to the House a letter from the Speaker (Mr. Carlisle) designating him "to preside as Speaker pro tempore during this day." No action was taken to inform the Senate. This letter of the Speaker was directed to the Clerk of the House.'

1412. On January 5, 1892,[2] the House elected Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, Speaker pro tempore. A message was sent to the Senate informing that body of the election, but not to the President.

1413. The President pro tempore of the Senate has general power to designate in writing a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair during his absence.—On December 15, 1904,[3] in the Senate, Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Rules., said:

> Subdivision 4 of Rule I of the Senate provides that—
> "In event of the death of the Vice-President the President pro tempore shall have the right to name, in writing, a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair during his absence," etc.
> That limits the power given to the President pro tempore of the Senate to a vacancy caused by the death of the Vice President. He should have that power however the vacancy is occasioned; and there is a vacancy now.[4] * * * I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to amend this subdivision of Rule I by striking out in the first line the words "the death of" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a vacancy in the office of;" so that it will read:
>
> "In the event of a vacancy in the office of the Vice-President the President pro tempore shall have the right to name," etc.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

1414. In the Senate the process of designating a President pro tempore for the day's sitting has been the subject of much discussion.—On June 9, 1856,[5] and on earlier occasions, the Senate has questioned the right of the Vice President to send to the Senate a written designation of a President pro tempore under the Senate rule, which is substantially the same as the House rule. It was the contention of Senator Thomas H. Benton and others that the designation should be by the Vice-President in the Senate chamber, and that the sending of written designations was liable to abuse. On this occasion the Vice-President sent several to be presented on successive days, but the Senators determined to elect.

1415. On June 2, 1882,[6] in the Senate, the Secretary presented a letter from David Davis, of Illinois, President pro tempore, designating Hon. J. J. Ingalls, of Kansas, to perform the duties of the Chair until adjournment. The rule of the Senate under which this action was proposed was, "the Presiding Officer shall have the right to name a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment." The question was raised that this language meant a designation in open Senate, and not by letter. The subject was debated all that day, precedents being cited. On the next legislative day the subject was referred to the Committee on Rules.

[1] Usually designations of a Speaker pro tempore are not only directed to the Clerk, but are read by him to the House, when he calls the House to order. Thus in 1902. (First session Fifty-seventh Congress, Journal, pp. 693, 753, 826.)

1416. On December 13, 1883,[1] a proposed rule in regard to the calling of a Senator to the Chair by the presiding officer led to a long debate on the subject in the Senate.

1417. Nature of the office of President pro tempore of the Senate and its relation to the Vice-President.

The President pro tempore of the Senate holds the office at the pleasure of that body.

On January 10, 1876,[2] the Senate agreed unanimously to the following resolutions reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Resolved, That the tenure of office of the President pro tempore of the Senate elected at one session does not expire at the meeting of Congress after the first recess, the Vice-President not having appeared to take the Chair.

Resolved, That the death of the Vice-President does not have the effect to vacate the office of President pro tempore of the Senate.

Over the following resolution, reported from the same committee, there was long debate:

Resolved, That the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is held at the pleasure of the Senate.

It was urged, in the course of the argument, that the model in view, when both the office of Speaker and President pro tempore were created, was the House of Commons. Hence the makers of the Constitution did not consider it necessary to say that the Speaker should be elected from among the members of the House. The Speaker held his office at the pleasure of the House,[3] and the same rule should apply to the President pro tempore.[4] The resolution was discussed on January 10, 12, and was agreed to on the latter date, yeas 34, nays 15.[5]

1418. A member of the Senate elected President pro tempore was excused from serving by vote of the Senate.—On March 1, 1831,[6] Mr. Tazewell, of Virginia, having been elected President pro tempore of the Senate, asked to be excused from serving.

Opposition being made to excusing Mr. Tazewell, a motion that he be excused was made and carried, yeas 20, nays 14.

[5] On March 27, 1889, the subject of the tenure of the President pro tempore of the Senate was the subject of elaborate debate in that body. (First session Fifty-first Congress, Record, p. 43.) And after report from a committee it was determined, on March 12, 1890, that it was competent for the Senate to elect a President pro tempore who should hold office during the pleasure of the Senate, and until another was elected. (Record, pp. 1717, 2144–2153.)

On October 13, 1881 (special session Senate, Forty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 519–521), the Senate removed one President pro tempore by electing another.

Chapter XLVI.

THE SPEAKER'S POWER OF RECOGNITION.

1. The rule and practice. Sections 1419–1424.
2. No appeal from. Sections 1425–1434
3. Member once recognized not to be deprived of floor. Sections 1435–1437.
5. Recognition governed by Member's relation to the pending question. Sections 1438–1464.[1]
6. Conditions under which right to prior recognition passes to opponents of a measure. Sections 1465–1479.[2]

1419. The rule as to recognition by the Speaker.—Sections 1 and 2 of Rule XIV [3] provide:

1. When any Member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and, on being recognized, may address the House * * *.

2. When two or more Members rise at once, the Speaker shall name the Member who is first to speak; * * *.

1420. The old parliamentary rule of recognition.—In Section XVII of Jefferson's Manual the rule of recognition is laid down as follows:

If two or more rise to speak nearly together, the Speaker determines who was first up and calls him by name; whereupon he proceeds, unless he voluntarily sits down and gives way to the other. But sometimes the House does not acquiesce in the Speaker's decision, in which case the question is put, "Which Member was first up?" * * * In the Senate of the United States the President's decision is without appeal.

In the House of Representatives, also, according to the later practice, there has been no appeal from the decision of the Chair on a question of recognition.[4]

1421. On April 4, 1834,[5] Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, complained that the Speaker[6] had deprived him of the floor by recognizing Mr. John Y. Mason, of Virginia, to move the previous question. Mr. Mason, in reply, contended that he was fairly entitled to recognition "by the rules of the House"—meaning undoubtedly the usages of the House.

1422. The Speaker has authority to name the Member who is entitled to the floor.—On March 3, 1853,[7] Mr. Abraham M. Schermerhorn, of New York, having been recognized by the Chair, Mr. Bernhart Henn, of Iowa, made the point of order that he was not entitled to the floor, not having risen from his seat[2] at the time he addressed the Chair.

The Speaker pro tempore[3] overruled the point of order on the ground that the rules confer authority upon the Speaker to name the Member who is entitled to the floor.

On an appeal the Chair was sustained.

1423. On February 2, 1874,[1] Mr. Speaker Blaine said, in the course of an explanation:

> The rules provide that the Member first addressing the Chair shall be recognized; but where fifteen or twenty address him at the same moment, some other mode of assigning the floor must of necessity be resorted to; and there is none so fair as to award precedence according to the relative importance of the motions.

1424. Discretion as to recognition must be lodged with the presiding officer.—On April 8, 1879,[2] the Speaker's power of recognition was the subject of extended debate in the House and was referred for examination. In response thereto, on April 9, 1879,[6] Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, from the Committee on Rules, made a report, which was acquiesced in by the House, on the subject of the rule of recognition:

> With the exception of the last clause of rule 113,[7] which was adopted in 1805, these rules have remained unchanged for ninety years. In the nature of the case discretion must be lodged with the presiding officer, and no fixed and arbitrary order of recognition can be wisely provided for in advance; and the committee are of opinion that these rules should not be changed.
> The practice of making a list of those who desire to speak on measures before the House or Committee of the Whole is a proper one to enable the presiding officer to know and remember the wishes of Members. As to the order of recognition, he should not be bound to follow the list, but should be free to exercise a wise and just discretion in the interest of full and fair debate.[8]

1425. There is no appeal from a decision by the Speaker on a question of recognition.—On February 28, 1881,[1] the question being on a motion of Mr. John Randolph Tacker, of Virginia, relating to disposal of business on the Speaker's table, Mr. George M. Robeson, of New Jersey, moved that the rules be suspended, so as to take from the House Calendar the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. 324) relating to the termination of articles 18 and 21 of the treaty of 1871 with Great Britain relating to the fisheries, and pass the same.

[9] Third session Forty-sixth Congress, Journal, p. 556; Record, p. 2236.

The Speaker [1] held the motion not to be before the House, Mr. Robeson not having been recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Robeson appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The Speaker [2] declined to entertain the appeal, saying:

There is really no power in the House itself to appeal from a recognition of the Chair. The right of recognition is just as absolute in the Chair as the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States is absolute as to the interpretation of the law.

1426. On June 5, 1882,[3] a question arose as to recognition, the Speaker deciding that Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, was not entitled to the floor.

Mr. Cannon proposed to appeal from this decision.

The Speaker [4] said:

The question of recognition does not admit of an appeal. * * * No appeal of that kind has ever been entertained by any Speaker.

1427. On January 30, 1890,[5] the House was considering the appeal of Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, from the decision of the Chair on the preceding day that a quorum was present within the meaning of the Constitution on the vote for the consideration of the contested election case of Smith v. Jackson.

After the Journal had been approved, the Speaker recognized Mr. William McKinley, jr., of Ohio, who was proceeding to debate the pending appeal, when Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made the point of order that a quorum had not voted to approve the Journal on the vote just taken, as was required under common parliamentary law,[6] and also that he had a right now to move to expunge from the Journal of yesterday's proceedings all that part of it which related to the statement of the Speaker that certain Members were present and not voting.

The Speaker [7] said:

Whether the gentleman from Illinois would have a right to make a motion to expunge at any time is another question from that he now presents. This question is a question of recognition; and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio, who has a right to proceed.

From this decision Mr. Springer proposed to appeal, whereupon the Speaker ruled:

The Chair does not think there can be any appeal from a decision upon a question of recognition. That is very well known.[8]

[8] This had long been understood in the House. (See Cong. Record, first session Forty-ninth Congress, p. 7054.) Also ruling by Mr. Springer himself. (First session Forty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 1778; Record, p. 5208.)

1428. On April 18, 1904,[1] the House had ordered the general deficiency appropriation bill to be engrossed and read a third time. After the third reading, Mr. John A. Moon, of Tennessee, arose.

The Speaker I said:

For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. Moon stated that he proposed to move to recommit the bill with certain instructions.

The Speaker said: "The gentleman is not recognized for that purpose," and immediately recognized Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, who had arisen.

Mr. Payne thereupon moved to recommit the bill, and on that motion demanded the previous question.

Thereupon Mr. John S. Williams, of Mississippi, raised the question that Mr. Moon was entitled to be recognized, and appealed from the decision of the Chair in recognizing Mr. Payne.

The Speaker said:

The question of recognition is not subject to appeal. If gentlemen will suspend for a moment, the Chair will make it perfectly plain. The gentleman from New York had requested of the Chair to recognize him to make a motion to recommit, and was on his feet for that purpose. The gentleman came to the Chair, as is usual in such cases, and asked for recognition, as other gentlemen have heretofore done on the minority side touching matters of this kind, and as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] himself came. The Chair informed the gentleman from New York that he would be recognized.

Therefore, with the gentleman from New York on his feet, addressing the Chair, and the gentleman from Tennessee also strenuously addressing the Chair, the Chair took occasion not to recognize the gentleman, but asked the gentleman for what purpose he rose. The gentleman proceeded to inform the Chair, and the Chair declined to recognize the gentleman for that purpose and recognized the gentleman from New York, who was upon his feet. * * * The gentleman from New York was not recognized by agreement. He notified the occupant of the chair that he desired to be recognized, was on his feet addressing the Chair at the same time that the gentleman from Tennessee was on his feet. The gentleman from Tennessee addressing the Chair was asked by the Chair for what purpose he rose.

The Chair did not know, and he stated for the purpose of moving to recommit, and the Chair at once said that the gentleman was not recognized, as the Chair had the right and the power to do from a parliamentary standpoint and a fair standpoint. This whole matter is easy of solution. The gentleman from New York moved the previous question; that motion is amendable by any germane amendment, provided a majority of the House does not cut it off by ordering the previous question. The gentleman from New York is recognized. * * * The Chair does not propose to try the question of fact. The Chair saw the gentleman and heard the gentleman; and even if the gentleman had not addressed the Chair, the Chair had the right to decline to recognize the gentleman from Tennessee and to recognize the gentleman from New York. * * * The Chair will state that the gentleman from New York has moved to recommit this bill to the Committee on Appropriations and upon that motion has demanded the previous question. If the previous question is ordered, no amendment to that motion will be in order. If the previous question is refused, then any germane amendment will be in order.

1429. Under the earlier practice of the House there was an appeal from a decision of the Speaker on a question of recognition.—On February 6, 1827,[3] during the discussion of the bill "for the alteration of acts imposing duties on imports," Mr. John Woods, of Ohio, Mr. James Hamilton, of South Carolina, and several other Members rose in their places to address the Chair.

[2] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

Mr. Hamilton claimed the floor.

The Speaker [1] decided that Mr. Woods was entitled to it.

Mr. Hamilton inquired if he had the right to appeal.

The Speaker replied that he had.

Mr. Hamilton then appealed from the decision of the Chair, which was affirmed by the House, ayes 98, noes 54.

1430. On January 29, 1840,[2] an appeal was taken from a recognition by Mr. Speaker Hunter and the decision of the Speaker sustained.

1431. On June 1, 1840,[3] a controversy occurred between Messrs. F. 0. J. Smith, of Maine, and George H. Proffit, of Indiana, as to who was entitled to the floor. The Speaker [4] awarded the floor to Mr. Proffit. Thereupon Mr. Smith appealed from this decision of the Chair, but later withdrew the appeal in order to save the time of the House. The Speaker not only entertained but invited the appeal.

1432. On March 3, 1857,[5] Mr. William R. Sapp, of Ohio, and Mr. Lemuel D. Evans, of Texas, having risen to address the Chair, the Speaker recognized Mr. Sapp.

Mr. Evans claimed that he was entitled to the floor.

The Speaker [6] decided that Mr. Sapp was entitled to the floor.

From this decision of the Chair Mx. Evans appealed. The appeal was laid on the table.

The record of the debate [7] shows that when Mr. Sapp was recognized Mr. Evans, rising to a question of order, submitted that the gentleman from Ohio had had the floor assigned to him three times while he, Mr. Evans, had been endeavoring to obtain the ear of the Speaker.

The Chair stated that the gentleman from Ohio was entitled to the floor before the House took a recess, and had now a right to claim the floor.

1433. On April 9, 1860,[8] Mr. Warren Winslow, of North Carolina, called up a report made on a previous day by the select committee on the subject of Executive influence and assigned to this day for consideration.

The House having proceeded to the consideration of the report, Messrs. Winslow and John Covode, of Pennsylvania, each claimed the floor.

The Speaker [9] decided that, as Mr. Covode had reported the measure under consideration from the committee, he was entitled under the rule to open the debate.

Mr. Winslow having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table, yeas 125, nays 59.

1434. On March 1, 1861,[10] a Member appealed from a decision of Mr. Speaker Pennington recognizing another Member as entitled to the floor. The Speaker entertained the appeal, but declared that it was not debatable.

1435. A Member may lose his right to the floor if he neglect to claim it before another Member has been recognized.—On January 13, 1836,[1] the House proceeded to the consideration of a resolution offered on a previous day by Mr. Leonard Jarvis, of Maine, relating to the agitation for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

A motion was made and entertained to lay the resolution, with a pending amendment, on the table, and the yeas and nays were called and ordered on this motion.

Thereupon Mr. Hopkins Holsey, of Georgia, made the point of order that he was on the floor when the subject was last before the House, and that he was entitled to the floor, the motion to lay on the table not being admissible under the circumstances.

The Speaker[2] said that if the gentleman had claimed the floor when the subject was first announced, he would have been entitled to it. But as he had not done so before several gentlemen had arisen and a modification of the resolution had been made, it was now too late to press his right to the floor.

1436. On June 13, 1836,[3] the House was considering the bill providing for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, when Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, proposed an amendment declaratory that nothing in the act should be construed as an assent by Congress to the articles in the constitution of the State relating to slavery.

The amendment being read, Mr. Sherrod Williams, of Kentucky, rose and addressed the Chair, and moved the previous question.

Mr. Adams objected to the right of Mr. Williams to the floor, on the ground that he had not yielded the floor after having submitted his motion to amend, but had remained standing while the Clerk was reading his amendment.

The Speaker[4] decided that as Mr. Adams did not claim the floor until after Mr. Williams had addressed the Chair and made his motion, and the question thereon had been stated, he (Mr. Adams) had lost his right to the floor and that Mr. Williams was entitled to the same.

Mr. Adams having taken an appeal;[5] the decision of the Chair was sustained, yeas 97, nays 87.

1437. After a Member has proceeded with his remarks it is too late to challenge his right to the floor.—On June 9, 1846,[6] Mr. Shelton F. Leake, of Virginia, rose, was recognized by the Speaker, and proceeded to address the House on the resolution declaring William T. Stewart the messenger of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

While he was proceeding in his remarks, Mr. Thomas J. Henley, of Indiana, rose and claimed the floor, on the ground that Mr. Leake, having once addressed the House on the question, had no right, under the rule which provided that "no Member shall speak more than once on the same question without leave of the House," to proceed with his remarks.

The Speaker[1] decided that Mr. Leake, having risen, been recognized, and having proceeded to address the House, no one claiming the floor, and no one having objected, must be considered as speaking by leave of the House. He therefore overruled the question of order raised by Mr. Henley.

Mr. Henley having appealed, the decision of the Chair was affirmed.

1438. The members of the committee reporting the bill have precedence in the discussion.—On March 31, 1870,[2] during discussion of a report from the Committee on Elections, a question arose as to right to recognition, whereupon the Speaker[3] said:

> The Chair understands the usage in this House to be that whenever a measure is reported from a committee the members of that committee shall have precedence in the discussion of that measure.

1439. In recognizing for general debate the Chair alternates between those favoring and those opposed, preferring members of the committee reporting the bill.—On January 30, 1907,[4] pending a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, a question arose as to the division of the time of general debate. In the course of this discussion the Speaker[5] said:

> Under the rules of the House, as the Chair understands it, when the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the chairman of that committee recognizes gentlemen to speak to the bill, preferring the committee and alternating between those who are in favor of the bill and those who are against the bill. If no one rises against the bill, then it is the practice of the chairman to recognize the membership of the House outside of the committee, and the Chair will say that under a fair construction of this rule the time has been heretofore divided as nearly as could be equally between those who favor the bill and those who oppose it.

1440. On January 15, 1900,[6] a District of Columbia day by special order of the House, the bill (H. R. 5297) relating to the holding of real estate in the Territories by aliens was under consideration, and Mr. John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin, a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, had the floor. The debate had been entirely by members of that committee, favoring the measure.

Mr. William Alden Smith, of Michigan, who was not a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked who controlled the time in opposition to the measure.

The Speaker[7] replied that after the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Jenkins] had exhausted his hour, the Chair would recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. W. A. Smith] in opposition, if no member of the Committee on the District of Columbia should rise in opposition.

1441. On March 1, 1900,[1] the bill (H. R. 6071) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter was called up during the call of committees in the morning hour.

Pending arrangement as to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Champ Clark, of Missouri, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked who would control the time in opposition to the bill if all the members of the committee reporting it were in favor of it.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that if there is no one on the committee to resist the bill, the first member claiming recognition to oppose the bill will be recognized for that purpose. It does not necessarily follow that he will control the time, because after he has had his hour and the other side an hour some other gentleman in opposition would be recognized.

1442. In general debate the Speaker recognizes with the purpose of securing alternation of the two sides; but this principle is not insisted on rigidly where a limited time is controlled by Members, as in the forty minutes' debate under section 3 of Rule XXVIII.—On April 11, 1900,[3] the House was considering a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules providing time and conditions for consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes," with Senate amendments.

The previous question having been ordered, the debate proceeded for forty minutes under the rule,[4] Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, being recognized to control twenty minutes and Mr. James D. Richardson, of the minority, to control twenty minutes.

The debate having proceeded for a time, each side having participated, Mr. Dalzell demanded that Mr. Richardson, who had just surrendered the floor, use his remaining time.

Mr. Richardson raised the point that he should not be compelled to use his time at present, unless the other side proposed to have but a single speech in conclusion.

The Speaker[2] held that Mr. Richardson should proceed, this being a case where there was only twenty minutes of debate on a side and differing from the conditions of general debate.

Later, on the same day, the bill itself (H.R. 8245) being under general debate, there remained under the control of the minority seven minutes and under the control of the majority forty minutes.

Mr. Richardson, for the minority, claimed that if two or three gentlemen were to occupy time on the majority side they should proceed in order to secure alternation as much as possible.

The Speaker said:

The Chair is of the opinion that if two or three gentlemen are to occupy the forty minutes one of them ought to come in at this time.

[4] Section 3 of Rule XXVIII.

1443. Recognitions are alternated between the majority and minority sides of the pending question.—On February 26, 1903,[1] during consideration of the contested election case of Wagoner v. Butler, from Missouri, Mr. David A. De Armond, of Missouri, had been recognized and had addressed the House on behalf of the minority contention.

Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, then took the floor for the majority.

Mr. James M. Robinson, of Indiana, thereupon demanded recognition as ranking minority member of the Committee on Elections.

The Speaker pro tempore[2] said that Mr. Olmsted was entitled to recognition:

The Chair is simply following out the ordinary practice in reference to recognition. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. De Armond] having just concluded his remarks on one side, the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Olmsted] on the other.

1444. Recognitions are alternated according to differences on the pending question rather than on account of political differences.—On February 28, 1901,[3] the House had resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5499) relating to the Revenue-Cutter Service, and Mr. William P. Hepburn, of Iowa, of the majority side of the House, was recognized by the Chair.

Thereupon Mr. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, made the point of order that the last recognition was on the majority side, and therefore that the minority side were entitled to recognition.

The Chairman[4] said:

With all due respect to the gentleman from Alabama, the Chair does not recognize that any question between the Democratic side and the Republican side enters into this matter. It was announced just before the close of this debate, when the question was last under consideration, that the opponents of the bill had occupied one hour and the friends of the bill thirty-five minutes; and the last recognition was given to the opponents of the bill. Therefore the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa.

1445. A member of the committee having occupied the floor in favor of a measure, a Member opposing should be recognized, even though he be not a member of the committee.—On April 19, 1892,[5] during the consideration of a contested election case, after two members of the Committee on Elections had consecutively addressed the House in favor of the report of the committee, Mr. Henry Bacon, of New York, took the floor to oppose the report.

Mr. Charles T. O'Ferrall, of Virginia, made the point of order that Mr. Bacon was not entitled to recognition until other members of the Committee on Elections who desired to speak had been recognized.

The Speaker pro tempore[6] overruled the point of order, holding that there was no rule of the House giving the committee such preference, and that two Members having spoken in favor of the committee's report it was in accordance with the practice to recognize a Member to oppose it, although the latter was not a member of the committee making the report.

1446. The Member on whose motion a subject is brought before the House is first entitled to the floor in debate.—On January 15, 1849,[1] Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of enabling him to move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the annual message of the President of the United States. This motion was agreed to, two thirds voting in favor thereof. The motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole was accordingly made; and the House proceeded to the consideration of the message.

Mr. John A. McClernand, of Illinois, rose for the purpose of debate.

Mr. Stephens claimed the floor.

The Speaker[2] stated that, in accordance with parliamentary courtesy, the Chair must assign the floor to the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Stephens. That gentleman had made the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the President's message, with a view of bringing it before the House. And the Chair decided, therefore, that the gentleman from Georgia was entitled to the floor.

Mr. McClernand still objecting, the Speaker said:

> When a question arises as to who is entitled to the floor when various gentlemen claim it, the question, if any gentleman demands it, must be put to the House, not in the nature of an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but whether the gentleman is entitled to the floor.[3]

Mr. McClernand offering to debate, the Speaker said the question was not debatable. If it were so, the whole time of the House would be taken up deciding who was entitled to the floor.

The question being put, the House decided that Mr. Stephens was entitled to the floor.

1447. The Member reporting a bill from a committee is entitled to recognition to move as to disposition of the bill, although another Member may have risen first.—On January 17, 1843,[4] Mr. Daniel D. Barnard, of New York, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill repealing the national bankrupt act, which was read a first and second time. Mr. Barnard then, in obedience to instructions from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved that the bill be recommitted to that committee with certain instructions.

At this stage of the proceedings Mr. Hopkins L. Turney, of Tennessee, stated that, as soon as the bill had received its first and second readings and before Mr. Barnard had risen to make the preceding motion, he had risen and addressed the Chair, notwithstanding which the Speaker had given the floor to Mr. Barnard; and that, having first risen and addressed the Chair, he claimed the floor in preference to any other Member for the purpose of making a motion touching the said bill different from the motion submitted by Mr. Barnard, which, he contended, under the circumstances was not in order.

[2] Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, Speaker.

[3] Such decisions by the House are not allowed by the present practice.

[4] Third session Twenty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 211.

The Speaker [1] (admitting the fact that Mr. Turney had risen first and addressed the Chair) stated that it was the invariable practice, in conducting business in the House, after a bill had received its first and second readings, to give the floor to the Member who reported it, that he might move such disposition of the bill as the committee might have directed, notwithstanding another Member might have previously risen and addressed the Chair, and under this practice the Speaker decided the motion of Mr. Barnard in order.

On an appeal taken by Mr. Turney the House sustained the decision of the Speaker.

The record of debate [2] shows that Mr. Turney based his demand for recognition on the fact that Mr. Barnard, although the reporter of the bill, had objected to its second reading,[3] and therefore had forfeited his right to prior recognition.

The Chair, however, held that the Member from New York, Mr. Barnard, was entitled to the preference according to the universal practice of the House. No Member had ever interposed between the reporter of a bill and any motion he might wish to make in regard to it.

1448. The right of the Member reporting the bill to priority in recognition extends also, to other members of the committee which made the report. This usage of the House was expressed by the Speaker [4] on May 13, 1879,[5] who said:

> The members of a committee reporting a bill have a right to the preference.[6]

1449. The chairman of a committee, having in committee opposed a bill, must in the House yield prior recognition to a Member of his committee who has favored the bill.—On July 16, 1886,[7] the House was considering a bill (H. R. 5603) to pension Catharine McCarty, which the President had returned with his objections. The Committee on Invalid Pensions had recommended the passage of the bill over the veto; but the chairman of the committee, Mr. Courtland C. Matson, of Indiana, had not agreed to this report and had concurred in the views of the minority.

Mr. Matson, after brief debate, during which he spoke in favor of sustaining the veto, demanded the previous question.

Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, made the point of order that under the parliamentary practice of the House the Member representing the majority of a committee was entitled to be first recognized to demand the previous question on a pending proposition.

After somewhat extended debate, during which it was developed that the chairman of the committee had been recognized to call up a series of bills of which

[6] Thus it happens that after the recognition of the first Member on the majority side of the committee the first Member on the minority side is recognized, and so on alternating down through the committee. The majority side consists of those favoring the bill, rather than members of the majority party in the House; and the minority side those opposing the majority or wishing to modify the bill as reported.

[7] First session Forty-ninth Congress, Journal, pp. 2225–2227; Record, pp. 7053–7037.

this was one, and also that there had in this case been a competitor for the floor from among those who concurred in the report of the committee, the Speaker pro tempore [1] ruled that Mr. Matson was entitled to the floor, but very soon after he reversed this ruling, saying:

The Chair had been recognizing the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Matson, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to indicate what pension bills should be taken up and to conduct the proceedings of the House thereon. The gentleman from Indiana had called up the pending bill, and was proceeding with its management, when a point of order was made or a parliamentary question asked in regard to the right of the gentleman from Indiana to recognition. The Chair, at the time, did not comprehend exactly the import of that question. The Chair thought the point made was as to the propriety of recognizing the gentleman from Indiana every time to call up these bills, and did not understand the point to be that the gentleman from Indiana, representing in this case a minority of the committee, had no right to make a report to the House; that only the majority of the committee can make an official report, the minority being recognized merely by the courtesy of the House to submit their views. If the Chair had comprehended the real issue raised, the ruling would have been different, but the confusion in the House was so great that the point did not get into the head of the Chair at the proper time.

The Chair now rules that decision was wrong and retracts it. Hereafter when the majority makes a report the Chair will recognize a member of the majority to conduct the business of the House.

1450. The question as to the extent to which the chairman of the committee reporting a bill should be recognized to offer amendments to perfect it, in preference to other Members.—On January 15, 1894,[2] the House. was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

During the consideration of the bill for amendments, which took place under a special order, Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, arose and, addressing the Chair, proposed to offer an amendment.

The chairman announced that the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. William L. Wilson, was recognized.

It was then objected by Messrs. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, and Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, that the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. Wilson, was not on his feet when Mr. Burrows asked recognition; and that the gentleman from West Virginia proposed his amendment as an individual Member and not as the organ of the committee. It was not contended that he might not, as the organ of the committee, have the right, under the practice of the House, to offer committee amendments first; but it was objected that as an individual Member, although chairman of the committee reporting the bill, his right to recognition would not go beyond the privilege of offering the first amendment.

The Chairman,[3] in ruling, said:

The question of recognition is one which the Chair understands to be largely, if not altogether, in the discretion of the Chair; and so long as the present occupant of the Chair has the honor to fill that position he will endeavor to be fair in his recognition of gentlemen for and against the pending amendments or the proposed amendments to the pending bill.

Now, the Chair has understood that it has always been the custom, under the rule of the House and in committee, to permit the gentleman in charge of a bill to first offer amendments, that the text may be perfected. Of course if he offers them in behalf of the committee they are so much more strongly commended to the House. * * *

The Chair wishes to be fair, and will endeavor to recognize gentlemen on both sides of this question during the two weeks that this bill is open for amendments. The only question now presented is the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, and the Chair applies this ruling to only one amendment. The Chair does not intimate what his ruling will be on the next, but for the present there is but one amendment offered—the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia—and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Burrows, desires to offer one. The Chair decides, and he thinks he has discretion to do so, that the gentleman from West Virginia is in order in offering his amendment.

In the course of this ruling the Chair made certain statements in reference to the course pursued during the debate on the tariff bill of 1890, in the Fifty-first Congress, which were the subject of question on the next day, January 16, when precisely the same point arose. In the course of his remarks the Chair said:

Now, what the Chair wants to say is this: It has always been conceded that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, when a tariff bill is pending, has the floor until he offers the amendments which he sends up in behalf of the majority of the committee. That was not controverted during the pendency of the discussion on the McKinley bill. As long as Mr. McKinley offered amendments they were considered; if he let in other amendments in the mean time and then desired to recur to his own amendments the Committee of the Whole permitted him to do so until he was through with the amendments which he desired to offer.

Now, passing away from the question that has just been considered by the Chair and referred to in debate, the question of recognition is absolutely in the discretion of the Chair, as all gentlemen concede. The Chair wants to be fair in exercising this discretion. Shall the Chair stop, before this bill is perfected by the gentlemen who have it in charge, and permit a number of amendments to be offered and possibly adopted to different sections, and then have the Committee on Ways and Means afterwards calling up those different sections for further amendment? The Chair thinks that such a course ought not to be pursued. * * * The Chair thought yesterday, and still thinks, that the gentleman from West Virginia, representing the majority of the committee, has the right to offer these amendments, and the Chair recognizes him.

1451. The Member in charge of the bill is recognized anew after he has presented the bill and it has been read at the Clerk's desk.—On February 10, 1898,[1] Mr. George D. Perkins, of Iowa, asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2196) directing the issue of a duplicate lost check.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, claimed the floor, but the Speaker ruled that Mr. Perkins was entitled to the floor as the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. Bailey made the point that, while it was entirely proper to recognize the gentleman from Iowa on his bill, yet the asking for unanimous consent did not of itself give him the floor. After unanimous consent was given there must be a new recognition.

The Speaker[2] said then that he would recognize the gentleman from Iowa as a new recognition.

1452. The chairman of the committee which reported a bill is entitled to prior recognition when the Senate amendments thereto are debated.—On July 7, 1852,[3] the Senate amendments to the deficiency appropriation bill were under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Chairman recognized Mr. George S. Houston, of Alabama, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. William A. Sackett, of New York, made the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama had occupied his time when the bill was in the House before, and was not entitled to the floor now.

The Chairman[1] said:

The Chair decides that the Senate having attached to this bill certain amendments, which have been considered by the Committee on Ways and Means and reported back through their chairman, the chairman is entitled to an hour, under the rules, upon those amendments.

Mr. Sackett having appealed, the decision of the Chairman was sustained.

1453. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole which last reports a bill does not thereby become entitled to prior recognition in debate.— On January 21, 1853,[2] the House was considering a bill relating to the claim of David Myerlie, when a question arose as to who should be recognized to close the debate.

The Speaker[3] said:

The gentleman from Tennessee assumes that the chairman of a committee of the Whole House last reported the bill, and that to him would attach the right to close the debate. The Chair thinks that that has not been the practice in this body. It has uniformly been the practice to allow the Member who originally reported the bill from the standing committee to open and close the debate upon it.

1454. The mover of a proposition is entitled to prior recognition to move to reconsider.—March 3, 1865,[4] Mr. Speaker Colfax stated it as a well understood principle that the mover of a resolution was first entitled to recognition to move to reconsider the vote by which it had been passed.

1455. The control of a bill on the floor having devolved on the ranking member of the committee favoring it, he resigned his right to the introducer of the bill, who was not a member of the committee.—On December 7, 1900,[5] the House was considering the bill (H. R. 3717) making oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State and Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, reported from the Committee on Agriculture. The chairman of that committee having joined the minority in submitting views, the control of the bill on the floor devolved upon Mr. E. Stevens Henry, of Connecticut, the ranking member on the committee of those who favored the bill.

Mr. Henry, having opened the debate, resigned control of the bill to Mr. William W. Grout, of Vermont, who was not a member of the Committee on Agriculture, but who had originally introduced the bill in the House.

The Speaker[6] said:

The gentleman from Vermont, by this arrangement, will be placed in charge of the bill instead of the gentleman from Connecticut, and may make such motion with reference to its consideration in the House as he desires.[7]

[7] No objection was made to this arrangement, which probably was within the power of recognition vested in the Speaker.

1456. The opponents of a bill have no claim to prior recognition to make the motion to refer under Rule XVII.

Discretion as to recognition must be lodged with the presiding officer.

On April 27, 1904[1] (the legislative day of April 26), the House had ordered the third reading of the bill (S. 2163) entitled "An act to require the employment of vessels of the United States for public purposes," and the bill was read a third time.

Thereupon, as a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Alfred Lucking, of Michigan, asked if he could be recognized to move to recommit the bill with instructions.

The Speaker responded in the negative, and thereupon recognized Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, chairman of the committee which reported the bill, and he submitted a motion to recommit.

Mr. David H. Smith, of Kentucky, raised the question of order that Mr. Lucking was entitled to the recognition.

The Speaker[2] said:

The gentleman from Michigan addressed the Chair, but he was not recognized for the purpose he stated. He was informed by the Chair that he was not. Recognition is now due, under all the rules, to the gentleman in charge of the bill; and therefore the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Grosvenor).

Mr. Lucking, as a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the provision of the rule providing for the motion to recommit was not intended to give the opposition an opportunity to test some questions.

The Speaker said:

The object of the rule was to give the House a chance to cure a mistake, if perchance any had been made in the engrossment of a bill, or a mishap to it. The debate from time to time, as the Chair recalls it, has been along that line. The Chair wishes to be perfectly fair to the gentleman. The present occupant of the Chair, the Speaker of the House, follows the usual rule that has obtained ever since he has been a Member of the House, that the Chair chooses whom he will recognize. That is the universal rule, according to the parliamentary usages. In a body of 386 men it would be impossible to proceed in a practical way and do otherwise, and the Chair will go further and say to the gentleman, to be exactly fair to him, that other things being even, or anything near even, if there be a question, under present conditions, in the closing hours, the Chair has a perfect right, following the parliamentary precedents of all parties, to prefer some one with whom, perchance, the Chair is in sympathy, or upon the Chair's side of the House.

1457. The chairman of the committee in charge of a bill is entitled at all stages to prior recognition for allowable motions intended to expedite the bill.—On March 22, 1904,[3] while the post-office appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the five-minute rule, Mr. Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana, moved that debate on the paragraph under consideration and the pending amendments be closed.

Mr. Allan Benny, of New Jersey, having raised a question as to recognition, the Chairman[4] said:

The Chair will answer the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from New Jersey. The Chair understands the parliamentary rule and usage, which make the rules, to be that the chairman of the committee in charge of a bill on the floor of this House is entitled at all stages of the bill to the first recognition for such purpose as he sees fit to expedite the bill under the rule. On any pending amendment there is five minutes debate allowed on each side, and the chairman in charge of a bill may at any time after five minutes debate on each side move to close debate, and anything after that, the Chair understands, proceeds by unanimous consent.

1458. On March 1, 1903,[1] (legislative day of February 26), Mr. J. T. McCleary, of Minnesota, had presented the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, but had not taken the floor on the motion to agree to the report, when Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, proposed to move the previous question.

The Speaker[2] recognized Mr. McCleary to proceed in debate.

Mr. Fitzgerald having asked if his motion was not in order, the Speaker said:

The gentleman can not take a Member in charge of the bill from the floor by asking the previous question. That is the prerogative of the gentleman in charge of the bill. The gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

1459. A Member having obtained the floor to make a preferential motion may not thereupon demand the previous question to the exclusion of the Member in charge of the bill.—On the calendar day of March 3, 1901[3], but the legislative day of March 1, the House was considering Senate amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and a motion to recede and concur in the amendment making provisions for expositions at Buffalo, St. Louis, and Charleston had been decided in the negative.

Thereupon Mr. James S. Sherman, of New York, moved that the House recede and concur with a certain amendment, and on that motion demanded the previous question.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair will state that he regards the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sherman] as in order; but he declines to entertain from the gentleman from New York a demand for the previous question, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon], who has charge of this bill, can not be taken from the floor in that way.

1460. A Member may not, by offering a motion of higher privilege than the pending motion, deprive the member of the committee in charge of the bill of the floor.—On February 28, 1889,[4] the House was considering the Senate amendments to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. On the day before the gentleman in charge of the bill, Mr. Judson C. Clements, of Georgia, had moved that the House insist upon its disagreement to a certain amendment, and on that motion had demanded the previous question.

Thereupon Mr. Samuel Dibble, of South Carolina, made a motion to recede, and thereupon took the floor and claimed the right to debate for one hour.

The House having adjourned, when it met on the following day, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the recognition of the gentleman from South Carolina would dispossess the gentleman from Georgia from the control of the bill although there had been no adverse vote of the House so far as that control was concerned.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair thinks that it was undoubtedly correct to recognize the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Dibble] for the purpose of making the motion to recede from the disagreement, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Georgia had at the time pending a proposition insisting on the disagreement and had demanded the previous question. But the Chair, upon reflection, feels disposed to say that the gentleman from Georgia, under the practice heretofore prevailing in the House, was still entitled to the floor for the purpose of controlling the matter, having charge of the general subject, there having been no adverse action, and therefore the Chair thinks that the gentleman from South Carolina was not then entitled, under this usage, to recognition for the purpose of debate, but the Chair actually recognized the gentleman from South Carolina, and he yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky five minutes.

While the Chair thinks now this action was not strictly in accordance with the practice, the gentleman states that he will not occupy more time than would be allowed if the previous question was ordered, and the Chair will not undertake to reverse the action taken, but the Chair desires that the action taken yesterday shall not be a precedent.

1461. On May 5, 1896,[2] the House was considering the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill, and a motion to nonconcur in a certain amendment had been made by Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and in charge of the bill.

Mr. Joseph D. Sayers, of Texas, made a motion to concur in the Senate amendment, and upon that motion claimed the floor.

The Speaker [3] ruled:

The Chair thinks that the original motion made in the matter now before the House was the motion of the gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was that the House should nonconcur in the Senate amendment. If a vote were to be taken upon that proposition and it were decided in the negative, the Chair would announce that the House had concurred with the Senate. Consequently the motion made by the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Sayers, is simply a preferential method of putting the question, favored because it is supposed to look toward an agreement between the two Houses. The Chair thinks that that rule, which is a rule of ordinary parliamentary law, has little if anything to do with the question as to who has control of the matter, and the custom of the House is so invariable, as well as so entirely suitable, so well founded in good sense, that the committee in charge of the bill shall continue in charge of it until an adverse vote on the part of the House, that the Chair can not see that the making of this preferential motion makes any change in that aspect of the case. The Chair therefore thinks that the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Boutelle, in charge of the bill, has charge of it until there shall be some adverse vote on the part of the House. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine.

Again, on March 3, 1897,[4] the naval appropriation bill being again under consideration, and Mr. Boutelle being in charge of it, an amendment relating to the purchase of armor plate being under consideration, Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, made the point that his motion to recede and concur, being more highly privileged, entitled him to the floor in preference to Mr. Boutelle.

The Speaker[1] said:

The gentleman will see on reflection that the business of the House could not be transacted in any other way than by giving the gentleman in charge of the measure control of the floor. While the motion of the gentleman from Illinois takes precedence for the moment, still the gentleman from Maine is in charge of the bill.

1462. On February 25, 1901,[2] the House was considering Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill, the pending amendment being that relating to the authorization of new vessels.

Mr. John F. Rixey, of Virginia, moved to recede and concur, and on that motion demanded recognition.

The Speaker[3] held that while the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia was entitled to precedence, yet the right to prior recognition for debate belonged to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

1463. On February 25, 1903,[4] the House was considering the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, etc., and Mr. Joseph W. Babcock, of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and in charge of the bill, made a motion that the House insist on its amendments to the bill.

Mr. Edward Morrell, of Pennsylvania, moved that the House recede, and the motion was entertained as of higher privilege than the motion to insist.

The debate proceeding, Mr. Morrell claimed the right to close.

The Speaker[3] said:

The gentleman from Wisconsin is in charge of the bill and has the floor. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made a preferential motion, but that will not take from the gentleman from Wisconsin, in charge of the bill, the right to close debate.

1464. The fact that a Member has the floor on one matter does not necessarily entitle him to prior recognition for a motion relating to a different matter.—On the calendar day of July 7, 1897,[5] which was a continuation of the legislative day of July 5, the regular order had been demanded by Mr. Jerry Simpson, of Kansas.

Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, being recognized for a parliamentary inquiry, asked:

Monday being, under Rule XXVIII,[6] a day on which the Speaker can entertain a motion to suspend the rules and pass bills, and to-day being only a continuation of the legislative day of Monday, is it not in order for the Speaker to entertain today a motion to suspend the rules?

The Speaker[1] having replied to this inquiry in the affirmative, Mr. McMillin announced his desire to move to suspend the rules and pass a resolution recognizing Cuban belligerency, when Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, sought recognition

The Speaker said: "The gentleman from Maine is recognized," whereupon Mr. Dingley moved that the House adjourn. This motion prevailed, 134 yeas to 105 nays.

1465. A motion to direct or control the consideration of the subject before the House being made by the Member in charge and decided adversely, the charge of the subject passes to the opponents.—On January 15, 1897,[1] Mr. John P. Tracey, of Missouri, from the Committee on Accounts, reported a resolution for the employment of additional folders, and, after brief debate, asked for the previous question.

The House refused the previous question in order that there might be an opportunity to vote upon an amendment suggested by Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa.

Mr. Lacey having offered the amendment, and debate having proceeded, Mr. Tracey again asked for the previous question.

Mr. Lacey made the point of order that the gentleman from Missouri could not demand the previous question.

The Speaker[2] decided:

> The gentleman from Iowa was entitled to the control of the discussion after the refusal of the House to order the previous question, but the gentleman did not assume control. * * * On the contrary, the gentleman seems to have left it in the hands of the gentleman from Missouri, who, the Chair supposes, has the right to move the previous question, under the circumstances.

1466. On January 15, 1875,[3] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, against the objections of Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, demanded the previous question on a report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The question being taken, ayes 56, noes 73, and the House refused to second the demand.[4]

Thereupon the Speaker[5] said:

> The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldridge] as the parlimentary sequence of the last vote.

1467. On March 1, 1897,[6] Mr. J. Frank Aldrich, of Illinois, called up a bill relating to the transmitting in the mails of pictures and descriptions of prize fights.

After debate Mr. Aldrich demanded the previous question, which was refused by the House.

Thereupon Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, rising to a parlimentary inquiry, asked whether the refusal of the House to sustain the demand for the previous question made by the gentleman in charge of the bill did not pass the control of the bill to the opposition.

The Speaker[2] I replied that it did.,

1468. On January 17, 1903,[7] the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had reported the bill (S. 569) to establish a department of Commerce and Labor, with a substitute amendment.

Mr. William P. Hepburn, of Iowa, moved the previous question.

Mr. John B. Corliss, of Michigan, resisted this motion.

A vote being taken, there were ayes 78, nays 100.

The Speaker pro tempore [1] having inadvertently recognized Mr. Hepburn for a further motion, a question was raised, and the Speaker pro tempore thereupon recognized Mr. Corliss.

1469. The House having disagreed to the recommendation of the committee reporting a resolution, the Speaker recognized an opponent of the committee, but not the original proposer of the resolution.

In awarding recognition the Speaker is ordinarily controlled by the usages of the House.

On March 11, 1904,[2] the House was considering a resolution reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads relating to the conduct of Members in their transactions with certain officials of the Post-Office Department. This resolution had originally been presented on the floor (as involving a question of privilege) by Mr. James Hay, of Virginia, and the House had referred it to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The committee had reported the resolution with the unanimous recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The House disagreed to the motion to lay on the table.

Thereupon Mr. Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts (not a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and PostRoads), was recognized by the Speaker.

Mr. Hay demanded recognition, claiming that as the author of the original resolution he was himself entitled to prior recognition. He said:

I make the point of order that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads having reported that the resolution introduced by myself lie on the table, and the House having refused to adopt the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, under the precedents and practice of the House, and under a decision of the Speaker of this House, found in Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents,[3] section 70, the mover of any proposition before the House is first entitled to be recognized by the Chair.

This precedent cited a case in 1849, where a Member who had moved to discharge a committee from the consideration of a subject, was, when the motion had been determined in the affirmative, recognized first as entitled to the floor in debating the subject.

After debate the Speaker [4] said:

The Chair desires to state that the power of recognition is with the Chair, and it is not a debatable matter as to whom the Chair should recognize. There are certain practices touching recognition, well settled—some of them resting in the Digest and others resting in the minds of the older Member—that ordinarily do control and ought to control the action of the Chair touching matters of recognition.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Hay] some weeks ago rose to a question of privilege. The resolution which he presented, contrary to his vote, was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The committee took the resolution, and subsequently reported it to the House with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

On the question coming up in the House, the House refuses to lay the proposition upon the table. Now, the claim that the gentleman has parliamentary control touching his resolution would be, so far as the Chair is informed, without precedent. If we go back to the time when the gentleman did have charge of his resolution, he has by the action of the House lost control of it, because it was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. And the Chair declines to hear discussion touching the Chair's right or power of recognition, because such a practice would lead to interminable debate. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

1470. On May 8, 1900,[1] Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, of the Committee on Ways and Means, called up a report of that committee recommending that House resolution No. 229, requesting of the Secretary of the Treasury information as to returns made by manufacturers of oleomargarine, do lie upon the table.

The question being taken on the motion that the bill do lie upon the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 81, nays 137.

Thereupon the Speaker[2] recognized Mr. James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, who represented the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means in antagonism to the report, to make the motions for the disposition of the resolution. Mr. Tawney asked for the previous question, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

1471. On January 22, 1897,[3] the House had under consideration the bill (S. 90) for the relief of William P. Buckmaster, which had been reported from the Committee of the Whole with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

The motion for that recommendation having been made in the committee by Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, the Speaker recognized him as in charge of the bill on the floor.

A difference concerning division of time[4] having arisen between Mr. Cannon and Mr. Charles F. Joy, of Missouri, who represented the friends of the bill, Mr. Cannon at once moved that the bill lie on the table.

The motion being defeated, the Speaker[5] ruled that Mr. Joy was entitled to the floor, being in charge of the bill under the vote of the House.

Mr. Joy thereupon, against the objections of Mr. Cannon, demanded the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The House having decided this question in the negative, the Speaker said:

The House refuses to order the previous question. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

1472. On February 14, 1882,[6] Mr. Godlove S. Orth, of Indiana, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported, with the recommendation that it be laid on the table, a resolution requesting the President to communicate to the House correspondence on file in the State Department with reference to the case of D. H. O'Connor, a citizen of the United States imprisoned in Ireland.

The question being taken on the motion to lay on the table, it was decided in the negative.

[4] It is a common practice for the Member in charge of a measure to yield of his hour to opponents of the bill, retaining enough for his own use and to enable him to call for the previous question before having to surrender the floor.

[5] Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, Speaker.

[6] First session Forty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 1133–1140.

The Speaker[1] then recognized Mr. S.S. Cox, of New York, who nad opposed the recommendation of the committee, and Mr. Cox offered an amendment which was ruled out of order.

Mr. William E. Robinson, of New York, also was recognized in favor of the adoption of the resolution.

Then Mr. George M. Robeson, of New Jersey, took the floor in his own right, and after a time yielded it to Mr. Orth for the purpose of moving the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. Cox made the point of order that after the recommendation of the Committee of Foreign Affairs had been negatived, the control of the resolution passed to himself.

The Speaker said:

The Chair will state briefly that it agrees entirely with what has so frequently been said here that where a committee, or where a gentleman controlling a measure, after reporting it loses control of it by an adverse vote of the House, then the other side is entitled to be first recognized to control it. But it does not follow that the other side is at liberty to go into general debate and that the gentleman who might be entitled to control the measure can take it and yield the floor to others, thereby cutting off every other Member of the House from doing what he might otherwise do, that is, demand the previous question.

1473. A motion made by the Member in control of a conference report being decided adversely, it has usually been held that the right to recognition passes to the opponents.

The motion to agree is the pending question on a conference report, the motion to disagree is not admitted.

A conference report being disagreed to, the amendments of the other House then come up for action.

On January 30, 1905,[2] Mr. Lucius N. Littauer, of New York, presented the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the legislative appropriation bill and asked the previous question on the motion to agree to the conference report.

Mr. Charles L. Bartlett, of Georgia, antagonized the motion for the previous question, which was disagreed to—yeas 121, nays 122.

The Speaker[3] then recognized Mr. Bartlett, saying that the motion for the previous question had been negatived at his instance.

Mr. Bartlett proposed a motion to disagree to the report.

The Speaker said:

The Chair will state that a motion to disagree would seem hardly in order, although what the gentleman desires to get at, perhaps, would come in another form. The question is on agreeing to the conference report, the same being under consideration. Now, if the House refuses to agree to the conference report that disposes of it, and it is equivalent to a disagreement. If, on the contrary, the House agrees to the report, that closes it up and adopts the report, and the only question, as the Chair understands, that can be determined by the House in the present stage of the proceeding, is on agreeing to the report, and a failure to disagree disposes of the report.

[3] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

Mr. Bartlett having raised a question as to the effect of the vote about to be taken, the Speaker said:

The Chair understands this, that if the conference report is voted down then the Senate amendments are before the House for such action as the House sees proper to take—to further insist and ask for another conference, or to take such other steps as the House sees proper to take; but the only thing, as the Chair understands it, that can be done at this time is for the House either to agree to the conference report or refuse to agree to it.

1474. On January 29, 1897,[1] Mr. H. Henry Powers, of Vermont, called up the conference report on the bill (S. 1832) relating to the rights of purchasers in the matter of the proposed sale of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad and after debate demanded the previous question.

The question being put, the House refused to order the previous question.

Thereupon the Speaker[2] recognized Mr. William E. Barrett, of Massachusetts, who had asked the House not to order the previous question.

1475. On February 26, 1901,[3] Mr. Alston G. Dayton, of West Virginia, presented the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, and after brief debate demanded the previous question on the motion to agree to the report.

The question was taken, and on a division demanded by Mr. William P. Hepburn, of Iowa, there were 48 ayes and 76 noes. So the previous question was refused.

Both Messrs. Hepburn and Dayton demanding recognition, the Speaker[4] held that Mr. Hepburn was entitled to the floor.

After debate the report of the conference committee was disagreed to.

Mr. Dayton then having proposed a motion that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference, the Speaker held that Mr. Hepburn was entitled to recognition.

Mr. Hepburn thereupon yielded further control of the bill to Mr. Dayton.

1476. On June 28, 1902,[5] the House had agreed to a partial conference report on the naval appropriation bill, when Mr. George E. Foss, of Illinois, chairman of the Naval Committee and of the conferees, moved that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment.

This motion was opposed by Mr. William W. Kitchin, of North Carolina, a Member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by others.

The question being taken there appeared: yeas, 81; nays, 98; so the motion of Mr. Foss was disagreed to.

Thereupon Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the recognition did not go to the opposition.

The Speaker pro tempore[6] replied that it did.

Thereupon Mr. Fitzgerald proposed to move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment, and ask a further conference.

But it appeaxing that Mr. Fitzgerald was not a Member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Speaker pro tempore recognized Mr. Kitchin to make the motion.

1477. On June 21, 1906,[1] the House had disagreed to the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, and was proceeding with the consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill, when Mr. George W. Foss, chairman of the managers, whose attempt to secure the adoption of the report had been defeated, raised a question as to the right to prior recognition in the consideration of the amendments.

The Speaker[2] said:

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] has charge of this bill. While this motion is a preferential one, the gentleman does not lose control primarily as the Member in charge of the bill; and in this instance, the gentleman having charge can reserve his time or he can yield to his colleague, and he can test the sense of the House at any time by moving the previous question. In other words, the gentleman has not lost control of the bill at this stage. * * * The fact that a Member makes a motion to concur in an amendment, which is a preferential motion, and would have preference over the motion to disagree, does not entitle him to the floor to debate in the first instance, and does not deprive the gentleman from Illinois of the floor, if he asserts his right, and at this point, the gentleman from Florida having yielded the floor, the gentleman from Illinois is remitted to the position that he might have held in the event that he had asserted it.

All of this is equivalent to saying that the charge of the bill is in control of the gentleman from Illinois to move the previous question at any time that he sees proper to move it, and the gentleman, if he desires the floor, will get it from stage to stage, when a motion is made on this or other amendments.

1478. The defeat of an amendment proposed by the committee does not cause the right to prior recognition to pass from the Member representing the committee in charge of the bill.—On March 7, 1902,[3] Mr. Joel P. Heatwole, of Minnesota, chairman of the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 26) providing for the publication of the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse, with an amendment proposed by the committee.

The question being taken, the amendment was disagreed to by the House.

Thereupon Mr. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, who had opposed the amendment on the floor, demanded recognition, on the ground that, with the defeat of the committee amendment, the control of the measure passed to the opponents.

The Speaker[4] said:

The Chair is of opinion that the defeat of an amendment does not transfer the control of the bill. That is a mere minor detail. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to recommit.

1479. The adoption of an amendment against the advice of the Member in charge of the bill does not cause him to lose his right to prior recognition.—On January 22, 1903,[5] the bill (H. R. 15520) relating to Philippine coinage was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Henry A. Cooper, of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, who had reported the bill, being recognized as in charge of the measure.

Mr. William A. Jones, of Virginia, having proposed an amendment, which was agreed to after opposition by Mr. Cooper, the suggestion was made by Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, that the result of the vote on the bill entitled the gentleman from Virginia to be recognized as in control of the bill.

The Chairman [1] said:

The Chair questions the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor] as to the control of the bill having passed to the gentleman from Virginia simply because of an adverse vote on one amendment to the bill.

Thereafter other amendments were adopted on motion of Mr. Jones.

The Committee of the Whole having risen, and the bill being before the House, Mr. Jones sought recognition to move the previous question.

The Speaker [2] said:

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper] not having demanded this, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia for that purpose.

Chapter XLVII.

PREROGATIVES OF THE HOUSE AS TO REVENUE LEGISLATION.

1480. Revenue bills must originate in the House, but the Senate may concur with amendments.—The Constitution of the United States in section 7 of Article I provides:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

1481. In 1807 the House refused to agree to Senate amendments enlarging the scope of a revenue bill.—On February 26, 1807,[1] the House considered the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force, for a further time, the first section of the act entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary powers,' " and it was

Resolved, That this House do disagree to the amendments of the Senate; and do adhere to the said bill as the same originally passed this House, and was sent to the Senate for their concurrence.

The same day a message announced that the Senate adhered to their amendment, so the bill was lost.

The record of debates[2] shows that Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, assailed the Senate amendments because they went beyond amendment of the details of the bill, whereas under the Constitution he believed the Senate had no power to amend a money bill by varying the objects or altering the quantum.

1482. In 1830 a bill affecting the revenue was presented in the Senate and withdrawn, after a discussion of the constitutional question.—On February 23, 1830,[3] in the Senate, Mr. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, proposed a bill "to provide for the abolition of unnecessary duties, to relieve the people from sixteen millions of taxes, and to improve the condition of the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation of the United States."

One section of this bill proposed to raise the duty on certain articles, and a question arose as to the Constitutional power of the Senate to originate such a measure.

Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, having urged that the question was very important and merited a long discussion, Mr. Benton, on March 5, withdrew the bill.

1483. A bill to abolish a duty was refused consideration in the Senate, one objection being that the Senate had no right to originate such a measure.—On February 11, 1831,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, asked leave to introduce a bill for the gradual abolition of the duty on alum salt.

This motion was opposed on two grounds, because a similar bill was on the table of the Senate already, and because the bill belonged to a class of revenue bills which the Senate did not have the right to originate.

Leave to introduce the bill was refused, yeas 17, nays 27.

1484. Early instances of Senate and House participation in revenue legislation.—On February 16, 1833, the bill (S. 121) to amend the act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, approved July 14, 1832, was introduced on report from Committee on Finance in the Senate.[2] This bill restored the duty on certain articles of copper and tobacco.[3] It passed the Senate February 22,[4] and being sent to the House, was, on February 27,[5] reported favorably from the Committee on Ways and Means and referred to the Committee on the Whole House on the state of the Union. This bill was not considered further, and should not be confounded with the following: (S. 115) "To modify the act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," introduced by Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, February 12, 1833.[6] Objection was made by Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, and others, that the bill was not constitutional, as the Senate did not have the power to originate such a bill.[7] The bill was considered and carried to a third reading, when, on February 26, it was laid on the table,[8] the bill of the House (H. R. 641) being received in the Senate at that time. This House bill had originally been reported on December 27,[9] but, on February 25, on motion of Mr. Robert P. Letcher, of Kentucky, the Senate bill proposed by Mr. Clay had been moved as a substitute and adopted, retaining, however, the House number[10] This bill passed the Senate and became a law.[11]

1485. The Senate having insisted on its right to add a revenue amendment to an appropriation bill, the House declined to proceed further with the bill.

Instance of a conference over the prerogatives of the two Houses respecting revenue legislation.

An instance wherein a conference committee appointed to consider a question of prerogative only originated and reported a bill.

On March 3, 1859,[1] Mr. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, as a question of privilege, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 872, making appropriations for defraying the expenses of the Post-Office Department for the year ending 30th June, 1860, with the Senate amendments thereto, be returned to the Senate, as section 13 of said amendments is in the nature of a revenue measure.

Mr. Grow explained that section 13 raised the rate of postage.

Mr. John S. Phelps, of Missouri, contended that the revenue bills which should originate only in the House were such only as were contemplated in this clause of the Constitution.

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to, yeas 116, nays 78.

The resolution of the House having been received in the Senate, Mr. John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, proposed the following resolutions, which were agreed to:[2]

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Senate and House, being of right equally competent, each to judge of the propriety and constitutionality of its own action, the Senate has exercised said right in its action on the amendments sent to the House, leaving to the House its right to adopt or reject each of said amendments at its pleasure.

Resolved, That this resolution be communicated to the House of Representatives, and that the bill and amendments aforesaid be transmitted therewith.

This message, with the bill and amendments, having been received in the House,[3] a motion to take them up under suspension of the rules failed, yeas 94, nays 85. Thereupon Mr. Phelps, from the Committee on Ways and Means,[4] reported a new appropriation bill for the Post-Office service, which was passed as H. R. No. 893.

In the Senate objection was made to this bill, and it went to the table, while a discussion arose as to the propriety of the parliamentary action[5] taken by the House.

Mr. Charles E. Stuart, of Michigan, offered this preamble and resolution:

The House of Representatives having, in the opinion of the Senate, departed from the proper parliamentary usages and method of transacting business between the two Houses by its action in regard to the bill of the House (No. 872), entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1860:" Therefore

Resolved, That the Senate appoint a committee of conference to meet a like committee on the part of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of consulting as to what action ought to be had by the respective Houses respecting the said bill.

The resolution being agreed to, Messrs. Stuart, James A. Pearce, of Maryland, and Solomon Foot, of Vermont, were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

This message being received in the House,[1] a question arose as to whether the conferees, if a conference should be agreed to, would have before them the bill (H. R. 872), which was before the House. The Speaker[2] ruled that the bill would remain in possession of the House. The House agreed to the conference, and Messrs. J. Letcher, of Virginia; L. O'B. Branch, of North Carolina, and Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, were appointed conferees.

In the last hours of the session this report was presented to the House[3] from the committee of conference:

> The committee of conference on the disagreement between the two Houses on the resolutions adopted by them, respectively, in relation to the action of the House on the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 872) making appropriations, etc., having met, after full and free conference, have agreed as follows:
> That while neither House is understood to waive any constitutional right which they may respectively consider to belong to them, it be recommended to the House to pass the accompanying bill, and that the Senate concur in the same when it shall be sent to them.

The conference report having been agreed to, Mr. Letcher introduced the bill, which was numbered H. R. 894, and it was passed.[4] No point of order was made in the House against this proceeding. But in the Senate[5] Mr. Pearce referred to the fact that there was doubt of the power of the conferees to originate and report the bill. The principal objections to the bill were constitutional, however. It was urged, especially by Mr. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, that by passing the bill the Senate would surrender to the House a constitutional prerogative. Mr. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, urged that the public service should not be crippled by a punctilio between the Senate and House; but this failed to move Messrs. Toombs, David C. Broderick, of California, and Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, who interposed their objection to the second reading of the bill. In the midst of a speech by Mr. Toombs the hour of final adjournment arrived, and the Vice President declared the Senate adjourned sine die.[6]

1486. The House having questioned a Senate amendment providing a tax on incomes on a nonrevenue bill, the Senate withdrew the amendment.—On June 30, 1864,[7] Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following:

> Resolved, That the amendment of the section, being section No. 12, added by the Senate to House bill No. 549, in the opinion of this House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said bill, with the amendments, be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

[7] First session Thirty-eighth Congress, Journal, pp. 963, 968; Globe, p. 3427.

The bill (H. R. 549) further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out of the national forces had been returned from the Senate with amendments, among which was No. 12, providing for a 5 per cent duty on all incomes to meet the cost of paying bounties and enforcing the draft.

Mr. Stevens said:

It is so clearly a violation of the privileges of the House that I think it ought not for a moment to be acquiesced in.

Without further debate the House agreed to the resolution.

The same day a message from the Senate announced that they, on reconsideration, had again passed the bill with all amendments previously concurred in except the section objected to by the House.

1487. After a full but unconclusive conference with the Senate, the House reaffirmed its own exclusive right to originate revenue measures.

There being a difference between the two Houses as to the right of the Senate to originate a revenue bill, the subject was committed to a conference.

A resolution relating to an alleged invasion of the prerogatives of the House presents a question of privilege.

On January 27, 1871,[1] Mr. Samuel Hooper, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Ways and Means, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Resolved, That Senate bill 1083, to repeal so much of the act approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," as continues the income tax after the 31st day of December, 1869, be returned to that body with the respectful suggestion on the part of the House that section 7 of Article I of the Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the sole power to originate such measures.

The Speaker[2] having ruled that this presented a question of privilege, the resolution was agreed to.

The message was received in the Senate on January 30, and on the succeeding day was considered.[3] After debate the Senate adopted a preamble and resolution reciting the action of the House, and continuing:

And whereas the parliamentary law recognized by both Houses of Congress states that when the methods of Parliament are thought by the one House to have been departed from by the other a conference is asked to come to a right understanding thereon: Therefore,

Resolved, That the bill be returned to the House of Representatives, and that the Senate ask a conference on the question at issue between the Houses.

Messrs. John Scott, of Pennsylvania, Roscoe Conkling, of New York, and Eugene Casserly, of California, were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

The House agreed to the conference,[4] appointing Messrs. Hooper, William B. Allison, of Iowa, and Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana, to represent the House.

[3] Globe, pp. 815, 842–846.

[4] Journal, p. 247; Globe, p. 862.

During the debate Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, inquired as to the scope of the conference. The Speaker replied:

When, on a previous occasion, on a post-office appropriation bill, a conference was asked by the Senate, it was granted by the House. The only thing, of course, committed to the conference is the point of difference. The bill will in no wise be in the hands of the conference for action. But the point of difference in 1859 between the two Houses was, at the request of the Senate, allowed to go to a conference committee. And the Chair states that under the uniform usage and courtesy observed between the two branches the usual way is to have a conference.

1488. This conference having failed to agree, on February 27, 1871, Mr. Hooper, for the House managers, submitted the reasons [1] which formed the basis of their action in the joint committee of conference, accompanied by this resolution:

Resolved, That this House maintains that it is its sole and exclusive privilege to originate all bills directly affecting the revenue, whether such bills be for the imposition, reduction, or repeal of taxes; and in the exercise of this privilege, in the first instance, to limit and appoint the ends, purposes, considerations, and limitations of such bills, whether relating to the matter, manner, measure, or time of their introduction; subject to the right of the Senate to "propose or concur with amendments, as in other bills."

The House conferees, in their report, stated that the Senate's request for a conference had been granted as an act of courtesy, the question involved being the privilege of the House. At the meeting of the conference the Senate conferees had submitted and maintained throughout these propositions:

First. That the words "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," in the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, mean only bills the direct purpose of which is to raise revenue by the levy of taxes, imposts, duties, or excises.

Second. That a bill may originate in the Senate to repeal a law or portion of a law imposing such taxes, duties, imposts, or excise, even if the repeal of such repeal [law?] render necessary the imposition of other taxes; and Senate bill (S. 1083) being such an act, it is within the constitutional power of the Senate to originate it.

The committee on the part of the House maintained in reply that, according to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, it is the right of the House of Representatives to originate all bills relating directly to taxation, including all bills imposing or remitting taxes; and that in the exercise of this right the House of Representatives shall decide the manner and time of the imposition and remission of all taxes, subject to the right of the Senate to amend any of such bills, originating in the House, before they have become a law.

After a long and full discussion the conferees failed to agree, and arranged to report to their respective Houses their disagreement, and such further report as they might decide to make. The House conferees therefore presented a report giving at length the reasons on which they had founded their action. From a careful review of the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention and a consideration of the analogy of the British constitution they derived the opinion that all bills directly affecting the revenue should originate in the House of Representatives. "The practice of the English Commons," says the report, "was to have all tax bills considered by a committee called the ways and means, and all appropriations were considered by a committee on supply. Analogous to this, the first Congress that assembled provided a Committee of Ways and Means that should originate all revenue measures, whether of taxation or appropriation. The same Congress also borrowed another rule from the Commons, that this class of bills should be first considered in Committee of the Whole House on a day fixed, so that free discussion should be permitted and unlimited amendment allowed.

"Under these rules the right to originate not only tax and tariff bills, but also appropriation bills, was conceded to the House of Representatives until February 22, 1832, when Mr. Clay submitted certain resolutions in relation to the tariff, by which it was proposed to repeal the duties on all articles of importation not coming into competition with similar articles manufactured in the United States, etc."

"These resolutions were referred to the Committee on Manufactures, which committee, on the 30th of March, made a long report, accompanied by a bill proposing an absolute repeal of certain duties." This report led to a long debate on the constitutional power of the Senate to originate revenue bills or repeal duties. Finally, on motion of Mr. Dallas, the bill was laid on the table.[1]

"The question again came up in the Senate in 1833," continues the report, "when, at a time of great political excitement, reaching almost to rebellion, Mr. Clay, with a patriotic purpose, brought forward in the Senate his compromise tariff bill to reduce existing rates of duty on imported articles. The leading minds of the Senate revolted at what seemed to them an unconstitutional exercise of power, and the authority of the Senate under the clause now under consideration was debated by the ablest lawyers of that body."[2]

On February 27 the bill was laid on the table, a House bill for the same purpose having reached the Senate. The House bill was passed. In 1837, also, the Senate passed a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. In the House, the question of the Senate's power being raised, the Senate bill was laid aside and a House bill covering the same object was passed.[3] The report continues:

> The question again appeared in the Senate in 1844, Mr. McDuffie introducing a bill to revive the act of March 2, 1833, known as the compromise tariff act, and modify the existing duties upon foreign imports in conformity to its provisions, the effect of which would be to largely reduce the duties and rates of duty provided for by the tariff act of 1842. The question of power, together with the bill, was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, and on the 9th of January, 1844, was reported back to the Senate from that committee by Mr. Evans without amendment, accompanied by the following resolution:
> "Resolved, That the bill * * * is a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, and can not, therefore, originate in the Senate: Therefore,
> "Resolved, That it be indefinitely postponed."

After a long debate the resolution was adopted with but four dissenting votes.[4]

The report also refers to the action of the Senate in 1856, when it originated appropriation bills, which were tabled by the House.

Next the report takes up certain citations of laws, fourteen in all, which had originated in the Senate, and which the Senate conferees had claimed were precedents, saying:

They seem to be, generally, bills intended to carry out, in good faith, treaty stipulations and commercial regulations arising under treaties with foreign countries. It is true that two of the acts cited reduced existing rates of duty, which reduction was acquiesced in by the House without raising the question of power. But it seems to your committee that one or two instances of waiver can not be considered as a surrender, on the part of the House, of a great constitutional privilege.

The committee also cite the loan bill in the Twenty-seventh Congress, saying:

The House does not deny the power of the Senate to amend any particular bill relating to revenue whether a loan bill, a tax bill, or an appropriation bill, which is all that was decided in this case.

After citing the action of the House of Commons in 1860 in asserting its paramount authority, both for the imposition and repeal of taxes, the report says:

It is assumed that, because the bill under consideration is for the purpose of absolutely repealing a tax, the Senate has jurisdiction. But it seems to your committee clear that if the Senate can repeal one tax they can repeal another, and thus originate measures affecting the entire system of taxation. If, instead of repealing the income tax, the Senate had originated and passed a measure repealing all laws imposing duties on imports, it would at once become necessary for the House to originate another measure imposing taxes to make up for the deficiency created by this great loss of revenue. It seems to us plain that this would be an interference with the present system of taxation, and virtually the surrender of the power to originate tax measures according to the will of the House. * * *

It seems clear to your committee, therefore, that the only way to preserve, in its fullness, the power to originate bills for raising revenue is to insist upon the right of the House to originate all bills relating directly to the revenue, whether imposing or remitting taxes; that the House should, in the first instance, be the judge of the manner, the measure, and the time of such impositions or remissions.

On March 3, 1871, the resolution recommended by the committee was agreed to by the House, without division, but after debate.[1]

The Senate conferees made to the Senate a report in which they adduced arguments in support of their position that the bill was properly passed by the Senate.[2]

1489. In 1872 the House and Senate, after discussion, disagreed as to limitations of Senate amendments to a revenue bill of the House.—On April 11, 1871,[3] Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, had reported in the Senate with the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Finance, the following, which was agreed to without division, on April 12:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is hereby instructed, during the recess of Congress, to carefully examine the existing system of taxation by the United States, with a view to propose such amendments to the bills of the House of Representatives repealing certain taxes now pending in the Senate as will simplify, revise, and reduce both the internal taxes and the duties on imported goods now in force, and in such manner that the aggregate of such taxes shall not exceed the sums required to execute the laws relating to the public debt and the current expenditures of the Government, administered with the strictest economy, and so that such taxes may also be distributed so as to impose the least possible burden upon the people.

[2] Senate Report No. 376.

[3] First session Fifty-second Congress, Globe, pp. 565, 598.

There was little discussion, and apparently none on the question of the privileges of the two Houses.

On April 19, 1871,[1] on motion of Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to consider and report to the House at its next session how far the existing practice of amending, in the Senate, bills for raising revenue, by the addition of enactments not germane to the original bill, is in conformity with the Constitution, and whether any further rules or proceedings are needed to preserve the privileges of the House in the matter.

It does not appear that the committee reported.

On April 2, 1872,[2] Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the substitution by the Senate, under the form of an amendment, for the bill of the House (H. R. 1537) entitled "An act to repeal existing duties on tea and coffee," of a bill entitled "An act to reduce existing taxes," containing a general revision, reduction, and repeal of laws imposing import duties and internal taxes, is in conflict with the true intent and purpose of that clause of the Constitution which requires that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives;" and that therefore said substitute for House bill No. 1537 do lie upon the table.

And be it further resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, directed to notify the Senate of the passage of the foregoing resolution.

The resolution was debated at length, with reference to the principle of government involved in the compromise which resulted in the adoption of the provision of the Constitution,, and with reference to past precedents and to the proper construction of the terms of the constitutional provision. Mr. James Brooks, of New York, contributed as unwritten history the fact of which he was personally cognizant, that Mr. Clay, when he introduced the revenue reduction bill in the Senate in 1832, did not intend or expect it to pass, but did so solely for the purpose of causing a debate which should so instruct and influence the House of Representatives that they would take action. This was what happened, and as soon as the House, on the motion of his personal friend, Mr. Letcher, had passed the bill, Mr. Clay abandoned his Senate bill. In discussing the construction of the language of the Constitution, Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, said:

What then, is the reasonable limit to this right of amendment? It is clear to my mind that the Senate's power to amend is limited to the subject-matter of the bill. That limit is natural, is definite, and can be clearly shown. If there had been no precedent in the case, I should say that a House bill relating solely to revenue on salt could not be amended by adding to it clauses raising revenue on textile fabrics, but that all the amendments of the Senate should relate to the duty on salt. To admit that the Senate can take a House bill consisting of two lines, relating specifically and solely to a single article, and can graft upon them in the name of an amendment a whole system of tariff and internal taxation, is to say that they may exploit all the meaning out of the clause of the Constitution which we are now, considering, and may rob the House of the last vestige of its rights under that clause. * * * Now I will not say, for I believe it can not be held, the mere length of an amendment shall be any proof of invasion of privileges of the House. True we sent to the Senate a bill of three or four lines, and they have sent back a bill of twenty printed pages. I do not deny their right to send back a bill of a thousand pages as an amendment to our two lines. But I do insist that their thousand pages must be on the subject-matter of our bill.[1]

The resolution reported by Mr. Dawes was agreed to by a vote of yeas 153, nays 9.

On April 8 the resolution of the House came up in the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Finance. On April 10 that committee reported it back, Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, saying that it was the first time in the history of the country that the power of the Senate to propose amendments to revenue bills had been questioned. The Committee on Finance desired that the matter be referred for further examination to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. This action was taken, and on April 24 that committee made an elaborate report.

This report,[2] which was submitted on behalf of the committee by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, began with a review of the circumstances attending the controversy, and proceeded:

Assuming that a bill to abolish a certain duty or tax is a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the Constitution, as the House of Representatives determined in regard to the bill abolishing the tax upon incomes, the power of the Senate in regard to it is regulated by the provision of the Constitution.

The Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills, and the right of the Senate to put upon it the amendments with which it was returned to the House is, in the opinion of your committee, clearly conferred by this provision.

Without the provision of the Constitution under consideration, it will be conceded that such a bill might have originated in either House of Congress, and originating, as in this case, in the House of Representatives, the Senate might amend it in any particular and to any extent. But this provision of the Constitution is a limitation upon the power of the Senate which must be obeyed by the Senate to its full extent, but should not be extended beyond the fair scope and plain import of the phraseology employed. What, then, is the restriction laid upon the Senate? Simply and only this: The Senate shall not "originate" a bill for raising revenue, that being the exclusive prerogative of the House of Representatives. But, excepting only the origination of the bill, the Senate possesses the same power in regard to bills for raising revenue as in regard to any other bills; or, to quote the language of the Constitution, it may amend a bill for raising revenue as it may amend "any other bill."

[1] In the preceding Congress (third session Forty-first Congress, Appendix of Globe, p. 265) Mr. Garfield went into this subject very elaborately. In that speech Mr. Garfield reviewed the English usage, the circumstances attending the adoption of the clause in the Constitution of the United States, and the following precedents of Congress: In the House on January 25, 1789 (First Congress, Annals, Vol. I, pp. 592, 593, 597, 603, 605, 607), where Madison, Livermore, Gerry, Lawrence, and Tucker, contended that the sole right of originating money bills belonged to the House; in the Senate in 1833 (Twenty-second Congress, Debates, Vol. IX, Pt. 1, pp. 462, 473, 477, 478, 722), where the tariff bill introduced by Mr. Clay was discussed and tabled, Messrs. Webster, Clay, Dickerson, and Forsyth denied the right of the Senate to originate a revenue bill; in the House in 1837 (Twenty-fifth Congress, Debates, Vol. XlV, Pt. 1, pp. 1152–1153, 522), when a Senate bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes was, on September 30, discussed in Committee of the Whole and considered an invasion of the prerogatives of the House. As a result of the discussion the Senate bill was laid aside and a House bill on the same subject passed. This latter bill passed the Senate; in the Senate in 1842–43 (Twenty-eighth Congress), when, from January 19 to May 31, 1843, Mr. McDuffie's bill to revive the compromise tariff of 1833 was debated and by a vote of yeas 33, nays 4, was decided to be such a bill as could not originate in the Senate; and in the Senate in 1855 (Thirty-fourth Congress, Globe, January, 1856, pp. 160, 161, 162, 375, 376), where the Senate, in opposition to the influence of Messrs. Seward and Sumner, originated two general appropriation bills which were afterwards tabled by the House.

[2] Second session Forty-second Congress, Senate Report No. 146.

The report goes on to examine this contention in the light of English parliamentary history, which the framers of the Constitution had in mind when they gave to the Senate the power, not allowed to the House of Lords, of amending a money bill. The Constitution, in giving the power to amend, gave it in the fullest sense of the term, so as to include any amendment which might be in order under the rules of the Senate. A bill raising revenue might be amended like any other bill. The report then continues:

In opposition to this conclusion it has been urged that to permit the Senate to ingraft, by way of amendment, a general tariff bill upon a bill of the House laying a duty on peanuts, is entirely to disregard the spirit of the clause of the Constitution before quoted. In reply it may be said, however, that any other construction of this constitutional provision would deny to the Senate the power to amend a House bill laying a duty on peanuts so as to lay a duty upon English walnuts; that is, would deny to the Senate the power of making to the bill anything more than mere formal amendments.

The report then goes on to advance the theory that the framers of the Constitution expected that the Senate would sit in practically continuous session, and that the provision relating to revenue bills was to prevent them taking up that subject while the other House was absent by giving to the other House the origination of such bills.

It is conceded in the report that the Senate can not propose an amendment raising revenue to any bill coming from the House, but only to a bill raising revenue. This brings forward the phrase "raising revenue." The report discusses that phrase as follows:

Suppose the existing law lays a duty of 50 per cent upon iron. A bill repealing such law, and providing that after a certain day the duty upon iron shall be only 40 per cent, is still a bill for raising revenue, because that is the end in contemplation. Less revenue will be raised than under the former law, still it is intended to raise revenue, and such a bill could not constitutionally originate in the Senate, nor could such provisions be ingrafted, by way of amendment, in the Senate upon any House bill which did not provide for raising—that is, collecting—revenue. This bill did not provide that the duty on tea and coffee should be laid at a less rate than formerly, but it provided simply that hereafter no revenue should be raised or collected upon tea or coffee. To say that a bill which provides that no revenue shall be raised is a bill "for raising revenue" is simply a contradiction of terms. * * * To say that a bill which does not provide for raising any revenue must originate in the House because its operation may affect the revenue is not only to say what the Constitution does not say, but is to strip the Senate of jurisdiction it is conceded to possess and which it has exercised at every session of Congress since the Constitution was adopted. A bill creating an office and fixing the salary of the officer affects the Treasury to the extent of such salary, but is not a bill for raising revenue.

After observing that the Constitution intended to restrict the Senate as to bills raising revenue, but not as to bills appropriating money, the report concludes:

Your committee are therefore of opinion that the House bill under consideration was not a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the Constitution; and therefore, while the Senate might have amended it so as to abolish duties altogether upon other articles, the Senate had no right to ingraft upon it, as it did in substance, an amendment providing that revenue should be collected upon other articles, though at a less rate than previously fixed by law. That amendment would have become a provision in the act for raising revenue, because revenue at a certain rate would have been collected by the operation of the act.

It is due, however, to the Senate to say that its departure from the true principle in this case was owing to a desire to conform to the views of the House of Representatives, as expressed by the House, in relation to the Senate bill abolishing the tax upon incomes, and thus to preserve harmony between the two Houses. But since the House of Representatives, exalting its prerogative, asserts upon one occasion what it denies upon another, it has become necessary to review the question in the light of principle and seek for a solution of the difficulty in conformity with the Constitution, to which, it is hoped, the House will assent, and to which it is the duty of the Senate to adhere whether the House shall assent or dissent.

The report concludes with no recommendation for action. except that the report be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

1490. In 1874 the House declined to take issue with the Senate over an amendment of that body authorizing certain Government obligations.

It is for the House and not the Speaker to pass on a question relating to the constitutional prerogatives of the House.

On April 14, 1874,[1] the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill of the Senate (S. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

The bill in its first section provided "that the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000." The second section provided for the issue of forty-six millions in circulation in addition to the circulation already allowed the national banks, etc.

Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, made the point of order that the bill was a charge upon the people, as it provided for issuing a class of obligations, to pay every one of which obligations was by its very terms a charge upon the people. Therefore it was a bill which should not originate in the Senate.

The Speaker[2] said:

> The point, the gentleman from Ohio will observe, is one which the Chair has never ruled upon, because it is not for the Chair to say what the Senate of the United States may or may not properly do. On all points where the House has disagreed from the Senate on matters affecting its privilege and prerogative it has been by vote of the House.

Mr. Garfield thereupon moved that the Clerk be instructed to return the bill to the Senate with the message that the bill did not properly originate in the Senate. And on this question the yeas were 57 and the nays 179. So the House declined to agree to the motion.

1491. In 1883 the House raised, but did not press, a question as to certain Senate amendments relating to the revenue.

A question being raised as to certain revenue amendments of the Senate, it was held in order to refer the constitutional question to the House conferees, in case there should be a conference.

It being alleged that the constitutional prerogatives of the House were invaded by certain Senate amendments to a bill, the question of privilege was raised before the bill came up for consideration.

It is for the House and not the Speaker to decide whether or not the constitutional prerogatives of the House have been invaded.

On February 27, 1883,[3] Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, as a question of privilege, submitted this resolution:

> Resolved, That the substitute of the Senate to bill (H. R. 5538) entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," under the form of an amendment to the bill of the House

[1] First session Forty-third Congress, Journal, p. 800; Record, pp. 3075, 3076.

[2] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

[3] Second session Forty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 512; Record, pp. 3336, 3337.

(H. R. 5538) entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation," containing a general revision and repeal of laws imposing both import duties and internal taxes, is in conflict with the true intent and purposes of that clause of the Constitution which requires "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," and that therefore said bill so amended do lie upon the table.

And be it further resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, directed to notify the Senate of the passage of the foregoing resolution.

The bill (H. R. 5538) was on the Speaker's table, and the House had agreed to a special order for considering the Senate amendments at a future time.

Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, made the point of order that Mr. Hammond's resolution was not in order either to be offered or considered until the bill to which it referred was brought before the House for consideration.

After debate, the Speaker [1] said:

The resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia is offered by him for the purpose of raising the question of constitutional privilege, a question involving the constitutional prerogatives of the House in the formation of revenue bills. And in practice this has been always held to be a matter of high privilege. The only question raised now by the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana is as to the matter of time of raising the question, and it is suggested that the bill is not before the House for consideration, and hence that it is too soon to make the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia. In argument it is said that the House does not know officially what the bill contains for the purpose of determining this question.

The Chair does not take that view of the matter at all. The bill has been returned to the House by the official direction of the Senate. It goes, under the rules of the House, it is true, to the Speaker's table, but the House has taken notice of it there, has ordered it to be printed, and it is before the House for its action. It is sufficient to say that if the matter was under consideration once in the House, under the rules, in the opinion of the Chair, it would then be too late to raise this question of constitutional privilege against it, so that the House must look to the bill to determine that question before it proceeds to consider it at all. Under the practice, points of order must be made on bills, amendments, etc., before consideration commences, or they are waived, and to make such points of order Members must take notice of the contents of such bill, etc.

If the bill in dispute were brought up before the House and its consideration entered upon, under the practice of the House, it would be then too late to raise the question of constitutionality against it.

The Chair thinks this is a matter for the House to determine, and for the purpose of learning, if the House has not been advised upon the contents of the bill against which the constitutional question is raised, the bill can be read, or so much of it as may be necessary, for the purpose of determining whether it is a bill on which the question of constitutional privilege can properly be raised. It is not for the Chair to decide whether the prerogatives of the House have been invaded or not; it is for the House; and therefore the Chair now thinks that the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia is in order for consideration, and so rules.

One word further. It is said the precedents are against the consideration of such a resolution before the measure is brought before the House for consideration. The Chair has hastily looked to one or two instances with reference to similar resolutions, and finds that one of a similar character was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Dawes, in April, 1872, which involved a revenue bill, as this does, and the resolution was offered and entertained and considered by the House before the bill was taken up for consideration. * * * Several cases of a similar character to the one before the House have arisen in the history of the Congress of the United States, but only enough of them have been examined to show that the practice has not been uniform.

During consideration of the resolution, Mr. Dudley C. Haskell, of Kansas, offered the following as a substitute: [2]

Whereas House bill No. 5538, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," under the form of an amendment in the Senate to Title 33 of the Revised Statutes, which provides for duties on imports, has been so modified and changed by the introduction of new provisions, containing, among other things, a general revision of the statutes referred to so as both to increase and reduce duties on imports, and in many instances to repeal and in others to amend the laws imposing import duties; and,

[1] J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, Speaker.

[2] Journal, p. 513; Record, pp. 3340–3344.

Whereas in the opinion of this House it is believed that such changes and alterations are in conflict with the true intent and purpose of the Constitution, which requires that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives: Therefore,

Resolve, That, if this bill shall be referred to a committee of conference, it shall be the duty of the conferees on the part of the House on said committee to consider fully the constitutional objections to said bill as amended by the Senate and herein referred to, and to bring the same, together with the opinion of the House in regard thereto, before said committee of conference, and if necessary, in their opinion, after having conferred with the Senate conferees, said conferees on said committee may make report to the House in regard to the objections to the said bill herein referred to.

Mr. John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, made the point of order against the proposed substitute, for the reason that it not only proposed to submit the question of constitutional privilege of the House to such conference, but also to consider the subject-matter of such Senate amendment.

During the debate which followed, other points were urged: By Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, that the proposition was to instruct conferees in advance of a disagreement and in advance of a declaration by the House that its privileges had been violated; by Mr. Joseph S. C. Blackburn, of Kentucky, that it was proposed to give to the committee of conference a double power and duty, relating both to the constitutional prerogative and to the bill; by Mr. Edward S. Bragg, of Wisconsin, that it was not in order to refer an undisputed question of privilege to a committee composed in part of Members of the other branch.

The Speaker said:

The Chair may say in answer, so far as it is necessary to answer the question made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Bragg, and it is necessary to do it only so far as affects this question, that it is quite competent on presenting a matter which is clearly in opposition to the action of the Senate, and in the first instance, to declare a disagreement and ask for a conference.

The Chair is perfectly well satisfied that the proposed substitute would not be in order if it undertook to do anything more in the first instance than to provide for a disagreement with the Senate on the constitutional right of the House or of the two Houses, and then to refer that disagreement and other subjects connected with the bill to a committee of conference.

Committees of conference are not appointed, as has been suggested, by virtue of joint rules of the two Houses, because, as the Chair understands, there have been no joint rules of the two Houses recognized by either House for a number of years. Committees of conference have grown up in practice; either House may ask a conference on any matter of disagreement. The Chair does not think that upon a matter about which there is no disagreement, and none proposed by the action of the House with the Senate, a conference could properly be asked for. Nor does the Chair think that under the guise of providing for a conference other rules of the House may be overridden. If this resolution is subject to the construction that it sends the bill to the conference committee, in case the Senate should agree to it, then it would have to be held that under the right to provide for a committee of conference we could override our rules in reference to the manner of proceeding to business on the Speaker's table, and we could override Rule XX,[1] which requires that a Senate amendment to a revenue or appropriation bill shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, without declaring a disagreement in the Senate amendment, send it directly to a committee of conference. If this proposed substitute would do that, the Chair would hold it to be not in order.

But before coming to consider what the plain meaning of the language is, the Chair desires to call attention to the precedent, as it is claimed, which arose in March, 1859. On an examination of that case, which involved the constitutional right of the Senate to originate a post-office appropriation bill,[1] it will be found that a resolution very similar, certainly in effect, to the proposed substitute was adopted in the House by a very large vote, and a conference was agreed to by the Senate. The conferees on the part of the two Houses met and considered only, as the Globe of that time will show, the question of constitutional difference between the two Houses, and reported upon that. Without undertaking to settle the question one way or the other, the conference committee made a report declaring in effect that neither House receded from its position on the subject, and then, as it was the day before the expiration of the Congress, recommended in the latter clause of the report that each House should waive any constitutional right which they respectively considered to belong to them and that the House should pass the bill which was brought to the House.

The history of those proceedings shows, however, that after this bill was brought to the House it was not treated at all as a bill brought there by the conference committee. Mr. Letcher, of Virginia, a member of the conference committee on the part of the House, after the report was received and before it was acted upon, obtained unanimous consent to introduce the precise bill which was recommended by the committee of conference. It was introduced by unanimous consent, read a first and second time as an original bill, and subsequently that bill passed as a House bill upon a suspension of the rules. It was not treated as any matter offered to the House properly by the committee of conference. The committee of conference certainly transcended to some extent its duties by recommending the House to take up a bill, that subject not having been referred to the committee; but it was a mode of getting out of the difficulty and saving an appropriation bill in the expiring hours of Congress. Thus in this particular case we find a precedent only for a resolution of the House referring the constitutional question to a committee of conference, the House having first declared its opinion that the Senate had not the right to originate the particular bill.

Now, a fair reading of this proposed substitute leads the Chair to hold that it provides only for referring to a conference committee the constitutional objections to the bill, such as grow out of the alleged violation of the Constitution by the Senate of the United States in passing an impost bill as a part of or an amendment to an internal revenue bill of the House. The second clause of the preamble clearly provides for a disagreement with the Senate upon this constitutional question. The Chair, giving this substitute the construction it has indicated, holds that the substitute is in order, and therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentle-an from Kentucky.

Mr. Hammond, of Georgia, having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table on motion of Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine.

The substitute was adopted[2]—yeas 144, nays 120—and then the resolution as amended by the substitute was agreed to-yeas 139, nays 122.

When the conferees reported on the bill no mention of the constitutional question was made in the report,[3] and the bill with the Senate amendments became a law.

1492. Instance wherein a Senate amendment affecting the revenue was not objected to until the stage of conference.—On March 1, 1905,[4] in the Senate, the post-office appropriation bill was under consideration, when this amendment was agreed to without any debate as to whether or not it affected the revenue:

SEC. 3 [2]. That hereafter the rate of postage on packages of books or merchandise mailed at the distributing post-office of any rural free delivery to a patron on said route shall be 3 cents for each pound or any fraction thereof. This rate shall apply only to packages deposited at the local post-office for delivery to patrons on routes emanating from that office, or collected by rural carriers for delivery to the office from which the route emanates, and not to mail transmitted from one office to another, and shall not apply to packages exceeding 5 pounds in weight.

[1] This is hardly accurate. The Senate had placed on the post-office appropriation bill passed by the House an amendment raising the rate of postage. See section 1485 of this chapter.

On the same day,[1] the bill having been received in the House, all the amendments of the Senate were disagreed to,[2] and a conference was asked, Messrs. Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana, John J. Gardner, of New Jersey, and John A. Moon, of Tennessee, being conferees.

On March 1[3] the Senate agreed to the conference.

On March 3[4] the conference report was presented and agreed to, with the above amendment of the Senate disagreed to.

1493. The Senate having added a revenue amendment to an appropriation bill, the House returned the bill to the Senate, which reconsidered and struck out the amendment.—On February 16, 1905,[5] Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, rising to a question of privilege, offered for immediate consideration the following:

Resolved, That the amendment No. 208, added by the Senate to the House bill H. R. 18329, in the opinion of this House contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said bill, with the amendments, be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

Mr. Payne said:

Mr. Speaker, the bill in question is the annual agricultural appropriation bill. The amendment is in these words:

"That paragraph 234 of the act of July 24, 1897, entitled 'An act to provide revenue for the Government and encourage the industries of the United States,' shall not be held to be affected by the provisions of section 30 of said act."

Paragraph 234 of the tariff bill referred to provides for a duty of 25 cents a bushel on wheat imported into the United States. Section 30 provides for a drawback of 99 per cent of the tariff paid on imported articles which enter into the manufacture of articles afterwards exported from the United States. In other words, the amendment abolishes the drawback clause in the Dingley bill on wheat imported into the United States and afterwards manufactured into flour and exported.

Now, I do not intend to discuss at all the merits of this amendment. Whether it is wise or otherwise is a question not to be considered. The important question is whether that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives shall be cherished as one of the privileges handed down to us by the Constitution of the United States, and whether we will resent any infringement from any source of that clause of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, as the Members know, this is no new question in the House of Representatives, and the House has uniformly insisted on its right guaranteed to it by this clause of the Constitution of the United States, and the Senate has frequently conceded it. In 1831, February 11, in the Senate, Mr. Thomas H. Benton asked leave to introduce a bill for the gradual abolition of the duty on alum salt. This bill was opposed on two grounds, the latter ground because it belonged to a claw of revenue bills which the Senate did not have the right to originate. After debate, leave to introduce the bill was refused—yeas 17, nays 27—and in that case the Senate affirmed the right of the House.

On June 30, 1864, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens introduced a resolution, and the resolution which I have offered to-day is substantially a copy of the one introduced by Mr. Stevens, in regard to the bill to regulate and provide for enrolling and calling out of the national forces, which had been returned from the Senate with amendments, one of which provided for a 5 per cent duty on all incomes to meet the cost of paying bounties and enforcing the draft. Mr. Stevens said:

"It is so clearly a violation of the privilege of the House that I think it ought not for a moment to be acquiesced in."

Without further debate the House agreed to the resolution. The same day a message from the Senate announced that the Senate, on reconsideration, had again passed the bill with all amendments previously concurred in, except the amendment objected to by the House of Representatives.

In April, 1872, Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, reported a resolution in substance as follows:

"Resolved, That the substitution by the Senate, under the form of an amendment, for the bill of the House (H. R. 1537) entitled 'An act to repeal existing duties on tea and coffee' of a bill entitled 'An act to reduce existing taxes,' containing a general revision, reduction, and repeal of laws imposing import duties and internal taxes, is in conflict with the true intent and purpose of that clause of the Constitution which requires that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, and that therefore said substitute for House bill No. 1537 do lie upon the table—" and also directing the Clerk to notify the Senate of the passage of the resolution.

The House will notice that the original bill sent from the House of Representatives provided for the abolition of the duty on tea and coffee. It was a bill in relation to the revenue; but the House believed that it was not a bill raising revenue in the sense expressed by the Constitution of the United States, and therefore that the Senate, under their general power of amendment to bills raising revenues, could not incorporate a general tariff bill as a substitute for this bill of the House. This resolution gave rise to an important debate, in which any gentlemen indulged, some of whom have since become Senators and now are in the Senate of the United States, and all of whom took grounds that this bill was an infringement of the constitutional right of the House. Mr. James A. Garfield reviewed the English usage, the circumstances attending the adoption of the clause in the Constitution of the United States, and cited many precedents of Congress. For instance, in the House on June 25, 1789 (First Congress, Annals, vol. 1, pp. 592, 593, 597, 603, 605, 607), the First Congress, Madison, Livermore, Gerry, Lawrence, and Tucker contended that the sole right of originating money bills belonged in the House—this was on an appropriation bill—but that this clause covered also all appropriation bills, because an appropriation bill was an appropriation of the moneys raised by the revenue powers of the Government, and therefore was included; and since that time, as we all know, the appropriation bills of the Government—the supply bills—have originated uniformly in the House of Representatives, with perhaps a single exception, which I will note later, and which failed to become law.

Also in the Senate in 1833 (Twenty-second Congress, Debates, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. 462, 473, 477, 478, 722), where the tariff bill introduced by Mr. Clay was discussed and tabled, Messrs. Webster, Clay, Dickerson, and Forsythe denied the right of the Senate to originate a revenue bill. In the House in 1837 (Twenty-seventh Congress, Debates, vol. 14, pt. 1, pp. 1152, 1153, 522), where a Senate bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes was, on September 30, discussed in Committee of the Whole and considered an invasion of the prerogatives of the House. As a result of the discussion, the Senate bill was laid aside and a House bill on the game subject passed. This latter bill passed the Senate. In the Senate in 1842–3 (Twenty-eighth Congress) where, on January 19 to May 31, 1843, Mr. McDuffie's bill to revise the compromise tariff of 1833 was debated and by a vote of yeas 33, nays 4, was decided to be such a bill as could not originate in the Senate. In the Senate in 1855 (Thirty-fourth Congress, Globe, January, 1856, pp. 160, 161, 162, 375, 376), where the Senate, in opposition to the influence of Messrs. Seward and Sumner, originated two general appropriation bills, which were afterwards tabled by the House.

The resolution was agreed to by a vote of yeas 163, nays 9. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and an exhaustive report was made by Mr. Matthew H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin. The following is the concluding clause of the report:

"Your committee are therefore of opinion that the House bill under consideration was not a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the Constitution; and, therefore, while the Senate might have amended it so as to abolish duties altogether upon other articles, the Senate had no right to engraft upon it, as it did in substance, an amendment providing that revenue should be collected upon other articles, though at a less rate than previously fixed by law. That amendment would have become a provision in the act for raising revenue, because revenue at a certain rate would have been collected by the operation of the act."

On June 14, 1878, Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, as a question of privilege, offered a resolution returning a bill to establish post routes, originating in the House of Representatives, reciting:

"That the amendments thereto be returned to the Senate, as a portion of said amendments are in the nature of and constitute a revenue bill."

The amendments complained of gave the franking privilege to Members of Congress, reduced the rate on second-class mail from 3 to 2 cents a pound, adding a provision for a tax of $1 upon the publisher of a foreign newspaper before he should be permitted to use the mails to send his paper at the 2-cent rate, etc. Another provision relieved the railroads of certain duties in regard to delivering the mails. The resolution was agreed to, yeas 169, nays 68. The Senate appointed a committee of conference to confer with a like committee on the part of the House touching the matters of difference between the two Houses indicated by said House resolution. The House appointed a like committee and each committee reported to their respective Houses that they were unable to agree. The attempt to reconcile the two Houses failed and the bill failed. The House subsequently passed a bill without the objectionable amendments, and that was not passed in the Senate.

On March 3, 1859, Mr. Galusha A. Grow introduced a similar resolution in regard to the post-office appropriation bill, that the same be returned to the Senate, as section 13 of said amendments is in the nature of a revenue measure. That resolution was agreed to in the House and the bill finally failed. Similar action was taken January 27, 1871, in the House, on motion of Mr. Samuel Hooper, of Massachusetts. * * *

Mr. Allison was then a Member of the House. On February 23, 1830, in the Senate, Mr. Thomas H. Benton proposed a bill to provide for the abolition of unnecessary duties, etc. One section of this bill proposed to increase the duties on certain articles, and the question arose as to the constitutional power of the Senate to originate such a measure. After discussion, Mr. Benton withdrew the bill.

There was also a report made in the Forty-eighth Congress by Mr. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, on the question of changing revenues under the treaty-making, power of the Constitution. It was a lengthy, able, and exhaustive report, written by one of the ablest lawyers whom it has been my privilege to meet during my service in this House, and it showed most conclusively the exclusive power of the House of Representatives to originate revenue bills. I believe that in all the history of the treaty-making of the United States, a question in respect to or touching upon the question of revenue, or where appropriation has been required to carry out the effect of the treaty, it has been the uniform practice, with a single exception, to submit those treaties and those matters to the House of Representatives; and the treaties have not gone into effect until the House of Representatives have joined in the proper legislation to change the revenue or to make the appropriation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I might cite other precedents. They are numerous, and they are all to the same effect. Our predecessors have held inviolate the right of the House of Representatives to originate revenue bills. It is guaranteed to us by the Constitution. It is higher than any question that can arise in regard to tariff or to tariff change. It is higher than a question of duty on wheat or duty on any other of the four thousand articles that are covered by a revenue measure. It is the sacred right left us by the framers of the Constitution as representing the people, as coming from the body of the people, and as being nearer to the people than the other body, to originate these bills, and none of them can be originated and none should be originated, and none will be originated in the other body if the House of Representatives stand by their right and by their privileges as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

After further debate the resolution was agreed to, yeas 263, nays 5.

On February 17,[1] in the Senate, the message from the House was considered. Mr. Henry C. Hansbrough, of North Dakota, said:

Here, Mr. President, is another question that has never been judicially determined. In the only case that I am able to find which reached the Supreme Court touching the power granted by section 7, Article I, of the Constitution, the court say:

"The case is not one that requires either an extended examination of precedents or a full discussion as to the meaning of the words in the Constitution—'bills for raising revenue.' What bills belong to that class is a question of such magnitude and importance that it is the part of wisdom not to attempt by any general statement to cover every possible phase of the subject." (167 U. S., 202.)

Mr. Joseph B. Foraker, of Ohio, said:

I do not believe the position taken by the House in this matter is a correct one. That is to say, I do not believe the constitutional provision that bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House precludes the Senate from originating measures that merely affect the revenue, certainly when they affect reductions in the revenue, or when they affect, as here, the revenue only by providing for a construction of a law that is in force, as I understand this amendment does, governing the disbursement of revenues already raised by paying out the same for drawbacks. This is no time, with the pressure we are all working under, to enter upon a discussion of this very important subject, but this is a question that will arise from time to time in connection with the questions that are arising about tariff between this country and our insular possessions, and sooner or later we must discuss it.

I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to say that I assent because of the peculiar conditions surrounding it, but at the proper time I hope to be able to address the Senate upon the proposition I have tried to enunciate, namely, that the constitutional provision does not prohibit us from legislating so as to reduce revenue or to construe a statute that is in force in the way we proposed by this amendment.

Mr. John T. Morgan, of Alabama, said:

Mr. President, I think that the House in sending this resolution here, although it is couched in very respectful terms, has entirely transcended its authority under the Constitution. The House has no right to return to the Senate a proposition of any kind upon the ground that the action of the Senate was unconstitutional. It might ask a conference upon it with great propriety, and have the judgment of both Houses taken upon the constitutionality of that provision.

I maintain, Mr. President, that the action of the Senate in the passage of this amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill was altogether right and constitutional. The House has been in the habit of sending us bills called "bills of revenue," or "bills to raise revenue," or "tariff bills," or "tax bills," internal and external, or "customs bills," accompanied with provisions such as the one contained herein upon which the objection in this case rested, as follows "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States."

That is the title of the act in which we find the provision that it is now said we are trying to change in an unconstitutional way. The title of that act indicates very clearly its purposes, being twofold and, as I contend, entirely distinct. One is to raise revenue and the other is to encourage industries. When a bill is enacted into law for that purpose there can be no doubt that two propositions are contained in it. One is the revenue proposition and the other is the proposition to encourage industries.

It so happens that the tariff on wheat—25 cents a bushel—is a revenue measure, and that we have no right to change perhaps by a bill originating in the Senate. But the corresponding or correlative proposition of refunding 99 per cent of that tariff, when it is received upon wheat that is brought in, and the tariff has been paid to the Government, when it is exported to foreign countries, is simply a proposition for the encouragement of manufactures. That is not a revenue proposition. It is giving away the revenue after it has been paid into the Treasury. It gives it back to the miller if he grinds the wheat bought from a foreign country and imported into the United States and exports it for sale and for consumption abroad.

Now, there is a distinct proposition which encourages the miller at the expense of the wheat grower. That is a matter which ought to be rectified, if it can be done; and the Senate of the United States has just as much right to act upon that proposition as the House has. We do not disturb the 25 cents a bushel tariff on wheat. We merely say the giving back of that 25 cents, or of 99 per cent of it, to the mill owner is a matter we have a right to deal with. That is the encouragement of industry, and solely that. You can not say that you are raising revenue when you give 99 cents out of the dollar back to anybody as a condition of trade. That feature of the case is not the raising of revenue; it is the giving away of money from the Treasury of the United States to encourage manufactures.

Just as long as the House sends us bills that contain these distinct propositions and so announces in the title of the act itself, I feel entirely at liberty, under my view of the Constitution of the United States, to vote upon propositions to strike out so much of the express provisions of a bill as is intended merely to encourage manufactures without affecting in the slightest degree the tariffs or the revenues of the country.

Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, said:

Mr. President, I wish to say a word, and only a word, about this matter. I never supposed when the act was passed that the drawback clause included wheat and some other items. But I can not agree with the Senator from Alabama, and I do not quite agree with the Senator from Ohio, although I do not care to enter into a discussion of the question. I think the clause of the Constitution which says "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives" uses the word "raising" in a generic sense. I do not think it means simply raising duties. Oftentimes revenue is raised by lowering duties. I think it means, in a strict sense, affecting revenue. * * * Concerning revenue. The Constitution does certainly confer upon the House by that clause an exclusive right, so far as this class of measures is concerned. Tariff bills can not originate in the Senate. That is an impossibility.

This is an agricultural appropriation bill. There was not an item in it which dealt with the revenue, and I think it was entirely without the right of the Senate to include in it the amendment to which the House objects. As construed it amounted to free wheat for export. Whether the Attorney-General has correctly construed the law or not is a question of opinion. He has construed it one way, as Attorney-General Olney construed it the other way. Attorney-General Griggs and Attorney-General Moody construed it differently from the construction placed upon it by Attorney-General Olney.

It is not the function of Congress to construe acts of Congress. That is the function of the judicial department of the Government. Congress and legislatures may pass acts of legislative construction, but they are operative only to change the law from the passage of the legislative act of construction; they are not retroactive so as to bind as to the past.

So this proposition which has passed here absolutely changes the law. It is not simply a matter of construction, but it says: "That paragraph 234 of the act of July 24, 1897, entitled, etc., shall not be held to be affected by the provisions of section 30 of said act."

Section 30 being the general drawback section.

I think, Mr. President, the House was not called upon to nonconcur in the amendment and ask, as in ordinary cases, for a conference. That would have admitted the right of the Senate to incorporate the amendment. If the Senate might make this amendment it is difficult to limit the power of the Senate in incorporating amendments which affect the revenue. * * * I think the House of Representatives, in a very respectful and dignified way, has called our attention to a real invasion of its constitutional privilege and that the Senate is proceeding to do in a dignified and proper way what it ought to do in eliminating this amendment from the bill.

On motion of Mr. Spooner the passage and engrossment of the bill was reconsidered and the objectionable amendment was disagreed to. The bill was then engrossed, read a third tune, and passed; and then returned to the House of Representatives.

1494. The Senate having passed a bill with incidental provisions relating to revenue, the House returned the bill, holding it to be an invasion of prerogative.

Arguments in the Senate as to the limits of the prerogatives of the House in relation to revenue legislation.

On December 14, 1905,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill (S. 1475) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes, with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That the 2 per cent bonds of the United States authorized by section 8 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved

[1] First session Fifty-ninth Congress, Record, p. 383.

June 28, 1902, shall have all the rights and privileges accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States, and every national banking association having on deposit, as provided by law, such bonds issued under the provisions of said section 8 of said act approved June 28, 1902, to secure its circulating notes, shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of said 2 per cent bonds: and such taxes shall be in lieu of existing taxes on its notes in circulation imposed by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to and the bill as amended was passed. The question as to the right of the Senate to originate revenue legislation was not introduced in the debate.

On the next day, December 15,[1] the bill was sent to the House by message from the Senate, and went to the Speaker's table. Soon thereafter Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, called attention to the fact that the revenue provision of the bill constituted an infringement on the constitutional prerogatives of the House, referred to the summary of precedents given in the preceding Congress in a similar case, and proposed the following resolution, which was agreed to unanimously by the House:

Resolved, That the bill S. 1475, in the opinion of the House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said bill be taken from the Speaker's table and be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

On the same day[2] the action of the House was transmitted by message to the Senate.

Before the bill (S. 1475) was reported or acted on by the Senate, the House had sent to the Senate a bill (H. R. 480) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes. This House bill had contained, among other provisions, one similar to the provision of the bill S. 1475. The Senate had stricken the provision from the House bill, having embodied it in somewhat different form in their own bill. The House having disagreed to the Senate amendments to the House bill, the difference was committed to a conference, who reported on December 19, 1905.[3] This conference report, which was agreed to in both Houses on the day of its presentation, restored the provision originally embodied in the House bill, but did so not in the original House language, but in the language of the bill S. 1475.

While the conference report was under consideration in the Senate, Mr. Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, said[4] that, in his opinion, the bill S. 1475 was not a revenue measure:

The section, as it came from the House, and as it is proposed to be adopted in the conference report, is an amendment of section 13 of the refunding act of March, 1900, which originated in the Senate and was sent to the other House, where it was received and passed without the constitutional question having been raised. All the provisions of the refunding act were placed in the bill by the Senate, and to this there was no objection. Other important measures affecting taxation of banks have originated in the Senate without protest.

Last year, when the isthmian canal bill, so-called, was before the Senate, a similar provision to that now in controversy was inserted in that bill at the suggestion of the Finance Committee. That bill went to the other House and no constitutional objection was raised. By the rules of the House of Representatives all revenue bills—all bills relating to or affecting revenue—are referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. All bills relating to the taxation of national banks have been uniformly referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, showing very dearly that the House itself in its practice has not held bills of this nature to be revenue bills. In the very last session—and I suppose I am at liberty to speak of what occurred in that House as shown by the public records—a bill was introduced by a Member from Connecticut [Mr. Hill] containing substantially the same provisions that are now incorporated in this first section. That bill was referred by the action of the House to the Committee on Banking and Currency; it was reported back by the Committee on Banking and Currency with additional provisions as to the taxation of national banks; it was taken up for consideration without a question being raised as to its charter; taken up without any claim that it was entitled to the privileges of a revenue bill; and it was discussed for weeks. No point was ever raised as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, nor was there any claim or suggestion on the part of anybody that the bill was a revenue bill. The claim is now made for the first time that the prerogatives of the House are invaded by legislation of this kind.

Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, argued [1] more elaborately in the same line:

If the House of Representatives is correct in its view that the bill is a bill "for raising revenue," within the meaning of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution, certainly the bill is properly returned and must rest here. If the House of Representatives is wrong, the Senate has no right to yield its jurisdiction. No department of the government has any right to surrender any portion of the power or responsibility with which the Constitution has clothed it. It is vital, both as to the National Government and to the State governments, that the line of demarcation drawn by the framers of the Constitution of the United States and of the various States between the three independent and coordinate branches of the Government shall be observed always with the utmost strictness, to the end that neither shall, in the slightest degree, invade the other. * * * Assertion was made in the House, in advocacy of the resolution for the return of the bill, that at the last session the Senate invaded the prerogative of the House and upon its being resented had receded. In my judgment, at the last session of Congress the Senate transcended its rights under the Constitution and invaded the prerogative of the House. That was in the amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill by which the Senate enacted a construction of the tariff act in its relation to drawbacks. The Secretary of the Treasury had construed the drawback clause as including wheat and was admitting it free of duty. That was a question of construction. The Senate adopted an amendment to the appropriation bill declaring the drawback provisions not to include wheat.

It is not the function of legislatures to construe the laws. That is a judicial function. It may be persuasive in the court, but it is not binding upon the court; and where such an act is passed and the court is of opinion, as to past transactions, that the legislative construction is not the sound one, it stands by the judicial construction, but from the passage of the construing act it works a change in the law. Therefore the House rightly objected, in my opinion, to the amendment by the Senate to the tariff act, and the Senate did only its duty in receding from the proposition. But there is no similarity whatever between that amendment and the action here complained of.

But, Mr. President, if the House of Representatives, 357 of whose Members voted for this resolution challenging the power of the Senate-rising to make it more solemn—is right, then the Senate is deprived of a legislative jurisdiction which from the foundation of the Government it has exercised, and it is weakened in its legislative power to the detriment of the public interest. Now a word as to the obvious purpose of the bill which has been returned unconsidered. I apprehend that very few will be found to characterize it as a "tax bill." Certainly from a constitutional standpoint it is not a "bill for raising revenue."

What is its manifest object?

Under existing law the 2 per cent canal bonds heretofore authorized could, when issued, be used as a basis for national-bank circulation. Under existing law the tax upon that circulation would be 1 per cent. The law which is made by this bill to apply to the canal bonds relates to 2 per cent bonds, and to encourage their purpose and use as a basis for bank circulation reduces the tax from 1 per cent to one-half of 1 per cent. So the bill which was returned to us was simply a bill bringing these 2 per cent canal bonds upon the same basis in respect of taxation with all 2 per cent bonds of the Government.

Is it possible, Mr. President, that it can with reason be said that the object of this bill is to "raise revenue" for the support of the Government?

The question is this: Is the bill, which was introduced as a separate proposition by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller], and which the Senate passed, a revenue bill within the meaning of section 7 of the first article of the Constitution?

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

This brings us to the question: What is a "revenue bill" within the meaning of the Constitution?

The definition is well settled, thus:

"Revenue laws: Laws made for the direct and avowed purpose of creating and securing revenue or public funds for the service of the Government." (Anderson's Law Dictionary, p. 899.)

This embraces clearly all bills passed in the exercise of the taxing power, whether in the form of customs duties or internal-revenue taxation, for the purpose of raising money for the support of the Government.

This definition excludes, and the constitutional provision was intended to exclude, bills passed in the exercise of constitutional powers other than the taxing power, even if they operated to raise revenue, or even if they imposed incidentally a tax or taxes to secure the more efficient and successful exercise of the power.

Such bills or laws have never been, either in practice or judicially, deemed "revenue" bills or laws.

Congress enacts laws from time to time which operate to raise revenue. The post-office laws operate to raise revenue. Congress frequently changes the post-office laws so as to raise more revenue. But it has not been contended for many years—it was once—that those were revenue bills within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution.

The power to create national banks is a power which exists in Congress. It is not the sole prerogative of either House. It is not the taxing power. It is legislation which Congress may enact under the money power; and the Supreme Court of the United States has so decided. The taxation imposed from the beginning upon the circulation of national banks is purely incidental to the exercise by the Congress, in creating national banks, in supplying the people with the circulation of national banks, of a distinct power vested by the Constitution in either House. * * *

Mr. President, the definition of "revenue laws" which I read to the Senate is taken from Mr. Justice Story (see United States v. Mayo, 1 Gall, 398, and Story on Constitution, sec. 880), and the Supreme Court, in the case of United States v. Norton, 91 United States, 568, had occasion to consider carefully the question as to what is meant by the phrase "revenue bill," or what the word "revenue" as used in section 7 of Article 1 of the Constitution means. This was a post-office money-order case. It was a criminal case, but the court was obliged in deciding it to pass upon the question whether it was a "revenue law" or not, because, as it determined that it was or that it was not, the law, it was claimed, would be valid or invalid. They say:

"In no just view, we think, can the statute in question be deemed a revenue law.

"The lexical definition of the term 'revenue' is very comprehensive. It is thus given by Webster: 'The income of a nation, derived from its taxes, duties, or other sources, for the payment of the national expenses.'

"The phrase 'other sources' would include the proceeds of the public lands, those arising from the sale of public securities, the receipts of the Patent Office in excess of its expenditures, and those of the Post-Office Department, when there should be such excess, as there was for a time in the early history of the Government. Indeed the phrase would apply in all cases of such excess. In some of them the result might fluctuate, there being excess at one time and deficiency at another.

"It is a matter of common knowledge that the appellative 'revenue laws' is never applied to the statutes involved in these classes of cases.

"The Constitution of the United States, Article 1, section 7, provides that 'all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.'

"The construction of this limitation is practically well settled by the uniform action of Congress. According to that construction it 'has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which incidentally create revenue.'

(Story on the Constitution, sec. 880.) 'Bills for raising revenue' when enacted into laws become revenue laws. Congress was a constitutional body sitting under the Constitution. It was, of course, familiar with the phrase 'bills for raising revenue' as used in that instrument and the construction which had been given it.

"The precise question before us"—

That is, as to what was meant by a "revenue bill" under this clause of the Constitution—"came under the consideration of Mr. Justice Story, in the United States v. Mayo (1 Gall., 396). He held that the phrase 'revenue laws,' as used in the act of 1804, meant such laws 'as are made for the direct and avowed purpose of creating revenue or public funds for the service of the Government.' The same doctrine was reaffirmed by that eminent judge in the United States v. Cushman, 426."

These views commend themselves to our judgment.

Here is an interesting and original discussion of the question, and I will take but a moment with it before I bring to the attention of the Senate a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States declaring this very section involved between the Senate and the House not to be a revenue bill within that clause of the Constitution invoked by the House. I read from the case of the United States on the relation of Oran C. Michels v. Thomas L. James, postmaster of the city of New York, 13 Blatchford's Circuit Court Reports, 207. After quoting the clause, "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," the court says:

"Certain legislative measures are unmistakably bills for raising revenue. These impose taxes upon the people, either directly or indirectly, or lay duties, imposts, or excises for the use of the Government, and give to the persons from whom the money is exacted no equivalent in return, unless in the enjoyment, in common with the rest of the citizens, of the benefit of good government."

That is a well thought out distinction and definition.

"It is this feature which characterizes bills for raising revenue"—

Taxes levied throughout the United States upon all coming within the purview of the act to raise revenue for the general uses of the Government and all of the people—

"It is this feature which characterizes bills for raising revenue. They draw money from the citizen; they give no direct equivalent in return. In respect to such bills it was reasonable that the immediate representatives of the taxpayers should alone have the power to originate them. Their immediate responsibility to their constituents and their jealous regard for the pecuniary interests of the people, it was supposed, would render them especially watchful in the protection of those whom they represented. But the reason fails in respect to bills of a different class. A bill regulating postal rates for postal service provides an equivalent for the money which the citizen may choose voluntarily to pay. He gets the fixed service for the fixed rate, or he lets it alone, as he pleases and as his own interests dictate. Revenue, beyond its cost, may or may not be derived from the service and the pay received for it, but it is only a very strained construction which would regard a bill establishing rates of postage as a bill for raising revenue, within the meaning of the Constitution. This broad distinction existing in fact between the two kinds of bills, it is obviously a just construction to confine the terms of the Constitution to the case which they plainly designate. To strain those terms beyond their primary and obvious meaning, and thus to introduce a precedent for that sort of construction, would work a great public mischief. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (sec. 880), puts the same construction upon the language in question, and gives his reasons for the views he sustains, which are able and convincing. In Tucker's Blackstone only, so far as authorities have been referred to, is found the opinion that a bill for establishing the post-office operates as a revenue law. But this opinion, although put forth at an early day, has never obtained any general approval; but both legislative practice and general consent have concurred in the other view."

Mr. President, I now ask the attention of the Senate to the case of Twin City Bank v. Nebeker, 167 U.S., 196, which is upon the precise question, and is unanimous and conclusive. I will take the time to read a portion of the statement of the case in order that Senators may see how controlling is the decision. In this case the plaintiff bank brought suit against Nebeker, then Treasurer of the United States, "to recover from the defendant in error the sum of $73.08, alleged to have been paid by the former under protest to the latter, who was at the time Treasurer of the United States, in order to procure the release of certain bonds, the property of the bank, which bonds, the declaration alleged, were illegally and wrongfully withheld from the plaintiff by the defendant. The plaintiff went into liquidation"—that is, the bank—"in the manner provided by law, on the 23d of June, 1891, and on the 25th of August, 1891, deposited in the Treasury of the United States lawful money to redeem its outstanding notes, as required by section 5222 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. After making such deposit the bank demanded the bonds which had been deposited by it to secure its circulating notes, and of which defendant had possession as Treasurer of the United States. The defendant refused to deliver them unless the bank would make a return of the average amount of its notes in circulation for the period from January 1, 1891, to the date when the deposit of money was made—viz, the 25th of August—1891and—pay a tax thereon. The bank then made a return of the average amount of its notes in circulation for the period from January 1 to June 30, 1891, and paid to the defendant $56.25, protesting that he had no authority to demand the tax, and delivered to him a protest in writing setting forth that, in making the return and in paying the tax, it did not admit the validity of the tax or defendant's authority to exact or collect it, but made the return and payment solely for the purpose of procuring the possession of the United States bonds belonging to it, which defendant had refused to release until such return and payment were made, and further protesting that it was not liable to the tax or any part of it. The bank's agent then made another demand upon defendant for the bonds; but he refused to deliver them until a return should be made of the average amount of its notes in circulation for the period from July 1 to August 25, 1891, and a tax paid thereon. Its agent then delivered such return to defendant and paid him $16.83, at the same time delivering a written protest in the same form as the one above mentioned. These transactions were with the defendant himself, and the money was paid to him in person.

"The Journals of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States for the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress were put in evidence by plaintiff. The bank claim that these Journals show that the national-bank act originated as a bill in the House of Representatives; that when it passed the House it contained no provision for a tax upon the national banks, or upon any corporation, or upon any individual, or upon any property, nor any provisions whatever for raising revenue, and that all the provisions that appear to authorize the Treasurer of the United States to collect any tax on the circulating notes of national banks originated in the Senate by way of amendment to the House bill."

Which is the fact. The court say:

"The provision relating to taxation, which, it is alleged, was inserted by way of amendment in the Senate, appears as section 5214 of the Revised Statutes."

I am told by my friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison] that that is the very section involved here.

Mr. ALLISON. The same section.

Mr. SPOONER. The same section.

Now the court says:

"The contention in this case is that the section of the act of June 3, 1864, providing a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and for the circulation and redemption thereof, so far as it imposed a tax upon the average amount of the notes of a national banking association on circulation was a revenue bill within the clause of the Constitution declaring that 'all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills' (Article I, section 7); that it appeared from the official journals of the two Houses of Congress that while the act of 1864 originated in the House of Representatives, the provision imposing this tax was not in the bill as it passed that body, but originated in the Senate by amendment, and being accepted by the House became a part of the statute; that such tax was, therefore, unconstitutional and void; and that consequently the statute did not justify the action of the defendant."

The question could not, I think, be more clearly presented to the court than it is upon this statement of fact. The court say:

"The case is not one that requires either an extended examination of precedents or a full discussion as to the meaning of the words in the Constitution 'bills for raising revenue.' What bills belong to that class is a question of such magnitude and importance that it is the part of wisdom not to attempt, by any general statement, to cover every possible phase of the subject. It is sufficient in the present case to say that an act of Congress providing a national currency, secured by a pledge of bonds of the United States, and which, in the furtherance of that object, and also to meet the expenses attending the execution of the act, imposed a tax on the notes in circulation of the banking associations organized under the statute, is clearly not a revenue bill which the Constitution declares must originate in the House of Representatives.

"Mr. Justice Story has well said that the practical construction of the Constitution and the history of the origin of the constitutional provision in question proves that revenue bills are those that levy taxes in the strict sense of the word, and are not bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue." (1 Story on Constitution, sec. 880.)

That was the language of Mr. Justice Story long ago, incorporated in this opinion and expressly affirmed, and also in the Ninety-first United States, by unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. The court continues:

"The main purpose that Congress had in view was to provide a national currency based upon United States bonds, and to that end it was deemed wise to impose the tax in question. The tax was a means for effectually accomplishing the great object of giving to the people a currency that would rest primarily upon the honor of the United States and be available in every part of the country. There was no purpose by the act or by any of its provisions to raise revenue to be applied in meeting the expenses or obligations of the Government. "

Now, Mr. President, I do not intend to take further time. Here is to be found, under the strongest possible sanction, a definition of the word "revenue," as used in this constitutional provision, made a great many years ago by Judge Story, practically adopted by both bodies ever since, sustained by a number of decisions which I have not stopped to even note, and lastly sustained in language too plain for dispute by the Supreme Court of the United States. Nothing can be plainer than that this bill and kindred. bills do not fall within that definition.

There seem to be no answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich] that if section 1 as sent to us by the House of Representatives is a revenue bill within the meaning of section 7 of article I of the Constitution we have a right under that clause to add to it a tariff bill or amendments to the internal-revenue law. An attempt to treat the bill as a revenue bill for such a purpose could not fail to excite derision.

The conference report was agreed to by the Senate, and later by the House. No further action was proposed in the Senate at this time on the question of prerogative.

1495. The Senate having added certain revenue amendments to a non-revenue House bill, the House ordered the bill to be returned to the Senate.

The two Houses being at variance over a question of constitutional prerogative, the differences were submitted to a committee of conference.

On June 14,1878,[1] Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, as a question of privilege, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House bill (No. 4286) to establish post routes in the several States therein named, with the Senate amendments thereto, be returned to the Senate, as a part of said amendments are in the nature of and constitute a revenue bill.

Mr. Cannon specified amendments as follows:

Section 11 gives the franking privilege to all Members of Congress and certain Department officers, clearly making it a revenue measure in the contemplation of the Constitution. The case in the Thirty-fifth Congress was for an increase of postage; this is for decreasing postage on matter forwarded through the mails. * * *

Sections 12 to 19, inclusive, provide what shall constitute second-class mail matter. A large portion of it is now by law charged 3 cents a pound. This provides the whole of it shall go at 2 cents a pound.

The next section provides for a tax of $1 upon every publisher in the United States before he shall be permitted to use the mail to send his papers at the 2-cent rate, a provision that is unknown to the law—a revenue provision. * * *

Again, section 18 allows foreign newspapers to be sent by the publisher or his agent through the mails at 2 cents a pound. * * *

[1] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 1303; Record, pp. 4606–4613.

Again, sections 24 and 25 of this bill provide that an entirely new class of matter that never was permitted to go through the mails may go through the mails at 1 cent an ounce, changing the law and reaching out to gather revenue for the Department; a revenue to go into the Treasury. * * *

Mr. Cannon also called attention to a section subsidizing steamers, and another relieving railroads of certain duties in regard to delivering the mails.

The resolution was debated at length, attention being called to the fact that the bill, as it passed the House originally and was sent to the Senate, was neither a revenue bill nor an appropriation bill, but simply a post routes bill. The Senate, therefore, had not exercised their constitutional function of amending a revenue bill, but had originated revenue provisions.

The resolution was agreed to, yeas 169, nays 68.

On the same day, in the Senate,[1] the resolution of the House was received and considered. Various propositions were made—one that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask a conference. But it was objected that a conference might not take place in this manner when the House had not acted on the Senate amendments. Finally, Mr. Thomas W. Ferry, of Michigan, proposed a preamble reciting the circumstances and the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of conference be appointed to confer with a like committee on the part of the House touching the matters of difference between the two Houses indicated by said House resolution, and invite the House to agree to such conference.

It was objected that a conference might not be held except in case of disagreeing votes, but in reply Jefferson's Manual was quoted to show that conferences might be asked in cases of difference of opinion.

The resolution and preamble were agreed to by the Senate, and the action was reported to the House, where, on June 15, the request of the Senate for a conference was agreed to. The conferees of the two Houses were Senators T. W. Ferry, of Michigan, S. J. Kirkwood, of Iowa, and S. B. Maxey, of Texas; Representatives J. G. Cannon, of Illinois, W. R. Morrison, of Illinois, and A. M. Waddell, of North Carolina.

On June 17[2] the conferees submitted written reports to their respective Houses, stating that they had been unable to agree, and asking a new committee. The further conference was ordered by both Houses and the new conferees were appointed, the same ones being reappointed, except that Senator A. S. Paddock, of Nebraska, took the place of Mr. Ferry, and Representative John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, the place of Mr. Morrison.

On June 18[3] the conferees reported as follows:

The committee of conference * * * have met, and after full and free conference have been unable to agree touching the matter of difference between the two Houses indicated by said resolution.

The conferees on the part of the Senate propose to waive the discussion as to the question of privilege at issue between the two Houses, and to take up the House bill with the Senate amendments thereto and consider them for the purpose of 1ring a report upon the several matters embraced therein.

The conferees on the part of the House decline to agree to this proposition, for the reason that they do not, in their opinion, possess any power under the resolution of the House to consider the bill or amendments without an enlargement thereof.

The attempt to reconcile the two Houses failed with this conference, and the bill did not become a law.

The House subsequently passed, under suspension of the rules, a post-route bill embodying the unobjectionable amendments of the Senate.

1496. In 1889 Senate amendments to a House revenue bill were questioned in the House as an infringement of the House's privilege.—On February 15, 1889,[1] Mr. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, as a question of privilege, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, reported the same, accompanied by a report and the following resolution:

Resolved, That the substitution by the Senate, under the form of an amendment, for the bill of the House (H. R. 9051), entitled "An act to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue," of another and different bill, containing a general revision of the laws imposing impost duties and internal taxes, is in conflict with the true intent and purpose of section 7, Article I, of the Constitution, and that said bill and substitute be returned to the Senate with the respectful suggestion that said section vests in the House of Representatives the sole power to originate such a measure.

In their report the committee say:

The House bill was passed on the 21st day of July, 1888, and transmitted to the Senate on the 23d day of the same month. It was referred to the Committee on Finance on the 25th day of July, and by that committee reported back to the Senate on the 4th day of October, 1888, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out and that an entirely new bill be substituted. The Senate, without reading the House bill, proceeded to consider the substitute, with occasional interruptions, until the adjournment of Congress.

When Congress reassembled in December last the consideration of the substitute was resumed, and on the 22d of January the final vote upon the measure was taken in the Senate, the House bill having never been read except by title. The bill of the House contained 67 pages; the Senate substitute contains of the same print 179 pages; the House bill embraces certain specified items of our revenue; the Senate substitute proposes an original revision of our entire revenue system.

The report then goes to discuss the constitutional question, citing the action of the Senate in 1844 and the precedents of the Forty-first and Forty-seventh Congresses.

On February 22 Mr. Mills called up the resolution, but the House, by a vote of yeas 89, nays 144, refused to consider it. The resolution and the bill do not appear again.

1497. Instances wherein the Senate has acquiesced in the Constitutional requirement as to revenue bills, while holding to a broad power of amendment.—On January 5, 1903,[2] in the Senate, Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, in the course of debate on a Senate bill to suspend the duty on coal for a period of ninety days, said:

It is a bill to suspend for ninety days the duties on coal imported into the United States. I am perfectly aware, of course, that no such bill can originate in this body and that this body can take no action upon such a measure until it comes over to it from the House. I introduce the bill simply because I desire to call attention here and elsewhere to the subject, and to ask for it the prompt consideration of the Senate Committee on Finance.

Mr. Charles A. Culberson, of Texas, said:

I desire to say that it seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts, who has just taken his seat, misconceives the provision of the Federal Constitution with reference to revenue bills. The Constitution provides that all bills for "raising" revenue must originate in the House of Representatives, but I do not understand that by that clause the origination of bills in the Senate which have an entirely opposite purpose, or, in other words, the purpose of cutting off absolutely revenue derived from a specific article is prohibited.

On January 8, 1903,[1] the Senate considered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to prepare and report a bill amending "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, so that the tariff duty shall be removed from anthracite coal and the same be placed on the free list.

In the course of the debate Mr. Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, said:

The precedents in the Senate and in the House, as well as the restrictions of the Constitution itself, from my standpoint, preclude that action. I understand, of course, that the Senator from Missouri may hold a different view. A different view has been announced by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. But I submit to the Senate that an attempt to afford relief, which, as the Senator says, is demanded at once, through a method which would only precipitate a discussion here and elsewhere as to the constitutional rights of the Senate and as to the constitutional prerogative of the House of Representatives—a discussion which in its very nature would outlast the coal famine—is not a practical method of securing results. The House of Representatives has always affirmed the position to the contrary, and the Senate has universally yielded, whatever might have been the individual opinions of Senators as to that contention.

Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, after citing the precedent in the House, when Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, submitted a report, said:

The greatest constitutional authority in this country—save Marshall, as we all agree on both sides—Mr. Webster, declared in the Senate that, whatever might be the opinion of the Senate on this question, it was in the nature of the case absolutely clear that it was a matter which must be settled always by the sole opinion of the House of Representatives, and that, whatever the Senate might think, the House was the sole constitutional judge of the extent, meaning, and scope of that constitutional provision.

A little reflection will show that Mr. Webster was clearly right. We can not refuse to consider a House bill on such a subject, because we are bound to consider their bills, and we do not deny that they have the right to originate them. So, of course, we can not interfere with their bills. On the other hand, the House has a perfect right to refuse to consider bills which it regards as bills for raising revenue, when they come from the Senate, on the constitutional ground that we have nothing to do with that subject in its origin, and we can not help ourselves.

So practically the Constitution has tied our hands, and the worst thing that can happen to the cause of relieving the present distress of the people by getting free coal, either for a time or permanently, is what the Senator from Missouri has caused to happen, as far as he can—that is, the stirring up of a controversy between the two Houses of Congress.

On January 21[2] Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, said:

I have a conviction, Mr. President, that it is not in the power of the constitution of the Senate to originate a bill which increases a tariff rate, or reduces a tariff rate, or removes a tariff rate; and for the purpose of securing from the committee a report upon that subject—and it would be as well for that purpose to secure a report upon this resolution as any other measure—with the consent of the Senator from Missouri, I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

After brief debate the motion of Mr. Spooner was agreed to.

[2] Record, p. 1031.

1498. On February 17, 1879,[1] while the Senate was considering a bill of the House relating solely to the internal revenue, Mr. Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, proposed an amendment regulating the duty on tea and coffee. Mr. James B. Beck, of Kentucky, objected that such an amendment, affecting as it did the tariff, was not proper to a bill strictly confined to the internal revenue. After debate on the constitutional question the Senate decided, ayes 22, noes 16, that the amendment was in order.

1499. In the Forty-seventh Congress[2] the Senate originated and passed a bill (S. 22) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws. After this bill had been debated in the Senate a bill of identical title (H. R. 2315) was introduced in the House, and was under debate in the House when the Senate bill came over. The House continued with its own bill and passed it.[3] Then the Senate passed[4] the House bill and it became a law.

1500. Discussion by a committee of the House of the constitutional right of the Senate to originate bills appropriating money from the Treasury.—On March 11, 1880,[5] the bill (S. 1157) entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional lots of ground adjoining the new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing" was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. A question having arisen as to the clause of the bill making an appropriation, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary[6] with instructions to inquire into the right of the Senate under the Constitution to originate bills making appropriations of money belonging to the Treasury of the United States.

On February 2, 1881, Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report[7] recommending the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate had the constitutional power to originate the bill referred, and that the power to originate bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States is not exclusive in the House of Representatives.

The minority of the committee, Messrs. Hurd, House, Ryon, Lapham, and Williams, filed dissenting views, recommending these resolutions:

Resolved, That the seventh section of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," confers exclusive power upon the House to originate bills appropriating money from the public Treasury.

Resolved, That the Senate bill which has been referred to this committee be returned to the Senate of the United States with a copy of these resolutions.

[7] Report No. 147, third session Forty-sixth Congress.

The report and the views of the minority were ordered printed, but no further action was taken either on them or on the bill in question.[1]

Both the majority and minority submitted exhaustive arguments in support of their respective positions. The majority contended that if the words of the Constitution were to be taken in their ordinary acceptation, it was difficult to conceive how there could possibly be two opinions, for the distinction between raising revenue and disposing of it after it had been raised was sufficiently obvious to be understood by even the commonest capacity. It was true that from the time the Constitution was framed there had been an impression, more or less general, that this clause had a much broader signification than its terms implied. Many, including Mr. Madison, Mr. Webster, and Justice Storey, had seemed to regard the expression "bills for raising revenue" as synonymous with the term "money bills." The committee then examines the use of the term "money bills," especially with reference to the usages of the British Parliament, where money has long been raised and expended by the same bills. In Massachusetts, where the constitution provided that "money bills" should originate in the House of Representatives, the supreme court had given the opinion that this did not preclude the origination of appropriation bills by the Senate. Both at the time of the formation of our Constitution, as well as since, the appropriation of the revenue was in England a mere incident to measures by which it was granted to the Crown and brought into the exchequer. The House of Commons claimed and exercised the exclusive right both to raise and appropriate the revenue. With this example in their minds the framers of our Constitution, had they intended to confine the origination of appropriation bills to the House, would have done so in perfectly plain and unequivocal terms. In the debates on the Constitution the policy of investing the House with the exclusive privileges of the English Commons in regard to "money bills" was persistently urged, and it was to be assumed that the refusal to do this was significant of an intention not to give to the House the exclusive privilege. In the Senate in 1856 the question of originating some of the general appropriation bills was discussed, and such bills were framed and sent to the House. These bills were laid on the table in the House, not because of a contention that the Senate had transgressed the constitutional privilege of the House, but because similar bills had already passed the House. The committee decline to discuss the policy of the principle, but only refer to its strict constitutional basis.

The minority, in their views, gave six reasons:

1. That the word "revenue" meant money received into the Treasury for public uses, and the words "raising revenue" must include bills appropriating money to the use of the Government, as well as bills providing for levying and collecting taxes. This was shown from the English precedents, where the essential act to constitute the money raised revenue was the grant, without which not one dollar could be used for the national expenses.

2. The proceedings of the Constitutional Convention showed very clearly that the term "revenue" was intended to be used in its ordinary sense of appropriating as well as collecting money for uses of the Government. The committee review these proceedings carefully in support of this position, and also examine the English precedents. Incidentally dissent is expressed as to the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts.

3. The speeches in the conventions of the different States called for the consideration of the Constitution; the writings of the friends of that instrument, published for the purpose of securing its adoption; the expressions of members of the Constitutional Convention, and the opinions of the ablest commentators on the Constitution all showed that the phrase "bills for raising revenue" was the equivalent of "money bills," which in the English Government at the time of the framing of our Constitution included bills of appropriation. The minority give citations in support of this.

4. From the time of the first Congress appropriation bills had, with few exceptions, originated in the House. By unvarying usage all general appropriation bills had originated in the lower branch of Congress. The action of the Senate in 1857 [1856] emphasized this rule. The first appropriation bill provided in its opening section the sources from which the money should be drawn, and afterwards directed the purposes to which it should be applied. In one of the first bills for the imposition of duties it was provided that out of the proceeds a sum of $600,000 should be set aside annually for the public expenditure, and in almost every general appropriation bill until 1813 it was declared that out of that $600,000 the sums set aside for particular purposes should be paid. These enactments were in manifest analogy to similar legislation in the British Parliament and show plainly that the early opinion was universal that the House of Representatives possessed the same power over money bills which belonged to the House of Commons.

5. The minority cite the terms of the Constitution itself in confirmation of their view.

6. The immediate representatives of the people should have the control of the purse, and the power of originating appropriation bills was a trust which should be retained.[1]

---

[1] On February 8, 1888, during the consideration of the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment of common schools, the constitutional power of appropriation was debated at some length in the Senate. (First session Fiftieth Congress, Record, pp. 1046–1055.)

On May 15, 1888, the Senate debated the constitutional right of the House in the origination of appropriation bills, and also the subjects of amendments to such bills by the Senate. (First session Fiftieth Congress, Record, pp. 4151–4158.)

On January 7, 1856, during the prolonged contest over the election of a Speaker in the House, and while the House, from its disorganized condition, was unable to transact any business, Mr. Richard Brodhead, jr., of Pennsylvania, presented in the Senate a proposition that the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting the appropriation bills, with a view of obtaining a more speedy action on them than could be obtained by awaiting the action of the House. After a debate involving to some extent the constitutional right of the Senate to originate these bills, the resolution was agreed to. On February 4, Mr. Robert M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, reported that they had had the resolution under consideration and had deemed it best for the Senate to instruct them by the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to prepare and report such of the general appropriation bills as they may deem expedient.

On February 7 this resolution was agreed to after a debate on the constitutional question involved, Mr. William H. Seward, of New York, making an especially strong plea against departing from the practice since the foundation of the Government. (First session Thirty-fourth Congress, Globe, pp. 160, 349, 375.)

But while there has been dispute as to the theory, there has been no deviation from the practice that the general appropriation bills (as distinguished from special bills appropriating for single, specific purposes) originate in the House of Representatives.

1501. In 1885 the House, after learned debate, declined to investigate the power of the Senate to originate bills appropriating money.

Whenever it is asserted on the floor that the privileges of the House are invaded, the Speaker entertains the question.

On January 23, 1885,[1] Mr. Frank H. Hurd, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

> Whereas certain bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States, originating in the Senate, have passed that body and have been sent to this House for its concurrence, which are now upon the Speaker's table, to wit, Senate bill No. 398, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," and many others; and
> Whereas it is asserted that these bills are in violation of the privilege of this House to exclusively originate bills for raising revenue: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be hereby directed to inquire into the power of the Senate to originate bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States, and report to this House at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. J. Frederick C. Talbott, of Maryland, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] said that whenever it was asserted on the floor of the House that the rights or privileges of the House had been invaded or violated, it was the duty of the Chair to entertain the said question, at least to the extent of submitting it to the House. Therefore he overruled the point of order.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution, Mr. Hurd offering in its support an elaborate constitutional argument.

After debate, Mr. Albert S. Willis, of Kentucky, moved to lay the resolution and preamble on the table.

This motion was agreed to, yeas 128, nays 123.

Chapter XLVIII.

PREROGATIVES OF THE HOUSE AS TO TREATIES.

1. Suggestions of the House as to treaties. Sections 1502–1505.[1]
2. Conflicts with Senate and Executive. Sections 1506–1519.
3. Functions of the House as to revenue treaties. Sections 1520–1533.
4. House exacts a share in making Indian treaties. Sections 1534–1536.
5. Opinion of the Supreme Court as to explanations of treaties. Section 1537.

1502. Instances of the action of the House in carrying into effect, terminating, enforcing, and suggesting treaties.—On March 2, 1835,[2] the House, by a unanimous vote, and after debate, agreed to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House the treaty with France of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on.

Resolved, That contingent preparations ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France.

1503. On February 19, 1833,[3] a bill (H. R. 741) "to carry into effect the convention between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies" was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. This bill became a law.

1504. On June 3, 1874,[4] the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported to the House a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 107) providing for the termination of the treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Belgians. This resolution passed the House, and became a law.

1505. In 1879,[5] the House passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 117) providing for a treaty with the Republic of Mexico.

1506. In 1816 the House, after discussion with the Senate, maintained its position that a treaty must depend on a law of Congress for its execution as to such stipulations as relate to subjects constitutionally intrusted to Congress.

An instance wherein the enacting words of a bill were declaratory as well as legislative in form.

Under the early practice the conference reports made to the two Houses were not identical.

On January 4, 1816,[1] the House, in Committee of the Whole House, proceeded to the consideration of the bill of the House "to regulate the commerce between the Territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty according to the convention concluded on the 3d day of July, 1815." Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, stated that the bill was intended to carry into effect those parts of the treaty which required legislative interposition. The present discriminating duties on tonnage and importations were abrogated by the provisions of the treaty, and the present bill was for the purpose of conforming American law to the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. William Gaston, of North Carolina, made the point that the treaty since its ratification had become the law of the land, and therefore the pending bill seemed to him to be nugatory and unmeaning. On the succeeding day, January 5, in order to try the principles of the bill, Mr. Gaston moved that it be indefinitely postponed.

On January 8,[2] Mr. Forsyth replied, stating that the constitutional principle had been settled in 1795, when the House had enunciated the principle that "when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress." This doctrine evidently applied not only to appropriations but to all cases over which power was specially given by the Constitution to the legislative department. Mr. Forsyth reviewed then instances where Congress had legislated in obedience to this broad principle. It was further urged[3] by Mr. Philip P. Barbour, of Virginia, that a treaty was the supreme law of the land so far as the States were concerned, but that this superiority did not extend over the Constitution and laws of the United States. Were there not such a check upon the treaty-making power the harmony between the departments of the Government would be broken down, and the treaty-making power would swallow up all the rest.

On the other hand, Mr. Thomas R. Gold, of New York, urged[4] that a treaty required the aid of an act of Congress for its validity no more than an act of Congress required the aid of a treaty. If the treaty's reduction of the impost on British tonnage were not valid until an act of Congress should be passed what became of the most important act the Government ever passed—the declaration of war with Great Britain? The law declaring that war had not been repealed by Congress, and unless the treaty of peace abrogated it—i. e., was supreme to it—we were still at war. On a succeeding day Mr. John C. Calhoun elaborated[5] this argument also.

The motion to postpone the bill was decided in the negative,[6] yeas 60, nays 81.

But the discussion still continued on the constitutional question up to the taking of the question on the third reading of the bill on January 9, when it passed to a third reading, yeas 86, nays 69.[7]

And on the question of the passage the constitutional debate was again renewed, and on January 13[1] the bill passed, yeas 86, nays 71.

In the Senate the bill was, on January 18,[2] opposed for two reasons. Mr. James Barbour, of Virginia, stated that the Senate had already sent to the House a bill, the result of unanimous action by the Senate, declaring that all laws in opposition to the treaty should be held as null and void. The principle on which the Senate had acted was that, while the treaty operated to repeal any commercial regulations incompatible with its regulations, yet a declaratory act would remove all doubts and difficulties. It seemed to him that it would have been more decorous for the House to have acted on the Senate bill. But by the present proceedings an issue had been made up. Mr. Barbour then went on to argue that the treaty-making power was supreme over commerce, and that no legislative sanction was necessary in this case.

The debate was extended, various Senators speaking, among them Mr. Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, who upheld the principle contended for in the proposition of the House.

On January 19[3] the Senate rejected the bill of the House, yeas 10, nays 21.

On January 20 and February 4[4] the House considered the Senate bill "concerning the convention to regulate commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty." On the same day amendments were agreed to which in effect substituted for the text of the Senate bill the provisions of the bill passed by the House, and which the Senate had rejected. The bill was then passed by the House. The yeas and nays on the amendments were, yeas 81, nays 70.

The Senate disagreed to the amendments and the House insisted and asked a conference, naming as its conferees Messrs. Forsyth, William Lowndes, of South Carolina, and Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia. The Senate joined as conferees Messrs. Rufus King, of New York, James Barbour, of Virginia, and W. W. Bibb, of Georgia.[5]

On February 19[6] the House conferees reported to their House. Their report, after stating that the disagreement between the Houses related to their respective constitutional powers, continues:

> In the performance of this duty the committee of the House of Representatives are inclined to hope that it will sufficiently appear that there is no irreconcilable difference between the two branches of the Legislature.
> They are persuaded that the House of Representatives does not assert the pretension that no treaty can be made without their assent, nor do they contend that in all cases legislative aid is indispensably necessary, either to give validity to a treaty or to carry it into execution. On the contrary, they are believed to admit that to some, nay, many, treaties no legislative sanction is required, no legislative aid is necessary.
> On the other hand, the committee are not less satisfied that it is by no means the intention of the Senate to assert the treaty-making power to be in all cases independent of the legislative authority. So far from it, that they are believed to acknowledge the necessity of legislative enactment to carry into execution all treaties which contain stipulations requiring appropriations or which might bind the nation to lay taxes, to raise armies, to support navies, to grant subsidies, to create States, or to cede territory, if, indeed, this power exists in the Government at all. In some or all of these cases, and probably in many others, it is conceived to be admitted that the legislative body must act in order to give effect and operation to a treaty; and if in any case it be necessary, it may confidently be asserted that there is no difference of principle between the two Houses; the difference is only in the application of the principle. For if, as has been stated, the House of Representatives contend that their aid is only in some cases necessary, and if the Senate admit that in some cases it is necessary, the inference is irresistible that the only question in each case that presents itself is whether it be one of the cases in which legislative provision is requisite for preserving the national faith or not.

This appears to the committee to be by no means an unimportant point gained. Its influence upon the feelings with which the two bodies will naturally approach questions of this description may be of no trivial consequence; for as every case, according to this course of reasoning, would appear to rest upon its own foundation, there is less danger of its being drawn into precedent and therefore less occasion for solicitude in regard to it. It is a view of the subject, therefore, calculated to harmonize and to enable us to yield at all times to the application of another principle which the committee deem of the utmost consideration on all such occasions.

The committee allude to the principle which inculcates the propriety of always taking care if we do err to err on the safe side. Should Congress fail to legislate where legislation is necessary, either the public faith must be broken or, to avoid that evil, the executive branch of the Government must be tempted to overstep the boundaries prescribed by the Constitution. If, on the contrary, Congress should legislate where legislation is not necessary, the act could only be drawn into precedent in a case precisely similar; because upon the principle assumed, "that each case rests upon its own circumstances," it never could serve as a precedent, save where those circumstances are the same. Nor is it indeed unimportant to mention that there is little danger of much respect being paid to precedents upon great constitutional questions. Conscience will always burst the trammels of precedent unless restrained by reason.

The committee therefore believe that it is safer in every doubtful case to legislate, and by the joint act of the whole Congress give authority to the execution of the stipulations of a treaty by the executive, than to leave a doubtful case, without the sanction of the legislature, to tempt the executive to overleap its proper bounds, or to endanger the public faith by a failure to perform the provisions of a treaty which has received a constitutional ratification.

After referring to the passage of the bill by the Senate in the first instance as an act which manifests unequivocally the conviction of the Senate, either that the treaty did require legislative aid or that the case was at least doubtful, the report continues:

Both Houses having thus united in the opinion that a legislative act is necessary, the Senate having clearly assented to the propriety of passing a law, the committee waive any argument on the necessity of a legislative act. It only remains to consider whether the scheme of the House of Representatives or the bill of the Senate is best calculated to effect the object of legislation. The committee will succinctly offer the reasons which, as they believe, support the correctness of the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The first amendment proposed to strike out the word "declared," the insertion of which, in the enacting clause of the law, has not appeared to the House to be justified by the usages of the legislative body * * *. It forms, in their estimation, a sufficient objection to the phraseology alluded to, that it departs from the accustomed style of the acts of the Congress of the United States. * * * The retention of the words "and declared" was considered by the Senate expedient, with a view of giving to the bill a declaratory as well as an enacting form. It was said, also, that they were not unprecedented, that they were to be found in the acts of Congress not declaratory in their nature, and might be considered as not affecting the character of the present bill. Believing these words to be mere surplusage, not changing the character or impairing the force of the legislative act, that they have been introduced into previous acts of Congress; that no agreement could take place between the two Houses without permitting them to remain, your committee consented to recommend to the Houses to recede from the first amendment to the Senate's bill.

The report discusses further the other amendments, which only go to perfect the bill and do not involve the constitutional features of the disagreement.

The Senate conferees, who submitted their report to the Senate on February 27,[1] say:

> The conferees of the Senate did not contest but admitted the doctrine that of treaties made in pursuance of the Constitution some may not and others may call for legislative provisions to secure their execution, which provision Congress in all such cases is bound to make. But they did contend that the convention under consideration requires no such legislative provisions, because it does no more than suspend the alien disability of British subjects in commercial affairs in return for like suspension in favor of American citizens; that such matter of alien disability falls within the peculiar province of the treaty power to adjust; that it can not be securely adjusted in any other way, and that a treaty duly made and adjusting the same is conclusive, and by its own authority suspends or removes antecedent laws that are contrary to its provisions.
> That even a declaratory law to this effect is matter of mere expediency, adding nothing to the efficacy of the treaty, and serving only to remove doubts wherever they exist.
> The conferees of the Senate therefore insisted on retaining the word "declared," in addition to the usual formula of enactment, because it imparts to the bill passed by the Senate the character of a declaratory law, a quality without which any law would in this case be inadmissible.

The Senate agreed to the report of their conferees as soon as it was presented, the amendments proposed being concurred in.

The House, on February 24,[2] agreed to the recommendations of the conferees, yeas 100, nays 35.

1507. In 1820 the House considered, but without result, its constitutional right to a voice in any treaty ceding territory.—On April 3, 1820,[3] the House proceeded in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, then Speaker:[4]

> Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them, and that no treaty, purporting to alienate any portion thereof, is valid without the concurrence of Congress.
> Resolved, That the equivalent proposed to be given by Spain to the United States in the treaty concluded between them, on the 22d day of February, 1819, for that part of Louisiana lying west of the Sabine, was inadequate, and that it would be inexpedient to make a transfer thereof to any foreign power or renew the aforesaid treaty.

In discussing the right of the House of Representatives to express its opinion on the arrangement made in that treaty, Mr. Clay contended that in acting on the subjects committed by the Constitution to the charge of Congress the treaty-making power should have the concurrence of Congress. The House had uniformly maintained this right to deliberate on those treaties in which their cooperation was asked by the Executive. This was illustrated in the proceedings on the Jay treaty, in 1795, and later on the convention of 1815 with Great Britain. In the latter case, although a compromise was the final result, the House substantially maintained its contention. It was to be admitted that a treaty might fix disputed limits of territory without the cooperation of Congress, for the object in such cases was only to make certain what was before uncertain. This was to be distinguished from a proposition to cede away whole provinces.

[4] The Annals (p. 1691) would indicate that Mr. Clay offered these resolutions in the House, but the Journal of March 28 does not contain any reference to them (pp. 343–346). At that time original propositions were offered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. William Lowndes, of South Carolina, urged that the resolution went much farther than the contention of the House in 1795, and declared that there was not time for so long a discussion as would be necessary.

Mr. John Rhea, of Tennessee, opposed the resolutions, contending that there was no power vested in Congress by the Constitution to alienate territory of the United States, and that the treaty-making power was confided to the Executive and the Senate.

The discussion consumed the time of the House until April 5, when the House passed finally to other business without any decision on the resolutions.

1508. In 1868, after discussion with the Senate, the House's assertion of right to a voice in carrying out the stipulations of certain treaties was conceded in a modified form.

In 1868 the House declined to assert that no purchase of foreign territory might be made without the sanction of a previously enacted law.

On May 18, 1868,[1] Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 1096)— to enable the President of the United to fulfill the treaty between the United States and Russia, of March 30, 1867.

The report, after reviewing the history and nature of the treaty-making power under our Constitution, proceeds to review the instances where this power has come in conflict with the authorities of other branches of the Government, beginning with the Creek treaty of 1790, and noting the precedents of 1794, when a question arose between the President and House concerning the correspondence relating to that treaty; the treaty of 1819, the Spanish treaty of 1831, and the French treaty, and quotes the opinions of commentators on the Constitution—Jefferson, Story, and Kent. The report then proceeds with the following views as to the power of the House:

A treaty, then, is a contract between the United States and the sovereign power of a foreign government; and if within the authority conferred upon the treaty-making power by the Constitution both the House of Representatives and the Senate are solemnly bound to give effect to the conditions of the treaty by proper legislation. In the discharge of this duty the House has an unquestionable right to all the information connected with the subject, if not inconsistent with the public interest or safety. It can not be doubted that the House was entitled to the information it demanded in 1794, unless, upon other grounds, its communication would have been prejudicial to the Government. It must be remembered that this was the first occasion in which the treaty-making power was discussed by Congress, and that this was but one of several difficult and delicate questions considered and decided, for the first time, by the different branches of the Government. The information then called for has never been refused as to any subsequent treaty. Mr. Hamilton, who was regarded by Mr. Jefferson as the author of the President's message, afterwards expressed his regret that a qualified answer had not been returned. It is now conceded that the House is entitled to consider the merits of a treaty that it may determine whether its object is within the scope of the treaty power; but, if it be not inconsistent with the spirit and purpose of the Government, Congress is bound to give it effect, by necessary legislation, as a contract between the Government and a foreign nation. If, on the contrary, it is found to be in conflict with the fundamental principles, purposes, or interests of the Government, it would be justified, not merely in withholding its aid, but in giving notice to foreign nations interested that it would not be regarded as binding upon the nation, in passing laws for its abrogation, and preparing the State for whatever consequences might attend its action.

This was the course pursued by the Government in 1798 in regard to the three treaties of alliance, commerce, and consular representation concluded with France in 1778, the first treaties negotiated by this Government with any foreign nation, and which were concluded immediately upon the recognition of American independence by France. The House would be justified in such action in regard to any treaty which should change the character of the Government; bring into the Union and confer political powers upon large populations incapable of self-government, whose participation in its affairs would imperil our institutions and endanger the peace and safety of the people; which should alienate territory, surrender political power to any other Government, civilized or uncivilized; bind the Government to engage in the wars of other nations, or surrender the rights of the nation on the high seas in any part of the world; which should admit as States of the Union distant foreign nations or Indian tribes, conferring upon them representative powers, as was proposed under the confederation with regard to the Delaware Indians; reestablish slavery, annul the institution of marriage, or interdict the Christian religion. In such case the House would be justified in aiding in its rejection or its abrogation by any act within its power. But when a treaty is limited to objects consistent with the interests of the Government, which can not be attained except by the treaty-making power, its first and highest duty is to enact such measures as are necessary to carry the treaty into effect. To say that a treaty is not a treaty until approved by the House is to make the House a part of the treaty-making power. To say that the House has no rights in regard to foreign treaties, except when they are referred to the House by its provisions, is to admit that the House is not a part of the Government.

Mr. Cadwallader C. Washburne, of Wisconsin, in behalf of himself and Mr. George W. Morgan, of Ohio, presented minority views, contending that the House had the right to withhold the appropriation needed to carry the treaty into effect, and cited authorities in support of this contention—Jefferson, Madison, and the Supreme Court.

The report having been made to the House, the subject, especially in its constitutional aspects, was debated at length from June 30 to July 14, 1868.[1] On the latter date the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole with two amendments. The first amendment, which had been adopted on motion of Mr. William Loughridge, of Iowa, proposed to insert the following preamble and additional section:

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that in consideration of the cession by the Emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the Emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000 in coin; and whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas the subjects thus embraced in the stipulations of said treaty are among the subjects which by the Constitution of the United States are submitted to the power of Congress, and over which Congress has jurisdiction; and it being for such reason necessary that the consent of Congress should be given to said stipulation before the same can have full force and effect; having taken into consideration the said treaty, and approving of the stipulations therein, to the end that the same may be carried into effect; Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the stipulations of said treaty.

This amendment was agreed to, yeas 89, nays 49.

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Globe, pp. 3620, 3658, 3661, 3804, 3809, 3883, 4052–4055; Appendix, pp. 305, 382, 385, 421, etc.

The second amendment, which had been adopted on motion of Mr. Thomas D. Eliot, of Massachusetts, proposed to add the following proviso to the bill:

Provided, That no purchase in behalf of the United States of any foreign territory shall be hereafter made until after provision by law for its payment; and it is hereby declared that the powers vested by the Constitution in the President and Senate to enter into treaties with foreign governments do not include the power to complete the purchase of foreign territory before the necessary appropriation shall be made therefore by act of Congress.

This amendment was disagreed to by the House, yeas 78, nays 80.

The bill, which consisted, besides the amendment adopted, of a simple enactment appropriating the money, was then passed by the House and went to the Senate, where, on July 17,[1] the Senate concurred with the Committee on Foreign Relations in striking out all of the bill except the simple proposition for appropriating the money. With these amendments, the bill was returned to the House, where the amendments of the Senate were disagreed to, and the bill was sent to conference, Messrs. Banks, Loughridge, and Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, being the House conferees, and Messrs. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, O. P. Morton, of Indiana, and J. R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, the Senate conferees.

The conference report, which was signed by all the conferees, was presented in the House on July 23, and provided that the Senate agree to the preamble with the insertion, after the words "Emperor of Russia" where they first occur, the following: "And the Senate thereafter gave its advice and consent to said treaty," and with the further amendment striking out all of the preamble after the words "immunities of citizens of the United States;" and inserting the words, "and whereas said stipulations can not be carried into full force and effect except by legislation to which the consent of both Houses of Congress is necessary." The conference report also struck out the following section of the bill proper: "That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the stipulations of said treaty."

Thus the result of the conference was the amended preamble, and the section of the bill reduced to the form in which it was originally reported from the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, viz, a simple clause appropriating the money for the purchase in accordance with the treaty.

The report[2] was debated at some length in the House, the House conferees explaining that they were forced to waive the extreme contention of the House, because to have insisted on it would have been to defeat the appropriation. The report was agreed to, yeas 91, nays 48.

In the Senate the report was agreed to without debate.

1509. President Washington, in 1796, declined the request of the House that he transmit the correspondence relating to the recently ratified treaty with Great Britain.

Discussion of the right of the House to share in the treaty-making power.

In 1796 the House affirmed that when a treaty related to subjects within the power of Congress it was the constitutional duty of the House to deliberate on the expediency of carrying such treaty into effect.

The House declared in 1796 that its constitutional requests of the executive for information need not be accompanied by a statement of purposes.

On March 24, 1796,[1] the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the instructions to the minister of the United States, who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain (communicated by his message of the 1st instant), together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said treaty; excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed.

This treaty had been communicated to both House and Senate by the President for information, on March 1. The resolution calling for the additional papers was the subject of a long debate, beginning on the 7th of March. The extent to which the House had the right to share in the treaty-making power was discussed at length, as well as the question of how much right to call for information was involved in the House's constitutional prerogative of making appropriations to carry into effect the provisions of treaties.[2]

The resolution was finally agreed to, yeas 62, nays 37, and Messrs. Livingston and Gallatin were appointed a committee to wait on the President with the resolution.

On March 30[3] President Washington transmitted to the House a message in which he stated at length his reasons for declining to transmit the papers. He said that to admit the right of the House of Representatives to demand and receive as a matter of course all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent.

It does not occur—

he continues,

that the inspection of the papers called for can be relative to any purpose under the cognizance of the House of Representatives except that of an impeachment, which the resolution has not expressed.

After discussing the intention of the constitutional convention when it framed the clause relating to treaties, the President concludes:

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself also the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government, that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved; a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request.

On April 7,[4] at the close of a long discussion, the House agreed to the following resolutions, the vote on each being 54 yeas to 37 nays:

Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution, "That the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good.

Resolved, That it is not necessary to the propriety of any application from this House, to the Executive, for information desired by them, and which may relate to any constitutional functions of the House; that the purposes for which such information may be wanted, or to which the same may be applied, should be stated in the application.

In relation to the treaty with Great Britain, as well as in relation to several other treaties, the House came to the resolution that it was expedient to pass the laws necessary to carry it into effect.[1]

1510. The House has requested the President to lay before it information as to the carrying out and the violation of treaties, and the information has been furnished.—On January 2, 1797,[2] the House, after some debate as to the propriety of the request, agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House information what measures have been taken for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and the Dey and Regency of Algiers, and also whether any, and what, further legislative aid may be necessary for that purpose.

On January 3 Mr. Parker, of the committee appointed to wait on the President with the resolution, reported that the President was already preparing to send the papers when the resolution was passed and would transmit them as soon as they should be made out.

1511. On December 17, 1802,[3] on motion of Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia—

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information in possession of the Department of State as relates to the violation, on the part of Spain, of the twenty-second article of the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation between the United States and the King of Spain.

Messrs. Randolph and Huger were appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

On December 22 President Jefferson transmitted the information.

1512. In 1822 the House called generally and specifically for papers relating to the treaty of Ghent and obtained them, although the Executive advised against their publication.—On January 17, 1822,[4] the House proceeded to the consideration of a resolution requesting of the President all the correspondence which led to the treaty of Ghent which has not yet been made public.

After debate as to the propriety of leaving to the President the option of communicating such only of the correspondence as he might think it not improper to disclose, the House, on motion of Mr. William Lowndes, of South Carolina, agreed to this amendment:

and which, in his opinion, it may not be improper to disclose.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

1513. On April 19, 1822,[1] the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House, if not injurious to the public good, any letter or communication which may have been received from Jonathan Russell, esq., one of the ministers of the United States who concluded the treaty of Ghent, after the signature of that treaty, and which was written in conformity to the indications contained in said minister's letter, dated at Ghent 25th December, 1814.

On May 4[2] President Monroe, in a message to the House, after explaining the circumstances of the letter, said:

On full consideration of the subject, I have thought it would be improper for the Executive to communicate the letter called for unless the House, on a knowledge of these circumstances, should desire it, in which case the document called for shall be communicated.

On May 7[3] the House called for the letter, although the propriety of such a course was questioned.

The letter was promptly transmitted to the House.[4]

1514. The House sometimes requests the Executive to negotiate a treaty, although the propriety of the act has been questioned.—On May 15, 1826,[5] Mr. Edward Livingston, of Louisiana, offered these resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any arrangement has been made with the Government of Great Britain in consequence of the resolution of this House of the 23d of December, 1823, requesting that a negotiation should be opened for the cession of certain keys on the Bahama Banks.

Resolved, That the President be requested to open a negotiation with the Spanish Government for the cession of a proper situation for a light-house on one of the double-headed shot keys, to be used solely for the purpose of such light-house.

On May 16 the resolutions were considered, and Mr. Livingston explained that the resolution of 1823 requested the President to open negotiations for the cession of a part of the island of Abaca, and that the President had done so, but the efforts of our minister in London had been without avail.

The first resolution was agreed to without division, but there was objection to the second, Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, urging that, in spite of the precedent, it was irregular for the House to request the President to exercise any of his constitutional powers. The second resolution was then laid on the table.

1515. On February 28, 1823,[6] on motion of Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, and by a vote of 131 yeas to 9 nays, the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon, and to prosecute from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America, as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

1516. On December 3, 1833,[1] the President, in his annual message, stated that he had—the satisfaction to inform you that a negotiation which, by desire of the House of Representatives, was opened some years ago with the British Government for the erection of light-houses on the Bahamas, has been successful.

1517. On April 3, 1876,[2] the House agreed to this resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that at the present time there are over 100,000 Chinese on the Pacific coast, many of whom have been brought thither under contracts for servile labor, and that their numbers are being constantly increased, to the great detriment of the laboring men of the coast and in derogation of the treaty stipulations existing between the United States and the Empire of China: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to open negotiations with the Chinese Government for the purpose of modifying the provisions of the treaty between the two countries and restricting the same to commercial purposes.

A concurrent resolution of similar intent was[3] introduced later, but was referred and not acted on.

1518. In 1848 President Polk declined on constitutional grounds to honor the unconditional request of the House for a copy of the instructions to the minister sent to negotiate a treaty with Mexico.—On January 4, 1848,[4] the House, by a vote of 146 yeas to 15 nays, agreed to the following resolution, which was offered by Mr. William L. Goggin, of Virginia:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House any instructions which may have been given to any of the officers of the Army or Navy of the United States, or other persons, in regard to the return of President General Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, or any other Mexican, to the Republic of Mexico, prior or subsequent to the order of the President or Secretary of War, issued in January, 1846, for the march of the Army from the Neuces River, across the "stupendous deserts" which intervene, to the Rio Grande; that the date of all such instructions, orders, and correspondence, be set forth, together with the instructions and orders issued to Mr. Slidell, at any time, prior or subsequent to his departure from Mexico, as minister plenipotentiary of the United States to that Republic.

Resolved further, That the President be requested to communicate all the orders and correspondence of the Government in relation to the return of General Paredes to Mexico.

On January 13 President Polk communicated to the House a portion of the information called for, but in relation to another portion, took the following grounds:

The resolution calls for the "instructions and orders issued to Mr. Slidell at any time prior or subsequent to his departure for Mexico, as minister plenipotentiary of the United States to that Republic." The customary and usual reservation contained in calls of either House of Congress upon the Executive for information relating to our intercourse with foreign nations has been omitted in the resolution before me. The call of the House is unconditional. It is that the information requested be communicated, and thereby be made public, whether, in the opinion of the Executive (who is charged by the Constitution with the duty of conducting negotiations with foreign powers), such information when disclosed would be prejudicial to the public interest or not. It has been a subject of serious deliberation with me whether I could, consistently with my constitutional duty and my sense of the public interests involved and to be affected by it, violate an important principle, always heretofore held sacred by my predecessors, as I should do by a compliance with the request of the House. President Washington, in a message to the House of Representatives of the 30th of March, 1796, declined to comply with a request contained in a resolution of that body, to lay before them "a copy of the instructions to the minister of the United States who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiations may render improper to be disclosed." In assigning his reasons for declining to comply with the call, he declared that "the nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and, even when brought to a conclusion, a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, and eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate—the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of Members. To admit, then, in the House of Representatives, a right to demand and to have, as a matter of course, all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power, would be to establish a dangerous precedent." In that case the instructions and documents called for related to a treaty which had been concluded and ratified by the President and Senate, and the negotiations in relation to it had been terminated. There was an express reservation, too, "excepting" from the call all such papers as related to "any existing negotiations" which it might be improper to disclose. In that case President Washington deemed it to be a violation of an important principle, the establishment of a "dangerous precedent," and prejudicial to the public interests, to comply with the call of the House. Without deeming it to be necessary on the present occasion to examine or decide upon the other reasons assigned by him for his refusal to communicate the information requested by the House, the one which is herein recited is, in my judgment, conclusive in the case under consideration.

Indeed, the objections to complying with the request of the House, contained in the resolution before me, are much stronger than those which existed in the case of the resolution of 1796. This resolution calls for the "instructions and orders" to the minister of the United States to Mexico, which relate to negotiations which have not been terminated, and which may be resumed. The information called for respects negotiations which the United States offered to open with Mexico immediately preceding the commencement of the existing war. The instructions given to the minister of the United States relate to the differences between the two countries out of which the war grew, and the terms of adjustment which we were prepared to offer to Mexico in our anxiety to prevent the war. These differences still remain unsettled; and to comply with the call of the House would be to make public, through that channel, and to communicate to Mexico, now a public enemy engaged in war, information which could not fail to produce serious embarrassment in any future negotiation between the two countries. I have therefore communicated to Congress all the correspondence of the minister of the United States to Mexico which in the existing state of our relations with that republic can, in my judgment, be at this time communicated without serious injury to the public interest.

Entertaining this conviction, and with the sincere desire to furnish any information which may be in possession of the Executive Department, and which either House of Congress may at any time request, I regard it to be my constitutional right and my solemn duty, under the circumstances of this case, to decline compliance with the request of the House contained in their resolution.

Debate at once arose over this message, Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, saying that he believed that the House was right in asserting its position in 1796, and urging that it should maintain its position now, that it had a right to the information. The subject was debated at length on this day, and again on January 19 and March 14 and 15; but no further action seems to have been taken.

1519. On July 17, 1848,[1] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House (if not inconsistent with the public interest) copies of all instructions given to the Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier and Nathan Clifford, commissioners appointed to conduct negotiations for the ratification of the treaty lately concluded between the United States and the Republic of Mexico.

[1] First session Thirtieth Congress, Journal, pp. 1051, 1145; Globe, pp. 943, 1025.

On August 2, the President (Mr. Polk) responded in a message in which he said:

I avail myself of this occasion to observe that, as a general rule, applicable to all our important negotiations with foreign powers, it could not fail to be prejudicial to the public interest to publish the instructions to our ministers until some time had elapsed after the conclusion of such negotiations.

In the present case the object of the mission of our commissioners to Mexico has been accomplished. The treaty, as amended by the Senate of the United States, has been ratified. The ratifications have been exchanged, and the treaty has been proclaimed as the supreme law of the land. No contingency occurred which made it either necessary or proper for our commissioners to enter on any negotiations with the Mexican Government further than to urge upon that Government the ratification of the treaty in its amended form.

1520. The House has at times advised the Executive in regard to treaties affecting the revenue.—On December 13, 1869,[1] the House, on motion of Mr. John A. Peters, of Maine, agreed to the following resolution, after declining, by a vote of yeas 43, nays 129, to lay it on the table:

Resolved, That the sentiment of this House accords with the opinion expressed in the message of the President of the United States, that a renewal of a treaty of reciprocal trade with the British provinces on this continent would be wholly in favor of the British producer, and should not in our present condition be favorably considered.

1521. On March 3, 1869,[2] the last day of the Congress, Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That while this House does not admit any right in the Executive and treaty-making power of the United States to conclude treaties or conventions with any foreign government by which import duties shall be mutually regulated, it is, however, of the opinion, and recommends to the President, that negotiations with the Government of Great Britain should be renewed and pressed, if possible to a definite conclusion regarding commercial intercourse and securing to our own citizens the rights claimed by them in the fisheries on the coasts of the British provinces of America, and the free navigation of the St. Lawrence River from its source to the sea.

This resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

1522. On April 23, 1879,[3] the House, on motion of Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, and without debate, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of entering into a convention with the Government of France for the negotiation of a treaty which shall secure a more equal interchange of the products and manufactures of each country and serve to cement closer relations of amity, trade, and commerce.

1523. In 1871 the House asserted its right to a voice in carrying into effect treaties on subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress.—On April 20, 1871,[4] under suspension of the rules, and without debate or division, the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution "that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on the law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

1524. In 1880 the House declared that the negotiation of a treaty affecting the revenues was an invasion of its prerogatives.—On January 19, 1880,[1] Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, moved to suspend the rules and agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the negotiation by the Executive Department of the Government of a commercial treaty whereby the rates of duty to be imposed on foreign commodities entering the United States for consumption should be fixed would, in view of the provision of section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, be an infraction of the Constitution and an invasion of one of the highest prerogatives of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Benjamin Wilson, of West Virginia, opposed the resolution on the ground that the Foreign Affairs Committee were examining the subject,[2] and action should be deferred until their report.

But the House agreed to the resolution, yeas 175, nays 62.

1525. In 1881 the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, discussing the treaty-making power, concluded that the House had no share in it.—On February 14, 1881,[3] Mr. George A. Bicknell, of Indiana, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report on the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 132) relating to the treaty-making power:

This resolution affirms that the treaty-making power of the United States "does not extend to treaties which affect the revenue, or require the appropriation of money to execute them; but that in such cases the consent of the law-making power of the Government is required, which includes, as one of its branches, the House of Representatives."

It is assumed in the preamble of this resolution that article 1, section 7, of the Constitution, which declares that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," is in conflict with the subsequent provisions in article 2, section 2, and in article 6 of the Constitution, which declares that the President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present shall concur," shall have power to make treaties, and that "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

[2] Reference here seems to be made to the consideration of the fishery provisions of the treaty of Washington. The Committee on Foreign Affairs reported on June 9, 1880. (H. Rept. 1746, second session Forty-sixth Congress, p. 4.) In the course of this report they say: "The decisions of our highest law tribunal go so far as to say that in all matters within the purview of Congress, as, for instance, the tariff, as on hemp in the case of Tyler v. Morton (Curtis's Reports, vol. 2, p. 454), no treaty should intervene to prevent the action of the Federal legislation as to imposts on foreign articles. The question as to the right of the treaty-making power to affect duties on imports is not a new question. The Constitution in delegating such a power did not, however, interfere with that of Congress to regulate commerce and impose duties. It is not necessary to discuss here and now how far Congress may participate in the matter of reimposing duties on fish, which were made free by the Washington treaty, as whatever power the Federal Government had to make the treaty as to imposts may of right be controlled by Congress. This part of our constitutional duty it is not proposed to assume by the bill reported. No one can question the power of Congress to control the revenues to be derived from fish and fish oil."

[3] Third session Forty-sixth Congress, House Report No. 225.

In the opinion of your committee there is no conflict in these provisions. The words "all bills for raising revenue," in section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution, do not embrace treaties; a treaty is not a bill for raising revenue, and the requirement that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives" is not a limitation upon the treaty-making power, but is only a condition imposed on the ordinary law-making power of the Government. The President and the two Houses of Congress constitute the ordinary law-making power of the Government; the President and two-thirds of the Senators present constitute the treaty-making power. Neither of these powers has anything to do with the other, and to require the consent of the House of Representatives to make a treaty valid would violate the Constitution by making the House of Representatives a branch of the treaty-making power.

The first clause of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution declares that "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." It is sometimes asserted that this clause impairs the force of the subsequent grant of the treaty-making power to the President and Senate already referred to.

Provisions apparently conflicting, in the same writing, must be construed so as to give effect to all of them if possible; but if that is not possible, then the latest clearly-expressed intention must prevail. And it will be observed that if the mere grant of power in section 8 of article 1 excludes all the subjects mentioned in that section from the treaty-making power, the latter power will be confined within very narrow limits. Under that construction the President and Senate could not make a commercial treaty with a foreign nation, because said section 8 gives power to Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," and no treaty could be made to promote the general welfare because the same section gives power to Congress to provide "for the general welfare."

Treaties, however, for the general welfare, and commercial treaties and reciprocity treaties affecting duties, have often been made.

It seems clear to your committee that section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution refers exclusively to the ordinary law-making power, but section 2 of article 2 creates the extraordinary treaty-making power, in which the House of Representatives can not participate.

The making of treaties is the exercise of the supreme power of the State (Vattel, 192). Ordinarily it belongs to the executive department, but wherever it may be placed by a written constitution, it is a supreme power, subject to no limitations except such as are expressed in the Constitution, or are necessarily implied from the nature of the subject-matter, or from the distribution of the constitutional powers. (Halleck, 189; Wheaton, 457.)

A treaty can not be construed so as to destroy other powers given in the Constitution, or to change the form of Government, or to renounce the national sovereignty, or to alienate the entire national domain. (Story, sec. 1508.) It has been asserted that treaties altering the rules of trade and navigation may require the sanction of the legislature (Wheaton, 457), and in 1816 a question was made whether a certain treaty changed the revenue and whether an act of Congress was necessary to reinforce it, and such an act was passed (3 Stat., 354); but it seems to be agreed by American writers on public law that a treaty within constitutional limits and free from fraud, and not renouncing the national sovereignty or giving up the national domain, is binding upon Congress, and that a refusal by Congress to carry the treaty into effect might be regarded by the other party as just cause of war. (See authorities already cited, and 2 Peters, 314; 6 Peters, 375.) But within our own jurisdiction, in case of a conflict between a valid treaty and a valid act of Congress, they both being the law of the land, it seems that the later law would govern. The resolution under consideration (H. J. Res. 132) affirms a proposition which, under existing constitutional provisions, can not be sustained. Your, committee therefore recommend that the same be not adopted.

In the House on the same day that this report was presented the joint resolution was laid on the table [1] without debate.

1526. In 1884 and 1886 the Ways and Means Committee assumed that the right of the House to a voice in making treaties affecting the revenue had been conceded.—On June 17, 1884,[2] Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, from the Committee on Ways and Means, made a report on the convention between the United States and Mexico, in which the following principles are laid down:

[2] First session Forty-eighth Congress, House Report No. 1848.

Under the Constitution the right to negotiate treaties is vested in the executive power, subject to the ratification of the Senate. The intervention of the House of Representatives is not required, unless the treaty calls for the exercise of powers which, by the Constitution, are vested in the Congress. Commercial treaties dealing with questions of revenue, which, by the Constitution, are subject to the control of the Congress, could not be carried into effect without affirmative action of the legislative branch of the Government. It is true the question has been raised whether it would not be competent for the President and Senate alone to enter into treaties which would change the laws for the collection of revenue; but the practice has been uniform, and the House has always insisted that where the rates of duty are changed by treaty the approval of the Congress is necessary for its execution. In the case of the treaty under consideration, however, this question does not arise, for the reason that the Senate, before ratifying the convention, adopted the following amendment:

"The present convention shall take effect as soon as it has been approved and ratified by both contracting parties according to their respective constitutions, but not until laws necessary to carry it into operation shall have been passed by both the Congress of the United States of America and the Government of the United Mexican States, and regulations provided accordingly, which will take place twelve months from the date of the exchange of ratifications to which article 10 refers."

The adoption of this amendment by the Senate is a substantial admission, in the nature of a precedent, which may be expected hereafter to govern treaties affecting the revenue.

1527. On May 25, 1886,[1] the Committee on Ways and Means reported adversely the bill (H. R. 1513) to carry into effect the reciprocity treaty with Mexico. This treaty contained a clause making its validity dependent on the law-making power, and the report of the committee, as well as the minority views, assume this as a recognition by the treaty-making power of the right of the Congress to have a voice in treaties relating to the revenue.

1528. After long and careful consideration, the Judiciary Committee of the House decided, in 1887, that the Executive branch of the Government might not conclude a treaty affecting the revenue without the assent of the House.—On January 15, 1884,[2] Mr. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, presented and the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to report to the House whether the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can negotiate treaties with foreign Governments by which the duties levied by Congress on importations can be changed or abrogated.

On March 3, 1885,[3] at the end of the Congress, and when there was no time for action by the House, Mr. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made a very elaborate and able report on this subject. The remaining members of the committee sign a statement accompanying, stating that they have not had time to examine the important question, and that they are not to be considered as assenting or dissenting from the report or its conclusions.

The report offers the following resolution, as the conclusion to which the arguments come:[4]

Resolved, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can not negotiate treaties with foreign Governments by which the duties levied by Congress can be changed or abrogated, and such treaties to be operative as law must have the sanction of an act of Congress.

[2] First session Forty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 316; Record, p. 412.

[3] Second session Forty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 814; House Report No. 2680.

[4] In 1884–85 (second session Forty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 175, 231, 506, 548) this subject was discussed at length in the Senate.

Mr. Tucker, after quoting those articles of the Constitution bearing on the treaty-making power, says it will not be denied that the power to make treaties is exclusively vested in the President and Senate; but he denies that this power is absolute and unlimited, even as to the rightful subjects within its scope. He says:

The question then recurs, What limitations are there on the power of the President and Senate to make treaties? Or, to limit the inquiry to the terms of the resolution referred to us, Can a treaty (so called) made by President and Senate repeal existing tax laws or impose taxation propro vigore, or make it imperative on the House of Representatives to pass laws conforming to the terms of the treaty relative to taxation?

A treaty is a contract, or agreement between nations. It binds each nation when made by its lawful authority. If not so made it is not binding at all. The agency through which the national faith is bound must be authorized to bind it. The power to make some contracts may be exclusive and even absolute, but the question still remains, what contracts may be made? When, therefore, it is asserted that the President and Senate alone have authority to make treaties, it does not follow that it may by treaty do anything which is a possible subject of contract. What subjects the treaty power embraces is untouched by the conclusion of the exclusive authority to make treaties being vested in the President and the Senate.

What limitations exist as to the subjects within the treaty power are to be determined by the circumstances.

Vattel declares a treaty is not valid which is contrary to a former one with another nation. (Vattel, Book II, chap. 12, secs. 164, 165, p. 196; 2 Phil. International Law, 75.)

So he declares that no treaty is binding on a nation which is pernicious to the nation for whose safety the Government is constituted a trustee. (Vattel, Book II, chap. 12, sec. 160, pp. 194–195.)

It is from the fundamental laws of each State that we must learn where resides the authority that is capable of contracting with validity in the name of the State. (Id., section 154, p. 193.)

It is therefore beyond question that a treaty is invalid which destroys the Constitution of the nation, or the rights of its people thereby secured. A treaty can not violate the Constitution of the nation. It is a sound principle of international law, on the high authority just cited, that the government of a nation can not annul the Constitution from which its authority is derived.

But it is also a clear constitutional doctrine. The language of the Constitution of the United States, which gives the character of "supreme law" to a treaty, confines it to "treaties made under the authority of the United States." That authority is limited and defined by the Constitution itself. The United States have no unlimited but only delegated authority. The power to make treaties is bounded by the same limits which are prescribed for the authority delegated to the United States by the Constitution. To suppose that the power to make treaties with foreign nations is unlimited by the restraints imposed on the power delegated by the United States would be to assume that by such treaty the Constitution itself might be abrogated and the liberty of the people secured thereby destroyed. The power to contract must be commensurate with and not transcend the powers by virtue of which the United States and their Government exist and act. It can not contract with a foreign nation to do what is unauthorized or forbidden by the Constitution to be done. The power to contract is limited by the power to do. (3 Story Com. on Const., sec. 1501.)

It is on this principle that a treaty can not take away essential liberties secured by the Constitution to the people. The treaty power must be subordinate to these. A treaty can not alien a State or dismember the Union, because the Constitution forbids both.

In all such cases the legitimate effect of a treaty is to bind the United States to do what they are competent to do and no more. The United States by treaty can only agree with another nation to perform what they have authority to perform under the constitutional charter creating them. The treaty makes the nexus which binds the faith of the Union to do what their Constitution gives authority to do. A treaty made under that authority may do this; all it attempts to do beyond it is ultra vires—is null and can not bind them.

We advance to a further limitation. Can a treaty do what the Constitution has expressly delegated to another department the exclusive and independent authority to do? Or can a treaty compel a department to do what the Constitution submits to its exclusive and absolute will? And is not the obligation of the treaty conditioned upon its free action in those things which the Constitution confides to it as an exclusive and independent department?

If a treaty has any operation to supersede legislative action, or to constrain it, it would follow that by treaty a State might be admitted to the Union. Congress alone has that power. The treaty between the United States and Texas did not propose to make her a member of the Union, and the admission was made by the action of Congress.

Congress has power to naturalize foreigners. A treaty can not do so without or contrary to the will of Congress. So as to bankruptcy, patents, copyright, coinage of money, etc.; so as to the Army, Navy, postal service, exclusive legislation in the District of Columbia. If a contract may be made with a foreign nation as to all these subjects which is obligatory on the United States, then it follows that foreign intervention in all our internal concerns may supersede under treaty stipulations all the powers of Congress intrusted to it by the Constitution. The cases of the power to tax and to appropriate money to public objects is a stronger case than any other against the construction which gives this supremacy to the treaty power. The same results follow as to the powers of the President and of the judiciary. These, too, may be subordinated by treaty to the supreme control of foreign nations through the action of the treaty-making power under this construction. Treaties may not usurp the chair of the Executive and the bench of the judges.

The report then goes on to an analysis of the terms of the Constitution, the English precedents, including the treaty of Utrecht, which, in respect to a clause respecting reciprocity of commerce, was never sanctioned by parliamentary consummation, and to a view of the debates during the framing of the Constitution, and of the precedents of the House, those of 1796 and 1816. The report made in the Senate in 1844 [1] by Mr. Rufus Choate, of Massachusetts, and the action of President Jackson in 1834, in regard to the French treaty.[2]

The report also quotes the law writers and commentators on the Constitution.

1529. On January 22, 1887,[3] Mr. Nathaniel D. Wallace, of Louisiana, submitted as a question of privilege a resolution reciting that the President and Senate had ratified a convention with Hawaii, which convention, unlike the preceding one of the same kind, was not subject to the approval of Congress, and further setting forth that the new convention provided for the admission of certain articles into the United States free of duty. Therefore the resolution provided for the investigation of the subject by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The point of order being made that the resolution was not privileged, the Speaker [4] held that such subjects, referring to the constitutional prerogatives of the House, had always been considered as privileged.

The resolution was agreed to and on March 3 Mr. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, reported from that committee the following resolutions:

That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can not negotiate a treaty which shall be binding on the United States whereby duties on imports are to be regulated, either by imposing or remitting, increasing or decreasing them, without the sanction of an act of Congress; and that the extension of the term for the operation of the original treaty or convention with the Government of the Hawaiian Islands, proposed by the supplementary convention of December 6, 1884, will not be binding on the United States without like sanction, which was provided for in the original treaty and convention, and was given by act of Congress.

That the President is respectfully requested to withhold final action upon the proposed convention and to condition its final ratification upon the sanction of an act of Congress, in respect of the duties upon articles to be imported from the Hawaiian Islands.

Accompanying these resolutions was a report similar to that in the preceding Congress. It appears, however, that in this case, the report was authorized by the committee, and it does not appear that there was dissent. The report was made too late for action by the House.

1530. On January 31, 1902,[1] the following resolution was reported from the Committee on Rules and agreed to by the House:[2]

Whereas it is seriously claimed that under the treaty-making power of the Government, and without any action whatever on the part of the House of Representatives or by Congress, reciprocal trade agreements may be negotiated with foreign governments that will of their own force operate to supplant, change, increase, or entirely abrogate duties on imports collected under laws enacted by Congress and approved by the Executive for the purpose of raising revenue to maintain the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to fully investigate the question of whether or not the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and independent of any action on the part of the House of Representatives, can negotiate treaties with foreign governments by which duties levied under an act of Congress for the purpose of raising revenue are modified or repealed, and report the result of such investigation to the House.

No report on this subject was made at this session of Congress.

1531. The House maintains that customs duties may not be changed otherwise than by an act of Congress originated by itself.

Approvals by Congress of reciprocity treaties affecting customs duties.

Discussion of the prerogatives of the Senate as to treaties affecting customs duties.

On November 16, 1903,[3] the House proceeded, in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1921) to carry into effect a convention between the United States and the Republic of Cuba signed on the 11th day of December, in the year 1902:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the Republic of Cuba has made provision to give full effect to the articles of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Cuba, signed on the 11th day of December, in the year 1902, he is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that he has received such evidence, and thereupon, on the tenth day after exchange of ratifications of such convention between the United States and the Republic of Cuba, and so long as the said convention shall remain in force, all articles of merchandise being the product of the soil or industry of the Republic of Cuba which are now imported into the United States free of duty shall continue to be so admitted free of duty, and all other articles of merchandise being the product of the soil or industry of the Republic of Cuba imported into the United States shall be admitted at a reduction of 20 per cent of the rates of duty thereon, as provided by the tariff act of the United States approved July 24, 1897, or as may be provided by any tariff law of the United States subsequently enacted. The rates of duty herein granted by the United States to the Republic of Cuba are and shall continue during the term of said convention preferential in respect to all like imports from other countries: Provided, That while said convention is in force no sugar imported from the Republic of Cuba, and being the product of the soil or industry of the Republic of Cuba, shall be admitted into the United States at a reduction of duty greater than 20 per cent of the rates of duty thereon, as provided by the tariff act of the United States approved July 24, 1897, and no sugar the product of any other foreign country shall be admitted by treaty or convention into the United States while this convention is in force at a lower rate of duty than that provided by the tariff act of the United States approved July 24, 1897: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed as an admission on the part of the House of Representatives that customs duties can be changed otherwise than by an act of Congress originating in said House.

SEC. 2. That so long as said convention shall remain in force the laws and regulations adopted or that may be adopted by the United States to protect the revenues and prevent fraud in the declarations and proofs that the articles of merchandise to which said convention may apply are the product or manufacture of the Republic of Cuba shall not impose any additional charge or fees therefor on the articles imported, excepting the consular fees established, or which may be established, by the United States for issuing shipping documents, which fees shall not be higher than those charged on the shipments of similar merchandise from any other nation whatsoever; that articles of the Republic of Cuba shall receive, on their importation into the ports of the United States, treatment equal to that which similar articles of the United States shall receive on their importation into the ports of the Republic of Cuba; that any tax or charge that may be imposed by the national or local authorities of the United States upon the articles of merchandise of the Republic of Cuba embraced in the provisions of said convention subsequent to importation and prior to their entering into consumption into the United States shall be imposed and collected without discrimination upon like articles whencesoever imported.

The report[1] of the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted by Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, began as follows:

The enactment of this bill into law is necessary to give effect to the convention providing for reciprocal trade between this country and Cuba.[2] This results not merely because the convention itself provides that it "shall not take effect until the same shall have been approved by the Congress," but because the Constitution gives no power to the President and the Senate to make a convention or treaty changing the rates of revenue. That power is expressly lodged in the Congress. (Sec. 8, Article I, of the Constitution.) Section 7 of the same article provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." lt is not intended here to cite authorities or advance reasons on this proposition. The records of Congress abound with unrefuted arguments on the affirmative of this contention, and the practice of Congress has been uniformly in the same direction. The reciprocity treaties with Great Britain in reference to our trade relations with Canada and with Hawaii were by their terms each dependent upon the passage by the Congress of appropriate legislation reducing the duties and making provision for the carrying into effect of their terms.[3] Every treaty requiring the payment of money, from the Jay treaty to the treaty of Paris with Spain, has been referred to the Congress to make the necessary appropriation of money. Foreign countries in making treaties with us are bound to take notice of this requirement of our Constitution, and, whether it is expressed in the treaty or not, the whole matter is subject to the necessary legislation by the Congress.

[1] House Report No. 1, Record, pp. 274–276. Mr. S. B. Cooper, of Texas, filed individual minority views, holding that it "was plainly a subterfuge to contend that this is a bill of the House when its only purpose and effect is to ratify a treaty or law already perfected in form by the other branch of Congress, and practically already ratified in that branch, under the treaty-making power conferred by the Constitution, which treaty or law the House is now simply called upon by the majority to accept as a fait accompli, without any voice as to the wording of the original document, and even without the privilege of amending or modifying the terms laid down by its constructors. It certainly appears an unconstitutional proceeding thus to tie the hands of the House of Representatives in a matter of legislation affecting the revenue."

[2] For text of this treaty see Executive Document No. 2, first session Fifty-eighth Congress. This treaty provided: "This convention shall not take effect until the same shall have been approved by Congress."

[3] Both Canadian and Hawaiian treaties had clauses requiring legislation of Congress, and acts were passed in accordance therewith. (See 10 Stat. L., pp. 587, 1092; 13 Stat. L., p. 566; 19 Stat. L., p. 200.) The Mexican reciprocity treaty also had a similar clause, but the legislation failed and the treaty did not become effective. (24 Stat. L., p. 988; 25 Stat. L., p. 1370.)

The convention to which this bill refers is by its terms not to "take effect until the same shall have been approved by the Congress." If, in the judgment of Congress, the terms of the treaty are to become the law of the land, it is necessary, both by the terms of the convention and by force of the express requirement of the Constitution, that Congress pass the requisite legislation authorizing the change in our revenue laws.

To render the convention valid it is necessary to enact into law the language of the proviso of Article VIII: "And no sugar the product of any other foreign country shall be admitted by treaty or convention into the United States while this convention is in force at a lower rate of duty than that provided by the tariff act of the United States approved July 24, 1897." To enact these words into law would be to admit, by implication, that duties could be lowered by treaty or convention. Your committee can not consent to this proposition, nor is it believed that such an admission would be sanctioned by any Member of the House. The bill therefore adds the following saving clause at the conclusion of this proviso:

"And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed as an admission on the part of the House of Representatives that customs duties can be changed otherwise than by an act of Congress originating in said House."

This proviso, in the judgment of your committee, preserves the contention of the House as to its rights and prerogatives under the Constitution.

The bill was debated November 16 [1] and succeeding days and passed the House without amendment.[2]

In the Senate on December 14 and 16,[3] Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, discussed at length the constitutional question, holding the initiatory action of the Senate unconstitutional. On December 16 Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, also discussed the question in controversy with Mr. Bailey.

Mr. Bailey laid down three propositions:

My first proposition is that—

The House of Representatives alone has the right to originate revenue bills; and neither the President alone nor the President and the Senate jointly possesses that power.

My second proposition is that—

The Constitution commits the treaty-making power of the Government to the President and the Senate; and the House of Representatives has no right to approve or to disapprove a treaty.

My third proposition is that—

The President and the Senate, acting in conjunction with the House of Representatives, can not validate an invalid law or treaty; and that what is null and void from the beginning must remain null and void to the end.

Mr. President, in declaring that all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives I merely repeat the very language of the Constitution, and it follows as a corollary from that that neither the President alone nor the President and the Senate acting together can initiate such a measure.

Mr. Bailey, in the course of the discussion of his propositions, said:

In 1843 the President of the United States negotiated what is commonly known as the "Zollverein commercial treaty," and transmitted it to the Senate for its ratification. That treaty was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and from that committee, on the 14th day of June, Senator Choate, of Massachusetts, submitted a report in which he states the case against the President's right and power to negotiate a treaty of this kind so much better than I could hope to state it that I shall ask the Secretary to read it.

I commend this report [4] to the careful attention of all Senators, but I especially commend it to the attention of the Senators from Massachusetts. I do not need to remind them that Rufus Choate was not a strict-construction Democrat, who insisted upon the cold letter of the Constitution. He was a Whig, and a leader in the party which had elected the President who had negotiated this treaty and urged its ratification. But over and above his political affiliations he was a profound lawyer, whose learning and eloquence are still cherished by the Massachusetts bar, even if his advice is not followed by the Massachusetts Senators.

Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, during the debate, said:

That the question the Senator has discussed as to the power of the President and the Senate by treaty alone to change tariff rates was not raised by this treaty, because it is part of the agreement itself that it should not take effect until it had been approved by Congress. I did not say, nor do I say, nor do I think that if that provision had not been in the treaty the treaty would have been unconstitutional, although I assume, for the purposes of argument, and I should be strongly inclined to the opinion, that it would have remained executory until legislation originating in the House had given effect to it.

* * * * * * *

I certainly can not agree that where a treaty is of such a character that it can not become effective until Congress has supplied the legislation to carry it into effect it becomes a perfect obligation, unless there is a provision in the treaty itself that it shall not become effective until it has been approved by Congress. The Constitution itself is written into the treaty and if it can not take effect under the organic law without affirmative action by Congress, that is in the body of the treaty. The nations must take notice of the limitations upon the treaty-making power.

If the Senator will pardon me a moment, Wheaton says:

"The treaty, when thus ratified, is obligatory upon the contracting states, independently of the auxiliary legislative measures which may be necessary on the part of either in order to carry it into complete effect. Where, indeed, such auxiliary legislation becomes necessary, in consequence of some limitation upon the treaty-making power, expressed in the fundamental laws of the State, or necessarily implied—"

As the Senator from Texas thinks in this case—

"from the distribution of its constitutional powers—such, for example, as a prohibition of alienating the national domain—then the treaty may be considered as imperfect in its obligation until the national assent has been given in the forms required by the municipal constitution."

And so it is said by Mr. Story; and so it is said in Foster v. Neilson by Chief Justice Marshall; and so it is said by Mr. Justice McLean, who, in the case of Turner v. The American Baptist Union, expressed himself as follows:

"A treaty under the Federal Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This unquestionably applies to all treaties where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and can not, be, the supreme law of the land where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect."

That is either where it provides as a part of the agreement that it shall not take effect until approved by Congress or where it is provided as a part of the Constitution that it shall not take effect until approved by Congress. Justice McLean continues:

"Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative, in the sense of the Constitution, as money can not be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our Government."

* * * * * * *

The point of the Senator's argument was that the House was no part of the treaty-making power. That is true. A treaty which the President and the Senate may lawfully enter into would be no better if it provided for approval by the House, but would be an attempt to confer by contract a power upon the House which under the Constitution it does not possess, which it claimed long ago in President Washington's day, but which it abandoned then and has never since asserted.

But a provision that the treaty shall not take effect until approved by Congress is a valid provision unless the Senator takes the narrow view of the word "approved," that it involves a ratification of the treaty by the House and by the Senate as legislative bodies. You will find the word "approved" in the provision of the Dingley Act as to commercial treaties. If that word means what the Senator seems to think it does, it is bad; there is no sense in it. If it means what I think it means, until the House, where it relates to duties, shall approve by legislation the duty provisions of the treaty, it is entirely harmonious with my contention that it is constitutional. It is a different proposition from that which the Senator was making a moment ago.

In the course of the debate, Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, said:

But when you come to an event which it is declared is absolutely indispensable to the operation of the treaty, an act by Congress, what better can you have than that? I can see none, and that is the reason why I am going to vote for this bill, that all the rights of the great body of popular Representatives of the Government are preserved.

I do not agree with certain Senators here that the President and the Senate can ride roughshod over the popular branch, and that the power, which is given in terms to negotiate treaties undermines and destroys the fundamental proposition that revenue measures must originate in the House. I do not agree with Senators in that. My education in the House and all my thought and reflection since have been in the other direction. I shall vote for this bill because it has been so amply guarded in that direction that the right of the House is maintained, and the treaty is dependent upon a single event which must be initiated and started and adopted by the House and the Senate as Congress.

On December 16,[1] Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, said:

The Constitution provides for two methods of legislation. It declares that bills passed in accordance with the Constitution and treaties shall be the law of the land. They have equal authority, and the latest bill or treaty is the latest declaration of the law and repeals all others in conflict with it. Then the Constitution proceeds to say, not that measures or even laws for raising revenue shall originate in the House, but that bills for that purpose shall do so—that is, in substance, that when the method of doing this is by majority vote the method of accomplishing it is by statute, the origin of which is a bill, the popular branch shall have the sole prerogative of originating it. But the Constitution leaves untouched, by any suggestion of a provision, direct or indirect, the otherwise unlimited authority to make any kind of law by treaty.

It is true there are many treaties which, while pledging the faith of the Government, require an act of Congress to give them effect, just as there are many laws which, while pledging the faith of the Government, require a supplementary act of Congress to give them effect. A law providing for a public debt and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sign the evidences of the public debt requires a future law making an appropriation for its payment, but it is operative and pledges the faith of the Government to the public creditor, and it becomes the bounden duty of both Houses to make the appropriation, just as much as it becomes the bounden duty of both Houses to carry into effect any other provision of the Constitution whatever. So in the matter of the salaries of judges. But it is not necessary to carry the illustration further.

There may be treaties affecting revenue—and it makes no difference, as I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, whether their effect is the diminution or the raising of revenue—which require future legislation to carry them into effect. It is not necessary to illustrate that. And there may be treaties which require no further legislation to carry them into effect. For instance, suppose, being in the habit of charging $100 head money on every passenger brought into the United States, we should make a treaty with Spain in these words: "Hereafter no officer of the United States shall receive or exact any head money from any passenger coming from Spain." That would be a complete, perfect enactment. It would be the law of the land, by the express provision of the Constitution, requiring no farther act of Congress to give it effect or to provide any mechanism for carrying it out. I hold that such a treaty, although it affects revenue and never has been in the House, is as absolutely, by the plain meaning of the Constitution, the law of the land as if those same words were put into a statute enacted by both Houses.

The bill, on December 16, was passed by the Senate without amendment, yeas 57, nays 18.[2]

1532. In 1844 the Senate took the view that the constitutional method of regulating duties was by act of Congress rather than by treaty.

Argument that duties are more properly regulated with the publicity of Congressional action than by treaties negotiated by the Executive and ratified by the Senate in secrecy.

[1] Record, p. 277.

[2] Record, p. 286.

On June 14, 1844,[1] in executive session of the Senate, Mr. Rufus Choate, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom had been referred the convention with Prussia and the other states of the Germanic Association of Customs and Commerce, reported the same adversely. In the report the committee says:

That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the ratification of the convention aforesaid.

In submitting this report the committee do not think it necessary to say anything on the general object sought to be accomplished by the convention, or on the details of the actual arrangement; not to attempt to determine, by the weight and measure of the reciprocal concessions, which Government, if either, has the best of the transaction. These subjects have not escaped their notice, but they propose to confine themselves to a very brief exhibition of another and single ground, upon which, without reference to the particular merits of the treaty, they advise against its ratification.

The committee, then, are not prepared to sanction so large an innovation upon ancient and uniform practice in respect of the department of Government by which duties on imports shall be imposed. The convention which has been submitted to the Senate changes duties which have been laid by law. It changes them either ex directo and by its own vigor, or it engages the faith of the nation and the faith of the Legislature through which the nation acts to make the change. In either aspect it is the President and Senate who, by the instrumentality of negotiation, repeal or materially vary regulations of Commerce and laws of revenue which Congress had ordained. More than this, the executive department, by the same instrumentality of negotiations, places it beyond the power of Congress to exceed the stipulated maximum of import duties for at least three years, whatever exigency may intervene to require it.

In the judgment of the committee the Legislature is the department of Government by which commerce should be regulated and the laws of revenue be passed. The Constitution, in terms, communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it, in terms, to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is indisputably that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress. They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our Government, from the theory of Republican liberty itself, and from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods and of all parties and opinions. They think, too, that, as the general rule, the representatives of the people sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently, more discreetly, may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employments and the interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes and rejects, than is within the competence of the executive department of the Government.

To follow, not to lead; to fulfill, not to ordain the law; to carry into effect, by negotiation and compact with foreign governments, the legislative will, when it has been announced, upon the great subjects of trade and revenue; not to interpose with controlling influence, not to go forward with too ambitious enterprise—these seem to the committee to be the appropriate functions of the Executive.

Holding this to be the general rule upon the subject, the committee discern nothing in the circumstances of this case, nothing in the object to be attained or in the difficulties in the way of obtaining it, which should induce a departure from this rule. If Congress think the proposed arrangement a beneficial one, it is quite easy to pass a law which shall impose the rates of duty contemplated by it, to take effect when satisfactory information is conveyed to the President that the stipulated equivalents are properly secured.

Upon this single ground, then, the committee advise that the treaty be rejected. It may help to reconcile the Senate to this conclusion if they add that they do not regard the stipulated concessions of the foreign contracting power as in any degree equivalent to the considerations by which we obtain them. * * *

[1] Senate Executive Journal, 1841–1845, pp. 333–334.

On June 15, 1844, by a vote of yeas 26, nays 18, the treaty was laid on the table.

On February 26, 1845,[1] the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom had been referred a message of the President, submitting arguments as to the merits of the convention rather than as to the constitutionality of the question involved, made a second report,[2] in which was reiterated the reason of the former report, and which then continues:

The committee have experienced no change of these views. The fact of the President and Senate being invested with authority to control Congress in a sphere so appropriate to its jurisdiction furnishes no sufficient cause for the exertion of the authority, unless for peculiar reason of injury to be avoided or advantage realized which legislation may not reach with the same facility or effect. Retaliatory regulation, when required, for example, may be best arranged or obviated by treaties. In such cases the cooperation of Congress may always be expected, with no impairment of harmony between the departments.

The question has been debated how far Congress would be bound to give effect, in cases requiring its cooperation, to regulations by treaty on subjects put within its express province by the Constitution. Whichever may be the better opinion, the doubt supplies reason enough against putting the question to trial in other circumstances than those in which the concurrence of Congress may be safely assumed. And the reason is the stronger for this forbearance from the fact that in the contingency of conflict it would be not the interests only, but the faith, too, of the nation which might be compromised, as this would have been committed by the adoption of the treaty regulations.

The condition of the Government at this point is of peculiar delicacy as regards the arrangement of its imposts. Parties have been arrayed with vehemence and the greatest sensibility awakened on the subject. Regulation by treaty in these circumstances would doubtless be carried into effect by the House of Representatives. But the temper in which the supposed intrusion might be expected to be received would be anything but cordial or placid. Ought not the occasion to be considerable, the motive urgent, to warrant the exercise of the authority at this cost? This is a topic requiring only to be displayed, not dwelt on.

It is further to be considered, if we were to have separate regulation of duties with the various powers which might invite or desire this course of action, how inconveniently diversified and mottled our tariff system might soon become, whilst we should be precluded from simplifying and restoring it to uniformity and symmetry by engagements we were not at liberty to retire from, or which we could only retract at the hazard of disturbing harmony and possibly inciting changes of tariff unfavorable to our interests.

We have at this time treaty stipulations with twenty-one foreign States, engaging that their articles of produce or manufacture, respectively, shall be liable to the payment of no higher or other duties on importation into the United States than shall be payable on the like articles from other countries. We say that this pledge does not preclude us from changes of our rates of duty for equivalents without letting other powers to participation, unless in the render of the same equivalents by these other powers. Let this view be granted to be correct. Is it not true, nevertheless, that others might be found to contest this construction, and, whilst they could not prevail on us to abandon it, might still seek occasion of dissatisfaction on our refusal, possibly to the extreme of introducing change to our disadvantage in their tariffs? The consequence may not be hazarded on light inducements in any event.

If we make regulations of reduction and favor in regard to articles from a foreign country, unless (the instances of which are rare) they are peculiar to that country, the operation will not be confined to these articles, but extend to 0 of the same class from all countries, or, it may be, have the effect to derange the established channels of trade, not in these classes of articles only, but much larger classes in connection with these, as having formed their associates in importation from the same country. The committee do not feel required to expand and assign their full development to views of this character. They regard it their duty, however, to bring them to the attention of the Senate, for a better and wiser consideration, with the expression of the opinion that they are worthy of that consideration. The effect of granting reductions of impost on the revenue of the country is, in this view, not to be confined to the mere estimate of the articles to be introduced from the country with which the stipulation for the reduction has been made. The reduction must affect the articles of the same claw from all countries, and, of course, the revenue which the duties on them will afford.

Such, in a condensed form, are the views which the committee entertain as regards the general question of the propriety and policy of interference by regulations of treaty with the tariff arrangements of the Government. The power under the Constitution to interfere is not contested. The possible occurrence of occasions in which it may be advisable to exert it is not disputed. But the opinion is intended to be expressed that the occasions should be marked by the promise of very superior advantage, or lie out of the convenient reach of the exertion of the ordinary power of Congress.

1533. Discussion by a Senate committee as to the jurisdiction of the Senate over revenue treaties.

Provisions of the tariff act of 1897 in reference to reciprocity treaties.

On December 15, 1902,[1] the Senate removed the injunction of secrecy from the following report made at the preceding session by Mr. S. M. Cullom,[2] of Illinois, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, having adopted the following report of a subcommittee appointed to consider the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate to act upon the reciprocity treaties now pending in that body, submits the same for the consideration of the Senate.

The subcommittee to whom was referred the question whether the Senate has jurisdiction to act upon the reciprocity treaties transmitted to the Senate, and now pending in that body, begs leave respectfully to report as follows:

Section 4 of the tariff act of 1897, commonly known as the Dingley Act, provides

"SEC. 4. That whenever the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with foreign countries, shall, within the period of two years from and after the passage of this act, enter into commercial treaty or treaties with any other country or countries concerning the admission into any such country or countries of the goods, wares, and merchandise of the United States and their use and disposition therein, deemed to be for the interests of the United States, and in such treaty or treaties, in consideration of the advantages accruing to the United States therefrom, shall provide for the reduction during a specified period, not exceeding five years, of the duties imposed by this act, to the extent of not more than twenty per centum thereof, upon such goods, wares, or merchandise as may be designated therein of the country or countries with which such treaty or treaties shall be made as in this section provided for; or shall provide for the transfer during such period from the dutiable list of this act to the free list thereof of such goods, wares, and merchandise, being the natural products of such foreign country or countries, and not of the United States; or shall provide for the retention upon the free list of this act during a specified period, not exceeding five years, of such goods, wares, and merchandise now included in said free list as may be designated therein; and when any such treaty shall have been duly ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress, and public proclamation made accordingly, then and thereafter the duties which shall be collected by the United States upon any of the designated goods, wares, and merchandise from the foreign country with which such treaty has been made shall, during the period provided for, be the duties specified and provided for in such treaty, and none other."

It will be observed that the treaties contemplated by this section are those which the President of the United States, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with foreign countries, shall enter into within the period of two years from and after the passage of this act," such treaties to be operative if they shall provide for a reduction of duties imposed by the act during a specified period, not exceeding five years, and to an extent of not more than 20 per cent. The section contains other similar limitations.

The act was approved July 24, 1897. The pending treaties were negotiated by the President and transmitted to the Senate within two years from the passage of the act, but have not been ratified by the Senate within the time limited by section 4, although the time fixed by the treaties for the exchange of ratifications has been extended by agreement between the parties thereto.

It is difficult to discover the theory upon which this section was drawn. It certainly was not drawn upon the theory that such treaties require, as a condition precedent to their becoming effective, the approval of Congress, and that the act gave conditionally that approval in advance, for the section provides that when such treaties shall have been duly ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress, and proclamation made accordingly, then and thereafter the duties which shall be collected, etc., * * * shall be the duties specified and provided for in such treaty, and none other.

The single question submitted to the subcommittee for examination and report is whether the treaties not having been ratified by the Senate within two years from July 24, 1897, are still within its jurisdiction.

Section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The President and the Senate are, under the Constitution, the treaty-making power. The initiative lies with the President. He can negotiate such treaties as may seem to him wise, and propose them to the Senate for the advice and consent of that body, which is as free and independent in its action upon the same as the President is in exercising his power of initiative and negotiation.

The power of the President and the Senate is derived from the Constitution. There is under our system no other source of treaty-making power. The Congress is without power to grant to the President or to the Senate any authority in respect of treaties, nor does the Congress possess any power to fetter or limit in any way the President or the Senate in the exercise of this constitutional function. It can not enlarge or in any wise limit or attach conditions to the exercise of the treaty-making power.

Whether the treaty is one which is self-executing, or one which requires legislation by the Congress to give it effect, it must first in any event be negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate. Whether he will negotiate a treaty and when, and what its terms shall be, are matters committed by the Constitution entirely to the discretion of the President, and whether the Senate will advise and consent to it, with or without amendment, is a matter committed entirely to the discretion of the Senate.

If a treaty be such as to require legislative action, and when entered into by the President and ratified by the Senate does not meet the approval of Congress, it has the power to withhold the legislation requisite to give it effect, but with the preliminary steps of negotiation and ratification the Congress has nothing whatever, under the Constitution, to do.

The subcommittee is clearly of the opinion therefore that nothing contained in section 4 constitutes any valid restriction upon the jurisdiction and power of the Senate to act upon the commercial treaties now pending.

Whether such treaties operate without the approval of Congress, to change tariff duties theretofore fixed by law, is a question not involved, and upon which the subcommittee expresses no opinion.

The fact that the Senate as a legislative body concurred with the House of Representatives in the enactment of the tariff act of 1897, including section 4, is without weight upon the subject, for the obvious reason that it is impossible for the Senate by participation, deliberate or inadvertent, as a legislative body in such an enactment to disable itself in the slightest degree from exercising the power conferred upon it by the Constitution to act upon treaties negotiated by the Executive.

It is entirely competent for the Senate to amend these treaties so as to provide that they shall not take effect without the approval of Congress. Several treaties have thus provided, among others that with the Hawaiian Government in 1876. Such an amendment can not be objected to by the governments which have entered into these treaties with the United States, because they were known to be entered into with reference to the provisions of section 4.

The subcommittee therefore recommend, without reference to the merits thereof, that each of said treaties be amended by the Senate by inserting therein the following additional provision:

"This treaty shall not take effect until the same shall have been approved by the Congress."

1534. Even in the case of an application for papers relating to an Indian treaty, President Jackson asserted the Executive prerogative as opposed to the contention of the House.—In 1832 the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed by a resolution of the House to inquire concerning the lease of a certain tract of land reserved by treaty with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians. In the course of this investigation the committee called on the Secretary of War for a copy of a certain treaty with these Indians and a copy of the journal of the commissioners negotiating the treaty and such other papers as might be in the Department touching the subject before the committee. The committee accompanied their request with the statement that it was made subject to the judgment of the President as to whether or not the communication could be made without injury to the public service.

On March 2, 1832,[1] Secretary of War Lewis Cass transmitted the information required, but accompanied this with an exposition of the views of President Jackson, who did not wish this compliance to be made a precedent. The Secretary says:

> The Constitution has assigned to the different departments of the Government their appropriate duties. To the President and Senate it has given the treaty-making power. And although there is, in many important particulars an obvious difference between the treaties concluded with the civilized nations of the world and the compacts formed with the various Indian tribes, subject to the jurisdiction of the General Government or of the respective States, still the latter, as well as the former, have, by the usage of the Government since its establishment, been negotiated and ratified by the same authority and under the same general provision of the Constitution, and many of them expressly require the action of the Senate.
> The same principle, therefore, which regulates one of these subjects must regulate the other whenever any question arises involving the exercise of an authority connected with either. Upon the preservation of the Constitution, as well in its partition of duties as in its limitations upon their exercise, depends, in the opinion of the President, the stability of this Government which the people have established.
> In considering the application made by the committee the President does not perceive that a copy of any part of the incomplete and unratified treaty of 1830 can be "relative to any purpose under the cognizance of the House of Representatives, except that of impeachment, which the resolution has not expressed." If this quotation, which gives the view taken of this subject by General Washington in his message to the House of Representatives of March 30, 1796, applied to the circumstances of a call for the papers relating to a ratified treaty in the process of execution, and for the faithful performance of which an appropriation was required, it will apply with much more force to the present application, which calls for a paper that will be wholly inoperative until the parties have again met and completed their arrangements, which at present gives no rights, and can "change" none, and which has not and ought not yet be submitted to the coordinate branch of the treaty-making power for their concurrence.
> That circumstances may not yet arise in which the papers relating to a ratified or an unratified treaty should be transmitted to either House of Congress upon their application the President is not prepared to deny; more particularly when such ratified "treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to either House of Congress," and when "it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress."
> Such are the views of the President upon this subject—a subject connected with the relative duties of the executive and legislative departments of the Government and which may hereafter involved, as it has heretofore involved, consequences of the highest importance. He is therefore anxious that his sentiments upon the general subject, not less than the reasons of his course in this particular case, should be distinctly made known and understood. Precedents established for good purposes are easily perverted to bad ones, and while, therefore, he assents to the application which has been made in this particular case, he does so under his own views of its peculiar circumstances, and not because the committee has a right to call for the information or he is bound to furnish it.

[1] House Report No. 488, pp. 14, 15, first session Twenty-second Congress.

1535. After long discussion the House, in 1871, successfully asserted its right to a voice in approving Indian treaties.—In a report made to the House on July 20, 1842,[1] by the Committee on Indian Affairs[2] the committee discussed the nature of treaties with the Indians as related to the power of the House over such subjects:

There is scarcely a point of resemblance between the relations of this Government with an Indian tribe and a foreign independent nation. The Indian tribes are not regarded as foreign nations by the Constitution, for, amongst the enumeration of the powers of Congress by that instrument there is one which gives it authority "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Our relations with these tribes and the business of negotiating with them is not entrusted to the Department of State, whose duty it is to conduct negotiations with foreign Governments. By the act of Congress which established the War Department the execution of all duties relating to our Indian affairs was devolved upon it. The laws of the United States for many purposes extend over and are in force in the Indian Territory. No person is permitted to trade in the Indian country without a license from the superintendent of Indian affairs. The President may prohibit the introduction of goods or of any particular article into the country belonging to any Indian tribe either by citizens of the United States, foreigners, or any other tribe. The whole of the country occupied by the tribes who have removed west of the Mississippi is annexed to the judicial district of the United States to which it is contiguous. The jurisdiction of our courts extends to crimes committed in the Indian country, and Congress has always claimed to exercise the power of protecting the Indians. Indeed, the Indian tribes can not in any sense be regarded as independent nations, the wardship exercised over them by the Government of the United States being entirely incompatible with their independence. There is no reason, therefore, for regarding our negotiations with them in the light and subject to the rules which prevail in relation to the treaties negotiated with foreign nations.

1536. In 1870[3] the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 1169) failed because of adherence by both House and Senate after two unsuccessful conferences. The point of difference was the refusal of the House to appropriate to carry out the stipulations of certain treaties. The House took the ground that the Indian treaties did not stand on the same grounds under the Constitution as did the treaties with foreign nations. In short, the House denied the right of the President and Senate to bind the Government by a treaty with Indians. The Senate held that the right had been recognized by the House and the Supreme Court from the organization of the Government until the present Congress, and declined to yield what it conceived to be one of its prerogatives.

A new bill was then passed in the House (H. R. 2413) without provision for payment of certain treaty stipulations. The Senate amended it in accordance with their contention, and a disagreement arose, which in the last hours of the session was composed by a provision of the conference report as follows:

That nothing in this act contained, or in any of the provisions thereof shall be construed as to ratify, approve, or disaffirm any treaty made with said tribes, bands, or parties of Indians, since the 20th of July, 1867, or affirm or disaffirm any of the powers of the Executive and Senate over the subject.

Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, said in presenting the report that it merely postponed the question at issue. The report was agreed to, and the bill became a law.[4]

The conflict between the two Houses was renewed in 1871, when the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 2615) came up for consideration. The difficulties were submitted to a conference composed, on the part of the House, of Messrs. Aaron A. Sargent, of California; James B. Beck, of Kentucky, and Sidney Clarke, of Kansas. On the part of the Senate the conferees were Messrs. Cornelius Cole, of California; James Harlan, of Iowa, and John P. Stockton, of New Jersey.

On March 1 they agreed to a conference report, which all the conferees signed, and which included, among other provisions, the following:

> That hereafter no Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to invalidate or impair the obligation of any treaty heretofore lawfully made and ratified with any such Indian nation or tribe.

In the Senate the report was assailed by Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, and others as a surrender of a great principle, but the report was agreed to in both Houses without division.[1]

1537. The meaning of a treaty may not be controlled by subsequent explanations sanctioned by a majority vote only of the Senate.—In the case of Fourteen Diamond Rings v. The United States,[2] Chief Justice Fuller, in delivering the opinion of the court, discussed the following joint resolution, which had been passed by the Senate:

> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.[3]

The Chief Justice says:

> But it is said that the case of the Philippines is to be distinguished from that of Porto Rico because on February 14, 1899, after the ratification of the treaty, the Senate resolved that it was not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippines into citizenship of the United States nor to permanently annex those islands.
> We need not consider the force and effect of a resolution of this sort, if adopted by Congress, not like that of April 20, 1898, in respect of Cuba, preliminary to the declaration of war, but after title had passed by ratified cession. It is enough that this was a joint resolution; that it was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 26 to 22, not two-thirds of a quorum; and that it is absolutely without legal significance on the question before us. The meaning of the treaty can not be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of those who may have voted to ratify it. What view the House might have taken as to the intention of the Senate in ratifying the treaty we are not informed, nor is it material; and if any implication from the action referred to could properly be indulged, it would seem to be that two-thirds of a quorum of the Senate did not consent to the ratification on the grounds indicated.

Chapter XLIX.

PREROGATIVES OF THE HOUSE AS TO FOREIGN RELATIONS.

1538. In 1811 the House originated and the Senate agreed to a resolution declaring the attitude of the United States on a question of foreign policy.

Instance wherein two Members; of the House were directed to take a confidential message to the Senate.

On January 5, 1811,[1] a joint resolution was proposed, which, after amendment was on January 8, engrossed, read a third time, and passed in this form:

Taking into view the present state of the world, the peculiar situation of Spain, and of her American provinces, and the intimate relations of the territory eastward of the River Perdido, adjoining the United States, to their security and tranquility: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States can not see, with indifference, any part of the Spanish provinces adjoining the said States eastward of the River Perdido pass from the hands of Spain into those of any other foreign power.

A committee of two Members of the House was appointed to carry this resolution to the Senate. Their message was received confidentially in the Senate on January 9, and on January 11 it was passed with an amendment, in which the House concurred.[2]

This resolve was enrolled and signed by the President.[3]

1539. The House has declared its "constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new powers as in other matters."—On April 4, 1864,[1] the House originated and passed by a vote of yeas 109, nays 0, a joint resolution as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States are unwilling, by silence, to leave the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the Republic of Mexico; and they therefore think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge a monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America under the auspices of any European power.

This resolution was in the Senate referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and on May 27[2] a motion to discharge the committee failed, yeas 5, nays 23. The Senate, however, sent to the State Department for documents and correspondence relating to affairs in Mexico, and on June 28[3] and 29 considered the propriety of printing them.

On May 23[4] Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, presented the following resolution,, which was agreed to by the House:

Whereas the following announcement appeared in the Moniteur, the official journal of the French Government:

"The Emperor's government has received from that of the United States satisfactory explanations as to the sense and bearing of the resolution come to by the House of Representatives at Washington relative to Mexico. It is known, besides, that the Senate has indefinitely postponed the examination of that question, to which, in any case, the executive power would not have given its sanction."

Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any explanations given by the Government of the United States to the Government of France respecting the sense and bearing of the joint resolution relative to Mexico, which passed the House of Representatives unanimously on the 4th of April, 1864.

On May 25[5] President Lincoln transmitted the correspondence.

This correspondence[6] contained a letter from Wm. H. Seward, Secretary of State, to Wm. L. Dayton, minister to France, transmitting a copy of the resolution of the House, with this explanation:

This is a practical and purely executive question, and the decision of its constitutionality belongs not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States. * * * While the President receives the declaration of the House of Representatives with the profound respect to which it is entitled, as an exposition of its sentiments upon a grave and important subject, he directs that you inform the Government of France that he does not at present contemplate any departure from the policy which this Government has hitherto pursued in regard to the war which exists between France and Mexico.

The correspondence having been referred, Mr. Davis reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on June 27, 1864,[7] the report beginning as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have examined the correspondence submitted by the President relative to the joint resolution on Mexican affairs with the profound respect to which it is entitled, because of the gravity of its subject and the distinguished source from which it emanated.

They regret that the President should have so widely departed from the usage of constitutional governments as to make a pending resolution of so grave and delicate a character the subject of diplomatic explanations. They regret still more that the President should have thought proper to inform a foreign government of a radical and serious conflict of opinion and jurisdiction between the depositories of the legislative and executive power of the United States.

No expression of deference can make the denial of the right of Congress constitutionally to do what the House did with absolute unanimity, other than derogatory to their dignity.

They learn with surprise that in the opinion of the President the form and term of expressing the judgment of the United States on recognizing a monarchial government imposed on a neighboring republic is a "purely executive question, and the decision of it constitutionally belongs not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States."

This assumption is equally novel and inadmissible. No President has ever claimed such an exclusive authority. No Congress can ever permit its expression to pass without dissent.

It is certain that the Constitution nowhere confers such authority on the President.

The precedents of recognition, sufficiently numerous in this revolutionary era, do not countenance this view; and if there be one not inconsistent with it the committee have not found it.

All questions of recognition have heretofore been debated and considered as grave questions of national policy, on which the will of the people should be expressed in Congress assembled, and the President, as the proper medium of foreign intercourse, has executed that will. If he has ever anticipated its expression, we have not found the case.

The declaration and establishment of the Spanish-American colonies first brought the question of the recognition of new governments or nations before the Government of the United States; and the precedents then set have been followed ever since, even by the present Administration.

The correspondence now before us is the first attempt to depart from that usage, and deny the nation a controlling deliberative voice in regulating its foreign policy.

The report then goes on to cite the precedents. First comes the action in the Seventeenth Congress, in 1821 and 1822, led by Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, which resulted in the passage of a bill recognizing the South American governments. President Monroe invited and acquiesced in the participation of Congress in this action.

Again in 1836 the recognition of Texas was preceded by resolutions by the two branches of Congress, and President Jackson, while pointing out that it had not been settled where the power of recognizing new governments lay, expressed the opinion that no issue would arise between the legislative and executive branches, and also that it would seem to be within the spirit of the Constitution and most safe that recognition, when probably leading to war, should be exercised after a previous understanding with the body by whom alone war could be declared.[1] The independence of Texas was recognized by law.

In 1862 the independence of Haiti was recognized by a clause in an appropriation bill.

The report further discusses the attitude of the Administration of John Quincy Adams in relation to the attitude of the United States to the South American republics, and also the action of the Executive and Congress in relation to the Panama mission.

At the conclusion of its report the committee recommended a declaratory resolution.[2] which was not acted on at that time, but on December 15, 1864,[3] Mr.

Davis again reported the resolution from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in form as follows:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States as well in the recognition of new powers as in other matters; and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy, not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law; and the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it; and such proposition, while pending and undetermined, is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign power. * * *

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, moved that the resolution lie on the table, and that motion was agreed to, yeas 69, nays 63. Mr. Davis at once asked to be relieved of his position as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and on this request a debate arose as to the purport of the resolution. He said that at the last session the House had passed a resolution declaratory of the policy of the Government with reference to the republics of America. The resolution had not passed the Senate. Soon after the House acted the Secretary of State had virtually apologized to the French Government for the action of the House and had impeached the authority of Congress to interfere in the foreign affairs of the Government.

On December 19 Mr. Davis presented the resolution again, and after modifying it by using the words "Executive Departments" instead of "President" the subject was brought to a vote by a motion to lay the resolution on the table. This resolution was disagreed to, yeas 50, nays 73. The first branch of the resolution down to and including the words "authorized by law" was then agreed to, yeas 119, nays 8. The remainder was agreed to, yeas 68, nays 59.

1540. The joint resolution of 1898 declaring the intervention of the United States to remedy conditions existing in the island of Cuba originated in the House.—In April, 1898,[1] the House originated a joint resolution which, after amendment by the Senate, was passed in this form and approved by the President on April 20, 1898: [1]

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with two hundred and sixty-six of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Habana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

1541. The House has usually had a voice in the recognition of the independence of a foreign nation, when such recognition has affected relations with another power.—On April 4, 1820,[1] in Committee of the Whole, House on the state of the Union, Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky (the Speaker), submitted this resolution:[2]

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law a suitable outfit and salary for such minister or ministers as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any of the Governments of South America which have established and are maintaining their independence of Spain.

On May 10[3] the resolution was debated in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to by the House, yeas 80, nays 75.

1542.—On February 9, 1821,[4] during the consideration of the general appropriation bill, Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, offered in the House the following amendment:

For an outfit and one year's salary to such minister as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any Government of South America which has established and is maintaining its independency of Spain a sum not exceeding eighteen thousand dollars.

This proposed amendment had been offered in Committee of the Whole on February 6, and after long debate had been decided in the negative, 77 to 73. It was debated again in the House when Mr. Clay offered it to the bill as reported. It was urged that a similar measure the last session had not resulted in any action of the Executive, and that in this case also the money, if appropriated, would lie idly in the Treasury. It was objected also that the amendment was improper as tending to embarrass the Executive. The vote being taken, the amendment was disagreed to, yeas 79, nays 86.

On February 10 Mr. Clay offered in the House this resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America, which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence; and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said provinces.

The propriety of this resolution was debated at length. It was opposed as an improper interference on the part of the House in Executive functions, and the last clause was criticized as conceding to the Executive alone a power which belonged rather to him in conjunction with Congress.

The two clauses of the resolution were divided for the vote, and the first was agreed to, yeas 134, nays 12. The second was agreed to, yeas 87, nays 68. The whole resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. Clay and Mr. Allen were appointed a committee to present the resolution to the President.

On February 19 Mr. Clay reported "that the committee had, according to order, presented the resolution to the President; that the President assured the committee that, in common with the people of the United States and the House of Representatives, he felt great interest in the success of the provinces of Spanish America which are struggling to establish their freedom and independence; and that he would take the resolution into deliberate consideration, with the most perfect respect for the distinguished body from which it had emanated."

1543. On March 28, 1822,[1] the House, with 1 negative vote, agreed to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President, in his message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain, which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognized by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum, not exceeding $100,000, to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition.

1544. On July 4, 1836,[2] the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives perceive with satisfaction that the President of the United States has adopted measures to ascertain the political, military, and civil condition of Texas.

The resolutions were agreed to by the House, the former, yeas 128, nays 20; the latter, yeas 113, nays 22.

1545. Arguments in the Senate that the power of recognizing foreign governments is vested in the President.—On December 18, 1903,[3] in the Senate, Mr. John T. Morgan, of Alabama, proposed the following resolutions, which were a subject of debate rather than action in the Senate:

Resolved, That neither the President, nor the President and the Senate as the treaty-making power of the United States, has the lawful power to wage or declare war against any foreign power without the consent of Congress, when such country is at peace with the United States, and when its diplomatic relations with the United States are unbroken, and when its diplomatic representatives are recognized by the President as the representatives of a friendly power. And the consent of the Senate, as a part of the treaty-making power, to a war waged by the President against such a nation, under such circumstances, can not confer upon him such lawful authority under the Constitution of the United States, or under the laws of nations, or under the neutrality law of the United States.

2. That a state of war exists between Colombia as an organization in the Colombian Department of Panama that claims to have accomplished the secession of Panama from Colombia and to have established its independence and sovereignty through the recognition of the President of the United States and of some European and Asiatic states; and that claims also to have established a republic under the flag and the name and title of the Republic of Panama. And Colombia refuses to recognize the validity of the act of secession and the independence or the sovereignty of any government so organized on the Isthmus of Panarna, and is engaged in military and naval operations to assert and enforce her claim of the supreme right of government in and over the territory described in her laws and constitution as the Department of Panama.

[2] First session Twenty-fourth Congress, Journal, pp. 1218–1220; Debates, p. 4621.

[3] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 361.

3. That, if Colombia is not prevented by some powerful foreign nation, she is manifestly able to maintain her present effort to repress the said secession organization and to restore her sovereignty over said Department of Panama. And the President of the United States having entered into treaty relations with the persons who claim to have seceded from Colombia and assert the powers of supreme government in and over the territory included in such Department of Panama, and having made agreements with the secessionists relating to the right and privilege of constructing and owning in perpetuity a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama, all based on the following stipulation, namely:

"The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama."

Said stipulation is in effect a declaration of war with Colombia, and is not within the limits of any power conferred upon the President by act of Congress or the Constitution, or by the laws of nations.

4. That the President has no lawful right or power, without the consent of Congress, and under the conditions that exist in Panama, to use the military and naval forces of the United States to prevent Colombia from enforcing her claim to the proper exercise of her sovereignty and to execute her laws in the Department of Panama by any form of coercion that is consistent with the laws of nations and is not in conflict with any right of the United States.

5. That the Senate repeats its resolution of 1889, in the following words:

"Resolved, etc., That the Government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of any European government with the construction or control of any ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America, and must regard any such connection or control as injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States and as a menace to their welfare.

"SEC. 2. That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate this expression of the views of the Government of the United States to the governments of the countries of Europe."

6. That the United States, in the Revised Statutes, has defined neutrality and the penalties for its violation as follows:

"SEC. 5286. Every person who, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begins, or sets on foot, or provides or prepares the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, shall be deemed guilty of high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $3,000 and imprisoned not more than three years."

The intervention by the President, with armed forces of the United States, and without the authority of Congress, to prevent the exercise of military or civil authority by Colombia, with whom we are at peace, for the assertion or exercise of her sovereignty and the enforcement of her constitution and laws over the Department of Panama is contrary to said law of neutrality enacted by the Congress of the United States, and is contrary to the laws of nations.

On December 19[1] this resolution was debated by Mr. Edmund W. Pettus, of Alabama.

On January 4, 1904,[2] the resolution was generally debated, among others by Mr. Louis E. McComas, of Maryland, who said:

Mr. President, I emphatically take that position which has so often been taken by this Government from its earliest history. Our Supreme Court looks alone to the Executive for the recognition of all new governments. That is true in the judicature of all the great nations; but in a republic like our tripartite division of power it is the essential thing that the Executive should have the power of recognition; that the courts should follow the Executive, and that Congress at intervals in session should follow the Executive. I answer with great confidence that it is a question for the Executive, and the President properly put it in the conclusion of his admirable message when he said:

"In conclusion, let me repeat that the question actually before this Government is not that of the recognition of Panama as an independent republic. That is already an accomplished fact. The question, and the only question, is whether or not we shall build an isthmian canal."

The question whether or not a de facto government be recognized by our Government and enter into relations with it is a question for the Executive. The question of the recognition of a de facto government likely to endure is an Executive question pure and simple, and is necessarily exclusively an Executive question, and as much so in our country as in other countries where the same rule also obtains.

Story and John Randolph Tucker well state the reasons why the President is properly vested with the power to determine whether the representatives of an insurgent power shall be recognized. He can do nothing more than to give official recognition, but that official recognition, in case of a dismemberment by revolution, is binding upon the courts, and the President will have to answer for the wisdom of the decision. Mr. Tucker well states the strong reasons why this power in the President must be exclusive of any like power in the Senate.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, I said that the new Republic of Panama is the child of a revolution, as is our Government and that of every government on this hemisphere to the south of us. It is idle, therefore, to criticise the promptness of our recognition of that Government by the United States. A document I have here, but will not read, contains the long roll of the recognitions by this Government of other governments from its foundation until a recent date. It is a long roll of prompt and speedy recognitions, and it shows what might be expected, that the United States has been swift, wherever it safely could, to recognize in this world a new republic.

Mr. Fish, our Secretary of State, telegraphed our minister, Mr. Washburn, to recognize the French Republic, not waiting until the provinces had been heard from, but as soon as Gambetta and his friends had proclaimed it in the Hotel de Ville in Paris. So earnest were we that, although that Government was disputed and war to crush it followed, bloody and monumental in its cruelty, three telegrams bad gone from our Secretary of State under President Grant, recognizing the Republic when war against the Republic was impending by the Commune in Paris.

Mr. Blaine telegraphed Mr. Adams, now an honored Member of the other House, then our minister at Brazil, on the second day of the existence of the Republic of Brazil, to recognize that Republic.

On January 5,[1] Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, gave an exhaustive review of the precedents of the State Department as to the recognition of new governments:

My proposition now is as to the recognition of a state and government. That I hold to be an Executive function. The precedents are uniform to a most extraordinary degree. The position has been held by every Secretary of State, I think, without exception; it has been held by the Supreme Court in the cases I have read that the Executive recognition is the only recognition admitted by the courts, and I do not think it is possible to go beyond that. If I was guilty of an inconsistency with that doctrine when I voted for the resolution that the Cubans are and of right ought to be free and independent, I plead guilty, and do not think it is a matter of much consequence. I do not think it was a recognition of any state or government. So that I do not precisely see that it touches my argument the least in the world or is in the least inconsistent with the doctrine laid down by all the authorities.

The other method of recognition in the Constitution is by the clause which gives the President the right to nominate ambassadors, ministers, and consuls. Recognition has almost invariably occurred in what Mr. John Quincy Adams pointed out to be the best and most proper way—the reception of a minister from the state seeking independence—but the power of the President to nominate a minister where no such office bad been created by Congress and which, therefore, implies his ability to recognize in that way, has been established beyond a doubt.

I have heard the right of the President to nominate a minister to Panama questioned because no such office had been created by Congress, and I thought it would not be amiss to call the attention of the Senate to the practice in that respect.

On December 22, 1791, President Washington sent a message to the Senate nominating Gouveneur Morris, Thomas Pinckney, and William Short as ministers to Paris, London, and The Hague, respectively. There were no provisions of law for any such officers.

Various motions declaring that there was no need for these missions were debated and were rejected, and the nominations of Morris and Pinckney were confirmed.

[1] Record, pp. 459–469.

A similar motion was made that there was no occasion for a minister to The Hague, and that was postponed until the following Monday, when it was taken up and defeated, and immediately after the nomination of a minister to The Hague was confirmed.

On the 16th of April, 1794, Washington nominated John Jay as envoy extraordinary to Great Britain. Mr. Pinckney was minister plenipotentiary, but he was not envoy extraordinary, which office did not exist.

President Washington therefore nominated Mr. Jay to an office which had no existence. He was confirmed by the Senate. On the 6th of February, 1799, John Adams nominated Rufus King minister to Russia. No such office existed. He said in the nominating message that it was to open relations with Russia. No action was taken, and the Russian mission was not established until 1809, 1 think, when Mr. John Quincy Adams was sent.

On the 29th day of May, 1813, Mr. Madison nominated a, minister to Sweden to open diplomatic relations with that country. No such office had been created by Congress.

John Adams sent in the names of Ellsworth and Patrick Henry to be commissioners to France in conjunction with William Vans Murray. No such offices existed.

On the 11th of January, 1803, Jefferson nominated Livingston to negotiate with France, and Charles Pinckney to negotiate with Spain in conjunction with Monroe. No such offices existed.

Of course, Mr. President, with the extension of our diplomatic service cases of nominating to offices for which there is no appropriation have practically disappeared, but the cases which I have cited—of Washington, John Adams, and Madison—show that the men most familiar with the Constitution in its early days conceived that they had an entire right to nominate a minister to a country where there was no provision for a mission made by Congress and that the Senate in all instances confirmed those nominations just as if an appropriation had been made, thereby recognizing the right of the President. It is a method by which recognition could be extended. It is a method which, in practice, has not been used at all lately for that purpose, because very naturally the reception of the minister or ambassador of the state seeking recognition has been the obvious way to meet it.

Mr. President, I have tried to lay down the general international law; I have tried to show the general practice of the Government of the United States and the precedents which we have had in regard to it. Having shown, as I believe, that all the authorities hold that recognition is an Executive function which can not be invaded or diminished by the legislative body; that whatever dangers it may carry, the Constitution has placed it in Executive hands, I now come to the exercise of that right in the present case of Panama. The right of the President to recognize being demonstrated by law and precedent, I wish to inquire whether that undoubted right has been properly exercised in this particular case.

1546. In 1825 the House, after long debate, made an unconditional appropriation for the expenses of the ministers to the Panama Congress.

Discussion as to the right of the House to withhold an appropriation to pay the expenses of diplomatic agents appointed by the Executive.

In 1825 the House, after long discussion, declined to make a declaration of policy or give express approval of a diplomatic service instituted by the President.

Discussion of the prerogatives of the House in relation to treaties, commercial and otherwise.

On December 6, 1825,[1] in his annual message to Congress President John Quincy Adams referred to the independence of the South American Republics, and said:

Among the measures which have been suggested to them by the new relations with one another, resulting from the recent changes in their condition, is that of assembling at the Isthmus of Panama a congress, at which each of them shall be represented, to deliberate upon objects important to the welfare of all. The Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America have already deputed plenipotentiaries to such a meeting, and they have invited the United States to be also represented there by their ministers. The invitation has been accepted, and ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned to attend at those deliberations and to take part in them so far as may be compatible from that neutrality from which it is neither our intention nor the desire of other American States that we should depart.

The House having adopted a resolution inquiring of the President in regard to the character and objects of the proposed mission, on March 17, 1826,[1] the President transmitted to the House a lengthy explanation, at the conclusion of which he said:

The concurrence of the House to the measure, by the appropriations necessary for carrying it into effect, is alike subject to its free determination and indispensable to the fulfillment of the intention. * * * With this unrestricted exposition of the motives by which I have been governed in this transaction, as well as of the objects to be discussed and of the ends, if possible, to be attained by our representation at the proposed congress, I submit the propriety of an appropriation to the candid consideration and enlightened patriotism of the Legislature.

By a message transmitted the same day the President also submitted the propriety of making an appropriation for carrying into effect the appointment of the mission.

The former message was committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the latter to the Committee on Ways and Means.

On March 25[2] both committees reported. The Committee on Ways and Means reported a bill making an appropriation for the mission. The Committee on Foreign Affairs reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send ministers to the congress of Panama.

Both reports were committed to Committees of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs began on April 3,[3] when Mr. Louis McLane, of Delaware, offered an amendment expressing the sense of the House as to what the ministers ought and ought not to do. In the progress of the debate, which lasted until April 20, Mr. McLane, at the suggestion of various Members, modified his amendment until it reached this final form,[4] which it was proposed to add to the resolution reported by the committee:

The House, however, in expressing this opinion do not intend to sanction any departure from the settled policy of this Government; that in extending our commercial relations with foreign nations we should have with them as little political connection as possible, and that we should preserve peace, commerce, and friendship with all nations and form entangling alliances with none. It is therefore the opinion of this House that the Government of the United States ought not to be represented at the congress of Panama except in a diplomatic character, nor ought they to form any alliance, offensive or defensive, or negotiate respecting such an alliance with all or any of the Spanish-American Republics, nor ought they to become parties with them, or either of them, to any joint declaration for the purpose of preventing the interference of any of the European powers with their independence or form of government or to any compact for the purpose of preventing colonization upon the continent of America, but that the people of the United States should be left free to act in any crisis in such a manner as their feelings of friendship toward these Republics and as their own honor and policy may at the time dictate.

The debate, which was protracted until April 21,[1] centered to a large extent around the question of the House's constitutional powers, and related, first, to the propriety of the amendment and, second, to the right of the House to refuse the appropriation.

There was a diversity of opinion as to whether or not the President, by the language of his message, had invited the House to decide as to the propriety of the mission.

Those who argued in favor of the amendment contended that it did not amount to an instruction to diplomatic agents, but was a proper expression of opinion by the House. The House had always exercised the right of expressing its opinion on great questions, either foreign or domestic, and such expressions were never thought to be improper interferences with the Executive.[2] It was recalled that in the early days of the Government, when the President made an annual speech to Congress instead of sending a message, opinions on all questions of moment were expressed in the addresses which the House adopted in reply to the President. Since the abandonment of that practice Congress had spoken generally by the acts recorded on the statute book; but on extraordinary occasions, in accordance with the usages of the British Commons as exemplified recently by the resolution beseeching the King to negotiate for the suppression of the slave trade, the House had considered and often adopted resolutions expressive of opinions.[3] Thus, there were the two resolutions of Mr. Clay relating to the opening of diplomatic relations with the South American republics; Mr. Trimble's resolution relating to the same general subject; the resolution recommending negotiations for the suppression of the slave trade, which brought the President and Senate into collision, causing the President to come to the House for instructions which the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not favor; Mr. Webster's resolution at the last session relating to diplomatic relations with Greece, and the request that the President open negotiations for the cession of Abaco. It was also urged that the power of the House to appropriate for the expenses of the mission carried with it the right to impose conditions.

In opposition to the amendment, it was observed that, while the House had an undoubted right to express its general opinion in regard to questions of foreign policy, in this case it was proposed to decide what should be discussed by particular ministers already appointed. If such instructions might be furnished by the House in this case, they might be furnished in all, thus usurping the prerogative of the Executive.[4] Such action would infringe on the treaty-making power, and was not in harmony with the precedent of 1796. Moreover, independent of the constitutional objection, the House was too numerous a body to interpose in foreign negotiations, which required secrecy and despatch.[5] The assertion that the House might qualify its appropriation with conditions overlooked the fundamental fact that the House had no gifts of its own to give, but was rather the steward over a trust fund.[1] Furthermore, the House should not give instructions which it could not enforce. If it should be admitted that the President was bound to obey the House, he must also be bound to obey the Senate. And suppose the Senate and House should give incompatible instructions? The House had not been wont to express itself on matters of diplomacy in other than general terms, and it would be noted that the resolutions of Mr. Clay in regard to the South American Republics were much more guarded than that now before the House.[2]

As to the right of the House to refuse the appropriation there were also two opinions. It was maintained on the one side that the House, in matters relating to diplomatic intercourse and treaties, was not held simply to carry out the will of the President and the Senate by consenting to the appropriation of the necessary money. A refusal to appropriate would be justified by the Constitution and the precedents, and might afford a salutary check on the action of the President and the Senate. A treaty requiring the aid of Congress to carry it into effect did not become the supreme law of the land until it had the sanction of Congress. And it was the right and duty of the House, in such a case, to deliberate, and withhold the legislation, if necessary. If the House was merely to register the edicts of other branches of the Government the President and Senate might send ministers to every petty principality and negotiate and ratify treaties of the utmost importance, without the House being able to express its will. The power of the President and the Senate to make laws by means of treaties would be indefinite, and might even involve the country in war. It was true that the Constitution was mandatory as to the duty of Congress to pay the compensation of the President and the courts, but it was not equally mandatory as to the payment of the compensation of ministers.[3] It was pointed out that the precedent of 1796 related to a treaty already made. There was a difference between appropriating to carry out a promise made by a minister and appropriating to send a minister to make a promise. In the present case the question was as to the Diplomatic Corps, and the authorization of a new and important policy. The agents to be sent to Panama were not ministers as known to the law of nations and contemplated by the Constitution. Surely the House might be consulted in a case like this, and might express its opinion by withholding the appropriation.[4] The treaty making and legislative powers were inseparably blended. Besides the examples already given of declarations by the House as to matters belonging to the treaty making power, there was the law of March 3, 1815, proposing to foreign nations a repeal of discriminating impost and tonnage duties. This was a declaration of legislative will on a subject within the treaty-making power.[5] Again, in 1798, Congress, by law, abrogated the treaties of 1778 with France.

Those, who argued that the appropriation should be made called attention to the fact that public ministers were created, not by statute, but by the law of nations, and were recognized by the Constitution as existing. They were appointed by the President and the Senate. Acts of Congress limited their salaries, but did no more. By voting the salaries the House simply empowered another branch of the Government to discharge its own duties. In so voting the House had no responsibility for the conduct of the negotiations. To refuse the appropriation would be to prevent the action of the Government according to constitutional plan. Of course, the House could break up a mission by withholding salaries, as it could break up a court but the House should not, and could not, share Executive duty.[1] The House was morally bound to vote the salaries of ministers duly created by the President and the Senate. The obligation was as strong as it was to carry into effect a treaty. The power to create the minister was contained in the same clause that provided for treaties. The House might not prejudge the determination of the President and Senate in regard to those officers. Their salaries might not be withheld any more than the House might withhold the salaries of the President and Supreme Court. If the salaries were withheld the ministers would be legally appointed and their acts would be valid. Of course the House had the physical power to take such action, and there might be an extreme case where they would be impelled by duty to do it.[2] Thus, if the Army should entertain projects injurious to the country, Congress might, to defeat its objects, withhold its pay. But such extreme suppositions could hardly be admitted in argument. In the case of treaties containing stipulations requiring the exercise of powers vested in the House, such as the regulation of commerce, the House might act as it saw fit. But treaties not touching subjects committed to the discretion of the House should be treated, so far as appropriations to carry them into effect was concerned, as mandatory on the House.[3] It was even contended, further, that the House had no authority whatever in regard to treaties, which might be negotiated and ratified without the knowledge of the House, and that the House, in appropriating to carry out the stipulations, was not justified in weighing the propriety of the expenditure by the principles governing ordinary appropriations. What the House could do and what it should do were of course different matters. It might, by refusing all appropriations, bring the Government to a standstill. But to admit that the power to appropriate carried with it the right to direct diplomatic affairs would be to establish a principle that would concentrate in the House the whole powers of the Government.[4]

On April 20[5] the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. McLane, and it was agreed to, yeas 99, nays 94.

On April 21,[6] on the question of agreeing to the resolution as amended, there were yeas 54, nays 143.

The same day the House began the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the mission to Panama, and on Mr. George MeDuffie's motion to strike out the enacting clause, so as to defeat the bill, there were 61 yeas and 133 nays. On April 22 the bill passed the House, yeas 134, nays 60.[1] This bill (H. R. 180) became a law.[2]

1547. On December 16, 1852[3] Mr. James Hamilton. of South Carolina, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House copies of all such documents or parts of correspondence (not incompatible with the public interest to be communicated) relating to an invitation which has been extended to the Government of this country "by the Republics of Columbia, of Mexico, and of Central America to join in the deliberations of a Congress to be held at the Isthmus of Panama" and which induced him to signify "that ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned to join in those deliberations."

On January 31, 1826,[4] when this resolution was considered, Air. Churchill C. Cambreleng, of New York, suggested that on so important a question the House should be put in possession of all the facts, and therefore asked Mr. Hamilton to strike out the words "Not incompatible with the public interest to be communicated." Mr. Hamilton made the modification of the resolution, but Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, immediately moved that they be inserted. He said, in support of his motion, that in all such calls it was customary in the first instance to limit the call, and he believed it unprecedented to call at once on the President for all the information in his hands on a given subject, without leaving it discretionary with him to withhold such part as the public good might require him to withhold. If the reply should not be satisfactory, the residue might be supplied later in a confidential communication.

Mr. Webster's motion was then agreed to without division, and debate on the resolution was resumed, involving both the general policy of the proposed mission and the propriety of calling for information on a subject in trusted by the Constitution to another department of the Government. On February 2, at the suggestion of Messrs. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, and William C. Rives, of Virginia, the House adopted an amendment adding to the resolution these words:

And, further, to communicate to this House all the information in possession of the Executive Department relative to the objects which the republics of the south propose to accomplish by the Congress of Panama and the powers proposed to be given to the commissioners or ministers of the United States to that Congress and the objects to which they are to be directed.[5]

Mr. Webster, who had commented upon the amendment as proposing an unusual interference with Executive power, recalled President Washington's refusal to furnish information pertaining to the treaty making power, and, objecting to a call without the discretionary clause, proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert the following:

That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House so much of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the new States of America, or their ministers, respecting the proposed congress, or meeting of diplomatic agents at Panama, and of such information respecting the general character of that expected congress, as may be in his possession, as may, in his opinion, be communicated without prejudice to the public interest; and, also, to inform the House, as far as, in his opinion, the public interest may allow, in regard to what objects the agents of the United States are expected to take part in the deliberations of that congress.

Mr. Webster's motion was agreed to, whereupon Mr. Samuel D. Ingham, of Pennsylvania, moved to recommit the resolution as amended by the substitute with instructions to strike out the words "so far as, in his opinion, the public interest may allow."

This motion gave rise to a lengthy debate as to the relations of the House and the Executive.[1] Mr. Ingham said that the adoption of the motion to amend would be a distinct indication to the Executive that the House wanted all the information that it could get, the great interests of the nation demanding this. No disrespect to any other branch of the Government was intended. It had been a long practice of the House to insert a qualifying clause in calls upon the President for information, but in this case the whole should be asked for. To do less would be to carry too far the doctrine of confidence in public functionaries.

Mr. Thomas R. Mitchell, of South Carolina, while admitting that the House had no right to demand the information of the President, yet thought the House should request it, and that in case he should refuse it the House might decline to appropriate for the mission. Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, contended, on the other hand, that when the House requested information of the President the word "request" was used from courtesy and did not imply that the House had no right to demand information or that the President had a right to refuse it. Whenever, in the exercise of its constitutional authority, the House called upon the President for information, it had the right to demand it and the power to compel its production. President Washington had based his refusal of the call of the House, not on the ground of want of authority on the part of the House to demand, but because the demand was not made with a view to the exercise of any of the constitutional powers of the House. It would be strange if the House which could impeach those giving and receiving instructions, could not compel the production of them. The House might demand any information it might constitutionally want, and, in case of refusal, take the information by ordinary process of the Sergeant-at-Arms. In the usual calls for diplomatic information the qualifying clauses were inserted because the information was of such a nature that its publication might be injurious to the public interest, and also because the House might not be able to make any constitutional use of the information. But in this case the qualifying clause which it was proposed to strike out was in the second part of the resolution, which referred to our objects in going to Panama. Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, elaborated this point still further. In calls for correspondence between this Government and foreign powers the qualification was invariably made that disclosure should be conditioned on the President's judgment. But here was a different and an unprecedented case. If the mission was to be sent it would be by the act of the Congress and not of the Executive. He denied the power of the President to send agents to a tilting tourney where they might involve the United States in war.

[1] Debates, pp. 1262–1302.

Against the proposed motion Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, urged that the comity which should ever characterize the relations of the House and the Executive had settled long ago that respectful form which every call for information from that coequal department had always assumed. While not denying that a state of things might occur in which the House might be justified in demanding information, such a case did not exist at the present time, and there was no precedent for such a call.

Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, urged that the words should remain because they were in accordance with the usual and, he believed, the invariable practice. It would imply a most extraordinary want of confidence in the Executive to strike out those words allowing him discretion. A qualification was as proper to one part of the resolution as to the other. If this were the case of an ordinary mission to Europe, would it be deemed constitutional for the House to ask the President to disclose without reserve all the objects of the mission? No one would pretend that it would. In the present case it seemed equally undesirable to call for unqualified publicity.

Mr. Peleg Sprague, of Maine, went still further, and held that the President was as independent in his sphere as the House in theirs, and that, in the conscientious performance of his duty, he might feel it necessary to withhold information called for by the House in unqualified terms.

Mr. Ingham's motion was decided in the negative, yeas 71, nays 98.[1]

The House then agreed to the resolution, as amended by Mr. Webster's substitute, yeas 125, nays 40.[2]

On March 17[3] the message of the President in response to the resolution was communicated to the House.

1548. While not questioning the right of the House to decline to appropriate for a diplomatic office, President Grant protested against its assumption that it might give directions as to that service.—On August 15, 1876,[4] President Grant sent the following message to the House:

> In announcing as I do that I have attached my signature of official approval to the "act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," it is my duty to call attention to a provision in the act directing that notice be sent to certain of the diplomatic and consular officers of the Government "to close their offices."
> In the literal sense of this direction it would be an invasion of the constitutional prerogatives and duty of the Executive.
> By the Constitution the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls," etc.
> It is within the power of Congress to grant or withhold appropriation of money for the payment of salaries and expenses of the foreign representatives of the Government.
> In the early days of the Government a sum in gross was appropriated, leaving it to the Executive to determine the grade of the offices and the countries to which they should be sent.

Latterly, for very many years, specific sums have been appropriated for designated missions or employments, and, as a rule, the omission by Congress to make an appropriation for any, specific port had heretofore been accepted as an indication of the wish on the part of Congress, which the Executive branch of the Government respected and complied with.

In calling attention to the passage which I have indicated, I assume that the intention of the provision is only to exercise the constitutional prerogative of Congress over the expenditures of the Government and to fix a time at which the compensation of certain diplomatic and consular officers shall cease, and not to invade the constitutional rights of the Executive, which I should be compelled to resist; and my present object is not to discuss or dispute the wisdom of failing to appropriate for several offices, but to guard against the construction that might possibly be placed on the language used as implying a right in the legislative branch to direct the closing or discontinuing of any of the diplomatic or consular offices of the Government.

The message was debated at some length, and in the course of the discussion reference was made to the precedent in the case of Mr. Harvey, whom President Johnson appointed minister to Portugal. The Congress declined for a time to appropriate for his salary, but later did so. The message was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, no action on the part of the House being contemplated.

1549. An authorization of diplomatic relations with a foreign nation originated in the House in 1882.—On July 15, 1882,[1] the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported the bill (H. R. 6743) authorizing the Secretary of State to take the necessary measures for the establishment of diplomatic relations with Persia, and making appropriations for that purpose.

This bill passed the House and Senate and became a law.

1550. Congratulations of the House on the adoption of a republican form of government by Brazil.—On February 13, 1890,[2] the House passed the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. 54) providing:

Resolved, etc., That the United States of America congratulate the people of Brazil in their just and peaceful assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, based upon the free consent of the governed, and in their recent adoption of a republican form of government.

This resolution was signed by the President.

On March 2, 1891,[3] Mr. Robert R. Hitt, of Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, laid before the House resolutions of the Brazilian Congress thanking the people of the United States for their message of congratulation sent by Congress upon the establishment of a republican form of government in Brazil.

These resolutions were transmitted to Mr. Hitt, as chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, by the Secretary of State.

They were read and ordered entered on the Journal.

1551. The House has expressed its interest in the establishment of constitutional government in other lands.—On March 10, 1792,[4] the House agreed to a resolution expressing the interest of the House in the adoption of a constitution by France, and requesting the President of the United States, in his reply to the notification from the French King, to express the sincere interest of the House.

A special committee was appointed to wait on the President with this resolution.

On April 10, 1848,[1] the House passed the joint resolution from the Senate tendering by Congress the congratulations of the American to the French people.

This resolution was signed by the President on April 15.

1552. Congratulations of the House at the appearance of a new nation.—On May 20, 1902,[1] Mr. Robert R. Hitt, of Illinois, by unanimous consent presented the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That this House views with satisfaction, and expresses congratulation at, the appearance this day of the Cuban Republic among the nations of the world.

1553. The House has, by resolutions, extended its sympathy to foreign peoples desirous of greater liberty.—On March 27, 1867,[2] Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution, which, after debate, was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the House extend its sympathy to the people of Ireland and of Canada in all their just efforts to maintain the independence of states, to elevate the people, and to extend and perpetuate the principles of liberty.

1554. On December 18, 1871,[2] the House, on motion of Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, agreed to the following by a vote of yeas 182, nays 0:

Resolved, That while this House deems the conduct of foreign governments to be beyond its jurisdiction, it deeply sympathizes with all efforts to establish self-government and republican institutions, and with the families and friends of all persons who have lost their lives either in the field or on the scaffold or elsewhere in the cause of civil liberty.

1555. On December 20, 1876,[1] the Speaker stated that he was informed that there was in the city a gentleman who bore to the people of this country from the Irish nation congratulations to our people on this centennial year.

Thereupon Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to:

Whereas it has been announced to this House by the Speaker that Mr. John O'Connor Power, M. P., has been deputed to present to the people of the United States congratulations of the Irish nation on the centenary of American independence: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the subject of his mission be referred for consideration to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report what action should, in their opinion, be taken in the premises.

On March 3 Mr. Bernard G. Caulfield, of Illinois, submitted a preamble and resolution reciting the deeds of citizens of Irish descent in the establishment of this Republic, and accepting on behalf of the people of the United States the congratulations of the people of Ireland. This resolution, in the form of a simple resolution of the House, was offered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Grant as infringing on Executive prerogative.—On January 30, 1877,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a message received from the President[2] of the United States, returning with his objections the joint resolutions of the House (H. Res. 171) in reference to the congratulations from the Republic of Pretoria, South Africa, and (H. Res. 172) relating to congratulations from the Argentine Republic. In the veto message the President says:

Sympathizing as I do in the spirit of courtesy and friendly recognition which has prompted the passage of these resolutions,[3] I can not escape the conviction that their adoption has inadvertently involved the exercise of a power which infringes upon the constitutional rights of the Executive.

The usage of governments generally confines their correspondence and interchange of opinion and of sentiments of congratulation as well as of discussion to one certain established agency. To allow correspondence or interchange between states to be conducted by or with more than one such agency would necessarily lead to confusion, and possibly to contradictory presentation of views and to international complications.

The Constitution of the United States, following the established usage of nations, has indicated the President as the agent to represent the national sovereignty in its intercourse with foreign powers, and to receive all official communications from them. It gives him the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers; it intrusts to him solely "to receive ambassadors and other public ministers," thus vesting in him the origination of negotiations and the reception and conduct of all correspondence with foreign states, making him, in the language of one of the most eminent writers on constitutional law, "the constitutional organ of communication with foreign states."

No copy of the addresses which it is proposed to acknowledge is furnished. I have no knowledge of their tone, language, or purport. From the tenor of the two joint resolutions it is to be inferred that these communications are probably purely congratulatory. Friendly and kindly intentioned as they may be, the presentation by a foreign state of any communication to a branch of the Government not contemplated by the Constitution for the reception of communications from foreign states might, if allowed to pass without notice, become a precedent for the address by foreigners or by foreign states of communications of a different nature and with wicked designs.

If Congress can direct the correspondence of the Secretary of State with foreign governments, a case very different from that now under consideration might arise, when that officer might be directed to present to the same foreign government entirely different and antagonistic views or statements.

By the act of Congress establishing what is now the Department of State, then known as the Department of Foreign Affairs, the Secretary is to "perform and execute such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeable to the Constitution, relative to correspondence, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign states or princes, or to memorials or other applications from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such other matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United States shall assign to said Department, and, furthermore, that the said principal officer (the Secretary of State) shall conduct the business of the said Department in such manner as the President of the United States shall from time to time order or instruct."

This law, which remains substantially unchanged, confirms the view that the whole correspondence of the Government with and from foreign states is intrusted to the President; that the Secretary of State conducts such correspondence exclusively under the orders and instructions of the President, and that no communication or correspondence from foreigners or from a foreign state can properly be addressed to any branch or Department of the Government except that to which such correspondence has been committed by the Constitution and the laws.

[2] Ulysses S. Grant.

[3] The resolutions were introduced December 15 (Journal, p. 82; Record, pp. 227, 228), and it appears from the debate that the congratulations came from the congress of sister republics, and the resolutions were intended to return the congratulations of the American Congress.

I therefore feel it my duty to return the joint resolutions without my approval to the House of Representatives, in which they originated.

In addition to the reasons, already stated for withholding my constitutional approval from these resolutions is the fact that no information is furnished as to the terms or purport of the communications to which acknowledgments are desired, no copy of the communications accompanies the resolutions, nor is the name even of the officer or of the body to whom an acknowledgment could be addressed given; it is not known whether these congratulatory addresses proceed from the head of the state or from legislative bodies; and as regards the resolution relating to the republic of Pretoria, I can not learn that any state or government of that name exists.

U. S. GRANT.

Washington, January 26, 1877.

The veto message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was not reported therefrom.

1557. The House has expressed its regret at attempts on the lives of foreign rulers.—On June 25, 1894,[1] a message from the President communicated to the House the intelligence of the death by assassination of President Carnot, of France. Thereupon Mr. James B. McCreary, of Kentucky, offered the following resolutions, which were agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States of America, has heard with profound sorrow of the assassination of President Carnot, and tenders the people of France sincere sympathy in their national bereavement.

That the President of the United States be requested to communicate this expression of sorrow to the Government of the Republic of France and to Madame Carnot; and that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the President of the French Republic, the House of Representatives do now adjourn.

On June 27 the Speaker laid before the House a cable dispatch from the Government of France to the Speaker acknowledging the action of the House. This dispatch appears in full in the Journal, although no order in regard to it was made.[2] On July 25 the Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State transmitting more formal expressions of gratitude from the Government of France. These also appear in full in the Journal without special order.[3]

1558. On May 4, 1866,[4] the House, on motion of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, passed a joint resolution expressing deep regret at the attempt on the life of the "Emperor of Russia by an enemy of emancipation." This joint resolution was passed by the Senate and signed by the President.

1559. The Senate expressed its disapproval of the attempt to destroy the English Parliament houses.—On January 26, 1885,[5] the Senate, by resolution expressed its indignation and profound sorrow at the attempt to destroy the English Parliament Houses.

1560. The Congress, by joint resolution, expressed its abhorrence of massacres reported in a foreign nation.—On June 22, 1906,[6] the House considered and passed Senate Joint Resolution No. 68, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the people of the United States are horrified by the report of the massacre of Hebrews in Russia on account of their race and religion, and that those bereaved thereby have the hearty sympathy of the people of this country.

This joint resolution was approved by the President.[2]

1561. In 1846 President Polk, for reasons of public policy, declined to inform the House as to expenditures from the secret or contingent fund of the State Department.—On April 9, 1846,[8] the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished to this House an account of all payments made on President's certificates from the funds appropriated by law, through the agency of the State Department, for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse since the 4th of March, 1841, until the retirement of Daniel Webster from the Department of State, with copies of all entries, receipts, letters, vouchers, memorandums, or other evidence of such payments, to whom paid, for what, and particularly all concerning the Northwestern boundary, dispute with Great Britain; also copies of whatever communications were made from the Secretary of State during the last session of the Twenty-seventh Congress, particularly February, 1843, to Mr. Cushing and Mr. Adams, members of the committee of this House on Foreign Affairs, of the wish of the President of the United States to institute a special mission to Great Britain; also copies of all letters on the books of the Department of State to any officer of the United States, or any person in New York, concerning Alexander McLeod: Provided, That no document or matter is requested to be furnished by the foregoing resolution which, in the opinion of the President, would improperly involve the citizen or subject of any foreign power.

On April 20, in a message to the House, President Polk declined to give the desired information in regard to the contingent fund, explaining the nature of that fund under the laws and the impropriety of making public the information asked. In the course of the message the President said:

It may be alleged that the power of impeachment belongs to the House of Representatives, and that with a view to the exercise of this power that House has the right to investigate the conduct of all public officers under the Government. This is cheerfully admitted. In such a case the safety of the Republic would be the supreme law, and the power of the House, in the pursuit of this object, would penetrate into the most secret recesses of the Executive Departments. It could command the attendance of any and every agent of the Government, and compel them to present all papers, public or private, official or unofficial, and to testify on oath to all facts within their knowledge. But, even in a case of that kind, they would adopt all wise precautions to prevent the exposure of all such matters the publication of which might injuriously affect the public interests, except so far as this might be necessary to accomplish the great ends of public justice. If the House of Representatives, as the grand inquest of the nation, should, at any time, have reason to believe that there has been malversation in office, by an improper use or application of the public money by a public officer, and should think proper to institute an inquiry into the matter, all the archives and papers of the Executive Departments, public or private, would be subject to the inspection and control of a committee of that body, and every facility in the power of the Executive be afforded to enable them to prosecute the investigation.

The experience of every nation on earth has demonstrated that emergencies may arise in which it becomes absolutely necessary for the public safety or the public good, to make expenditures, the very object of which would be defeated by publicity. Some governments have very large amounts at their disposal and have made vastly greater expenditures than the small amounts which have from time to time been accounted for on President's certificates. In no nation is the application of such sums ever made public. In time of war, or impending danger, the situation of the country may make it necessary to employ individuals for the purpose of obtaining information or rendering other important services who could never be prevailed upon to act if they entertained the least apprehension that their names, or their agency, would in any contingency be divulged. So it may often become necessary to incur an expenditure for an object highly useful to the country; for example, the conclusion of a treaty with a barbarian power, whose customs require on such occasions the use of presents; but this object might be altogether defeated by the intrigues of other powers if our purposes were to be made known by the exhibition of the original papers and vouchers to the accounting officers of the Treasury. It would be easy to specify other cases which may occur in the history of a great nation in its intercourse with other nations wherein it might become absolutely necessary to incur expenditures for objects which could never be accomplished if it were suspected in advance that the items of expenditure, and the agencies employed, would be made public.

Actuated undoubtedly by considerations of this kind, Congress provided such a fund, coeval with the organization of the Government, and subsequently enacted the law of 1810 as the permanent law of the land. While this law exists in full force I feel bound by a high sense of public policy and duty to observe its provisions and the uniform practice of my predecessors under it.

With great respect for the House of Representatives, and an anxious desire to conform to their wishes, I am constrained to come to this conclusion.

Chapter L.

PREROGATIVES OF THE HOUSE AS RELATED TO THE EXECUTIVE.[1]

1562. The House, either alone or in concurrence with the Senate, has by resolution expressed opinions or determinations on important public questions.—On April 5, 1852[2] the House adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we recognize the binding efficacy of the compromises of the Constitution, and believe it to be the intention of the people generally, as we hereby declare it to be ours individually, to abide such compromises, and to sustain the laws necessary to carry them out—the provision for the delivery of fugitive slaves and the act of the last Congress for that purpose included—and that we deprecate all further agitation of questions growing out of that provision, of the questions embraced in the acts of the last Congress known as the compromise, and of questions generally connected with the institution of slavery, as unnecessary, useless, and dangerous.

Resolved, That the series of acts passed during the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, known as the compromise, are regarded as a final adjustment and a permanent settlement of the question therein embraced, and should be maintained and executed as such.

1563. On December 17, 1860,[3] Mr. Owen Lovejoy, of Illinois, introduced the following, which was considered and agreed to by a vote of 135 yeas and no nays:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, and its ready and faithful observance the duty of all good and law-abiding citizens: Therefore

Resolved, That we deprecate the spirit of disobedience to that Constitution wherever manifested, and that we earnestly recommend the repeal of all statutes, including nullification laws so called, enacted by State legislatures, conflicting with and in violation of that sacred instrument, and the laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof; and it is the duty of the President of the United States to protect and defend the property of the United States.

1564. On January 7, 1861,[1] Mr. Garnett B. Adrian, of New Jersey, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by a vote of yeas 125, nays 56:

Resolved, That we fully approve of the bold and patriotic act of Major Anderson in withdrawing from Fort Moultrie to Fort Sumter, and of the determination of the President to maintain that fearless officer in his present position; and that we will support the President in all constitutional measures to enforce the laws and preserve the Union.

1565. On December 6, 1862,[2] the House, on motion of Mr. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, adopted a resolution declaratory of the duty of soldiers, citizens, and officials to unite in putting down the rebellion against the Government.

1566. On March 3, 1863,[3] the House and Senate adopted a series of concurrent resolutions setting forth the attitude of Congress on the subject of intervention in the then existing war by foreign nations. These resolutions do not appear in full in the Journal of the House.

1567. On December 5, 1865,[4] Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to, yeas 162, nays, 1:

Resolved, That, as the sense of this House, the public debt created during the late rebellion was contracted upon the faith and honor of the nation; that it is sacred and inviolate, and must and ought to be paid, principal and interest; that any attempt to repudiate or in any manner to impair or scale the said debt shall be universally discountenanced and promptly rejected by Congress if proposed.

On January 28, 1878,[5] the House passed a concurrent resolution from the Senate declaring the coin bonds of the United States payable in silver dollars of 412½ grains.

1568. On December 15, 1875,[6] the House, by a vote of yeas 223, nays 18, agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the Presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

1569. While the House in some cases has bestowed praise or censure on the President or a member of his Cabinet, such action has at other times been held to be improper.—On May 26, 1809,[7] Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, after referring to the abandonment of the old relations of Congress and the President wherein the President made an annual speech to the Congress, and the House responded with an address, proposed the following:

Resolved, That the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has met the overtures of the Government of Great Britain toward a restoration of harmony and a free commercial intercourse between the two nations, receives the approbation of this House.[8]

[8] This resolution of the House should be distinguished from a concurrent expression of both Houses, such as the resolution passed by House and Senate in 1809 condemning the British minister and pledging Congress to stand by the Executive in repelling insults to the nation. First session Eleventh Congress, Annals, pp. 481, 747, 1151.

A lengthy debate arose over this resolution, involving, besides the merits of the question, the question of precedent and propriety. Mr. Randolph cited two precedents in support of the propriety of the resolution. The first was a paragraph in the address to the President, adopted December 6, 1793, wherein the House expressed approbation of the President's proclamation of neutrality in the existing conflict in Europe.[1] The second precedent was that of January 7, 1803, wherein the House expressed, by a resolution, their determination to maintain rights of navigation on the Mississippi, and expressed themselves as relying with perfect confidence in the wisdom and vigilance of the Executive.[2]

It was objected that the Constitution did not include such expressions of opinion among the duties of the House; that their effect would be to constitute the House censors; that it was not wise to compliment officers whom it might be necessary to impeach, etc.

Finally, on June 2[3] the resolution was laid on the table, yeas 54, nays 41.

1570. On January 18, 1819,[4] the House, in Committee of the Whole, began consideration of a resolution reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom had been referred so much of the President's message as related to the conduct of the war against the Seminole Indians by Gen. Andrew Jackson.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States disapproves the proceedings in the trial and execution of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister.

In the course of the long debate, which related chiefly to the moral and political aspects of the question, several speakers touched on the question as to the power of the House to adopt such a resolution. It was urged on the one hand that the adoption of the resolution would be to trench on the Executive authority, and on the other that the House in the St. Clair and Wilkinson cases had settled its right to investigate, and that the right to investigate involved the right to censure.

The resolution was disagreed to, 108 to 62.

1571. On April 30, 1862,[5] the House, by a vote of yeas 79, nays 45, agreed to the following resolution reported from the select committee appointed to investigate Government contracts:

Resolved, That Simon Cameron, late Secretary of War, by investing Alexander Cummings with the control of large sums of the public money and authority to purchase military supplies without restriction, without requiring from him any guarantee for the faithful performance of his duties, when the services of competent public officers were available, and by involving the Government in a vast number of contracts with persons not legitimately engaged in the business pertaining to the subject-matter of such contracts, especially in the purchase of arms for future delivery, has adopted a policy, highly injurious to the public service, and deserves the censure of the House.[6]

On December 16, 1862, the Senate, by a vote of yeas 38, nays 3, laid on the table a resolution censuring James Buchanan, recently President of the United States.[7]

1572. On July 16, 1894,[1] Mr. James B. Creary, of Kentucky, moved to suspend the rules and agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives indorses the prompt and vigorous efforts of the President and his Administration to suppress lawlessness, restore order, and prevent improper interference with the enforcement of the laws of the United States, and with the transportation of the mails of the United States, and with interstate commerce, and pledges the President hearty support, and deems the success that has already attended his efforts as cause for public and general congratulation.

This resolution, after debate, was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

1573. The House has at times adopted resolutions requesting or advising the Executive as to matters within the sphere of his duties.—On April 9, 1818,[2] the House, on the report of a select committee appointed to investigate the circumstances of the imprisonment of an American citizen by Spain, agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That this House is satisfied that the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade is an act of cruel and unjustifiable oppression; that it is the right and duty of the Government of the United States to afford to Mr. Meade its aid and protection; and that this House will support and maintain such measures as the President may hereafter adopt to obtain the release of the said R. W. Meade from confinement, should such measures be proper and necessary.

1574. On February 22, 1823,[3] the House agreed to this order:

Ordered, That * * * the petition of Jacob and Henry Schieffelin, of New York, * * * be referred to the President of the United States; and that he be requested to afford to the petitioners, in the prosecution of their claim on the British Government, such assistance as the nature of the case may require.

1575. On July 5, 1832,[4] the House considered a joint resolution from the Senate providing for a joint committee to wait on the President and request him to appoint a public fast day, in order that by humiliation and prayer the Asiatic cholera might be everted. This resolution was debated at length, especially as the President had informally expressed some sentiments unfavorable to Executive action in the matter. Precedents of similar requests in 1812 and 1814 were cited. Finally, after consideration and reference to a committee, the resolution was, on July 14, laid on the table.

1576. On July 27, 1866,[5] the House agreed to resolutions declaring it to be the duty of the Executive Departments to proceed to the trial of Jefferson Davis.

1577. On July 8, 1897,[6] the Senate considered a simple resolution directing the Secretary of State to collect through the diplomatic representatives abroad information as to postal telegraph systems, etc. On July 12[7] the resolution was agreed to; and thereafter the Secretary of State obeyed the directions.

1578. On April 29, 1872,[8] the House by resolution advised the Executive as to the course to be pursued in the case of John Emilio Houard, alleged to be a citizen of the United States, imprisoned in Cuba.

1579. Instance wherein the House by resolution expressed an opinion as to the course of action which an executive officer should follow.—On December 13, 1906,[1] the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that hereafter, in printing reports, documents, or other publications authorized by law, ordered by Congress or either branch thereof, or emanating from the Executive Departments, their bureaus or branches, and independent offices of the Government, the Government Printing Office should observe and adhere to the standard of orthography prescribed in generally accepted dictionaries of the English language.

1580. An opinion of the Attorney-General that neither House may by resolution give a construction to an existing law which would be of binding effect on an executive officer.—On August 23, 1854,[2] Caleb Cushing, Attorney-General of the United States, submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the claim of Isaac Bowman, an opinion. The opinion states that—

On the 20th of February, 1854, the Senate passed the following resolution, namely:

"Resolved, That the claim of Isaac Bowman, legal representative of Isaac Bowman, deceased, for half-pay due his father under the act of the general assembly of Virginia of May, 1779, be referred to the Secretary of the Interior for liquidation under the act of Congress of July 5, 1932, and that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the case."

And on the 1st of July, 1854, the House adopted a resolution, reported by the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, in the following words, namely:

"Resolved, That the petition in the case of Isaac Bowman be referred to the Secretary of the Interior for liquidation under the act of July 5, 1832, and that this committee be discharged from its further consideration."

Whereupon the question of law submitted to me for consideration is, whether, on the supposition that the Secretary on a reexamination of the case maintains his original opinion and believes the claim not to be allowable under the provisions of the said act on the evidence presented, is he bound to consider these two resolutions, or either of them, as mandatory on him, and as compelling him to liquidate the claim against his judgment of the right of the case?

It is impossible for me to conceive of any other than a negative answer to this question.

When an act of Congress commands a head of Department to do a particular thing, and the thing to be done is ministerial in its nature—as to pay so much money to A. B.—then the head of Department is bound in law to do the thing, and may be compelled by mandamus of the circuit court. (Kendal v. United States, 12 Peters, 610.)

The same doctrine applies to a joint resolution, properly enacted, which differs from an act of Congress only in form.

But if the tenor of the law be not mandatory of a mere ministerial act to be done, then the head of Department acts according to his discretion, in subordination always to his constitutional and legal relation to the President of the United States. (Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Peters, 497.)

The reason of this must be apparent to the least reflection.

The act of a head of Department is, in effect, an act of the President. Now, the Constitution provides for coordinate powers acting in different and respective spheres of cooperation. The executive power is vested in the President whilst all legislative powers are vested in Congress. It is for Congress to pass laws, but it can not pass any law which, in effect, coerces the discretion of the President, except with his approbation, unless by concurrent vote of two-thirds of both Houses, upon his previous refusal to sign a bill. And the Constitution expressly provides that orders and resolutions, and other votes of the two Houses, in order to have the effect of law, shall, in like manner, be presented to the President for his approval, and if not approved by him shall become law only by subsequent concurrence in vote of two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

[1] Second session Fifty-ninth Congress, Record, pp. 369, 370.

[2] Vol. 6, Opinions of the Attorneys-General, p. 680.

If, then, the President approves a law which imperatively commands a thing to be done, ministerially, by a head of Department, his approbation of the law, or its passage after a veto, gives constitutionality to what would otherwise be the usurpation of executive power on the part of Congress.

In a word, the authority of each head of Department is a parcel of the executive power of the President. To coerce the head of Department is to coerce the President. This can be accomplished in no other way than by a law, constitutional in its nature, enacted in accordance with the forms of the Constitution.

Of course, no separate resolution of either House can coerce a head of Department unless in some particular in which a law, duly enacted, has subjected him to the direct action of each; and in such case it is to be intended that, by approving the law, the President has consented to the exercise of such coerciveness on the part of either House.

For instance, the act of September 2, 1789, (1 Stat. L., p. 66), renders it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to "make report and give information to either branch of the legislature, in person or writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or (and) which shall appertain to his office." And in practice the same duty is imposed on other heads of Department. But, except where otherwise provided by law, every such communication of a head of Department to either House must be understood to be made with the assent express or implied, of the President. Suppose, for example, the House of Representatives should, by vote, assume to require the Secretary of State to communicate to it a copy of a draft of a treaty under negotiation, or his instructions to some diplomatic agent of the Government; still, it is clear, he could not do this except with permission of the President.

On the same principle, and with stronger reason, it is not in the power of a separate resolution of either House to command or to control the executive action of a head of Department—that is, of the President—in the construction and execution of a general law of the land.

It does not help the case, constitutionally speaking, if there should happen to be a resolution of the same substance, or even of the same identical words, passed by each House; for such separate resolutions have not the form nor the responsibilities of enactment, according to the rules of the two Houses, nor do they possess the conditions of a law according to the Constitution.

Therefore, even if the two resolutions in Bowman's case were mandatory in their terms, which they are not, yet they have not the constitutional requisites of any authority, either mandatory or directory, over the action of the Secretary.

Indeed, it seems little better than a mere truism to say that a separate resolution of either House of Congress is not a law.

Whenever a general act is passed, like that for the payment of half-pay to certain officers of the Virginia line, that is to say, a law embracing a defined class of cases, and assigning to a head of Department the executive duty of ascertaining the particular cases of the class, and applying the law to them, in such case the terms of the law constitute a rule for his government. It is incumbent on him, as on every other citizen, to obey the law. To obey it, in him, is to execute it according to its provisions, as conscientiously construed by him in his best judgment, or if he doubt, then as he may be advised by the Attorney-General. To do otherwise—that is, on the one hand to refuse to apply the law to cases to which it is justly applicable, or on the other to apply it to cases to which it is not justly applicable, is to disobey, not to obey—to violate, not to execute—the constitutional will of the legislative department of the Government.

It may happen that a claim shall rise which, according to the plain terms of the law, is not within its provisions, or which is not proved by the evidence which the law prescribes, and so is rejected by the Secretary. In such a case the claimant can apply to Congress, and that body may pass a private law for the relief of the party, dispensing with its own conditions of applicability, or its prescribed rules of evidence. But no such dispensing power resides in the Secretary.

Or the Secretary, in the exercise of his lawful discretion in construing such a general act of Congress, may adopt a construction of it which is deemed erroneous by the two Houses of Congress. In that case they will pass a declaratory act, which, being approved by the President or repassed after his refusal to approve it, constitutes a new law for the government of the Secretary.

But the Constitution has not given to either branch of the Legislature the power, by separate resolution of its own, to construe, judicially, a general law or to apply it executively to a given case. And its resolutions have obligatory force only so far as regards itself or things dependent on its own separate constitutional power.

Any other view of the subject would result in the absurd conclusion that a separate resolution of either House could repeal or modify an act of Congress. For, as the Supreme Court well say, in one of the cases before cited, a head of Department "must exercise his judgment in expounding the acts and resolutions of Congress under which he is from time to time required to act." That exposition of the law, conscientiously made by him, and with the aid of the law officer of the Government, is the law of the case. If the question be one of judicial resort, the exposition of the statute by the Supreme Court will constitute the law. But if it be a mere executive question, then the exposition of the particular Secretary, or of the Attorney-General, is just as much the law, and, as such, binding on the conscience of the head of Department as any other part of the statute, which may happen to be of unquestionable import, and so not to require exposition. In fine, it becomes the law—that is, the authorized construction of the legal intendment of the act of Congress. That ascertained legal intendment of a statute can not be authoritatively changed by a separate resolution of either or of both Houses, but only by a new act of Congress.

The conclusive test of the whole doctrine is to inquire whether the Supreme Court of the United States would adjudge that the report of a committee, or a resolution of either House, has the effect of repealing, modifying, or conclusively construing an act of Congress. It is perfectly clear that they would not. (Albridge v. Williams, 3 Howard, 9.)

It does not appear, in the case of Bowman, why the obvious and usual course of proposing a law for his relief was not followed, provided the two Houses of Congress would, on full consideration of his claim, in the established legislative forms, have sanctioned the view of it, which is implied by the passage of these resolutions in connection with the reports of the Committees on Revolutionary Clams and on Pensions in the case.

The Attorney-General then goes on to refer to an opinion of the Attorney-General of March 27, 1849, in the case of Churchill Gibbs, wherein the Attorney-General gives the opinion that a proper deference to the legislative branch of the Government demanded that the executive department should heed a resolution wherein the Congress had given a construction of the existing law. Mr. Cushing then proceeded with his argument in relation to this question, and says:

Most assuredly it can not be sound constitutional doctrine that a declaratory resolution of either House, construing a general law, is obligatory against the judgment of the Executive, and that it is the duty of the Executive to yield its judgment in all such cases to the mere opinion of the Senate or of the House of Representatives. Such an assumption is contrary, as I have shown, to the plain letter and clear spirit of the Constitution.

If it be said that, although a head of department be not absolutely bound in law to yield up his own judgment, yet that, in the language of the opinion under consideration, it is his duty so to do, out of deference to both or either of the Houses, or to prevent the public reproach of disagreement between the legislative and executive branches of the Government, or for any other possible consideration of mere expediency, I reply that the whole weight of the argument of expediency is the other way; for the adoption of such a rule would inevitably tend to the disorganization of the Government.

In the first place, the President is not bound to yield up his own judgment, even to the most unequivocally expressed opinion of the two Houses, in the form of a bill passed through all the solemnities of constitutional enactment. But if the hypothesis under consideration be maintainable, a separate resolution of either House will constrain the Executive, when a bill, solemnly passed to be enacted, would not. Of course, this idea would afford easy means of striking the veto power and the rights of minorities out of the Constitution, and conferring on a bare majority of the two Houses that legislative omnipotence which it was one of the great objects of the Constitution to guard against and avoid.

According to the letter of the Constitution, resolutions of the two Houses, even a joint resolution, when submitted to the President and disapproved by him, do not acquire the force of law until passed anew by a concurrent vote of two-thirds of each House. On the present hypothesis, the better way would be not to present the resolution to the President at all, and then to call on him to accept it as law, with closed eyes, and, however against law he may know it to be, yet to execute it out of deference to the assumed opinion of Congress.

In the second place, the hypothesis puts an end to all the forms of legislative scrutiny on the part of Congress. A declaratory law, especially if it involve the expenditure of the public treasure, has forms of legislation to go through to insure due consideration. All these time-honored means of securing right legislation will pass into desuetude if the simple acceptance of a resolution, reported by a committee, is to be received as a constitutional enactment, obligatory on all concerned, including the Executive.

In this way, instead of the revenues of the Government being subject only to the disposition of Congress in the form of a law constitutionally enacted, they will be transferred to the control of an accidental majority, expressing its will by a resolution, passed, it may be, out of time, and under circumstances in which a law duly and truly representing the will of Congress could not have passed. And thus, all those checks and guards against the inconsiderate appropriation of the public treasure, so carefully devised by the founders of the Government, will be struck out of the Constitution.

Where is the doctrine to stop? Will a declaratory resolution of one House constitute a law, or must both Houses concur? Will one resolution suffice? Or must there be several successive ones, cumulative one upon the other? And what is to be done if opposing resolutions be passed by the two Houses?

And by what intelligible ground of constitutional distinction is the Executive to obey, out of deference, and against his judgment, a separate resolution of either House on the subject of private claims, and not on any other business of the Government? All general laws are a rule comprehending particulars more or less numerous. The construction of a law is, in part, the consideration of what particulars are included within the rule; and the execution of the law is the application of that rule to the particulars of ascertained inclusion. If, by separate resolution of either House, a pension law or half-pay law may be construed with conclusive legal effect, so may any other law within the whole scope of the legislation of the United States.

Nay, instead of assuming it as a general rule of duty that the Executive is to obey, as of course, out of deference, and against his better judgment, a separate declaratory resolution of either House, we should assume the contrary as a rule; because such a resolution is, on its face, an attempt to coerce the conscience of the Executive by extra-constitutional means; and because, if the resolution were expressive of the true will of Congress, it may be presumed that it would have been passed into a law according to the Constitution. I can not readily conceive of any innovation so dangerous to good legislation, and so well calculated to defeat the will of Congress itself, as the setting up of a hasty vote or order of either House accepting the report of a committee, and adopted out of time perhaps, to have the force of law. Wherefore, it is most respectfully urged that, in the interest of the legislative department of the Government, not less than that of the executive, the doctrine supposed is wholly inadmissible, even regarded in the light of expediency.

But, after all, is not our first duty that of humble submission to the Constitution? Of what avail are arguments of expediency against the positive injunctions of the Constitution? How can the consideration of "deference" to any human power, or of possible liability to "reproach," justify, in a head of department, the deliberate infringement of the Constitution? There is but one safe guide for any of us, and that is the Constitution, and the laws under it duly enacted by Congress.

A mere vote of either or of both Houses of Congress, declaring its opinion of the proper construction of a general law, has, be it repeated, in itself, no constitutional force or obligation as law. It is opinion merely, and to be dealt with as such, receiving more or less of deference, like other mere opinions, according to the circumstances.

1581. In cases where its investigations have suggested the culpability of executive officers, the House has by resolution submitted advice or request to the Executive.—On March 27, 1867,[1] Mr. Calvin T. Hulburd, of New York, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, reported the following:

Whereas Congress having determined to adjourn, there is not sufficient time prior thereto for the Committee on Public Expenditures to conclude its investigation of the administration of the New York custom-house by Henry A. Smythe, in the manner indicated by the House, although the committee having given Mr. Smythe two hearings, he has expressed himself content therewith, unless the committee desires to prosecute the investigation further; and whereas in the opinion of the committee there is abundant affirmative testimony in the possession of the House of Henry A. Smythe's unfitness to hold the office of collector; therefore Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythe should be removed from the office of collector of the port of New York, and that a copy of this resolution and the testimony be transmitted to the President of the United States.

When this course of action was proposed on March 21, it caused some debate as to the power of the House to proceed in this way. It was urged that the House might impeach, but that the appointment and removal of subordinate officers was an Executive function.

The resolution and preamble were agreed to, yeas 68, nays 38.

1582. On March 24,1870,[2] Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following:

Whereas it is in evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, as well as admitted by Commander John H. Upshur, of the Navy, that he paid the sum of $1,300 to one M.D. Landon, with a view of having said money used in procuring the appointment of his son to the Naval Academy at Annapolis: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a copy of said evidence be transmitted to the Secretary of the Navy, and that he be directed to convene a court-martial for the purpose of putting said Commander Upshur on trial for conduct unbecoming an officer.

After debate, and on motion of Mr. Logan, the word "requested" was inserted in the place of "directed," as being more appropriate.

Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, then raised the question that it was not becoming for the House to appear as prosecutor in one of the Executive Departments, and therefore moved to amend the resolution so that it should request the convening of a court of inquiry instead of a court-martial. This amendment was disagreed to, yeas 71, nays 109.

The preamble and resolution were then agreed to as amended.

1583. On March 24, 1870,[2] Mr. John A. Logan, of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following:

Whereas the testimony presented to the House of Representatives on the 16th instant, as taken by the Committee on Military Affairs in the case of R. R. Butler, clearly shows that Gen. A. Schoepf, one of the examiners in the Patent Office, was engaged in lending himself as a medium through which money should pass for corrupt purposes: Therefore,

Resolved, That the evidence in said case be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and that he be requested at once to remove said Schoepf from the position of examiner of patents, as an improper person to have or hold so responsible a position under the Government.

Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, proposed an amendment to request the Secretary to institute an inquiry, instead of removing General Schoepf.

The amendment was disagreed to, and the resolution was then agreed to.

1584. On January 6, 1873,[3] the House agreed to a resolution requesting the President to cause the employment of two attorneys to prosecute suit against the Crédit Mobilier.

1585. In 1842 the House, after discussion, abandoned a proposition to pass on the authority of the President to appoint commissions of investigation without the sanction of law.—On May 4, 1842,[4] the House proceeded to the consideration of the message from the President of the United States of the 30th of April, ultimo, transmitting reports of the commissioners appointed to examine into the affairs of the New York custom-house. The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Henry A. Wise of Virginia, that the said message, with all the documents which accompany the same, be printed.

Mr. Joseph R. Underwood, of Kentucky, moved to amend the same by adding as follows:

but, in printing the message and accompanying documents, this House does not intend to approve or sanction the institution of this commission, it being the opinion of this House that the President has no rightful authority to appoint and commission officers to investigate abuses, or to procure information for the President to act upon, and to compensate such officers at public expense, without authority expressly given by law.

This amendment was debated on May 5 and May 9, and again on June 8, the constitutional aspects of the question being considered. On the latter date, by a division of the question, a vote was taken first on agreeing to this portion of the proposed amendment:

but, in printing the message and accompanying documents, the House does not intend to approve or sanction the institution of this commission.

This portion was agreed to, yeas 86, nays 83.

Thereupon Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, saying that it was time to get rid of the question, since the House had undertaken to decide on the constitutional powers of the Executive, moved that the whole subject be laid on the table.

This motion was agreed to, yeas 96, nays 76.

1586. The House has decided that a Vice-President succeeding to the Presidency should be called "the President" without qualification.—On May 31, 1841,[2] at the organization of the House, Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, offered the customary resolution authorizing the appointment of a committee to join a similar committee on the part of the Senate "to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of the two Houses have assembled," etc.

Mr. John McKeon, of New York, moved to amend by inserting before the word "President" the words "Vice-President, now exercising the duties of."

After a discussion of the constitutional provisions relating to the death of a President, and the duties of the Vice-President, the proposed amendment was decided in the negative without division, and the resolution as originally presented was agreed to.[3]

[3] Vice-President Tyler had succeeded President Harrison, who had died before the assembling of this Congress, which had been called together by his proclamation. This was the first time that a Vice-President had succeeded to the office.

1587. The proposition to have the heads of the Executive Departments occupy seats on the Floor and participate in proceedings.—On April 6, 1864, Mr. George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, from a select committee [1] submitted a report [2] on the bill (H. R. 214) to provide that the heads of the Executive Departments might occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives.[3] The committee entertained no doubt of the power of Congress to pass the bill. Members of the Cabinet would not become Members of the House any more than the contestant for a seat, who was sometimes admitted to argue in his own behalf, or the delegate from a Territory, who was admitted to debate, but not to vote, by virtue of a statute. The law of 1787, organizing the Treasury Department, provided that the Secretary of the Treasury—shall make report and give information to either branch of the legislature, either in person or in writing (as he may be required), respecting all matters which may be referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office.

The report cites the fact that on July 22, 1789, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Jefferson, attended agreeably to order, and made the necessary explanations.[4] On August 22, 1789, the President of the United States came into the Senate chamber, attended by General Knox, Secretary of War, and laid before the Senate a statement of facts.[5] Other instances in the first Congress are cited by the committee.

The committee proposed certain amendments to the rules to allow for carrying out the provisions of the bill, which provided that Cabinet officers might have seats on the floor with right to participate in debate relating to their Departments, and that they should attend at certain stated times to give replies to questions.

The committee agreed that Congress would, by such an arrangement, be better informed as to measures of legislation, and that the influence of the Executive Departments upon legislation would be open and authorized instead of secret and unauthorized. The example of other nations and the authority of Justice Story's Commentaries were cited in support of this view.[6]

The bill was not acted on, but was debated at considerable length.[7]

1588. Presents to the President or other officers were formerly placed at the disposal of Congress.—On January 6, 1834,[8] President Jackson, by message to the House of Representatives, communicated an extract of a letter from R. J. Leib, consul of the United States at Tangier, by which it appeared that Mr. Leib had received a present of a lion and two horses from the Emperor of Morocco, which he held as belonging to the United States. In this connection also the President called attention to the fact that the number of articles presented to United States officials and deposited in the Department of State had become a source of inconvenience.

[7] It appears from the record of debates (Annals, first session Fifth Congress, p. 458) that the Secretary of State was present at the secret session of the House when the message relating to Senator William Blount was considered, and that he gave an opinion to the House relating to the pending question.

The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and on March 4 that committee made a report [1] and was discharged from further consideration of the subject.

The subject was revived at the next session, and on December 18, 1834,[2] the Committee on Foreign Affairs made a report accompanying a joint resolution (H. Res. No. 13), which became a law.

1589. On January 19, 1830,[3] President Andrew Jackson transmitted a message directed to both the House and Senate, which contained this paragraph:

> The accompanying gold medal, commemorative of the delivery of the Liberator President of the Republic of Colombia from the daggers of assassins, on the night of the 25th of September last, has been offered for my acceptance by that Government. The respect which I entertain, as well for the character of the Liberator President as for the people and Government over which he presides, renders this mark of their regard most gratifying to my feelings; but I am prevented from complying with their wishes by the provision of our Constitution forbidding the acceptance of presents from a foreign state by officers of the United States; and it is, therefore, placed at the disposal of Congress.

The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and on February 9 [4] they reported this resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

> Resolved, That the medal recently offered to the acceptance of the President of the United States by the President Liberator of Colombia be deposited by the clerk in the Department of State.[5]

1590. A formal protest by the President against certain proceedings of the House was declared a breach of privilege.—On August 30, 1842 [6] a motion was made by Mr. John M. Botts, of Virginia, that the rules in relation to the order of business be suspended, and that the written communication from the President of the United States, received this day, be now read. This motion passed in the affirmative, two-thirds voting therefor, and the communication from the President of the United States was then read.[7] Thereupon Mr. Botts moved

[7] This message may be found on page 190, Vol. IV of Richardson's Messages and Papers. These resolutions, except No. 4 (which was not agreed to), were copied from the resolutions adopted by the Senate in 1834. That year that body had adopted certain resolutions condemning the course of President Jackson in the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States to the State banks. Against this President Jackson sent a protest.

August 9 President Tyler had returned to the House with his objections House bill No. 472, "to provide revenue from imports," etc. This was referred to a special committee, of which Mr. John Quincy Adams was chairman. This committee made a report severely criticizing the message. It was against this report that the President sent his protest.

the following resolutions, which were all agreed to except the fourth, which was disagreed to:

1. Resolved, That while this House is, and ever will be, ready to receive from the President all such messages and communications as the Constitution and laws and the usual course of public business authorize him to transmit to it, yet it can not recognize any right in him to make a formal protest against votes and proceedings of this House, declaring such votes and proceedings to be illegal and unconstitutional, and requesting the House to enter such protest on its Journal.

2. Resolved, That the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of this House, and that it be not entered on the Journal.

3. Resolved, That the President of the United States has no right to send a protest to this House any of its proceedings.

4. Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to return the message and protest to its author.

1591. President Jackson. having sent to the Senate a protest against its censure of his acts, the Senate declared the protest a breach of privilege and refused it entry on the Journal.—On April 17, 1834,[3] President Jackson sent to the Senate his protest against the resolution which the Senate, on March 28, had agreed to, in these words:

Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.

This protest was debated until May 7,[2] when these resolutions were agreed to, yeas 27, nays 16.

Resolved, That the protest communicated to the Senate on the 17th instant, by the President of the United States, asserts powers as belonging to the President, which are inconsistent with the just authority of the two Houses of Congress, and inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That while the Senate is, and ever will be, ready to receive from the President all such messages and communications as the Constitution and laws and the usual course of business authorize him to transmit to it, yet it can not recognize any right in him to make a formal protest against votes and proceedings of the Senate, declaring such votes and proceeding to be illegal and unconstitutional, and requesting the Senate to enter such protest on its journals.

Resolved, That the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of the Senate, and that it be not entered on the Journal.

Resolved, That that President of the United States has no right to send a protest to the Senate against any of its proceedings.

1592. A protest by the minister of a foreign power against proposed action of the House was held to be an invasion of privilege.—On August 5, 1841,[3] Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, called the attention of the House to a communication from the minister of France to the Secretary of the Treasury, which accompanied the message of the President of the United States of the preceding day, and observed that he considered the fact of a foreign functionary addressing an official communication to any officer of this Government, except the head of the Department of State, a breach of official decorum; and the further fact of the remonstrance of such functionary against the passage of any measure pending before this House as a breach of the privileges of this House. He therefore moved, as a matter of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House by what authority the minister from France addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, remonstrating against the passage of a bill now pending before Congress.

Mr. Hopkins L. Turney, of Tennessee, objected to the reception of the resolution as a question of privilege, contending that the privileges of the House were not involved in the subject-matter of the correspondence referred to in the resolution.

The Speaker [1] decided against the objection taken by Mr. Turney, and that the rights, privileges, and dignity of the House were involved in the subject-matter touched upon in the resolution.

Mr. Turney having appealed, both the appeal and the resolution were laid on the table.

1593. Congress, by concurrent resolution, directs executive officers, to make investigations in river and harbor matters.—On February 1, 1906,[2] the following resolution was received from the Senate by message, and was on the same day referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the advisability of establishing a harbor of refuge by the construction of a breakwater on the island of Nantucket, Massachusetts, at or near the westerly side of Great Point, for the purpose of providing better protection for commerce and the lessening of the perils of navigation to coastwise traffic in the adjacent waters.

On February 2,[3] also, the following resolution was agreed to in the Senate and transmitted to the House:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made with a view to providing a harbor suitable for the largest boats at a point opposite or near the following-described land: Sections Nos. 33 and 34, township 37, range 8 west, Lake County, Ind.

The act of March 3, 1905,[4] provides:

That after the regular or formal reports made as required by law on any examination, survey, project, or work under way or proposed, are submitted no supplemental or additional report or estimate shall be made unless ordered by a concurrent resolution of Congress.

1594. A law confers on either House of Congress the power to direct by simple resolution that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor make certain investigations.—The act of February 14, 1903.[5] "to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor," provides that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall "from time to time make such special investigations and reports as he may be required to do by the President, or by either House of Congress, or which he himself may deem necessary and urgent."

The same act gives the Commissioner of Corporations, an officer under the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the power to compel testimony and the production of papers.

Acting under the provisions of this act—

On March 7, 1904,[1] the House agreed to this resolution:[2]

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to investigate the causes of the low prices of beef cattle in the United States since July 1, 1903, and the alleged large margins between the prices of beef cattle and the selling prices of fresh beef, and whether the said conditions have resulted in whole or in part from any contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of commerce, etc.

1595. The power of appointment to office belongs to the President, and Congress, by law, may not declare one an officer who is not such in fact.— By a message dated September 30, 1890,[3] President Benjamin Harrison returned to the House of Representatives, without his approval, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. No. 39) declaring the retirement of Capt. Charles B. Shivers, of the United States Army, legal and valid, and that he is entitled as such officer to his pay. The President says:

It is undoubtedly competent for Congress by an act or joint resolution to authorize the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, to appoint Captain Shivers to be a captain in the Army of the United States and to place him upon the retired list. It is also perfectly competent, by suitable legislation, for Congress to give to this officer the pay of this grade during the interval of time when he was improperly carried upon the Army lists. But the joint resolution, which I herewith return, does not attempt to deal with the case in that way. It undertakes to declare that the retirement of Captain Shivers was legal and valid, and that he always has been and is entitled to his pay as such officer. I do not think this is a competent method of giving the relief intended.

The message states the facts to be that Captain Shivers was summarily dismissed from the Army by order of the President on July 15, 1863. On August 11, 1863, an order was issued revoking this order of dismissal and restoring Captain Shivers to duty as an officer of the Army. On December 30, 1864, Captain Shivers, by proper order, was placed on the retired list of the Army. The Supreme Court (114 U. S., 619) had decided that the President had the authority to so separate an officer from the service; and that having been thus separated he could not be restored except by nomination to the Senate and confirmation thereby. The Attorney-General therefore gave an opinion that Captain Shivers was not an officer on the retired list of the Army.

This message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and was not acted on further.

vote of 117 yeas to 45 nays, the rules were suspended and the following resolution was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker for the purpose of investigating whether the President of the United States, or any other officer of the Government, has, by money, patronage, or other improper means, sought to influence the action of Congress, or any committee thereof, for or against the passage of any law appertaining to the rights of any State or Territory; and also to inquire into and investigate whether any officer or officers of the Government have, by combination or otherwise, prevented and defeated, or attempted to prevent or defeat, the execution of any law or laws now on the statute books; and whether the President has failed or refused to compel the execution of any law thereof, etc.

There was also a further resolution relating to the investigation of the use of money in elections and abuses in certain public offices.

The Speaker appointed as the committee Messrs. Covode, Abraham B. Olin (of New York), Warren Winslow (of North Carolina), Charles R. Train (of Massachusetts), and James C. Robinson (of Illinois).

On March 29, 1860,[1] a message was received from the President of the United State's in which he protested against the resolution, saying:

The House of Representatives possess no power under the Constitution over the first or accusatory portion of the resolution, except as an impeaching body; while over the last, in common with the Senate, their authority as a legislative body is fully and cheerfully admitted.

It is solely in reference to the first or impeaching power that I propose to make a few observations. Except in this single case, the Constitution has invested the House of Representatives with no power, no jurisdiction, no supremacy whatever over the President. In all other respects he is quite as independent of them as they are of him. As a coordinate branch of the Government, he is their equal. Indeed, he is the only direct representative on earth of the people of all and each of the sovereign States. To them, and to them alone, is he responsible while acting within the sphere of his constitutional duty, and not in any manner to the House of Representatives. * * *

The people have not confined the President to the exercise of executive duties. They have also conferred upon him a large measure of legislative discretion. No bill can become a law without his approval, as representing the people of the United States, unless it shall paw after his veto by a majority of two-thirds of both Houses. In his legislative capacity, he might, in common with the Senate and the House, institute an inquiry to ascertain any facts which ought to influence his judgment in approving or vetoing any bill.

This participation in the performance of legislative duties between the coordinate branches of the Government ought to inspire the conduct of all of them, in their relations toward each other, with mutual forbearance and respect. At least each has a right to demand justice from the other. The cause of complaint is, that the constitutional rights and immunities of the executive have been violated in the person of the President.

The President further protested that the resolution involved the preliminary proceedings of impeachment, and contended that, as in the case of Judge Peck[3] and in succeeding impeachments, the accusations should be set forth definitely and specifically, and should be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, which had always been considered the appropriate committee, according to proper forms. But the House of Representatives, by making John Covode chairman of the select committee had made the accuser the judge. Also the House, by adopting the resolution, had indorsed vague charges against the Executive, without permitting inquiry to be made as to specific charges. Thus the President was denied the privileges which the Constitution granted to the humblest citizen. He also contended that the proceeding tended to aggrandize the legislative department at the expense of the executive.

After debate the message was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. This committee reported [1] on April 9, 1860. This committee consisted of Messrs. John Hickman, of Pennsylvania; John A. Bingham, of Ohio; George S. Houston, of Alabama; Miles Taylor, of Louisiana; Thomas A. B. Nelson, of Tennessee; William Kellogg, of Illinois; John H. Reynolds, of New York; Christopher Robinson, of Rhode Island, and Albert G. Porter, of Indiana.

The report, to which Messrs. Houston and Taylor dissented, recommends the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That the House dissents from the doctrines of the special message of the President of the United States of March 28, 1860;

That the extent of power contemplated in the adoption of the resolutions of inquiry of March 5, 1860, is necessary to the proper discharge of the constitutional duties devolved upon Congress;

That judicial determinations, the opinions of former Presidents, and uniform usage sanction its exercise; and,

That to abandon it would leave the executive department of the Government without supervision or responsibility, and would be likely to lead to a concentration of power in the hands of the President, dangerous to the rights of a free people.

In support of these resolutions the report of the committee contends:

The President of the 'United States, under the Constitution, possesses neither privilege nor immunity beyond the humblest citizen, and is less favored in this respect than Senators and Representatives in Congress. Article 1, section 6, reads: "They (the Senators and Representatives) shall, in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same." No such exemption is made in behalf of the Executive or any other officer of Government. The conduct of the President is always subject to the constitutional supervision and judgment of Congress; while he, on the contrary, has no such power over either branch of that body. He is left, under the law, without shield or protection of any kind, except such as is borne by all. He is as amenable for all his acts after inauguration as before. He can make no plea which is denied to any other citizen, and is subject to the same scrutiny, trial, and punishment, with the proceedings, hazards, and penalties of impeachment superadded. The President and the citizen stand upon equality of rights. The distinction between them arises from an inequality of duties. Wherever the conduct of the latter is open to inquiry and charge, that of the former is not the less so. The President affirms, with seeming seriousness, in comparing himself with the House of Representatives, that, "as a coordinate branch of the Government, he is their equal." This is denied in emphatic terms. He is "coordinate," but not coequal. He is "coordinate," for he "holds the same rank;" but he is not coequal, for his immunities and powers are less. The Members of the House may claim a, privilege, whether right or wrong, which he can not, and the executive or law executing power must always be inferior to the legislative or law-making power. The latter is omnipotent within the limits of the Constitution; the former is subject not only to the Constitution, but to the determinations of the latter also. To repeat the point: The President is not, in any respect, superior to the citizen, merely because he is bound to discharge more numerous duties; and he is not coequal with that branch of Government which helps to impose and define those duties. The fact that he holds a limited veto over the legislation of Congress can not affect the soundness of the views here briefly presented. His claim to "legislative capacity," in other words, to possess legislative power, will scarcely be conceded in view of Article I, section 1, of the Constitution, declaring that, "All legislative powers herein (therein) granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

[1] House Report No. 394, first session Thirty-sixth Congress.

The committee then go on to discuss the President's assumption that the resolution charged him with the commission of high crimes and misdemeanors. They deny that it was a charge. It was a mere inquiry, as the language of the resolution would show. But even if the charges were, proper for impeachment, the House might proceed in any way it might consider proper, either according to the precedent of the case of Judge Peck, or according to other forms.

The committee drew a distinction between this case and the protest of President Jackson against the Senate resolution of March 28, 1834, wherein the President was censured. The resolutions of the House in this case did not propose censure, but merely an inquiry.

The appointment of the Member moving the resolution as chairman of the committee was in accordance with "a practice in legislation coextensive with our national existence."

The propriety of inquiry into the acts of the Executive had been admitted by Presidents Jackson and Polk, and the necessity for the full and unrestricted exercise of the power in question is so overruling as to prevent its surrender: (1) With a view to impeachment; (2) for the purpose of legislation; (3) to protect the privileges of Congress.

The committee replied to the statement that the legislative power would be aggrandized unduly, by pointing out that the fears of the fathers that the Executive would be unduly aggrandized, were more likely to be realized.

On June 8 the resolution of the committee was agreed to,[1] yeas 87, nays 40.[2]

[1] Journal, p. 1041; Globe, pp. 2774–2776.

Chapter LI.

POWER TO PUNISH FOR CONTEMPT.

1597. Discussion by Jefferson as to the inherent power of the House to punish for contempts without prior sanction of law.—Thomas Jefferson, in his Manual written for the use of the Senate and in 1837 adopted as a guide for the House in all cases not provided for by its rules and orders, has the following in his discussion of the subject of privilege:

So far there will probably be no difference of opinion as to the privileges of the two Houses of Congress; but in the following cases it is otherwise: In December, 1795, the House of Representatives committed two persons of the name of Randall and Whitney for attempting to corrupt the integrity of certain Members, which they considered as a contempt and breach of the privileges of the House; and the facts being proved, Whitney was detained in confinement a fortnight, and Randall three weeks, and was reprimanded by the Speaker. In March, 1796, the House of Representatives voted a challenge given to a Member of their House to be a breach of the privileges of the House;[1] but satisfactory apologies and acknowledgments being made, no further proceeding was had. The editor of the Aurora having, in his paper of February 19,1800, inserted some paragraphs defamatory of the Senate, and failed in his appearance, he was ordered to be committed. In debating the legality of this order it was insisted in support of it that every man, by the law of nature, and every body of men, possesses the right of self-defense; that all public functionaries are essentially invested with the powers of self-preservation; that they have an inherent right to do all acts necessary to keep themselves in a condition to discharge the trusts confided to them; that whenever authorities are given, the means of carrying them into execution are given by necessary implication; that thus we see the British Parliament exercise the right of punishing contempts; all the State legislatures exercise the same power, and every court does the same; that if we have it not, we sit at the mercy of every intruder who may enter our doors or gallery, and, by noise and tumult, render proceeding in business impracticable; that if our tranquillity is to be perpetually disturbed by newspaper defamation, it will not be possible to exercise our functions with the requisite coolness and deliberation; and that we must therefore have a power to punish these disturbers of our peace and proceedings. To this it was answered that the Parliament and courts of England have cognizance of contempts by the express provisions of their law; that the State legislatures have equal authority because their powers are plenary; they represent their constituents completely, and possess all their powers, except such as their constitutions have expressly denied them; that the courts of the several States have the same powers by the laws of their States, and those of the Federal Government by the same State laws adopted in each State, by a law of Congress; that none of these bodies, therefore, derive those powers from natural or necessary right, but from express law; that Congress have no such natural or necessary power, nor any powers but such as are given them by the Constitution; that that has given them directly exemption from personal arrest, exemption from question elsewhere for what is said in their House, and power over their own Members and proceedings; for these no further law is necessary, the Constitution being the law; that, moreover, by that article of the Constitution which authorizes them "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in them," they may provide by law for an undisturbed exercise of their functions, e. g., for the punishment of contempts, of affrays or tumult in their presence, etc., but, till the law be made, it does not exist, and does not exist from their own neglect; that, in the meantime, however, they are not unprotected, the ordinary magistrates and courts of law being open and competent to punish all unjustifiable disturbances or defamations, and even their own sergeant, who may appoint deputies ad libitum to aid him (3 Grey, 59, 147, 255), is equal to small disturbances; that in requiring a previous law, the Constitution had regard to the inviolability of the citizen, as well as of the Member; as, should one House, in the regular form of a bill, aim at too broad privileges, it may be checked by the other, and both by the President; and also as, the law being promulgated, the citizen will know how to avoid offense. But if one branch may assume its own privileges without control, if it may do it on the spur of the occasion, conceal the law in its own breast, and, after the fact committed, make its sentence both the law and the judgment on that fact; if the offense is to be kept undefined and to be declared only ex re nata, and according to the passions of the moment, and there be no limitation either in the manner or measure of the punishment, the condition of the citizen will be perilous indeed. Which of these doctrines is to prevail time will decide. Where there is no fixed law, the judgment on any particular case is the law of that single case only, and dies with it. When a new and even a similar case arises, the judgment which is to make and at the same time apply the law is open to question and consideration, as are all new laws. Perhaps Congress in the meantime, in their care for the safety of the citizen, as well as that for their own protection, may declare by law what is necessary and proper to enable them to carry into execution the powers vested in them, and thereby hang, up a rule for the inspection of all, which may direct the conduct of the citizen, and at the same time test the judgments they shall themselves pronounce in their own case.

1598. It was found inexpedient to define the offense of contempt of the House by law and provide a punishment.—On February 13, 1837,[1] Mr. Andrew Beaumont, of Pennsylvania, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill defining the offense of a contempt of this House, and to provide for the punishment thereof.

After debate a motion was made that the resolution lie on the table, and was decided in the negative. Then, after further debate, the resolution was disagreed to.

1599. The contempt cases of Randall and Whitney in 1795.

On the evidence of Members who in their places gave information of attempts to bribe them, the House issued an order for the arrest of the person charged with the offense.

Arrests are made by the Sergeant-at-Arms on authority of a warrant duly signed, attested, and sealed; and on performing the duty that officer makes return on the warrant.

[1] Second session Twenty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 386; Debates, p. 1755.

On December 28, 1795,[1] information being given to the House by the following Members in their places, to wit, William Smith (South Carolina), William V. Murray (Maryland), and William B. Giles (Virginia), that a person of the name of Robert Randall had made or communicated to them, respectively, certain overtures to obtain their several support in this House to a memorial intended to be presented by the said Robert Randall, on behalf of himself and others, for the grant of a tract of land containing 18,000,000 or 20,000,000 acres, bordering on Lakes Erie, Michigan, and Huron, and lying within the limits of the United States; for which support the said Members, respectively, were promised to receive of the said Robert Randall and his associates a consideration or emoluments in lands or money; and this House, regarding the said information as sufficient evidence of a contempt to, and breach of the privileges of, this House, in an unwarrantable attempt to corrupt the integrity of its Members, it was—

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of the said Robert Randall, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of the House.

A warrant, pursuant to this resolution, was accordingly prepared, signed by Mr. Speaker, under his seal, attested by the Clerk and delivered to the Sergeant-at-Arms, with order forthwith to execute the same and make due return thereof to the House.

Information being also given to the House, by Mr. Daniel Buck, one of the Members from Vermont, of an application to him by a person of the name of Charles Whitney, by which there was good reason to believe that the said Whitney was a partner and associate of the before-named Randall, etc., so action was taken against Whitney similar to that already taken against Randall, although at first there was hesitation because it was reported that Whitney was already in custody of a magistrate.

On December 29[2] the Sergeant-at Arms made a return on the warrants, that he had executed the same on the bodies of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney, who were taken into custody on the preceding day, and were held subject to the further direction of the House.

1600. The contempt cases of Randall and Whitney, continued.

In 1795 proceedings against persons in contempt were taken in accordance with recommendations by a select committee on privileges.

Form of arraignment of Randall and Whitney in 1795.

Instance wherein the House amended its charges against a person already arraigned for contempt.

Thereupon the House authorized the appointment of a Committee of Privileges to report "a mode of proceeding," and Messrs. Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; William Smith, of South Carolina; William B. Giles, of Virginia; William V. Murray, of Maryland; Edward Livingston, of New York; Joshua Coit, of Connecticut, and Benjamin Goodhue, of Massachusetts, were appointed.

This committee on the same day [1] reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the said Robert Randall and Charles Whitney be brought to the bar of the House and interrogated by the Speaker touching the information given against them, on written interrogatories, which with the answers thereto shall be entered on the minutes of the House. And that every question proposed by a Member be reduced to writing and a motion made that the same be put by the Speaker. That, after such interrogatories are answered, if the House deem it necessary to make any further inquiry on the subject, the same be conducted by a committee to be appointed for that purpose.

The said Robert Randall was accordingly brought to the bar of the House in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms; and the charge against him being read, he was interrogated by Mr. Speaker—whether he did admit or deny the truth of the said charge.

to which interrogatory he answered that he was not prepared to admit or deny the same, but requested that time might be allowed him to answer, and offer a vindication of his conduct, until the day after tomorrow.

Whereupon it was Ordered, That the said Robert Randall do now withdraw in custody, until the House shall presently decide on his request.

The said Robert Randall accordingly withdrew in custody; and after debate the House decided that he be allowed until 12 o'clock tomorrow to make answer.

The House also resolved

That it be an addition to the charge against the said Robert Randall "that he informed a Member of this House that a number of the Members of this House, not less than thirty, had engaged or were engaged to support his memorial and application, or words to that effect."

The said Robert Randall was then returned to the bar in custody and notified by Mr. Speaker of the indulgence and further proceeding of the House respecting him; after which it was Ordered, That he be detained in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and brought again to the bar at 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Charles Whitney was then brought to the bar in custody, the charges against him read, and thereupon he was interrogated by the Speaker.[2] The Speaker seems to have asked the questions according to his own judgment, none being suggested by Members. In response to one question the respondent denied that he had offered any improper inducements to Mr. Buck at his house in Vermont.

Thereupon Mr. Buck informed the House that the respondent had offered him land and money.

On motion it was then

Ordered, That the respondent withdraw in custody, that the proceedings respecting him be adjourned until tomorrow at 12 o'clock, and that he be kept in custody separate and apart from Robert Randall.

1601. The contempt cases of Randall and Whitney, continued.

The House permitted a person arraigned for contempt in 1795 to be represented before the House by counsel.

On December 30[1] a petition of Robert Randall was presented and read praying that he might be indulged with the assistance of counsel, and a reasonable time to prepare for his defense.

Considerable debate arose as to the propriety of permitting counsel, and also as to whether or not the examination should be by a select committee or before the House. It was urged that these proceedings were peculiar, not analogous to process in the courts, where the Constitution provided for counsel and trial by jury. This process was justified by the inherent power of the House to take measures for its own preservation; and there was no obligation to permit counsel, although it might be done as a matter of favor.

The House decided that Randall's petition should be granted. He was then brought to the bar in custody, and it being demanded of him by Mr. Speaker "what further time he required to prepare for his defense?" he answered "until Friday next."

The House then ordered that he have the time asked, and in the meantime be remanded to custody.

The Speaker then laid before the House a document which had been given up by Charles Whitney to the Sergeant-at-Arms, and which purported to be an agreement relating to the land scheme, from which the proceedings had arisen. The document was read and laid on the table.

Charles Whitney was then brought in under custody, and the further information against him, given by Mr. Buck on the preceding day, being read to him, he was interrogated by the Speaker "whether he did admit or deny the same?"

To which he answered that he did wholly deny the same.

Thereupon he was remanded to custody.

1602. The contempt cases of Randall and Whitney, continued.

A person being on trial for contempt, both the information given by Members and their testimony were required to be under oath.

In 1795 the House decided to hear the case of a person arrested for contempt at the bar rather than by a select committee.

In 1795 the House introduced a district judge to administer oaths to witnesses in a contempt case heard at the bar of the House.

Method of examining witnesses through the Speaker in a contempt case tried at the bar of the House in 1795.

In a contempt case tried at the bar of the House the prisoner and counsel withdrew during deliberations of the House.

Then, as to whether or not the examination should be by select committee or before the House debate arose, it being urged that the dignity of the House demanded an open inquiry rather than secret proceedings before a select committee. The matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges.

On December 31[2] the Committee on Privileges submitted their report. This report included several provisions that were the subject of debate. It was urged that the information to be given by Members in writing over their signatures should also be sworn to; but the argument was made that this was a proceeding by privilege, not by law, and that the word of the Member was sufficient. On the other hand, it was argued that no citizen should be punished without the solemnity of an oath, and that where the offense was not committed in the presence of the House it was proper for the information to be on oath. Another question arose as to the proposed introduction of the district judge to administer oaths. It was urged that this would be an encroachment on the privileges of the House; but the House declined to take this view. And finally a contention arose as to whether or not an oath should be required of Members who should testify as well as of the witnesses for the accused. The Committee on Privileges had reported in favor of requiring an oath of the latter only, and it was argued in support of this that the oath taken by a Member when he took his seat was sufficient. On the other hand, it was urged that the trial should proceed as in the courts. The House decided to amend the report in this respect.

[2] Annals, pp. 185–195.

On January 1[1] the report was adopted in form as follows:

That the proper mode of conducting the further inquiry and the trial in the case of Robert Randall and Charles Whitney will be to proceed, first, with a further hearing of Robert Randall at the bar of the House.

That the information that has been given against the said Robert Randall and Charles Whitney be reduced to writing and signed by the informants themselves, respectively, and entered at large on the Journal. That the said information be read to the prisoners, and that they be called upon by the Speaker to declare what they have to say in their defense.

That if the said prisoners shall offer any parole evidence in their exculpation the same shall be heard at the bar of the House, excepting the Members of the House, who may give their testimony on oath in their places; and no question shall be put to any Member on the part of the prisoner by way of cross-examination, except leave be first given by the House, and every such question shall be put by the Speaker; and that the judge of the district of Pennsylvania be requested to attend for the purpose of administering an oath or affirmation to all witnesses. That all questions on the part of the House to be asked of the said witnesses shall be put by the Speaker.

That in every debate the prisoners and their counsel shall be directed to withdraw; and that when they shall have concluded their defense and are withdrawn, the sense of the House shall be taken on the guilt or innocence of the prisoners, respectively.

January 4[2] the Members delivered at the Clerk's table their several informations showing attempts to corrupt them at the seat of Government. Then Robert Randall was arraigned, being attended by counsel, Messrs. Lewis and Tilghman; and the informations were read to him.

It was then demanded of him by Mr. Speaker: "What have you to say in your defense?" To which he answered that he was "not guilty."

In response to further demand by the Speaker, he said he had no witness whom he wished examined.

His counsel asked, however, that the informations delivered against him might be attested by oaths of the informant Members, and that he be permitted to examine them under oath.

The prisoner and counsel having retired, after debate the House adopted the following:

Resolved, That the prisoner be informed that if he has any questions to propose to the informants or other Members of the House he is at liberty to put them in the mode already prescribed; that the said informant Members be sworn to the declaration just read, and also to answer such questions as shall be asked of them touching the same.

Oaths were then administered by the district judge.

Various Members of the House were questioned on behalf of the respondent in the manner prescribed in the resolution of the House.

1603. The contempt cases of Randall and Whitney, continued.

For contempt in attempting to bribe its Members the House committed Robert Randall in 1795.

The House, in 1795, declined to take action that would seem to imply a definition of its privileges.

Is an attempt to bribe a Member at a place other than the seat of government, and before he has taken his seat, a breach of privilege?

On January 5[1] counsel for the respondent made an argument and on the next day[2] the House proceeded to a final decision. The following resolution was proposed, but set aside:

Resolved, That the said Robert Randall has thereby committed a high contempt of this House and a breach of privilege.

It was then voted by yeas and nays, 78 to 17, as follows:

Resolved, That it appears to this House that Robert Randall has been guilty of a contempt to, and a breach of the privileges of, this House by attempting to corrupt the integrity of its Members in the manner laid to his charge.

Resolved, That the said Robert Randall be brought to the bar, reprimanded by the Speaker, and committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms until further order of this House.

January 7[3] the case of Whitney was taken up. His case was distinguished from that of Randall by the fact that he had attempted to corrupt a Member-elect before he had taken his seat and away from the seat of government. Various propositions were made to declare the case not one of privilege, because of one or both of these reasons; but objection was made to a definition of privilege, and finally, by a vote of yeas 52 to nays 30, a simple resolution discharging Whitney from custody was agreed to.

On January 12[4] Randall petitioned that he be released from imprisonment and on January 13 the House adopted a resolution that he be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

On Much 8, 1800,[1] after a debate that had began on February 26, and after the discussion and rejection of several propositions, the Senate agreed to the following by a vote of 19 yeas to 8 nays:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges be, and they are hereby, directed to consider and report what measures it will be proper for the Senate to adopt in relation to a publication in the newspaper printed in the city of Philadelphia on Wednesday morning, the 19th of February, 1800, called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, in which it is asserted that the bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States had passed the Senate, when, in fact, it had not passed; in which it is also asserted that the Hon. Mr. Pinckney, a Senator from the State of South Carolina, and a member of the committee, who brought before the Senate the bill aforesaid, had never been consulted on the subject, whereas, in fact, he was present at each meeting of the committee; and generally to report what measures ought to be adopted in relation to sundry expressions contained in said paper respecting the Senate of the United States, and the members thereof, in their official capacity.

On March 18[3] the committee submitted the following report, which, as agreed to on March 19 and 20, contains a statement of the entire case:

Whereas on the 19th of February, now last past, the Senate of the United States being in session in the city of Philadelphia, the following publication was made in the newspaper, printed in the said city of Philadelphia, called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, viz:

"In our paper of the 27th ultimo we noticed the introduction of a measure into the Senate of the United States, by Mr. Ross, calculated to influence and affect the approaching Presidential election, and to frustrate, in a particular manner, the wishes and interests of the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"We this day lay before the public a copy of that bill as it has passed the Senate.

"Some curious facts are connected with this measure, and the people of the Union at large are intermediately, and the people of this State immediately, interested to consider the movements, the mode of operation, and the effects.

"We noticed a few days ago the caucuses (or secret consultations) held in the Senate Chamber. An attempt was made in an evening paper to give a counteraction (for these people are admirable at the system of intrigue) to the development of the Aurora, and to call those meetings jacobinical; we must cordially assent to the jacobinism of those meetings—they were in the perfect spirit of a jacobinical conclave.

"The plain facts we stated are, however, unquestionable; but we have additional information to give on the subject of those meetings. We stated that intrigues for the Presidential election were among the objects. We now state it as a fact that can not be disputed upon fair ground, that the bill we this day present was discussed in the caucus on Wednesday evening last.

"It is worthy of remark how this bill grew into existence.

"The opponents of independence and republican government who supported Mr. Ross in the contest against Mr. McKean are well known by the indecency, the slander, and the falsehood of the measures they pursued—and it is well known they are all devoted to the Federal party, which we dissected on Monday. Mr. Ross proposed this bill in the Federal Senate (how consistently with the decency of his friends will be seen), a committee of five was appointed to prepare a bill on the subject; on this committee Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, was appointed. On Thursday morning last (the caucus held the preceding evening) Mr. Ross informed Mr. Pinckney that the committee had drawn up a bill on the subject, when in fact Mr. Pinckney had never been consulted on the subject, though a member of the committee. The bill was introduced and passed as below.

"On this occasion it may not be impertinent to introduce an anecdote which will illustrate the nature of the caucuses, and show that our popular Government may, in the hands of a faction, be as completely abused, as the French constitution has been, by the self-created consuls:

[2] This debate is reported at length in vol. 6 of Annals, pp. 66–106.

[3] Senate Journal, pp. 51–54; Annals, pp. 111–115.

"In the summer session of 1798, when Federal thunder and violence were belched from the pestiferous lungs of more than one despotic minion, a caucus was held at the house of Mr. Bingham, in this city. It was composed of Members of the Senate, and there were present seventeen Members. The Senate consisting of thirty-two Members, this number was of course a majority, and the session was a full one.

"Prior to deliberation on the measures of war, navy, army, democratic proscription, etc., it was proposed and agreed to that all the Members present should solemnly pledge themselves to act firmly upon the measures to be agreed to by the majority of the persons present at the caucus.

"The measures were perfectly in the high tone of that extraordinary session. But upon a division of the caucus it was found that they were divided nine against eight. This majority, however, held the minority to their engagement, and the whole seventeen voted in the Senate upon all the measures discussed at the caucus.

"Thus it is seen that a secret self-appointed meeting of seventeen persons dictated laws to the United States; and, not only that, nine of that seventeen had the full command and power over the consciences and votes of the other eight, but that nine possessed, by the turpitude of the eight, actually all the power which the Constitution declares shall be vested in the majority only. In other words, a minority of nine Members of the Senate ruled the other twenty-three Members.

"It is easily conceivable, as in the recent changes in France, that the spirit of caucusing may be conducted in progression down to two or three persons; thus three leading characters may agree to act upon measures approved by any two of them, these three may add two others, and they would be a majority of five; and those adding four others would be a majority of nine; and this nine possess all the power of a majority of twenty-three.

"Yet such is the way we are treated—by those who call themselves Federalists.

"The following bill is an offspring of this spirit of faction secretly working, and it will be found to be in perfect accord with the outrageous proceedings of the same party in our State legislature who are bent on depriving this State of its share in an election that may involve the fate of the country and posterity."

Resolved, That the said publication contains assertions and pretended information respecting the Senate and the committee of the Senate, and their proceedings, which are false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States; and that the said publication is a high breach of the privileges of this House.

Resolved, That William Duane, now residing in the city of Philadelphia, the editor of the said newspaper called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, be, and he is hereby, ordered to attend at the bar of this House, on Monday, the 24th of March, instant, at 12 o'clock, at which time he will have opportunity to make any proper defense for his conduct in publishing the aforesaid false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious assertions and pretended information; and the Senate will then proceed to take further order on the subject; and a copy of this and the foregoing resolution, under the authentication of the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and attested as a true copy by James Mather, Sergeant-at-Arms for the said Senate, and left by the said Sergeant-at-Arms with the said William Duane, or at the office of the Aurora, on or before the 22d day of March, instant, shall be deemed sufficient notice for the said Duane to attend in obedience to this resolution.

On March 22,[1] the Committee on Privileges reported the following form of proceeding:

When William Duane shall present himself at the bar of the House, in obedience to the order of the 20th instant, the President of the Senate is to address him as follows:

First. William Duane:

You stand charged by the Senate of the United States, as editor of the newspaper called the General Advertiser, or Aurora, of having published in the same, on the 19th of February now last past, false, scandalous, defamatory and malicious assertions and pretended information respecting the Senate and the committee of the Senate and their proceedings, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States, and therein to have been guilty of a high breach of the privileges of this House.

[1] Senate Journal p. 55; Annals, p. 117.

Then the Secretary shall read the resolutions of the Senate, passed the 20th instant, and with the preamble; after which the President is to proceed as follows, viz:

First. Have you anything to say in excuse or extenuation for said publication?

Secondly. If he shall make no answer the Sergeant-at-Arms shall take him into custody, and retiring with him from the Senate Chamber until the Senate shall be ready for a decision, at which time the Sergeant-at-Arms shall again set him at the bar of the House and the President of the Senate is to pronounce to him the decision.

Thirdly. If he shall answer, he is to continue at the bar of the House until the testimony (if any be adduced) shall be closed and then he shall retire while the Senate are deliberating on the case; and when a decision is agreed upon, the said Duane, being notified of the time by the Sergeant-at-Arms verbally, or by a written notice left at his office, shall appear at the bar of the House, and the President of the Senate is to pronounce to him the decision.

On March 24,[1] Duane appeared at the bar of the Senate, and, the charges against him having been read, requested that he be allowed the assistance of counsel.

Thereupon he was ordered to withdraw, and after debate the following resolutions were agreed to:

Resolved, That William Duane, having appeared at the bar of the Senate and requested to be heard by counsel on the charge against him for a breach of privileges of the Senate, he be allowed the assistance of counsel while personally attending at the bar of the Senate, who may be heard in denial of any facts charged against said Duane, or in excuse and extenuation of his offense.

Resolved, That a copy of the resolution last agreed to be sent to William Duane, and at the same time he be ordered to attend at the bar of this House at 12 o'clock on Wednesday next.

On Wednesday, March 26[2]—

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms, at the bar of the House, do call William Duane, and the said William Duane did not appear.

Whereupon, on motion—

Resolved, That as William Duane has not appeared at the bar of this House, in obedience to the order of the 24th instant, and has addressed a letter to the President of the Senate, which has been read this morning, in which he refuses any further attendance, his letter be referred to the Committee of Privileges, to consider and report thereon.

On March 27[3] the Committee on Privileges reported the following resolution, which was agreed to, yeas 16, nays 11:

Resolved, That William Duane, editor of the General Advertiser, or Aurora having neglected and refused to appear at the bar of this House at 12 o'clock on the 26th day of March, instant, pursuant to the order of the 24th instant, of which order he had been duly notified; and having sent the following letter to the President of the Senate, which has been communicated to the Senate, viz:

"To the President of the Senate:

"SIR: I beg of you to lay before the Senate this acknowledgment of my having received an authenticated copy of their resolutions on Monday last, in my case. Copies of those resolutions I transmitted to Messrs. Dallas and Cooper, my intended counsel, soliciting their professional aid; a copy of my letter enclosed, marked A. Their answers I have also the pleasure to enclose, marked B and C. I find myself, in consequence of these answers, deprived of all professional assistance, under the restrictions which the Senate have thought fit to adopt. I therefore think myself bound by the most sacred duties to decline any further voluntary attendance upon that body, and leave them to pursue such measures in this case as in their wisdom they may deem meet.

"I am, sir, with perfect respect, is guilty of a contempt of said order and of this House, and that, for said contempt, he, the said William Duane, be taken into custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, to be kept subject to the further orders of the Senate.

The committee further reported the following resolution, which was agreed to, yeas 18, nays 11:

Resolved, That a warrant issue signed by the President of the Senate, in the following form, viz:

UNITED STATES,

The 27th day of March, 1800, ss:

Whereas the Senate of the United States, on the 18th day of March, 1800, then being in session in the city of Philadelphia, did resolve that a publication in the General Advertiser or Aurora, a newspaper printed in the said city of Philadelphia, on Wednesday, the 19th of February, then last past, contained assertions and pretended information respecting the Senate and committee of the Senate, and their proceedings which were false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States; and that the said publication was a high breach of the privileges of the House.

And whereas the Senate did then further resolve and order that the said William Duane, resident in the said city, and editor of said newspaper, should appear at the bar of the House on Monday, the 24th day of March, instant, that he might then have opportunity to make any proper defense for his conduct in publishing the aforesaid false, defamatory, Scandalous, and malicious assertions and pretended information.

And whereas the said William Duane did appear on said day at the bar of the House, pursuant to said order, and requested counsel, and the Senate, by their resolution of the 24th day of March, instant,

"Resolved, That William Duane, having appeared at the bar of the Senate and requested to be heard by counsel on the charge against him for a breach of privileges of the Senate, he be allowed the assistance of counsel while personally attending at the bar of the Senate, who might be heard in denial of any facts charged against said Duane, or in excuse and extenuation of his offense, and that the said William Duane should attend at the bar of the Senate on Wednesday, then next, at 12 o'clock, of which the said Duane had due notice."

And whereas said William Duane, in contempt of the said last-mentioned order, did neglect and refuse to appear at the bar of the Senate at the time specified therein, and the Senate of the United States, on the 27th day of March, instant, did thereupon resolve that the said William Duane was guilty of a contempt of said order of the Senate, and that for said contempt he, the said William Duane, should be taken into custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending the Senate, to be kept for their further orders. All which appears by the journals of the Senate of the United States now in session in the said city of Philadelphia.

These are, therefore, to require you, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms for the Senate of the United States, forthwith to take into your custody the body of the said William Duane, now resident in the said city of Philadelphia, and him safely to keep, subject to the further order of the Senate; and all marshals and deputy marshals and civil officers of the United States, and every other person, are hereby required to be aiding and assisting to you in the execution thereof, for which this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand, this 27th day of March, 1800.

THOMAS JEFFERSON,
PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

On May 14,[1] the last day of the session, the Senate, by a vote of yeas 13, nays 4, agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to instruct the proper law officer to commence and carry on a prosecution against William Duane, editor of the newspaper called the Aurora, for certain false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious publications in said newspaper, of the 19th of February last, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States.

Proceedings instituted against Duane in accordance with this request resulted in a sentence of imprisonment for thirty days and the payment of cost of prosecution.[2]

1605. The arrest by a civil magistrate of an officer of the House for an act performed in the service of the House was deemed a high breach of privilege.

A spectator in the gallery having created disturbance, the Speaker ordered his arrest.

On December 22, 1800,[1] a spectator, one James Lane, in the gallery applauded by clapping his hands. The Speaker[2] at once directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to attend to the disturbance, and the Sergeant-at-Arms at once went into the gallery and took the person out, keeping him in confinement about two hours.

The spectator obtained a warrant for the arrest of the Sergeant-at-Arms, who was apprehended and conducted before a magistrate, by whom, after a time he was released, James Lane not appearing to prosecute.

On December 30,[3] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms on the subject, which was referred to a select committee on privileges.

On January 6, 1801,[4] the committee reported a resolution that it was not expedient for the House to take any further order on the letter from Joseph Wheaton, Sergeant-at-Arms.

This was agreed to, yeas 58, nays 30.

The report was then presented to the House, as follows:

That the representation made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, contains a correct statement of facts; and that he, in the opinion of the committee, is to be commended for the promptitude and fidelity with which he executed the order of the Speaker, to apprehend the person guilty of indecent and disorderly conduct in the gallery.

The committee have reason to believe, from the best information they can obtain, that the person who committed the disorder (and who has since absconded), was, at the time, intoxicated with liquor.

The magistrate, by whose warrant the Sergeant-at-Arms was arrested and held in custody, for discharging his duty in the premises, has explained his conduct, in a letter accompanying this report. The suggestion made to him, that any one Member of this House was consulted relative to the prosecution of the Sergeant-at-Arms, is, by the committee, presumed to be wholly false; as it would imply in such Member, not only a disregard of all sense of personal propriety, but also an inexcusable contempt for the honor and dignity of the House.

That, although the arrest and confinement of an officer of the House of Representatives, for any act by him performed in its service, and in obedience to its orders, must be deemed a high breach of its privileges; yet as the magistrate, in the present case, seems rather to have been deceived by false representations, than influenced by improper views, the committee can not consider his conduct as a subject of animadversion.

They are therefore of opinion, that it is not expedient for the House to take any further order on the letter of Joseph Wheaton.

The question being put on agreeing to this report, there were yeas 50, nays 38; so the report was agreed to.

The debate showed that the power of the Speaker to order the arrest of a person in the gallery, and of the Sergeant-at-Arms to make the arrest, was questioned. The Speaker said that he considered himself possessed of the power to arrest and confine a person for disorderly behavior during the present sitting, subject to the instructions of the House. He had not claimed the power to confine an individual beyond that time.

1606. The contempt case of John Anderson before the House in 1818.

A citizen having attempted to bribe a Member, the House arrested, tried, and punished him.

Discussion of the power of the House to issue a general warrant.

Discussion of the power of the House to punish for a breach of its privileges.

The House appointed a committee of privileges to determine the procedure in the Anderson contempt case.

In the case of John Anderson, the accused and witnesses were examined at the bar of the House.

For attempting to bribe a Member John Anderson was censured by the Speaker at the bar of the House.

On January 7, 1818,[1] Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, arose and laid before the House a letter from Col. John Anderson, in which the latter requested him to accept $500 as "part pay for extra trouble" in furthering claims from the River Raisin. Mr. Williams also submitted a signed statement from himself.

On the letter and statement being read, on motion of Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia—

Resolved, unanimously, That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of John Anderson, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of this House.

Mr. Forsyth explained that he had, in drawing up the resolution, followed the precedent of 1795.[2]

Before the adoption of the resolution there was some question as to the authority of the House to issue a general warrant, which was spoken of as opposed to the principles of civil liberty. The Speaker[3] observed that, in the practice of the House, happily, instances were extremely rare where such a warrant became necessary. No such case had occurred within his observation. But there could be no doubt, when an offense was committed against the privileges or dignity of the House, it was perfectly in its power to issue a warrant to apprehend the party offending. The Speaker also expressed the opinion that the facts on which the warrant was issued need not be substantiated by oath.

On January 8, Colonel Anderson having been arrested, an extended debate arose on Mr. Forsyth's motion for the appointment of a committee on privileges to report a mode of procedure. It was objected that neither the Constitution nor the law gave any authority to the House to punish, and that the great and oppressive powers assumed in this respect by the British Parliament were no precedent here. The House might protect itself from indecorum and insult, but might not punish individuals for acts done elsewhere. It was better to suffer a hundred insults than to trample on the rights of the individual. The precedent of 1795 was set by "a high-handed party majority, full of British notions and fond of British precedents."

[3] Henry Clay, of Kentucky.

On the other hand, it was said that there must be in the House the power to resist the advances of bribery and corruption, since the Constitution, in giving being to the House, must have given it every attribute necessary to its security and its purity. The House of Commons acted as a House in its punishment for contempts; therefore the different functions of Parliament, as compared with Congress, did not prevent the precedents of the Commons from being valuable. The precedent of 1795 had not been set by party influence, since of the 78 who voted for the proceedings 39 were afterwards, when the parties were formed, known as Republicans.

The Committee on Privileges being authorized by the House, it was composed of Messrs. John Forsyth, of Georgia; Joseph Hopkinson, of Pennsylvania; Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia; John Sergeant, of Pennsylvania; Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky; Timothy Pitkin, of Connecticut, and John W. Taylor, of New York.

This committee reported the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That John Anderson be brought to the bar of the House and interrogated by the Speaker, on written interrogatories, touching the charge of writing and delivering a letter to a Member of the House offering him a bribe, which, with his answers thereto, shall be entered on the minutes of the House; and that every question proposed by a Member be reduced to writing and a motion made that the same be put by the Speaker, and the question and answer shall be entered on the minutes of the House. That after such interrogatories are answered, if the House deem it necessary to make further inquiry on the subject, the same be conducted by a committee appointed for that purpose.

Anderson then appeared at the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms; and the Speaker addressed him, informing him why he had been brought before the House, and that the House would take into consideration any request of his for counsel, leave to summon witnesses, etc.

And Anderson having stated his requests and retired, the House resolved to allow him counsel and ordered that the Clerk issue processes for his witnesses; also that a copy of the letter of accusation be furnished him. Then he was brought to the bar and the resolution communicated to him by the Speaker.

In the midst of the proceedings Mr. John C. Spencer, of New York, presented a resolution that, because of great doubt of the power of the House to punish Anderson for contempt, the case should be turned over to the Attorney-General of the United States, and that the Committee on the Judiciary should inquire into the expediency of providing a law for the punishment of contempt. A very long and exhaustive debate arose. The authority of the law of Parliament was denied, and it was contended that the House had only such privileges as were defined in Article I, section 6, and all cases not enumerated there were obviously excluded. There were no inherent powers, except those specifically enumerated. This argument was made by Mr. Philip P. Barbour, of Virginia, and Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of the same State, replied that in Virginia "from the form of the speaker's chair to the power of expelling a member the character and authority of the house of delegates is derived, without any express constitutional provision, from the House of Commons, the archetype of the popular branch of every State legislature, as it is of this House."

The resolution of Mr. Spencer was, at the end of the debate, postponed indefinitely, by a vote of 117 to 42.

Then, on January 15, it was voted that Anderson be brought to the bar of the House, where the Speaker propounded to him certain questions, which he answered. Then witnesses were examined, the Speaker and Anderson questioning them. On January 16 the Speaker propounded further interrogatories, the remaining witnesses summoned by Anderson were examined, and then Anderson was heard in his own defense.

After this he was removed from the bar and the House came to final action in his case. Mr. Forsyth submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Anderson has been guilty of a contempt and a violation of the privileges of the House, and that he be brought to the bar of the House on Wednesday next and be there reprimanded by the Speaker for the outrage he has committed, and then discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The resolution was amended making the time "this day" instead of Wednesday. There were several attempts to further amend, with a view of softening the resolution, in view of Colonel Anderson's services, but they failed; and the original resolution having passed as amended, John Anderson appeared at the bar of the House, was reprimanded, and then discharged from custody. In giving the reprimand the Speaker dwelt strongly upon the evil consequences of attempting to corrupt a legislative assembly.

Decision of the Supreme Court affirming the right of the House to punish John Anderson for contempt.

Anderson brought a suit against the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House[1] for assault and battery and false imprisonment, which was finally settled by a decision of the United States Supreme Court, rendered at the February term, 1821.

From the circuit court of the District of Columbia the case of Anderson v. Dunn went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and at the February term, 1821 a decision was rendered. (6 Wheaton, 204.) The summary of the decision was:

To an action of trespass against the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the United States, for an assault and battery and false imprisonment, it is a legal justification and bar, to plead, that a Congress was held and sitting, during the period of the trespasses complained of, and that the House of Representatives had resolved that the plaintiff had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, and of a high contempt of the dignity and authority of the same; and had ordered that the Speaker should issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take the plaintiff into custody, wherever to be found, and to have him before the said House, to answer to the said charge; and that the Speaker did accordingly issue such a warrant, reciting the said resolution and order, and commanding the Sergeant-at-Arms to take the plaintiff into custody, etc., and deliver the said warrant to the defendant, by virtue of which warrant the defendant arrested the plaintiff and conveyed him to the bar of the House, where he was heard in his defense, touching the matter of the said charge, and the examination being adjourned from day to day, and the House having ordered the plaintiff to be detained in custody, he was accordingly detained by the defendant until he was finally adjudged to be guilty, and convicted of the charge aforesaid, and ordered to be forthwith brought to the bar, and reprimanded by the Speaker, and then discharged from custody; and after being thus reprimanded, was actually discharged from the arrest and custody aforesaid.

After the statement of the case, the opinion, delivered by Mr. Justice Johnson, proceeds:

Notwithstanding the range which has been taken by the plaintiff's counsel in the discussion of this cause, the merits of it really lie in a very limited compass. The pleadings have narrowed them down to the simple inquiry, whether the House of Representatives can take cognizance of contempts committed against themselves under any circumstances? The duress complained of was sustained under a warrant issued to compel the party's appearance, not for the actual infliction of punishment for an offence committed. Yet it can not be denied that the power to institute a prosecution must be dependent upon the power to punish. If the House of Representatives possessed no authority to punish for contempt, the iniating process issued in the assertion of that authority must have been illegal; there was a want of jurisdiction to justify it.

[1] The House authorized an appropriation for the defense of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Second session Fifteenth Congress, Annals, p. 433.

It is certainly true that there is no power given by the Constitution to either House to punish for contempts, except when committed by their own members. Nor does the judicial or criminal power given to the United States, in any part, expressly extend to the infliction of punishment for contempt of either House, or any one coordinate branch of the Government. Shall we, therefore, decide that no such power exists?

It is true that such a power, if it exists, must be derived from implication, and the genius and spirit of our institutions are hostile to the exercise of implied powers. Had the faculties of man been competent to the framing of a system of government which would have left nothing to implication, it can not be doubted that the effort would have been made by the framers of the Constitution. But what is the fact? There is not in the whole of that admirable instrument a grant of powers which does not draw after it others, not expressed, but vital to their exercise; not substantive and independent, indeed, but auxiliary and subordinate.

The idea is utopian that government can exist without leaving the exercise of discretion somewhere. Public security against the abuse of such discretion must rest on responsibility and stated appeals to public approbation. Where all power is derived from the people, and public functionaries, at short intervals, deposit it at the feet of the people, to be resumed again only at their will, individual fears may be alarmed by the monsters of imagination, but individual liberty can be in little danger.

No one is so visionary as to dispute the assertion that the sole end and aim of all our institutions is the safety and happiness of the citizen. But the relation between the action and the end is not always so direct and palpable as to strike the eye of every observer. The science of government is the most abstruse of all sciences; if, indeed, that can be called a science which has but few fixed principles, and practically consists in little more than the exercise of a sound discretion applied to the exigencies of the state as they arise. It is the science of experiment.

But if there is one maxim which necessarily rides over all others, in the practical application of government, it is that the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the powers which the people have intrusted to them. The interests and dignity of those who created them require the exertion of the powers indispensable to the attainment of the ends of their creation. Nor is a casual conflict with the rights of particular individuals any reason to be urged against the exercise of such powers. The wretch beneath the gallows may repine at the fate which awaits him, and yet it is no less certain that the laws under which he suffers were made for his security. The unreasonable murmurs of individuals against the restraints of society have a direct tendency to produce that worst of all despotisms, which makes every individual the tyrant over his neighbor's rights.

That "the safety of the people is the supreme law" not only comports with, but is indispensable to, the exercise of those powers in their public functionaries, without which that safety can not be guarded. On this principal it is, that courts of justice are universally acknowledged to be vested, by their very creation, with power to impose silence, respect, and decorum in their presence, and submission to their lawful mandates, and, as a corollary to this proposition, to preserve themselves and their officers from the approach and insults of pollution.

It is true that the courts of justice of the United States are vested, by express statute provision, with power to fine and imprison for contempts; but it does not follow from this circumstance that they would not have exercised that power without the aid of the statute, or not, in cases, if such should occur, to which such statute provision may not extend; on the contrary, it is a legislative assertion of this right, as incidental to a grant of judicial power, and can only be considered either as an instance of abundant caution or a legislative declaration, that the power of punishing for contempt shall not extend beyond its known and acknowledged limits of fine and imprisonment.

But it is contended that if this power in the House of Representatives is to be asserted on the plea of necessity, the ground is too broad and the result too indefinite; that the executive and every coordinate, and even subordinate, branch of the Government may resort to the same justification, and the whole assume to themselves, in the exercise of this power, the most tyrannical licentiousness.

This is unquestionably an evil to be guarded against, and if the doctrine may be pushed to that extent, it must be a bad doctrine, and is justly denounced.

But what is the alternative? The argument obviously leads to the total annihilation of the power of the House of Representatives to guard itself from contempts, and leaves it exposed to every indignity and interruption that rudeness, caprice, or even conspiracy, may meditate against it. This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberate assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people and charged with the care of all that is dear to them; composed of the most distinguished citizens, selected and drawn together from every quarter of a great nation; whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public, and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire; that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness or repel insult is a supposition too wild to be suggested. And, accordingly, to avoid the pressure of these considerations, it has been argued that the right of the respective Houses to exclude from their presence, and their absolute control within their own walls, carry with them the right to punish contempts committed in their presence; while the absolute legislative power given to Congress within this district enables them to provide by law against all other insults against which there is any necessity for providing.

It is to be observed that, so far as the issue of this cause is implicated, this argument yields all right of the plaintiff in error to a decision in his favor; for, non constat, from the pleadings, but that this warrant issued for an offense committed in the immediate presence of the House.

Nor is it immaterial to notice what difficulties the negation of this right in the House of Representatives draws after it when it is considered that the concession of the power, if exercised within their walls relinquishes the great grounds of the argument, to wit, the want of an express grant and the unrestricted and undefined nature of the power here set up. For why should the House be at liberty to exercise an ungranted, an unlimited, and undefined power within their walls any more than without them? If the analogy with individual right and power be resorted to it will reach no further than to exclusion, and it requires no exuberance of imagination to exhibit the ridiculous consequences which might result from such a restriction imposed upon the conduct of a deliberative assembly.

Nor would their situation be materially relieved by resorting to their legislative power within that district. That power may, indeed, be applied to many purposes, and was intended by the Constitution to extend to many purposes indispensable to the security and dignity of the General Government; but they are purposes of a more grave and general character than the offenses which may be denominated contempts, and which, from their very nature, admit of no precise definition. Judicial gravity will not admit of the illustrations which this remark would admit of. Its correctness is easily tested by pursuing, in imagination, a legislative attempt at defining the cases to which the epithet contempt might be reasonably applied.

But although the offense be held undefinable, it is justly contended that the punishment need not be indefinite. Nor is it so.

We are not now considering the extent to which the punishing power of Congress by a legislative act may be carried. On that subject the bounds of their power are to be found in the provisions of the Constitution.

The present question is, What is the extent of the punishing power which the deliberative assemblies of the Union may assume and exercise on the principle of self-preservation?

Analogy and the nature of the case furnish the answer—"the least possible power adequate to the end proposed," which is the power of imprisonment. It may at first view, and from the history of the practice of our legislative bodies, be thought to extend to other inflictions. But every other will be found to be mere commutation for confinement, since commitment alone is the alternative where the individual proves contumacious. And even to the duration of imprisonment a period is imposed by the nature of things, since the existence of the power that imprisons is indispensable to its continuance; and although the legislative power continues perpetual, the legislative body ceases to exist on the moment of its adjournment or periodical dissolution. It follows that imprisonment must terminate with that adjournment.

This view of the subject necessarily sets bounds to the exercise of a caprice which has sometimes disgraced deliberative assemblies, when under the influence of strong passions or wicked leaders, but the instances of which have long since remained on record only as historical facts, not as precedents for imitation. In the present fixed and settled state of English institutions there is no more danger of their being revived, probably, than in our own.

But the American legislative bodies have never possessed or pretended to the omnipotence which constitutes the leading feature in the legislative assembly of Great Britain, and which may have led occasionally to the exercise of caprice, under the specious appearance of merited resentment.

If it be inquired what security is there that, with an officer avowing himself devoted to their will, the House of Representatives will confine its punishing power to the limits of imprisonment, and not push it to the infliction of corporal punishment, or even death, and exercise it in cases affecting the liberty of speech and of the press, the reply is to be found in the consideration that the Constitution was formed in and for an advanced state of society and rests at every point on received opinions and fixed ideas. It is not a new creation, but a combination of existing materials, whose properties and attributes were familiarly understood, and had been determined by reiterated experiments. It is not therefore, reasoning upon things as they are, to suppose that any deliberative assembly constituted under it would ever assert any other rights and powers than those which had been established by long practice and conceded by public opinion. Melancholy, also, would be that state of distrust which rests not a hope upon a moral influence. The most absolute tyranny could not subsist where men could not be trusted with power because they might abuse it, much less a government which has no other basis than the sound morals, moderation, and good sense of those who compose it. Unreasonable jealousies not only blight the pleasures, but dissolve the very texture of society.

But it is argued that the inference, if any, arising under the Constitution is against the exercise of the powers here asserted by the House of Representatives; that the express grant of power to punish their Members, respectively, and to expel them, by the application of a familiar maxim, raises an implication against the power to punish any other than their own Members.

This argument proves too much; for its direct application would lead to the annihilation of almost every power of Congress. To enforce its laws upon any subject without the sanction of punishment is obviously impossible. Yet there is an express grant of power to punish in one class of cases and one only, and all the punishing power exercised by Congress in any cases, except those which relate to piracy and offenses against the laws of nations, is derived from implication. Nor did the idea ever occur to any one that the express grant in one class of cases repelled the assumption of the punishing power in any other.

The truth is that the exercise of the powers given over their own members was of such a delicate nature that a constitutional provision became necessary to assert or communicate it. Constituted, as that body is, of the delegates of confederated States, some such provision was necessary to guard against their mutual jealousy, since every proceeding against a representative would indirectly affect the honor or interests of the State which sent him.

In reply to the suggestion that on this same foundation of necessity might be raised a superstructure of implied powers in the Executive and every other Department, and even ministerial officer of the Government, it would be sufficient to observe that neither analogy nor precedent would support the assertion of such powers in any other than a legislative or judicial body. Even corruption anywhere else would not contaminate the source of political life. In the retirement of the Cabinet it is not expected that the Executive can be approached by indignity or insult; nor can it ever be necessary to the Executive, or any other Department, to hold a public deliberative assembly. These are not arguments; they are visions which mar the enjoyment of actual blessings, with the attack or feint of the harpies of imagination.

As to the minor points made in this case, it is only necessary to observe that there is nothing on the face of this record from which it can appear on what evidence this warrant was issued. And we are not to presume that the House of Representatives would have issued it without duly establishing the fact charged on the individual. And, as to the distance to which the process might reach, it is very clear that there exists no reason for confining its operation to the limits of the District of Columbia; after passing those limits, we know no bounds that can be prescribed to its range but those of the United States. And why should it be restricted to other boundaries? Such are the limits of the legislating powers of that body; and the inhabitant of Louisiana or Maine may as probably charge them with bribery and corruption, or attempt, by letter, to induce the commission of either, as the inhabitant of any other section of the Union. If the inconvenience be urged, the reply is obvious; there is no difficulty in observing that respectful deportment which will render all apprehension chimerical.

1608. The case of Hallet Kilbourn, a contumacious witness in 1876.

Form of subpoena duces tecum issued in Kilbourn case.

In the Kilbourn case the subpoena was attested for the Clerk by deputy.

The witness Kilbourn was arraigned without previous adoption of a form.

The House denied to Kilbourn the services of counsel at his arraignment for contempt.

On March 14, 1876,[1] Mr. John M. Glover, of Missouri, from the Select Committee on the Real Estate Pool and Jay Cooke Indebtedness, which had been empowered "to send for persons and papers," made to the House a "partial report," stating that it had caused a subpaena duces tecum to be issued and duly served on one Hallet Kilbourn, a resident of this District. The subpoena was in the words and figures following:

HALLET KILBOURN:

We command and strictly enjoin you that, laying aside all manner of business and excuses whatsoever, you appear in your proper person before the select committee of the House of Representatives, appointed on the 28th day of January, A. D. 1876, of which Hon. John M. Glover is chairman, at their room in the Capitol—the room of the Committee on Mines and Mining—in the city of Washington, D. C., on Saturday, the 4th day of March, A. D. 1876, at the hour of 10 o'clock a.m., of said day, to testify what you know in regard to the matters to be inquired of by said committee; and that you also diligently and carefully search for, examine, and inquire after, and bring with you and, produce at the time and place aforesaid, the certain deeds and deeds of trust, declarations of trust, and "printed papers" referred to therein, relating to the following squares, parts of squares, lots, and parcels of ground, or real property, situate in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to wit, all the property described in the paper writing hereto attached, marked "Exhibit A," and made a part of this subpoena, also relating to any other property purchased or sold by you as trustee for either the "real estate pool "in which the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., or Messrs. Stewart, Hillyer & Sunderland, or either of them, had an interest, together with all copies, drafts, and vouchers relating to said documents, and all other documents, letters, and paper-writings whatsoever, including bank books, bills of exchange, bank checks, stubs of checks, ledgers, blotters, day books, and other books of accounts or maps, that can or may afford any information or evidence relating to the said matters to be inquired of by said committee, belonging to you, or subject to your control, either individually, or as trustee, or as a member of the firm of Kilbourn. & Latta.

Herein fail not and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 28th day of February, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.]

MICHAEL C. KERR, Speaker.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

By GREEN ADAMS, Chief Clerk.

The Exhibit A follows, and then the report of the committee proceeds to state that said Kilbourn appeared as a witness before the committee at 10 a. m., March 4, 1876, and to give extracts of testimony showing the interrogatories and replies of the witness. This testimony shows that the witness declined to produce books and papers and to answer certain questions, on the ground that the subject involved was a purely private matter and had no relation, in the remotest degree, to any public interest whatsoever.

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Journal, pp. 578–588; Record pp. 170–1708.

The committee closed their partial report by stating that it was necessary, for the efficient prosecution of the inquiry ordered by the House, that said Hallet Kilbourn should be required to respond to the subpoena duces tecum, and answer the questions which he had refused to answer, and that there was no sufficient reason why the witness should not obey said subpoena duces tecum and answer the questions he had declined to answer, and that his refusal as aforesaid was in contempt of this House.

This resolution accompanied the report:

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Hallet Kilbourn, and him bring to the bar of the House to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the meantime to keep the said Kilbourn in his custody to wait the further order of this House.

This resolution was agreed to without debate or division.

On the same day[1] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody, as therein commanded, the body of Hallet Kilbourn.

Whereupon the said Kilbourn was arraigned and the following interrogatory propounded to him by the Speaker:

Mr. Kilbourn, you are presented at the bar of the House, upon the order of the House, under arrest on an alleged breach of the privileges of the House in refusing to answer certain questions propounded to you by a committee of the House, which questions that committee was authorized by the House to ask. It is my duty now, by authority of the House, to ask you whether you are now ready to answer those questions before the committee.

Mr. Kilbourn then stated that the proceedings were of great importance to him, and he would respectfully request that he might be represented by his counsel, Judge Black, of Pennsylvania, and David Dudley Field, of New York.

Mr. Horace F. Page, of California, moved that the request be granted. In the debate it was urged against this Motion[2] that it was not the practice of the House to permit such proceeding, the prisoner at the bar being usually permitted to have read his reasons for not responding to the demands. On the other hand, it was argued[3] that this was in spirit, although not technically, a criminal proceeding, and. the prisoner had a constitutional right to be represented as he requested.

On motion of Mr. Glover, the motion of Mr. Page was laid on the table, yeas 117, nays 74.

When arraigned the witness Kilbourn submitted a written, unsworn answer, which does not appear in the Journal.

The journal contains no reference to the act of the Speaker in certifying the case of the witness Kilbourn to the district attorney.

Then, on motion of Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, leave was granted said Kilbourn to make his statement[4] in writing, to be read at the Clerk's desk.

[2] By Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana.

[3] By Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts.

[4] This statement was not printed in the Journal, but is found in the Record. Journal., p. 591; Record, p. 1715.

In this statement he admitted that the House, as well as the Senate, had originally the power to try and punish for all contempts that might be committed against it; and, as to contempts generally, each House was still in the possession of the same jurisdiction which it had from the beginning; but, as regarded the particular offense which a witness committed by refusing to obey a subpoena or to answer a proper question, the Revised Statutes [1] had declared it to be an indictable misdemeanor and transferred the whole power of trial and punishment to the criminal courts of the District. Therefore the House could do nothing but certify the facts found by the committee. The witness further denied the right of the House to investigate private business arbitrarily; but if either the committee or the House would assert that the production of his private papers, or the revelation of his private business, would promote any public interest, or if any private individual would assert on oath that the papers asked for would lead to the detection of corruption, he would respond freely to all demands for information or papers.

The answer of the witness does not appear to have been under oath.

The Speaker then propounded to the witness the interrogatories which he had refused to answer:

Mr. Kilbourn, are you now prepared to answer, upon the demand of the proper committee of the House, "where each of these five members reside," meaning the members of the pool? Are you prepared to produce, in obedience to the subpoena duces tecum, the records which you have been required by the committee to produce?

The witness declining to answer the said interrogatories, Mr. Glover submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That Hallet Kilbourn, having been heard by the House pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not answer the questions propounded to him by the committee and respond to the subpoena duces tecum by obeying the same, and having failed to show sufficient cause why he should not answer said questions and obey said subpoena duces tecum as aforesaid, be, and is therefore, considered in contempt of the House because of said failure.

Mr. Glover also submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That in purging himself of the contempt for which Hallet Kilbourn is now in custody, the said Kilbourn shall be required to state to the House whether he is now willing to appear before the committee of this House to whom he has hitherto declined to obey a certain subpoena duces tecum, and answer certain questions and obey said subpoena duces tecum, and make answers to said questions; and if he answers that he is ready to appear before said committee and obey said subpoena duces tecum and answer said questions, then said witness shall have the privilege to so appear and obey and answer forthwith or so soon as said committee can be convened; and that in the meantime the witness remain in custody; and in the event that said witness shall answer that he is not ready to so appear before said committee and obey said subpoena duces tecum and make answer to said questions as aforesaid, then that said witness be recommitted to the said custody for the continuance of such contempt; and that such custody shall continue until the said witness shall communicate to this House, through said committee, that he is ready to appear before said committee and make such answer and obey said subpoena duces tecum, and that in executing this order the Sergeant-at-Arms shall cause the said Kilbourn to be kept in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia.

On March 28, 1876,[2] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from H. H. Wells, United States attorney for the District of Columbia, stating that the grand jury had found against Hallet Kilbourn an indictment in five counts:

[1] Revised Statutes, section 102.

[2] Journal, pp. 680–682; Record, pp. 2008–2020.

(1) Failure to produce certain papers before the House committee; (2) refusing to answer certain questions before said committee; (3) refusing to answer certain questions before the House of Representatives; (4) failure to produce papers and refusal to answer questions before the committee; (5) refusal to answer the questions and produce the books and papers before the House of Representatives.

On the same day the Speaker also laid before the House a communication from John G. Thompson, Sergeant-at-Arms, reporting that the United States marshal for the District of Columbia had appeared with a warrant issued by the supreme court of said District for Hallet Kilbourn and had requested that he be admitted to the presence of Kilbourn in the jail, that the said Kilbourn might, under the terms of the warrant, be taken from the jail and before the court to be tried on the criminal charge. The Sergeant-at-Arms stated that he had declined to accede to the request, since the effect of such action would be to release Kilbourn from his custody by an officer of the House of Representatives. A copy of the warrant was appended to the letter, but does not appear in the Journal.

Mr. Glover thereupon submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That Hallet Kilbourn, a recusant witness, having by this House been adjudged guilty of a contempt of its authority by reason of his refusal to answer certain questions and refusing to produce, in answer to a subpoena duces tecum, certain documents, books, papers, etc., before a special investigating committee of this House, and said Kilbourn, because of said contempt and the judgment of this House, being now by its order and said judgment in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms in the common jail of the District of Columbia, there to remain in said custody until he shall communicate to this House, through said committee, that he is ready to appear before said committee and make answer to said questions and obey said subpoena duces tecum: Therefore, because of the facts and premises aforesaid, the said Sergeant-at-Arms is ordered to retain the custody aforesaid of said witness, and not to part with his custody or deliver him up to any other person, officer, court, or tribunal until the further order of this House.

The resolution was debated at length. Mr. Jephtha D. New, of Indiana, said, in reply to the contention of the witness that no person had filed allegations that the public interest demanded production of the papers or the answering of the questions, that the resolution authorizing the investigation of the real estate pool had recited that the Government was a creditor of Jay Cooke & Co., and therefore concerned in the investigation of the real estate pool, which was part of their assets.[1] The question of the right of the House to punish for contempt was considered at length, as well as the bearings of the law relating to witnesses.

Mr. Stephen A. Hurlbut, of Illinois, proposed, as a substitute to the resolution offered by Mr. Glover, a preamble reciting the fact of Kilbourn's committal by order of the House, and further reciting that in accordance with the provisions of law the Speaker had certified[2] to the district attorney the facts pertaining to the case, and a presentment had been found by the grand jury, and a resolution directing the release of Kilbourn and the delivery of him to the marshal of the District.

The House refused to agree to this substitute, yeas 33, nays 191, and the original resolution presented by Mr. Glover was then agreed to.

[2] The Journal does not contain a record of the Speaker's certification.

On April 3,[1] by a motion to suspend the rules, Mr. Glover attempted to have passed a resolution providing limitations on the diet furnished the prisoner; but the resolution failed to command the necessary two-thirds vote.

On April 12,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Sergeant-at Arms reporting that a writ of habeas corpus had been served upon him commanding him to produce the body of Hallet Kilbourn before one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia at 10 a.m. April 12, 1876. The Sergeant-at-Arms requested instructions, and attached to his letter a copy of the writ. This copy is printed in the Journal.

Mr. New, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution, which was agreed to, referring the matter to the Judiciary Committee with instructions for early action.

On April 15,[3] Mr. Frank H. Hurd, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report recommending the adoption of the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas one Hallet Kilbourn was subpoenaed to testify in a certain investigation ordered by this House before a committee duly authorized to send for persons and papers; and whereas during his examination as a witness the said Hallet Kilbourn refused to answer certain questions propounded to him as such witness by said committee, and to produce certain books and papers which he was ordered by said committee to produce; and whereas for such refusal the House of Representatives has adjudged the said Hallet Kilbourn to be in contempt of its authority and has ordered him into custody until he shall purge himself of said contempt and answer the questions as propounded and produce the papers and books ordered to be produced; and whereas said committee is still engaged in the investigation which it was ordered to make by the House, and is unable to complete the same because of the contumacy of the witness; and whereas the said Hallet KiIbourn is now in execution by the legal process of this House as aforesaid; and whereas the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has issued a writ of habeas corpus to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, directing him to produce before the said judge the body of the said Kilbourn. Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to make a careful return of said writ, setting out the causes of the detention of said Kilbourn, and to retain the custody of his body, and not to produce it before the said judge or court without further order of this House.

This resolution was discussed at length[4] on the same and succeeding day. It was urged that the English precedents for a hundred and fifty years as well as the American precedents were in favor of a course of action different from that proposed by the majority. Parliament since 1704 had not refused to bring the body into court.

Mr. J. R. Tucker, of Virginia, moved to amend by directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to appear by counsel before the court and raise question as to the legality of the writ of habeas corpus, meanwhile retaining custody of the body of said Kilbourn.

This proposition was disagreed to, and after exhaustive debate, the following resolution, offered by Mr. William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin, was agreed to[5] as a substitute—yeas, 166; nays, 75—and the resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary as amended was then agreed to:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Hallet Kilbourn that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of mid Kilbourn, before said court when making such return as required by law.

While confined in jail for contempt, the witness Kilbourn was released by habeas corpus proceedings, the court intimating that the punishment of law superseded the right of the House to punish.

In making return in the habeas corpus proceedings in the Kilbourn, the Sergeant-at-Arms produced the body of the prisoner.

On April 19[1] the Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Sergeant-at-Arms in which the latter reported to the House that he had made a careful return of the writ of habeas corpus, setting out in detail the facts relating to his detention, and that said Kilbourn was in his custody by virtue of an adjudication of the House finding him guilty of contempt of its authority. The Sergeant-at-Arms further stated that he produced the body of said Kilbourn and presented it to the judge who had issued the writ. Thereupon the judge ordered Kilbourn, into the custody of the Marshal of the District of Columbia, who immediately took possession of his body.

A question was made that a copy of the return should be appended to the letter of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Speaker[2] said that this should be done to perfect the record.[3]

On April 28[4] a letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms, transmitting the decision of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the matter of Hallet Kilbourn's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, was laid before the House.

On May 2[5] the House declined to accept an offer of Kilbourn to appear before the committee and testify and furnish such information as his books might contain.

The opinion of Chief Justice Carter "begins by stating that the real question involved is whether the House of Representatives possessed jurisdiction for punishment over the person of the relator. It might be regarded in the light of unvarying authority that punishment for contempt within the limitations of the jurisdiction of the House, whether the House was to be considered as a court or not, was conclusive of judgment, and might not be inquired into by writ of habeas corpus or otherwise. It was a right inherent in the jurisdiction of the tribunal, essential to its integrity and preservation, and inviolate from the interference of jurisdiction disconnected with the tribunal exercising it. The first inquiry would be whether the power of the House to inflict the punishment involved in its order had been transferred by law to the adjudications of the courts.[1] By the law approved January 24, 1857,[2] it was provided that a recalcitrant witness should "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing" be liable to indictment for misdemeanor, and on conviction be punished by fine and imprisonment. The failure of the witness to testify being reported to the House, the statute made it the duty of the Speaker to certify the fact, under the seal of the House, to the district attorney. In the revision of the statutes (act of June 22, 1874) the last expression of legislation on this subject was embodied in sections 102 and 104 of the Revised Statutes.

The reasons for the statutory enactment seem to have been that the antecedent condition of the power was latent, undefined, and unpublished. Common justice to the citizen required that it should be defined and made known. Again, it was a truth well known to the constitutional student of the history of this Government that a large and intelligent portion of its statesmen have denied the implied power of either House of Congress to inflict any punishment.

The present statute had a further significance in that, for some reason, the words "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing," as found in the earlier act, have been dropped, leaving the punishment of the statute the sole penalty.

It might be objected that it was not in the power of Congress to supersede by law the authority residing in either branch to punish for contempt and inherited from the Constitution. But the act did not imply the abnegation of power on the part of the House or Senate to inflict punishment for contempt, but, on the contrary, recognized that power, and exercised it in denominating the offense a misdemeanor and punishing it as such.

There was nothing in the language or nature of the statute indicating that the penalty imposed by it was to operate as an addition to any penalty that might be inflicted by the House for the same offense. Such a purpose would seem to be in violation of the Constitution. The offense was a single act—the refusal to produce the papers and to give the residences and names of the members of the real estate pool. The relator could not be punished in the courts in the penalty of transgression, and also in the House to make him testify. With the judgment of the House in contempt, its power to punish terminated, and the punishment prescribed by law intervened.

The attempt in 1876 to punish Hallet Kilbourn for declining to testify before a committee resulted in a decision of the Supreme Court denying that the House has an unlimited power to punish for contempt of its authority.

---

[1] On February 18, 1871 (Third session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 1754), when the House was providing for recompensing the attorney who had defended Members of the House against the suits of Hallet Kilbourn, John H. Reagan, of Texas, said: "On the question of contempt the House surrendered its jurisdiction of the matter to a petty court. The result was that the officers of the House and the Members of its committee were brought into court to answer for a trespass, instead of the House compe;ling the offending witness guilty of contempt to answer to the exclusive jurisdiction of this House. It was the folly and fault of this House in failing to vindicate its jurisdiction which has brought the Government, as well as the officers and Members of this House, into contempt."

[2] 11 Stat. L., p. 155.

The power of the House to punish for contempt is limited to the cases expressly defined by the Constitution.

In the Kilbourn case the court held that no witness could be punished for contumacy except in an inquiry which the House had power to make.

The House does not possess the general power to inquire into the private affairs of the citizen.

In the Kilbourn case the court decided that the resolution authorizing the investigation was in excess of the constitutional power of the House.

Kilbourn brought suit for false imprisonment against John G. Thompson,[1] Sergeant-at-Arms, and several Members of the House, and the case reached the Supreme Court of the United States, where an opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller at the October term, 1880.[2] Beside the general issue, Thompson pleaded in justification that he acted as Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, in conformity with its rules and orders, and under command of the duly and properly attested warrant of the Speaker.[3] The opinion of the court denies that there is in neither branch of Congress an unlimited power to punish for contempt of their authority.

> The powers of Congress itself, when acting through the concurrence of both branches, are dependent solely on the Constitution. Such as are not conferred by that instrument, either expressly or by fair implication from what is granted, are "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Of course neither branch of Congress, when acting separately, can lawfully exercise more power than is conferred by the Constitution on the whole body, except in the few instances where authority is conferred on either House separately, as in the case of impeachments. No general power of inflicting punishment by the Congress of the United States is found in that instrument. It contains in the provision that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," the strongest implication against punishment by order of the legislative body. It has been repeatedly decided by this court, and by others of the highest authority, that this means a trial in which the rights of the party shall be decided by a tribunal appointed by law, which tribunal is to be governed by rules of law previously established. An act of Congress which proposed to adjudge a man guilty of a crime and inflict the punishment would be conceded by all thinking men to be unauthorized by anything in the Constitution. That instrument, however, is not wholly silent as to the authority of the separate branches of Congress to inflict punishment. It authorizes each House to punish its own Members. By the second clause of the fifth section of the first article, "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member, "I and by the clause immediately preceding, it "may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." These provisions are equally instructive in what they authorize and in what they do not authorize. There is no express power in that instrument conferred on either House of Congress to punish for contempts.

The court goes on to say that the advocates of this power have used two principal arguments—first, its exercise by the House of Commons; and, second, the necessity of such a power to enable the two Houses of Congress to perform the duties and exercise the powers which the Constitution has conferred on them.

The first argument is examined at length, and the conclusion is reached that the powers and privileges of the House of Commons on the subject of punishment for contempts rest on principles which have no application to other legislative bodies, and certainly have none to the House of Representatives of the United States.

As to the second argument, the court makes no decision, none being required by the circumstances of the case; but in passing the intimation is given that the English precedents do not give much aid to the doctrine that the power exists as one necessary to enable either House of Congress to exercise successfully the function of legislation.

The opinion then goes on:

As we have already said, the Constitution expressly empowers each House to punish its own Members for disorderly behavior. We see no reason to doubt that this punishment may in a proper case be imprisonment, and that it may be for refusal to obey some rule on that subject made by the House for the preservation of order.

So, also, the penalty which each House is authorized to inflict in order to compel the attendance of absent Members may be imprisonment, and this may be for a violation of some order or standing rule on that subject.

Each House is by the Constitution made the judge of the election and qualification of its Members. In deciding on these it has an undoubted right to examine witnesses and inspect papers, subject to the usual rights of witnesses in such cases; and it may be that a witness would be subject to like punishment at the hands of the body engaged in trying a contested election, for refusing to testify, that he would if the case were pending before a court of judicature.

The House of Representatives has the sole right to impeach officers of the Government and the Senate to try them. Where the question of such impeachment is before either body acting in its appropriate sphere on that subject, we see no reason to doubt the right to compel the attendance of witnesses, and their answer to proper questions, in the same manner and by the use of the same means that courts of justice can in like cases.

Whether the power of punishment in either House by fine or imprisonment goes beyond this or not, we are sure that no person can be punished for contumacy as a witness before either House, unless his testimony is required in a matter into which that House has jurisdiction to inquire, and we feel equally sure that neither of these bodies possesses the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizens.

The court goes on to describe the three departments of the Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—and to declare that in the preamble and resolution [1] under which the committee acted in the Kilbourn case the House of Representatives—not only exceeded the limit of its own authority, but assumed a power which could only be properly exercised by another branch of the Government, because it was in its nature clearly judicial.

[1] The full text (see Journal, p. 578) is as follows:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is a creditor of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., now in bankruptcy, by order and decree of the district court of the United States in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, resulting from the improvident deposits made by the Secretary of the Navy of the United States with the London branch of said house of Jay Cooke & Co. of the public moneys; and whereas a matter known as the 'real estate pool' was only partially inquired into by the late joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia in which Jay Cooke & Co. had a large and valuable interest; and whereas Edwin M. Lewis, trustee of the estate and effects of said firm of Jay Cooke & Co., has recently made a settlement of the interest of the estate of Jay Cooke & Co., with the associates of said firm of Jay Cooke & Co., to the disadvantage and loss, as it is alleged, of the numerous creditors of said estate, including the Government of the United States; and whereas the courts axe now powerless, by reason of said settlement, to afford adequate redress to said creditors:

"Resolved, That a special committee of five Members of this House, to be selected by the Speaker, be appointed to inquire into the nature and history of said 'real estate pool' and the character of said settlement, with the amount of property involved in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested, and the amount paid or to be paid in said settlement, with power to send for persons and papers, and report to this House.

The court points out that if the United States was a creditor of the defunct firm the only legal redress was a resort to the courts; and, in fact, the matter was then before the court. That the indebtedness resulted from the "improvidence" of a Cabinet officer did not change the nature of the suit, since no purpose of impeaching the Secretary was avowed. The House of Representatives could not know that the court was powerless to redress the creditors, since the matter was still pending, and even if the court were powerless the preamble and resolution suggests no remedy. If the real estate pool was charged with any crime or offense, the court alone could punish the members. The House had no authority to enter into this investigation into the private affairs of individuals who held no office under the Government.

> We are of opinion for these reasons [concludes the court] that the resolution of the House of Representatives authorizing the investigation was in excess of the power conferred on that body by the Constitution; that the committee, therefore, had no lawful authority to require Kilbourn to testify as a witness beyond what he voluntarily chose to tell; that the orders and resolutions of the House, and the warrant of the Speaker, under which Kilbourn was imprisoned, are, in like manner, void for want of jurisdiction in that body, and that his imprisonment is without any lawful authority.

The court then reviews the similar case of Anderson v. Dunn.

1612. The Senate ease of Elverton R. Chapman, a contumacious witness in 1894.

Instance wherein the Senate proceeded to an investigation of charges made in general terms against its membership by newspapers.

In 1894 the certification of alleged cases of contempt before a Senate committee was made without action of the Senate declaring the witness in contempt.

On May 17, 1894,[1] the Senate agreed to a resolution providing for the investigation of newspaper charges that there had been corruption in connection with the passage of the tariff bill, particularly in connection with the sugar schedule thereof. This resolution was in form as follows:

> Whereas, it has been stated in the Sun, a newspaper published in New York, that bribes have been offered to certain Senators to induce them to vote against the pending tariff bill; and
> Whereas, it has been stated in a signed article in the Press, a newspaper published in Philadelphia, that the sugar schedule has been made up, as it now stands in the proposed amendment, in consideration of large sums of money paid for campaign purposes to the Democratic party; therefore,
> Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed to investigate these charges and to inquire further whether any contributions have been made by the so-called sugar trust, or any person connected therewith, to any political party for campaign purposes or to secure or defeat legislation, and with power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths.
> Resolved further, That said committee be authorized to investigate and report upon any charge or charges which may be filed before it, alleging that the action of any Senator has been improperly influenced in the consideration of said bill, or that any attempt has been made to so influence legislation; and whether any Senator has been or is speculating in what is known as sugar stocks during the consideration of the tariff bill now before the Senate.

On May 29[2] the committee reported that Elisha J. Edwards and John S. Shriver had refused to answer pertinent interrogatories, and concluded:

> Wherefore the committee report and request that the President of the Senate certify as to each witness his aforesaid failure to testify and his aforesaid refusals to answer, and all the facts herein, under the seal of the Senate, to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that each of said witnesses may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

[2] Senate journal., pp. 214216; Record, pp. 5451–5459.

The Vice-President [1] decided that the report was not such as required the action of the Senate, and on appeal the decision was sustained.

Mr. Joseph N. Dolph, of Oregon, presented a resolution providing for the arrest and arraignment of Edwards as a contumacious witness, but the resolution was never brought to a vote.

On June 12 the committee reported that Elverton R. Chapman had refused to answer pertinent questions. No action was taken on this report by the Senate.[2] Mr. William V. Allen, of Nebraska, at this time offered in the Senate a resolution providing for the arrest and arraignment of Chapman, but no action was taken on it.

On June 21, 1894, the committee in a similar manner reported that Henry O. Havemeyer, John E. Searles, and John W. Macartney had refused to answer pertinent inquiries, and in the usual form used in the preceding cases, requested the President of the Senate to certify the cases.

In these cases, however, there were minority reports, a portion of the committee not agreeing that the questions at issue were pertinent or such as the committee had authority to ask. In these cases, also, the resolutions for the arrest and arraignment of the recalcitrants were offered but not acted on.

The above reports gave rise to considerable debate, Mr. David B. Hill, of New York, contending that the report should be acted on by the Senate before the President could be authorized to certify. In the preceding cases he had certified, but in this case the committee were not united. It was further contended by Mr. William E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, that it was questionable whether the statute executed itself, and used the seal of the Senate for that purpose without the action of the Senate. Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, further objected that the Senate was laying down its constitutional rights in not itself compelling the witnesses to testify.[3] Mr. Hill also urged that the Senate, and not a divided committee, should determine whether there had been a refusal to answer material questions. The debate ceased without any action of the Senate and was not resumed.

The cases of all the witnesses mentioned above were certified by the President of the Senate, and indictments were found against them.

In 1894 the power of punishing for contempt was fully discussed in the district court of appeals.

The indictment against Chapman was the subject of further legal proceedings, involving interesting questions of law. These questions, after being passed upon by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, were carried to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, where a decision was rendered in an opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Alvey, which discusses at length the principles involved: [4]

This case comes into this court on an appeal specially allowed from the judgment of the court below, overruling a demurrer to the indictment against the appellant.

The appellant was indicted under section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for the prosecution and punishment of contumacious witnesses summoned to give testimony before either House of Congress or committees thereof. It is averred in the indictment that the appellant was summoned and appeared as a witness before a special committee of the Senate of the United States, in relation to a matter of inquiry before said committee, and that he refused to answer questions pertinent to the matter of inquiry referred to such committee.

The section of the Revised Statutes under which the indictment was found is as follows:

"SEC. 102. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, wilfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than one month nor more than twelve months."

In connection with the foregoing section 102 it is proper to read section 104 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

"SEC. 104. Whenever a witness summoned as mentioned in section 102 fails to testify, and the facts are reported to either House, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, shall certify the fact under the seal of the Senate or House to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action."

At the time the committee was raised and the subject-matter of inquiry was referred to it, the Senate had under consideration and debate the tariff act recently passed, known as the Wilson bill, with a very large number of proposed amendments thereto, reported from the Finance Committee of that body on the 20th of March, 1894; and among these amendments thus reported were certain proposed amendments providing for duties on sugar, different from the provisions in the bill as it had been passed by the House of Representatives and sent to the Senate. In the consideration of this matter, and in the rater, of duties that might be fixed to be paid on imported sugar, it was supposed that the American Sugar Refining Company was largely interested and that the market value of the stock of that corporation would be materially affected, the one way or the other, by the ultimate action and judgment of the Senate. In this state of affairs the matter became a topic of heated discussion with the public, and the press of the country teemed with imputations of bad faith and violated pledges, and some to the extent of charging attempted bribery and corruption, and that certain Senators were yielding to corrupt influences, and were acting and intended to act, in a manner derogatory to their high duties of Senators and legislators of the nation. With these charges and imputations daily repeated, the Senate was impelled by a proper sense of duty to itself and the country to institute the proper proceedings for maintaining its dignity, integrity, and purity as an important branch of the legislative department of the Government. For this purpose, and acting upon the immediate inciting cause of certain publications recited in the preamble, the following preamble and resolutions were passed, on the 17th of May, 1894, raising a special committee, and clothing it with power of full investigation.

Investigation was commenced, and according to the averments of the indictment in the course of the investigation by the committee, the appellant was produced as a witness, being a member of a firm of stockbrokers in the city of New York, dealing in the stock of the American Sugar Refining Company, and was asked by the committee, or a member thereof for the committee, whether the firm of Moore & Schley, of which the witness was a member, had bought or sold what were known as sugar stocks, during the month of February, 1894, and after the first day of that month, for or in the interest, directly or indirectly, of any United States Senator; had the firm, during the month of March, 1894, bought or sold any stocks or securities known as sugar stocks, for or in the interest, directly or indirectly, of any United States Senator; had the said firm, during the month of April, 1894, bought or sold any stocks or securities known as sugar stocks, for or in the interest, directly or indirectly, of any United States Senator; had the said firm, during the month of May, 1894, bought or sold any stocks or securities known as sugar stocks, for or in the interest, directly or indirectly, of any United States Senator; was the said firm at that time carrying any sugar stock for the benefit of or in the interest, directly or indirectly, of any United States Senator. But the appellant, then and there, to wit, on the 9th day of June, 1894, each and all of said questions willfully refused to answer; and all of which said questions are averred to have been pertinent to the inquiry then and there being made by the committee under the resolution.

This, so far as we are informed, is the first case of an indictment found under section 102 of the Revised Statutes, or the act from which that section was formed. There have been many cases of contempt, on the part of witnesses, for refusing to answer questions on inquiries instituted by the Houses of Congress, since the passage of the original act of 1857, from which sections 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes are taken; but in no case prior to the present, so far as we are informed, have the proceedings reached the form of an indictment.

There is no serious objections urged to the form of the indictment. The great effort on the part of the appellant has been to show, and which has been urged with great ability, that the provisions of the statute, as embodied in section 102 of the Revised Statutes, are unconstitutional and void; and that the scope and nature of the inquiry authorized by the resolutions of the 17th of May, 1894, were not within the limits of the power of the Senate of the United States, and therefore void.

In support of the demurrer to the indictment several positions have been strongly and ingeniously urged in argument; but we shall consider and determine the case as fully embraced by three principal questions—

(1) "Is the section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States constitutional and valid?

(2) "Was the inquiry directed by the resolutions of the 17th of May, 1894, within the power of the Senate to execute by requiring witnesses to testify, and—

(3) "Were the questions propounded to the appellant, the witness, pertinent to the subject-matter of inquiry that the committee was charged to investigate?"

If either of those propositions be resolved in the negative, it would follow that the demurrer should have been sustained; but, on the other hand, if they are all resolved in the affirmative, it results that the demurrer was properly overruled.

(1) With respect to the first of these questions, we can entertain no doubt. The section of the Revised Statutes brought into question, with some unimportant omissions and changes of phraseology, embodies the first section of the act of Congress of the 24th of January, 1857, entitled "An act more effectually to enforce the attendance of witnesses on the summons of either House of Congress and to compel them to discover testimony." (11 Stat., 155.) The history of Congress is full of instances where difficulties had been experienced in compelling unwilling and contumacious witnesses to make disclosure of facts essential to Congressional action; and it was found that the ordinary and incidental powers that pertained to the Houses of Congress in their separate capacities were quite inadequate to meet the exigencies of many of the cases that occurred. It was for the remedy of this evil that the act of 1857 was passed.

That Congress possessed the constitutional power to enact a statute to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to make disclosure of evidence to enable the respective bodies to discharge their legitimate functions can not admit of serious question. Congress is invested with all the legislative power of the Government, and each House also with certain other powers not legislative in their nature; and it is expressly provided that Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in it. (Const., art. 1, sec. 8, par. 18.) Under this grant of power, what more natural and appropriate, as a means of executing its powers and indeed necessary, than a statute providing for the discovery of evidence as the basis of action, and prescribing a punishment for those who condemn the authority of the body, and, by their contumacious conduct, obstruct the lawful exercise of its functions. We have no doubt of the power of Congress in this respect.

It has been, however, strongly urged in argument that the terms of the section 102 are sufficiently broad and comprehensive to include a class of witnesses protected and exempted by the provisions of Article V of the Constitution, and especially so urged when read, as it should be, in connection with the next succeeding section, 103 of the Revised Statutes, and therefore the section is void in toto. But it is not pretended that the appellant belongs to the class of witnesses contemplated by the article of the Constitution referred to; and if the contention of the appellant were conceded to be correct, as applied to a class of witnesses under different conditions, it would not follow necessarily that the statute should be stricken down in its entirety, because it may be susceptible of an unconstitutional application in certain cases that may possibly arise. This is not reasonable, nor is it in accordance with the rule of interpretation adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States as applied to a statute good on its face, but where, by reason of its general and comprehensive terms, it may be made, by construction, to apply to objects forbidden by the Constitution. In such case the statute win be allowed its full force and operation, as applicable to all cases, rightfully and constitutionally within its provisions, but such application will be sustained as to those objects simply to which the statute is forbidden to extend. This is the rule as we understand it, upon which the Supreme Court acted in the State Freight Tax Cases, 15 Wall., 232; Supervisors v. Stanley, 105 U. S., 305, 313; Virginia Coupon Cases, 114 U. S., 269, and other cases that could be cited.

But we are not to be understood as conceding that any such rule of construction as that just stated is necessary to be invoked. It is not by any means necessary that section 103 should be read with or as part of section 102. The last-mentioned section stands alone and makes a complete provision by its own terms, and it is in no manner dependent upon section 103; and there is nothing in the terms of section 102 that renders it liable to constitutional condemnation, whatever may be thought of section 103. The statute must not be condemned as unconstitutional if by any reasonable construction of its terms it can be maintained as constitutional and valid. This is an undoubted rule of construction.

It has also been seriously contended in argument that the act of 1857, now embodied in the Revised Statutes, was an attempt on the part of Congress to delegate its power and jurisdiction, or the power and jurisdiction of the several Houses thereof, incident and belonging to it as a legislative body, to punish for contempts, to the courts, and therefore the statute is void. But to this we can not accede. The statute has never been understood, either by Congress itself or by the courts, as having any such purpose as that of an attempt to delegate the power of the Houses of Congress to commit for contempt of their authority. This is fully shown by the case of Irwin, who was, for refusing to testify, committed by order of the House of Representatives, in 1875, and who, unsuccessfully, attempted to be relieved on habeas corpus. And so the case of Kilbourn, which occurred in 1876, where the witness was committed to prison by the order of the House of Representatives for refusing obedience to a subpoena duces tecum, and to testify in regard to a matter referred to a committee for investigation, and for which imprisonment an action was brought. In that case, which underwent great consideration by the Supreme Court, it was never suggested or intimated that Congress held, or had attempted, to divest itself of, and relegated to the courts, the power to punish for contempts, in cases to which the power of each House properly extends, by the passage of the act of 1857. That Congress could not divest itself, or either House thereof, of that essential incidental power inherent in it may well be conceded. It is a constitutional incident of the body; but it can only be exercised in such cases as to which the power of the Houses in their separate capacities extends.

But the existence of such inherent power in the House of Congress did not preclude the passage of the act of 1857, in the exercise of the ordinary legislative power of the two Houses of Congress, prescribing additional pains and penalties to those already existing by virtue of the inherent powers of the Houses of Congress, as legislative bodies, nor did Congress express its meaning in any doubtful terms. By the very terms of the original act of 1857 it was declared that the recusant witness should, in addition to the pains and penalties then existing, be liable to indictment as and for a misdemeanor in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, etc. In the Revised Statutes the terms "in addition to the pains and penalties then existing" have been omitted, but this omission can certainly not operate to make the statute import a sense that it never was intended to have nor consistently with the Constitution could have. It is only by showing that the statute, as it stands in the statute book, is void, that the objection to it is available as a defense to the indictment; and the effort to show it void has utterly failed.

(2) We come now to the question whether the matter of inquiry directed by the resolutions of the 17th of May, 1894, was within the power of the Senate to execute by requiring witnesses to testify. And in considering this question we must confess there is great difficulty in clearly and distinctly marking the boundaries within which either House of Congress may act with coercive power to compel the disclosure of facts deemed important to it and the rights of the citizen to exemption from inquiry into his private affairs. The question was most elaborately considered in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168), but that case was presented in somewhat different aspect from the present.

It must, however, be considered as established by that case that while within certain limits and for certain purposes either House of Congress may, where the examination of witnesses and the production of papers are necessary to the performance of its legal and constitutional functions, fine and imprison a contumacious witness, yet the Constitution invests neither House with any general power to punish for contempt. In that case it was also held that the question whether either House of Congress, acting in the case of a witness refusing to testify, had proceeded within the limits and scope of its constitutional authority, is a judicial question and one not to be concluded by the judgment of the body itself. In other words, that the House taking action in such case is a body of limited and restricted powers and whenever powers are exercised in excess or beyond the limits of those constitutionally possessed by the House its action can afford protection to no one acting under its unauthorized order or command. In the Kilbourn case the resolution of the House of Representatives under which Kilbourn was summoned and examined as a witness, directed the committee to examine into the history and character of what was called "the real-estate pool of the District of Columbia;" and the preamble recited, as the grounds of the investigation, that Jay Cooke & Co., who were debtors of the United States, and whose affairs were then in litigation in a bankrupt court, had an interest in the pool or were creditors of it. The subject-matter of the investigation, therefore, was of judicial cognizance and not legislative, and this was shown on the face of the resolution; and it was held that there existed no power in Congress, or in either House thereof, on the allegation that an insolvent debtor of the United States was interested in a private business partnership, to investigate the affairs of that partnership, and consequently there was no authority in the House to compel a witness to testify on the subject. It followed that the order of the House declaring Kilbourn guilty of a contempt of its authority and ordering his imprisonment was void, and afforded no protection to the Sergeant-at-Arms in an action against him for false imprisonment. It was emphatically declared by the court "that no person can be punished for contumacy as a witness before either House, unless his testimony is required in a matter into which that House has jurisdiction to inquire, and we feel equally sure that neither of these bodies possess the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen."

In the case now before us the subject-matter referred to the committee for investigation was altogether different in its nature and involved questions and consequences wholly unlike the subject-matter referred to the committee in Kilbourn's case. It was a matter immediately and most seriously affecting the Senate itself and the great legislative trust confided to its members by the people or the States of the Union. The dignity of the body and the integrity and purity of some of its members were openly and seriously questioned, and that, too, in a manner well calculated to destroy public confidence in and bring odium and reproach upon that important branch of our national legislature. The charges or imputations referred to in the resolutions, the truth of which was made the subject of inquiry, not only affected pending legislation with distrust, but were of a nature, if found to be true, to subject members of the body to reprimand or expulsion, and other guilty parties to punishment, at the hands of the Senate. But nothing could be done until inquiry was made and the facts brought to light. A preliminary investigation was therefore necessary. And for the purposes of the inquiry no more formal proceedings were required than those adopted by the Senate. No technical formality was required and no specific charges could, in justice and fairness, be formulated against any Member of the Senate or any other person until the facts could be ascertained upon which to proceed, and it certainly can not be true that the Senate is powerless in such case to elicit the facts. What the ultimate action of the Senate should or may be upon the facts when ascertained is not the question for the court to determine, but simply whether the inquiry instituted forms a subject-matter properly and constitutionally within the cognizance and jurisdiction of the Senate. That the subject-matter was within its jurisdiction we entertain no doubt. And having power and jurisdiction of the subject-matter of inquiry, the Senate by its committee had full and ample power to compel the attendance of the appellant as a witness and to require him to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry embraced by the resolutions. There is no pretense that the answers to the questions propounded would or could criminate the witness in any way, and it was his clear duty as a citizen to obey the law and to answer the questions without respect to the persons to be affected. His refusal was at his peril and he must abide the consequences prescribed by the statute.

It has been strongly insisted in argument that because the specific ulterior purpose of the investigation was not avowed or declared on the face of the resolutions, and thus made to appear affirmatively and in terms, that the Senate by instituting the investigation intended the exercise of some of its acknowledged powers, such as the expulsion or censure of its Members, the punishment of parties for attempting to corrupt Members, or for conduct otherwise calculated to bring the body into scandal and contempt with the people, therefore there was no power to require disclosure of facts, though pertinent to the inquiry, authorized to be made. But to the correctness of this contention we can not consent. The subject-matter of inquiry being within the jurisdiction of the Senate, the court can not assume that the body intended the investigation as a mere idle, prying, inquisitive proceeding, without ultimate aim or object. We must assume that the object and design of the inquiry was intended for legitimate purposes and not for the accomplishment of that which would be unlawful.

The resolutions of reference to the committee do not, in terms, require the committee to report their proceedings to the Senate. But that was necessarily a part of their duty, for it is an established principle "that when their acts and proceedings are agreed to they become the acts and proceedings of the House; it is consequently the duty of committees both to proceed under the authority given them and to report their proceedings to the House." (Cush. Parl. Law, sec. 1930.)

(3) The last question to be considered is whether the questions propounded to the appellant were pertinent to the subject-matter of inquiry before the committee. This question would seem to need but little to be said in regard to it. Each and all of the questions had reference to and sought to elicit the information whether the stockbrokers' firm, to which the appellant belonged, had bought or sold during the months of February, March, April, and May, 1894, sugar stocks for or in the interest, directly or indirectly, of any United States Senator, or were carrying such stocks for said Senators. If these questions had been answered in the negative, this fact thus proved would have gone far toward relieving Senators of the charge or imputation of using and abusing their position as Senators for the purpose of making selfish gain in the stock market. While, on the other hand, if the answers had been in the affirmative, the fact thus disclosed would have subjected the Senator or Senators involved not only to the animadversion of the public, but to censure, if not expulsion, from the body to which he or they belonged by his or their fellow Senators. This was plainly within the scope of the inquiry, and was that to which the resolution referred when it directed the committee to inquire "whether any Senator has been or is speculating in what are known as sugar stocks during the consideration of the tariff bill now before the Senate." Whether the questions propounded by the committee or by the Senate were pertinent is a judicial question and is an essential element in the offense charged; but we are clearly of opinion that the questions set out in the indictment and which the appellant refused to answer were all pertinent to the inquiry given in charge to the committee.

Upon the whole, this court is of the opinion that the indictment is good and sufficient, and that the demurrer thereto was properly overruled by the court below; and that the demurrer in the similar case of the United States against John W. Macartney, also on appeal to this court, and submitted with and to be determined on the arguments in the case against Chapman, the present appellant, was also properly overruled by the court below; and that the judgments entered on the demurrers in both cases must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Judgments affirmed.

The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and at the October term of 1896 that tribunal decided—that this tribunal has no jurisdiction to review, on writ of error, a judgment of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia in a criminal case under section 8 of the act of February 9, 1893.[1]

In 1894 Elverton R. Chapman was committed by the courts for contempt of the United States Senate in declining, as a witness, to answer a pertinent question.

In the Chapman case the Supreme Court held that the power to punish for contempt remains with each House in cases to which its power properly extends.

Each House possesses the inherent power of self protection.

An inquiry as to the integrity of Senators was held to be within the power of the Senate, and questions relating thereto were not unreasonable intrusions into the affairs of the citizen.

It is not essential that a resolution authorizing an investigation of the conduct of Senators shall specify censure or expulsion in order that the Senate may constitutionally compel testimony.

[1] 164 U. S., p. 436.

Chapman, being committed, applied to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus. On April 19, 1897,[1] the court rendered its decision, and held in the first place that sections 102 and 104 of the Revised Statutes, when reasonably construed, were not open to the objection that they conflicted with the Constitution of the United States, and that Congress possesses the constitutional power to enact a statute to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to make disclosure of evidence to enable the respective bodies to discharge their legislative functions.

The decision further found that—while Congress can not divest itself or either of its Houses of the inherent power to punish for contempt it may provide that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto shall be a misdemeanor the United States.

The opinion, delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, has the following discussion of certain phases of the case:

Under the Constitution the Senate of the United States has the power to try impeachments; to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; to determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member; and it necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection.

According to the preamble and resolutions, the integrity and purity of Members of the Senate had been questioned in a manner calculated to destroy public confidence in the body and in such respects as might subject Members to censure or expulsion. The Senate, by the action taken, signified its judgment that it was called upon to vindicate itself from aspersion and to deal with such of its members as might have been guilty of misbehavior and brought reproach upon it, obviously had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the inquiry it directed and power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to require them to answer any question pertinent thereto. And the pursuit of such inquiry by the questions propounded in this instance was not, in our judgment, in violation of the security against unreasonable searches and seizures protected by the fourth amendment.

In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168), among other important rulings, it was held that there existed no general power in Congress, or in either House, to make inquiry into the private affairs of a citizen; that neither House could, on the allegation that an insolvent debtor of the United States was interested in a private business partnership, investigate the affairs of that partnership as a mere matter of private concern; and that consequently there was no authority in either House to compel a witness to testify on the subject. The case at bar is wholly different. Specific charges publicly made against Senators had been brought to the attention of the Senate; and the Senate had determined that investigation was necessary. The subject-matter as affecting the Senate was within the jurisdiction of the Senate. The questions were not intrusions into the affairs of the citizen; they did not seek to ascertain any facts as to the conduct, methods, extent, or details of the business of the firm in question, but only whether that firm, confessedly engaged in buying and selling stocks and the particular stock named, was employed by any Senator to buy or sell for him any of that stock, whose market price might be affected by the Senate's action. We can not regard these questions as amounting to an unreasonable search into the private affairs of the witness simply because he may have been in some degree connected with the alleged transactions, and as investigations of this sort are within the power of either of the two Houses they can not be defeated on purely sentimental grounds.

The questions were undoubtedly pertinent to the subject-matter of the inquiry. The resolutions directed the committee to inquire "whether any Senator has been, or is, speculating in what are known as sugar stocks during the consideration of the tariff bill now before the Senate." What the Senate might or might not do upon the facts when ascertained we can not say, nor are we called upon to inquire whether such ventures might be defensible, as contended in argument, but it is plain that negative answers would have cleared that body of what the Senate regarded as offensive imputations, while affirmative answers might have led to further action on the part of the Senate within its constitutional powers.

Nor will it do to hold that the Senate had no jurisdiction to pursue the particular inquiry because the preamble and resolutions did not specify that the proceedings were taken for the purpose of censure or expulsion if certain facts were disclosed by the investigation. The matter was within the range of the constitutional powers of the Senate. The resolutions adequately indicated that the transactions referred to were deemed by the Senate reprehensible and deserving of condemnation and punishment. The right to expel extends to all cases where the offense is such as in the judgment of the Senate is inconsistent with the trust and duty of a Member.

After a citation and comment on authorities, the opinion proceeds:

Counsel contends with great ability that the law under consideration is necessarily subject to being impaled on one or the other of two horns of a dilemma, either inflicting a fatal wound. The one alternative is that the law delegates to the District of Columbia criminal court the exclusive jurisdiction and power to punish as contempt the acts denounced, and thus deprive the Houses of Congress of their constitutional functions in the particular class of cases. The other alternative is that if the law should be interpreted as leaving in the Houses the power to punish such acts, and vesting in addition jurisdiction in the District criminal court to punish the same acts as misdemeanors, then the law is invalid because subjecting recalcitrant witnesses to be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense contrary to the fifth amendment.

The refusal to answer pertinent questions in a matter of inquiry within the jurisdiction of the Senate, of course, constitutes a contempt of that body, and by the statute this is also made an offense against the United States.

The history of Congressional investigations demonstrates the difficulties under which the two Houses have labored, respectively, in compelling unwilling witnesses to disclose acts deemed essential to taking definitive action, and we quite agree with Chief Justice Alvey, delivering the opinion of the court of appeals, "that Congress possessed the constitutional power to enact a statute to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to make disclosure of evidence to enable the respective bodies to discharge their legitimate functions;" and that it was to affect this that the act of 1857 was passed. It was an act necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in Congress and in each House thereof. We grant that Congress could not divest itself, or either of its Houses, of the essential and inherent power to punish for contempt in cases to which the power of either House properly extended; but because Congress, by the act of 1857, sought to aid each of the Houses in the discharge of its constitutional functions, it does not follow that any delegation of the power in each to punish for contempt was involved; and the statute is not open to objection on that account.

Nevertheless, although the power to punish for contempt still remains in each House, we must decline to decide that this law is invalid because it provides that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto, shall be a misdemeanor against the United States, who are interested that the authority of neither of their departments, nor of any branch thereof, shall be defied and set at naught. It is improbable that in any case cumulative penalties would be imposed, whether by way of punishment merely or of eliciting the answers desired, but it is quite clear that the contumacious witness is not subjected to jeopardy twice for the same offense, since the same act may be an offense against one jurisdiction and also an offense against another; and indictable statutory offenses may be punished as such, while the offenders may likewise be subjected to punishment for the same acts as contempts, the two being diverso intuitu and capable of standing together.

1615. The President, by message, complained to the House that his secretary, immediately after delivering a message to the House, had been assaulted in the Capitol.

Discussion of the theory that the House has the inherent power to punish for contempts wherever committed.

On May 16, 1828,[1] Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, from the select committee to whom was referred the message[2] of the President of the United States relative to an assault committed upon his private secretary, made a report accompanying and recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the assault committed by Russel Jarvis on the person of John Adams, the private secretary of the President, in the Rotunda of the Capitol, immediately after the said John Adams had delivered a message from the President to the House of Representatives and while he was in the act of retiring from it, was a violation of privilege which merits the censure of this House.

Resolved, That it is not expedient to have any further proceedings in this case.

The committee decided that the act was in contempt of the authority and dignity of the House, involving not only a violation of its own peculiar privileges, but of the immunity which it was bound, upon every principle, to guarantee to the person selected by the President as the organ of his official communications to the House. The proceedings of Congress could not be more effectually arrested by preventing Members of either House from going to the Hall of their deliberations than they might be by preventing the President from making official communications essentially connected with the legislation of the country. The power of punishing for contempts was not peculiar to the common law of England, but belonged essentially to every judicial tribunal and legislative body. The power in question grows out of the great law of self-preservation and, from its nature, is not susceptible of precise definition and precise limitation.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. P. P. Barbour, of Virginia, agreed with the majority as to the facts of the case, but took the ground that it was not competent for the House to "punish Russel Jarvis for the assault upon the private secretary of the President as for a contempt to the House." The minority denied the doctrine of the inherent right of the House to punish for contempts, holding that the House had only such powers in this direction as were given by the Constitution. This instrument, which defined so carefully the privileges of the Members and the powers of the House to give itself organization and action, surely did not mean to leave the House "at liberty to range in the boundless field of wild and capricious precedent in search of power to punish its fellow-citizens." The Constitution had, moreover, declared that the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, should be by trial by jury, and that no man should be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The two Houses of Congress might remove any disorder or disturbance within their respective Chambers, so as to prevent any obstruction to the progress of their business, but they had not the power of imprisoning for contempt. But if they had this power, still it could not be extended to embrace any case beyond their own Chambers; for if it were, where would be the limits? The court, in the case of Anderson v. Dunn, give the answer. They say that they know no bounds to the process of this House for contempt but those of the United States. This principle could not be admitted to be correct. Tremendous would be that power which could drag before it any citizen from Maine to Florida and punish him for contempt, of which the sole criterion would be the discretion of the power punishing.

[1] First session Twentieth Congress, Congressional Debates, p. 2715.

[2] For this message see Journal, p. 587.

On May 23 Mr. Barbour moved to postpone the orders of the day in order to consider the question, his object being to test the sense of the House on the expediency of considering the question during the present session. The motion failed, 69 to 69. So the matter was not settled by the House.

1616. For assaulting a Member for words spoken in debate, Samuel Houston was censured by the House in 1832.

The complaint of a Member that he had been assaulted for words spoken in debate was made in the form of a letter to the Speaker accompanied by an affidavit.

After debate the House ordered a warrant to issue for arrest of a person who had violated its privileges by assaulting a Member.

Samuel Houston, arrested for a breach of privilege, was arraigned at the bar of the House, informed of the charge, and informed that he might summon witnesses and employ counsel.

On April 14, 1832,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a communication addressed to the House by Mr. William Stanberry, of Ohio, a Member, in which the latter said that on the previous night he was waylaid on the street near his boarding house, attacked, knocked down by a bludgeon, and severely bruised and wounded by Samuel Houston, late of Tennessee, for words spoken in his place in the House of Representatives.

The letter being read, Mr. Joseph Vance, of Ohio, moved the following resolution, which was adopted, 106 yeas to 65 nays.

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take in custody, wherever to be found, the body of Samuel Houston; and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of this House.

An affidavit of Mr. Stanberry was presented, wherein he made oath to the truth of the facts stated in his letter.

Mr. Vance's resolution was the subject of extended debate. He had followed the precedents of 1795 and 1818,[2] as he considered the present assault as gross a breach of privilege as the offering of a bribe. Mr. James K. Polk, of Tennessee, took the ground that the law of the District of Columbia was the proper remedy for the Member, and indorsed the sentiment that precedents from the House of Commons were repugnant to the spirit and genius of republican institutions. Among those who favored the resolution, Mr. Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, took the ground that the freedom of debate, the dearest privilege of freedom, was involved. Why had Congress left Philadelphia? Was it not because an insult had been offered a Member in a public theater because, as it was believed, of the part he had taken in public business? The legislature of Pennsylvania had promised to protect Congress if it would stay, but they determined to go where they could protect themselves.[3] If the time should ever come when the House would not assume the injuries inflicted on its Members as done to itself, the Constitution would no longer be worth living under.

[3] This evidently refers to the case of Mr. Randolph. (See sec. 2680 of Volume III.)

The resolution, as presented by Mr. Vance, was adopted by a vote of 145 yeas to 25 nays.

Pursuant to the resolution, a warrant was prepared, signed by the Speaker under his seal, attested by the Clerk, and delivered to the Sergeant-at-Arms, with orders forthwith to execute the same and make due return thereof to the House.

For the trial of Samuel Houston for contempt a committee on privileges reported on a method of procedure.

In 1832 the Speaker was empowered to administer the oath to witnesses in the contempt case of Samuel Houston.

For the trial of Samuel Houston a committe was appointed to examine witnesses at the bar of the House.

The House declined to permit Samuel Houston, on trial at its bar for contempt, to challenge the right of a Member to sit in the trial.

On April 16, the Speaker having announced to the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms had the body of Samuel Houston in custody, on motion of Mr. John Davis, of Massachusetts,

Resolved, That Samuel Houston be brought to the bar of the House to answer the charge of having assaulted and beaten William Stanberry, a Member of this House from the State of Ohio, for words spoken by said Stanberry in his place as a Member of this House, in a debate upon a question depending before the House, and that he be forthwith furnished by the Clerk with a copy of the said charge as set forth in the letter of said William Stanberry.

Samuel Houston was then brought to the bar of the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Speaker addressed him, informing him of the charge against him and that he would be allowed to employ counsel and summon witnesses.

He was then remanded and retired from the bar in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms; when

On motion of Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, it was [2]

Resolved, That a committee of privileges, consisting of seven Members, be appointed and instructed to report a mode of proceeding in the case of Samuel Houston, who is now in custody by virtue of an order of this House, and that said committee have leave to execute the duty assigned them immediately.

The committee was constituted of Messrs. John Davis, of Massachusetts; William Drayton, of South Carolina; John W. Taylor, of New York; Henry A. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania; James M. Wayne, of Georgia; Clement C. Clay, of Alabama, and William W. Ellsworth, of Connecticut.

On April 17 Mr. Davis, from the committee, reported the mode of proceeding.

This report was in the form of an order,[3] which was adopted by the House and provided the following procedure:

Said Samuel Houston shall be again placed at the bar of the House, and the letter of William Stanberry shall be read to him; after which the Speaker shall put to him the following interrogatory:

Do you admit or deny that you assaulted and beat the said Stanberry, as he has represented in the letter which has been read, a copy of which has been delivered to you by order of the House?

---

[2] Journal., p. 596.

[3] Journal, p. 600; Debates, pp. 2550–2553.

If the said Samuel Houston admit that he did assault and beat the said Stanberry as in said letter is represented, then the Speaker shall put to him the following interrogatory:

Do you admit or deny that the same assault and beating were done for and on account of words spoken by said Stanberry in the House of Representatives in debate?

But if the said Samuel Houston deny the assault and beating, or that the same were done for the cause aforesaid, or refuse or evade answering the said interrogatories, then the said William Stanberry shall be examined as a witness touching the said charge; after which the said Samuel Houston shall be allowed to introduce any competent evidence in his defense, and then any further evidence the House may direct shall also be introduced.

If parol evidence is offered, the witnesses shall be sworn by the Speaker and be examined at the bar, unless they are Members of the House, in which case they may be examined in their places. A committee shall be appointed to examine witnesses. The questions put shall be reduced to writing (by a person to be appointed for that purpose) before the same are proposed to the witness, and the answer shall also be reduced to writing. Every question put by a Member not of the committee shall be reduced to writing by such Member and be propounded to the witness by the Speaker, if not objected to; but if any question shall be objected to or any testimony offered shall be objected to by any Member, the Member so objecting and the accused or his counsel shall be heard thereon, after which the question shall be decided without further debate.

When the evidence is all before the House the said Samuel Houston shall be heard on the whole matter by himself or his counsel, as he may elect.

After the said Samuel Houston shall have been so heard he shall be directed to withdraw, and the House shall proceed to consider the subject and to take such order thereon as may seem just and proper.

Said Samuel Houston shall be furnished with a copy of this order.

Messrs. Davis, of Massachusetts; Richard Coulter, of Pennsylvania; Jabez W. Huntington, of Connecticut; John M. Patton, of Virginia, and Samuel Beardsley, of New York, were appointed the committee to examine witnesses

Then, on motion of Mr. Davis, it was

Resolved, That this House will proceed to the trial of Samuel Houston to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

On April 18[1] the House, on motion of Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee,

Resolved, That Samuel Houston be permitted to have counsel to aid him in the defense of the proceedings instituted against him in the House of Representatives, and that a seat be assigned to said counsel within the bar of the House.

A resolution forbidding publication of the testimony by newspapers while the trial was going on was offered, but being antagonized strongly was withdrawn.[2]

The Sergeant-at-Arms was then directed by the Speaker to place Samuel Houston at the bar of the House; whereupon Samuel Houston was placed at the bar, accompanied by Francis S. Key, as his counsel, when the Speaker addressed him as follows:

Samuel Houston, you stand charged before the House of Representatives of the United States with having assaulted William Stanberry, one of its Members from Ohio, for words spoken by him in the House of Representatives, in debate.

By order of the House you have been brought this day to its bar to answer this charge.

Before I propound to you any interrogatory touching this matter you will say whether you are now ready to proceed to trial in the mode prescribed by the order of the House, of which you have been informed, or whether you have any request to make of the House before you are put upon your trial. If you have, it will now be received and considered by the House.

Samuel Houston then answered in the words following:

The accused, put to the bar of this House to answer for an alleged offense, begs leave respectfully to protest against the authority of this House to institute the present proceeding, and under this protest is prepared to submit to whatever course the House may order concerning the investigation they may think proper to make.

Before, however, the House proceeds further in the inquiry, he asks permission to make, by his counsel, a motion which from its nature must be preliminary to any trial on which he may be put.

Which answer being read by the Clerk, a motion was made by Mr. James M. Wayne, of Georgia, that Samuel Houston be permitted to make the motion indicated in his answer, which had been read and delivered in by him.

This motion being agreed to, Samuel Houston made the motion in the words following:

The accused asks leave to object to an honorable Member of this House, sitting and voting in the House upon the questions that may arise on the present proceeding against him, on the ground that such Member has formed and expressed opinions in relation to the accused and in relation to the accusation unfavorable to the accused, and committing himself upon the subject of the accusation.

A motion was then made by Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, that the said Samuel Houston be removed from the bar of the House.

Mr. Clement C. Clay, of Alabama, urged [1] that the prisoner and his counsel should not be compelled to retire until they had been allowed to offer argument in support of their motion; but Mr. McDuffie replied that if there was any question that the House owed it to its own dignity to decide without argument it was this.

The House thereupon agreed to the motion that the prisoner and his counsel be removed, and Samuel Houston was conducted from the bar.

The request was then debated, and was objected to on the ground that it was a challenge of one of the judges; that it amounted to a call upon the House to expel one of its Members temporarily, a proceeding impracticable; and that, if the right of challenge was admitted, it might be carried to great lengths.[2]

A motion was then made by Mr. William S. Archer, of Virginia, that the said Samuel Houston be again brought to the bar of the House and that he have leave to withdraw his said motion.

The motion being agreed to, Samuel Houston, accompanied by his counsel, was then again brought to the bar of the House and withdrew his said motion.

The House declined to release Samuel Houston on bail pending his trial by the House for contempt.

In the examination of witnesses in the contempt case of Samuel Houston, the House declined to permit a witness to state opinions.

In the trial of Samuel Houston for contempt, the House permitted an affidavit to be read.

Thereupon the Speaker put the following interrogatory to the said Samuel Houston:

Are you ready to proceed to your trial?
Answer.—I am ready to go to trial.

[1] Debates, p. 2564.

[2] Debates pp. 2564–2566.

The Speaker thereupon had the letter of William Stanberry read, and then propounded the first interrogatory prescribed by the rules.

Mr. Houston's reply was given from a written paper read by his counsel. The reply admitted the assault and beating because of words reported to have been uttered in debate by Mr. Stanberry; but denied any intention to commit any contempt or breach of privilege, or that such had really been committed.

The House then postponed further hearing of the case until the succeeding day.

Then, by unanimous consent, Mr. Henry W. Connor, of North Carolina, offered this resolution:[1]

Resolved, That Samuel Houston be released from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, on giving security for his appearance at the bar of this House from day to day, and from time to time, until the termination of his trial. The amount of the security and terms of the bond to be prescribed by the Speaker of the House.

Mr. John Dickson, of New York, questioned whether precedent could be found for such proceeding, either in the House of Commons or of the House of Representatives; and Mr. Richard H. Wilde, of Georgia, raised questions as to what would happen in case the bond should be forfeited, there being no rules or statutes to authorize an officer of the House to prosecute. Mr. William S. Archer, of Virginia, said that it was not usual for the British Parliament to take bail in similar cases.

The debate continuing on April 19, and a proposition to discharge Mr. Houston being suggested as an amendment, Mr. Dickson defended the procedure, citing precedents of Parliament since 1550. In the sixteenth century the course in such cases had been to apply to the King to cause the offender to be prosecuted; but since then the course pursued in every case had been to arrest the offender in the first instance—thus the cases of the Earl of Shaftesbury in 1677, Sir Alexander Murray in 1671, and Sir Francis Burdett in 1810. In the last case actions had been brought against the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Speaker; but the court had sustained the power of the House. In this country an instance had occurred in New York State where the legislature had arrested and imprisoned until the end of the session an individual who had challenged De Witt Clinton. In the House of Representatives also were cited the cases of Randall, Whitney, and Anderson.

Mr. Connor's motion was withdrawn.

Samuel Houston, accompanied by his counsel, was then placed at the bar of the House; and, having responded that he was ready to proceed, the proceedings began.[2]

Mr. William Stanberry, the Member who complained to the House, was sworn in his place, and gave his testimony, which appears in full in the Journal, as does all the testimony. During his testimony witness was questioned both by the accused and by the committee. The witness testified in relation to his speech which had given offense to Mr. Houston.

On April 19,[3] during the testimony of Mr. Stanberry, a question was asked on behalf of the accused that elicited an answer suggesting, in connection with charges against Mr. Houston, fraud on the part of the late Secretary of War. This response at once caused objection and debate, but resulted in no definite action. On April 20, however, while the witness was stating reasons which led him to believe that Mr. Houston had been engaged in an attempted fraud through a Government contract, he was stopped by a Member, and after debate the House agreed to this motion:[1]

That the witness be precluded from stating his belief of any fraud committed by Governor Houston or in which he participated, but may be permitted to state any evidence which he then had or now has tending to prove it.

On April 20 also an effort was made, in order to save the time of the House, to confine the examination of witnesses and discussion of questions arising out of testimony to the committee, but objection was made and the proposition was withdrawn.

On April 20[2] also Mr. Stanberry, in the course of his testimony, presented a paper purporting to be the affidavit of one Luther Blake, charging Samuel Houston with fraud. Counsel for Mr. Houston claimed that the paper should not be considered evidence until it should be shown how taken, and objection was made to reading it.

The question being put, the House decided that the paper should be read; but on the succeeding day an affidavit in explanation of certain defects of this paper was not received.

Discussion as to the right of the House to punish for a contempt not committed in its actual presence.

Argument that the parliamentary law as to contempt does not apply to the House.

The House ordered spread on its Journal the paper in which Samuel Houston protested against the right of the House to punish him for contempt.

Rule for examining Members as witnesses in a trial at the bar of the House for contempt.

The trial continued, and on April 26 Mr. Key began his argument[3] for the defense. He was prevented by illness from concluding until May 3. On May 7 Mr. Houston spoke[4] at the bar in his own defense.

Thereupon Mr. John M. Harper, of New Hampshire, offered the following resolution:[5]

Resolved, That Samuel Houston, now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, be forthwith discharged.

Mr. Jabez W. Huntington, of Connecticut, moved to amend this by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting: "That Samuel Houston has been guilty of contempt and a violation of the privileges of this House."

On the next day an extended debate took place on these propositions, Mr. Polk supporting the original resolution in an exhaustive speech.

Mr. Polk, in favoring the original resolution, stated [1] that upon full examination of the question he was confirmed in the opinion that the House was invested with no authority, under the Constitution or laws of the land, to punish as for a contempt or violation of its privileges any offense committed not in the presence of the House during its session or in such manner as to disturb its proceedings. The precedents of Parliament were not applicable, for Congress was limited by a written Constitution, and the parliamentary law of privilege was not the law of privilege of either House of Congress. The Constitution had conferred no such power, and even if it had it could not be exercised until the offense was defined and the punishment prescribed. Mr. Polk argued in support of his position with exhaustive citations from authorities.

The debate continued until May 11, [2] being closed by Mr. Dickson, of New York, who argued that the inherent right of the House to punish for breach of its privileges was sustained by precedents of Parliament, legislatures of the States, of the Continental Congress, and of the House itself. The Constitution itself in this case was evidently authority for the procedure, for it could not be that it meant to protect them from arrest in going to and returning from the House and yet leave them subject to individual lawless violence because of words spoken in debate.

He was answered by Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, and thereafter the debate continued at length and with an exhaustive citation of authorities and precedents.

Finally, on May 11, the Huntington amendment was agreed to, 106 yeas to 88 nays, and then the following was adopted:

Resolved, That Samuel Houston be brought to the bar of the House on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, and be there reprimanded by the Speaker for the contempt and violation of the privileges of the House of which he has been guilty, and that he be then discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

This was agreed to, 96 yeas to 84 nays, and on May 14 Mr. Houston was censured by the Speaker for invading the rights and privileges of the House.[3]

As Mr. Houston was brought to the bar he was allowed to present a paper protesting against the punishment inflicted on him. This paper was, by vote of the House, spread on the Journal.[4]

1620. It being doubtful whether or not an assault on a Member had been for words spoken in debate, no action was taken.

A person who had assaulted a Member was permitted to be present at the investigation by a select committee and cross-examine witnesses.

On February 28, 1835,[5] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Hon. John Ewing, of Indiana, in which the latter apologized for his absence from the House and explained that while on his way to his boarding house after the adjournment on the evening of the 26th instant he was waylaid and assaulted in a most outrageous and dastardly manner by John F. Lane, a lieutenant in the United States Army and son of the Hon. A. Lane, of Indiana, for no other known cause than for words spoken in debate some weeks since, in reply to his father, on the floor of the House of Representatives. Mr. Ewing stated that he had but a casual acquaintance with the person who committed this outrage, and no intercourse whatever with him to lead to the assault. A blow from an iron cane with a leaden head accompanied the first notice of the attack, and was repeated by several others. Mr. Ewing regretted his disability at such an important and pressing period of the session.

After this letter had been read Mr. Edward A. Hannegan, of Ohio, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members be appointed to investigate the circumstances of the assault on the Hon. John Ewing, and to report the facts to this House.

After unsuccessful motions to lay the resolution on the table and to postpone it until March 3, it passed, 127 yeas to 63 nays.

Mr. Hannegan was made chairman of the committee, which on March 3 brought in their report.[1] They took testimony in the presence of Lieutenant Lane, to whom the privilege of cross-examination of witnesses was given. After the testimony on the part of the committee had been closed Lieutenant Lane gave the committee to understand that he did not feel bound to introduce any evidence going to show what his private motives were for the assault upon Mr. Ewing. After reciting the circumstances the committee say that they have been unable to discover any cause other than that assigned by Mr. Ewing. The committee had no grounds for supposing this to be the cause of the assault other than the supposition of Mr. Ewing and the absence of all apparent cause besides. Lieutenant Lane had disclaimed any such intention or motive. Therefore the committee, as the time allowed was brief, declined suggesting any action by the House.

1621. A proposition relating to an assault on a Senator by a Member was held in order as a question of privilege.

The House failed to agree to a resolution to expel a Member for assaulting a Senator.

The House censured a Member for being concerned in an assault on a Senator.

The House declined to censure two Members in one resolution, taking such action as enabled a vote to be taken as to each.

On May 23, 1856,[2] Mr. Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio, submitted a preamble and resolution, which he subsequently modified to read as follows, viz:

Whereas it is represented that on the 22d day of May, 1856, the Hon. Preston S. Brooks and the Hon. Lawrence M. Keitt, Members of this House from the State of South Carolina, and other Members, either as principals or accessories, perpetrated a violent assault on the person of the Hon. Charles Sumner, a Senator of the United States from the State of Massachusetts, while remaining in his seat in the Senate Chamber in performance of duties pertaining to his official station: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject and report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the character of this House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a clerk; also to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. Thomas L. Clingman, of North Carolina, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved in the proposition, and that it could not supersede the regular order of business.

The Speaker[1] decided that a question of privilege was involved in the proposition, saying:

The Chair is of opinion that the resolution involves a question of privilege. * * * If a personal difficulty occurred between two Members of this House, either during its session or immediately upon its adjournment, growing out of the proceedings in the House, the Chair is of the opinion that its investigation would be legitimately a question of privilege. His opinion is in accordance with many precedents involving the same circumstances.

The resolution refers to an assault by a Member of this House upon a member of the Senate while in his seat in the Senate Chamber. It does not, it is true, affect the privileges of the House or its Members with that directness which would exist if the assault had occurred between Members of the House in its presence. It is, however, only one step removed, and that removal is not such as to change the nature of the question. The members of the Senate are entitled under the Constitution to the privileges as Members of the House of Representatives; and whenever it shall appear, either by a message from the Senate or by an admitted statement on the part of any Member of this House, that the privileges of the Senate have been violated in the manner charged by the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair believes it to be a duty to submit it to the House as a subject of privilege. * * * The language of the resolution is, "whilst remaining in his seat in the Senate Chamber;" and the presumption is, from that language, "in the performance of the official duties pertaining to his station."

As a matter of right, the Senate has no cognizance of any violation of privilege upon the part of a Member of the House. This House is the protector exclusively of the privileges of its own Members; and the Chair would not recognize the right of the Senate to interfere with the privilege of any Member of the House, either here or elsewhere, upon the ground of an offense against the privileges of the Senate. It belongs to the House, if a Member has in any manner violated its own privileges or those of the Senate, to inquire into the facts, and come to such determination as its own dignity and regard for the privileges of the Senate may require. The Senate is not a tribunal competent to investigate and determine the privileges of Members of the House. The Chair is of opinion, therefore, that upon the facts stated in the resolution presented by the gentleman from Ohio, such a question of privilege is presented as will supersede ordinary subjects of legislation. The Chair is at liberty, undoubtedly, to refer the matter to the House for its decision. In the case lately decided by the House the Chair was not cognizant of the facts. No privilege of the Senate, or of any other person, was asserted, and the Chair declined to decide whether it was a question of privilege or not, and submitted it to the House for decision. But in this instance it is stated that a Member of the House has violated the privileges of the Senate by an assault upon one of its Members while in his seat in the performance of his duty; and the Chair believes he can not consistently decide that it is not a question of privilege.

As a precedent upon this point, the Chair refers to the action of the House of Representatives in the case of an assault committed upon the private secretary of the President of the United States,[2] not by a Member of Congress, but by a citizen. The information was transmitted to the House by the President in a special message. The House took cognizance of the subject as a question of privilege, and ordered a committee of investigation. The Chair decides this to involve a question of privilege.

Mr. Clingman having appealed from this decision, the appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 85 to 71.

The Speaker then announced the appointment of the following committee: Messrs. Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio; Howell Cobb, of Georgia; Alfred B. Greenwood, of Arkansas; Francis E. Spinner, of New York, and Alexander C. M. Pennington, of New Jersey.

---

[1] Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, Speaker.

[2] See section 1615 of this chapter.

On June 2, 1856,[1] the committee reported. They came to the conclusion that the assault was a breach of the privilege of the Senate, but that the Senate could not therefor arrest and try and punish a Member of the House. Therefore only the House could punish. The act was an aggravated assault upon the freedom of speech guaranteed by the Constitution. The committee did not discuss the powers of the House to punish its disorderly Members, nor argue the general question of privilege. The passage of the resolution by the House was regarded as declaratory on the part of the House of its power to call its Members to account for such acts as violated the privileges of the Senate.

The views of the minority, submitted by Howell Cobb and Alfred B. Greenwood, concluded with a resolution declaring that the House had no jurisdiction of the case, and therefore deemed it improper to express any opinion on the subject. After reciting the facts the report argues elaborately the question of privilege, taking with strictness the ground that the privileges of the House are only such as are expressly given by the fifth and sixth sections of the first article of the Constitution or set forth in some law passed in pursuance thereof or some rule adopted under the authority of the same, and denying that either the Senate or House possessed the inherent right to declare what its privileges were. To admit this inherent right would be to establish the despotism of the privileges of Parliament. To illustrate the nature of these privileges, the precedents from the minority report of P. P. Barbour in 1828 were given.[2]

The framers of our Constitution had too much regard for the liberty of the citizen to give such power to either House of Congress. As to the assault upon the freedom of speech, the report questioned whether the Constitution contemplated such an assault as this, which was made in violation of the criminal law, and suggested that the constitutional intent was rather to protect Members from legal liability under the law for words spoken. While each House should guard its own privileges, it was not charged with guarding the privileges of the other body. The Constitution expressly gave each House the power to punish its Members for disorderly behavior, but the minority Members took the view that this referred only to the actual sessions of the House.

In the debate on the question those who sustained the report of the majority drew the distinction between two branches of the crime—the offense against the individual, which the courts could punish, and the offense against the people, whose majesty had been violated, and which could be punished by no tribunal but the House or Senate. The narrow construction of the provision as to disorderly behavior was also combated, as tending inevitably to reduce that provision of the Constitution to a mockery. The inherent right of the House to punish for contempts such as this, even though the offender had also violated the civil law, was urged from the precedents of Gunn and Frelinghuysen in 1796,[3] Robert Randall in 1795,[4] and the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case Anderson v. Dunn.[5] Mr. John

A. Bingham, of Ohio, contended that for a Member of the House to violate the freedom of debate in the Senate was disorderly conduct, for which the House might expel him, Justice Story had said "that this power in the House to punish and expel its Members for aggravated misconduct was indispensable, not as a common, but as an ultimate, redress for the grievance."

Mr. Bingham summed up his statement by the claim that the House had the power to punish and expel its Members for breach of its privileges, for contempt of its authority, and for such high crimes and misdemeanors as are inconsistent with their public trusts and duties as Members, whether committed in the presence of the House and during its actual session or not. The opinions of jurists and the decision of the highest court most clearly established this. Beyond question, the act committed by the Member from South Carolina was a contempt of the House, a violation of his duty as a Member thereof, and a high crime against the people and their right of representation.

The question was put on the adoption of the preamble and resolutions recommended by the committee on July 9:

Whereas the Senate of the United States have transmitted to this House a message complaining that Preston S. Brooks, a Representative from the State of South Carolina, committed upon the person of Charles Sumner, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, while seated at his desk in the Senate Chamber, after the adjournment of that body on the 22d of May last, a violent assault, which disabled him from attending to his duties in the Senate, and declaring that the said assault was a breach of the privileges of that body; and

Whereas, from respect to the privileges of the House, the Senate have further declared that, inasmuch as the said Preston S. Brooks is a Member of this House, they can not arrest, and, a fortiori can not try or punish him for a breach of their privileges; that they can not proceed further in the case than to make their complaint to this House, and that the power to arrest, try, and punish devolves solely on this body; and

Whereas upon full investigation it appears to this House that the said Preston S. Brooks has been guilty of the assault complained of by the Senate, with most aggravated circumstances of violence; that the same was a breach of the privileges not only of the Senate, but of the Senator assailed, and of this House as a coordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government, in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that Senators and Representatives "for any speech or debate in either House shall not be questioned in any other place;" and

Whereas this House is of opinion that it has the power and ought to punish the said Preston S. Brooks for the said assault, not only as a breach of the privileges of the Senator assailed and of the Senate and House, as declared by the Constitution, but as an act of disorderly behavior; and

Whereas it further appears from such investigation that Henry A. Edmundson, a Representative from the State of Virginia, and Lawrence M. Keitt, a Representative from the State of South Carolina, some time previous to the said assault, were informed that it was the purpose of the said Preston S. Brooks to commit violence upon the person of the said Charles Sumner for words used by him in debate as a Senator in the Senate, and took no measures to discourage or prevent the same, but, on the contrary, anticipating the commission of such violence, were present on one or more occasions to witness the as friends of the assailant: Therefore Resolved, That Preston S. Brooks be, and he is forthwith, expelled from this House as a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That this House hereby declare its disapprobation of the said act of Henry A. Edmundson and Lawrence M. Keitt in regard to the said assault.

Mr. Howell Cobb's proposition, to substitute a resolution that the House had no jurisdiction over the case, having been disagreed to, on July 14 [1] the House voted on the first resolution for the explusion of Mr. Brooks, and there were 121 yeas and 95 nays—not the required two-thirds, so the resolution was not agreed to.

On July 15[1] the resolution relating to Mr. Edmundson and Mr. Keitt was decided in the negative—yeas 70 nays 125—it being urged that the cases of the two men should be voted on separately. This vote was then reconsidered, and then the resolution was amended by substituting a resolution of two branches, one relating to Mr. Keitt and the other to Mr. Edmundson. The resolution relating to Mr. Keitt was agreed to—yeas 106, nays 96. The second resolution, expressing disapprobation of Mr. Edmundson, was disagreed to—yeas 60, nays 136.

The preamble was then amended in relation to Mr. Edmundson, and then agreed to.

Both Mr. Brooks and Mr. Keitt resigned from the House immediately.

1622. A Member of the House having assaulted a Senator for words spoken in debate, the Senate examined the breach of privilege and transmitted the report to the House for action.

The Senate did not attempt to exercise any authority over a Member of the House who had committed a breach of the Senate's privilege.

The Senate having communicated the report of a breach of the Senate's privilege by a Member of the House. The House Journal records the fact but not the report.

On May 23, 1856,[2] in the Senate, Mr. Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, announced the assault which had been made the day before on his colleague, Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, by Mr. Preston S. Brooks, of South Carolina, a Member of the House of Representatives. Mr. Wilson then offered this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five Members be elected by the Senate to inquire into the circumstances attending the assault committed on the person of the Hon. Charles Sumner, a Member of the Senate, in the Senate Chamber yesterday, and that the said committee be instructed to report a statement of the facts, together with their opinion thereon, to the Senate.

This resolution was agreed to, and the following were chosen of the committee: Lewis Cass, of Michigan, Philip Allen, of Rhode Island, Henry Dodge, of Wisconsin, Henry S. Geyer, of Missouri, and James A. Pearce, of Maryland.

This committee, which subsequently was given authority to send for persons and papers, reported on May 28. On the same clay the resolution accompanying the report was agreed to. The report begins:

That from the testimony taken by them it appears that the Hon. Preston S. Brooks, a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of South Carolina, did, on the 22d day of the present month, after the adjournment of the Senate and while Mr. Sumner was seated at his desk in the Senate Chamber, assault him with considerable violence, striking him numerous blows on and about the head with a walking stick, which cut his head and disabled him for the time being from attending to his duties in the Senate. The cause of this assault was certain language used by Mr. Sumner in debates on the Monday and Tuesday preceding, which Mr. Brooks considered libelous of the State of South Carolina and slanderous of his near kinsman, Mr. Butler, a Senator from that State, who at the time was absent from the Senate and the city.

The committee forbear to comment upon the various circumstances which preceded and attended this affair, whether of aggravation or extenuation, for reasons which will be sufficiently obvious in the latter part of the report.

They have examined the precedents, which are to be found only in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, the Senate never having been called on to pronounce its judgment in a similar case. In the House of Representatives, though different opinions have at various times been expressed by gentlemen of great eminence and ability, among whom may be mentioned the late President of the United States, Mr. Polk, the late Judge Barbour, of the Supreme Court, and Mr. Beardsley, of New York, yet the judgment of the House has always pronounced an assault for words spoken in debate to be a violation of the privileges of the House.

The report then goes on to refer to the cases of Baldwin and Gunn in 1796, Russel Jarvis and John Adams in 1828, of Samuel Houston in 1832,[1] and, after indorsing the views given by Mr. McDuffie in the Jarvis case, continues:

But, while it is the opinion of the committee that this assault was a breach of the privileges of the Senate, they also think that it is not within the jurisdiction of the Senate, and can only be punished by the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Brooks is a Member. This opinion is in strict conformity with the recognized parliamentary law. Hatsell, in his precedents, says as follows:

"The leading principle which appears to pervade all the proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament is that there shall subsist a perfect equality with respect to each other, and that they shall be in every respect totally independent one of the other. From hence it is that neither House can claim, much less exercise, authority over a Member of the other; but, if there is any ground of complaint against an act of the House itself, against any individual Member, or against any of the officers of either House, this complaint ought to be made to that House of Parliament where the offense is charged to be committed; and the nature and mode of redress or punishment, if punishment is necessary, must be determined upon and inflicted by them. Indeed, any other proceeding would soon introduce disorder and confusion, as it appears actually to have done in those instances where both Houses, claiming a power independent of each other, have exercised that power upon the same subject, but with different views and contrary purpose. (3 Hatsell, 67.)

"We see from the several precedents above cited, that neither House of Parliament can take upon themselves any breach of privilege offered to them by any Member of the other House; but that in such cases the usual mode of proceeding is to examine into the fact, and then to lay a statement of that evidence before the House of which the person complained of is a Member." (Ibid., 71.)

Mr. Jefferson, in the Manual of Parliamentary Practice prepared by him, lays down the following rule:

"Neither House can exercise any authority over a Member or officer of the other, but should complain to the House of which he is a Member, and leave the punishment to them."

A brief examination of the constitutional privileges of Senators and Representatives will show the soundness of this rule of parliamentary law.

The Constitution provides, article 1, section 6, that "They shall, in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, in going to and returning from the same." But the Senate is not a court of criminal judicature, empowered to try the excepted offenses, and can not take cognizance of a breach of the peace, as such. It can not take any notice of the assault except as a breach of its privileges, and in this aspect it is not one of the cases in which the privilege from arrest is excepted.

The Senate, therefore, for a breach of its privileges can not arrest a Member of the House of Representatives, and a fortiori can not try and punish him. That authority devolves solely on the House of which he is a Member.

It is the opinion of the committee, therefore, that the Senate can not proceed further in the present case than to make complaint to the House of Representatives of the assault committed by one of its Members, the Hon. Preston S. Brooks, upon the Hon. Charles Sumner, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts.

The committee submit herewith certain affidavits taken by them in the case, and the following resolution:

Resolved, That the above report be accepted, and that a copy thereof and the affidavits accompanying the same be transmitted to the House of Representatives."

The Secretary of the Senate, in delivering this report to the House on May 29, stated, according to the House Journal:

I am directed by the Senate to communicate to this House a resolution and report relating to a breach of the privileges of the Senate by a Member of this House.

The House Journal contains only this statement, the report not being given in full. The message was referred to the select committee to whom the House committed the subject of the assault, the House already, on May 23, having taken cognizance of the breach of privilege.[1]

1623. A letter from a Member of the House disclaiming any intention of invading the privileges of the Senate in assaulting a Senator, was, after some discussion, read to the Senate.—On June 2, 1856,[2] the President pro tempore of the Senate, Jesse D. Bright, laid before the Senate a communication from Representative Preston S. Brooks, of South Carolina, disclaiming any intention of causing a breach of the privileges of the Senate in assaulting Senator Charles Sumner, upon which assault the Senate had taken action as a breach of privilege. The letter, after some discussion, was read and ordered to be printed.

1624. An assault upon a Member within the walls of the Capitol, when the House was not in session, was deemed a breach of privilege, although it arose from a cause not connected with the Member's representative capacity.—On November 30, 1809,[3] the Speaker laid before the House the following letter:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: An occurrence having recently taken place between a Member of the House of Representatives and myself, produced by circumstances not at all connected with his official duties or opinions, which from the time and place may be considered disrespectful to the House of Representatives, I take the liberty of tendering through you my most respectful declarations that I am the last who would willfully manifest a deficiency of that reverence which is due to the Representatives of my country, or that sacred regard which is also due to their privileges.

To yourself, sir, personally, I tender the assurances of my very great respect.

I. A. COLES.

NOVEMBER 29, 1809.

On December 8 a select committee was appointed to report on the facts and their opinion in the matter. Mr. John Taylor, of South Carolina, was made chairman.

On December 29 the committee reported that they had taken the deposition of the Hon. James Turner, a Senator of the United States, and of Mr. Samuel Sprigg, which depositions they reported to the House. The report continues:

From these depositions it was established to the satisfactory belief of your committee that Mr. I.A. Coles, without any immediate previous altercation or provocation, did assault and strike a Member of this House within the walls of the north wing of the Capitol, and this act was done on Monday, the 27th ultimo, about 1 o'clock p.m., and after this House had adjourned over to the following day.

That from the assertion of Mr. Coles, and from the actual admission of the Member assaulted, your committee were satisfied that the provocation or supposed provocation which occasioned the attack did not arise from anything said or from any act done by the Member of this House in the fulfillment of his duties as a Representative in the Congress of the United States.

Your committee are of opinion that this latter circumstance may be received in extenuation, but can not be admitted in justification of the act done by Mr. Coles, and from all the circumstances of the case they are of opinion that mid assault and violence offered to the Member was a breach of the privileges of this House.

In view, however, of the acknowledgments and apologies made to the Speaker, and also in a letter to the committee, the committee recommended the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That any further proceeding in the above case is unnecessary.

On December 30 by a vote of 76 yeas to 25 nays the House voted to have the report printed and that it be committed to the Committee of the Whole for next Thursday. It does not seem to have been acted on thereafter.

1625. For attempted intimidation and assault upon a Member, A.P. Field was arrested and censured at the bar of the House for breach of privilege.—On February 7, 1865,[1] Mr. F. C. Beaman, from the select committee[2] to investigate the assault upon the Hon. William D. Kelley by A.P. Field, a citizen of Louisiana, made a report recommending the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of A.P. Field, convicted of a breach of the privilege of the House in the attempt, by language of intimidation and bullying, to deter William D. Kelley, a Representative in this House from the Fourth district of the State of Pennsylvania, from the free and fearless exercise of his rights and duties as a Member of Congress, and voting and deciding upon a pending subject of legislation, and in following up the the said attempt at intimidation and bullying by an assault upon the person of said Representative Kelley, and forthwith bring him to the bar of the House, and thereupon said A.P. Field be reprimanded by the Speaker.

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of this House of the 5th day of December last granting the privilege of the hall to the claimants for seats from the State of Louisiana as applies to the said A.P. Field be rescinded.

The testimony before the committee showed that Field had assaulted Mr. Kelley with a knife at a hotel in Washington. Field admitted the assault, but excused himself on the ground that he was at the time laboring under much excitement.

On February 21[3] the first resolution was agreed to, yeas 82, nays 49. The second resolution was laid on the table, yeas 71, nays 64.

On February 22[4] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody A.P. Field, and the Speaker administered to him a reprimand for his "flagrant breach of privilege."

1626. The case of Patrick Woods, in contempt of the House in 1870.

A Member having, in a letter to the Speaker complained that he had been assaulted on his way to attend the House, the matter was held to be a question of privilege.

A person who had assaulted a Member on his way to the House, but at a place distant therefrom, was arrested on warrant of the Speaker and arraigned at the bar.

Members are not permitted to communicate with a prisoner arraigned at the bar of the House.

On June 10, 1870,[1] the Speaker, as a question of privilege, laid before the House a communication from Mr. Charles H. Porter, of Virginia, detailing the circumstances of an assault made upon him in the city of Richmond, Va., on the 30th ultimo, by Patrick Woods, alias Pat. Dooley.

The same having been read, Mr. Hamilton Ward, of New York, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take in custody, wherever to be found, the body of Patrick Woods, alias Pat. Dooley, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the farther order and direction of this House.

Mr. Ward drew this resolution in accordance with the precedent of 1832.[2]

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, raised the point of order that the paper presented did not show that the assault was made on the gentleman from Virginia in his capacity as a Member of Congress, or that it was designed to interfere with him as a Member of Congress, and that this, therefore, was not a question of privilege.

The Speaker[3] decided that any assault on a Member, which that Member, in his capacity as such, brings to the attention of the House, must be ruled as a question of privilege. The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Porter, was absent by leave of the House, and he stated that at the time of the assault he was on his return to the House of Representatives for the purpose of attending to his public duties. The Chair could not imagine that there could be a, difference of opinion as to its being a question of privilege.

The resolution was agreed to, 126 yeas to 40 nays; and on June 11, 1870,[4] the Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar having Woods in charge.

When the prisoner was arraigned at the bar, Mr. Logan H. Roots, of Arkansas, made the point of order that no Member had the right to converse with the prisoner at the bar while in custody. Jurors were not permitted to hold communication with the prisoner at the bar.

The Chair sustained the point of order.

In 1870 the investigation of a breach of privilege was committed to a standing committee.

A prisoner of the House was taken by its order and in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms to testify in the court of a State.

Reference to English precedents as to power to punish for contempt.

Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, presented this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the matter of privilege, being an assault upon Hon. Charles H. Porter, be referred to the Judiciary Committee of this House for examination, and report what action this House should take in the premises; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and that in the meantime the person at the bar be retained in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

[3] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

[4] Journal, p. 965; Globe, p. 4352.

On June 16,[1] on recommendation of the Committee on Judiciary, the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, or his assistant, John W. Le Barnes, be ordered to take Patrick Woods, now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and being so held by order of this House for a breach of the privileges thereof, to Richmond, Va., there to testify in the court of hustings as a witness in the case of the Commonwealth of Virginia against John Gurhiser, on Monday next, the 20th instant; and that the Sergeant-it-Arms, or his assistant, John W. Le Barnes, shall continue to keep said Woods in his custody, and shall, immediately after he shall have so testified, return with said Woods to this House.

On June 25 Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the report of the committee:[2]

It appears, from an uninterrupted series of cases, both in this country and in England, from which we derived our parliamentary law, that all assaults made upon the reputation, character, and persons of Members have ever been held as breaches of the privileges of the legislative body of which the Member was a part, and as high crimes and misdemeanors. The uniformity of the decisions and action in these cases relieves your committee of the necessity of any review of the specific cases. In the Commons, on the 12th of April, 1733, it was resolved and declared, nem. con., "That the assaulting, insulting, or menacing any member of this House, or upon account of his behavior in Parliament, is a high infringement of the privileges of this House, a most outrageous and dangerous violation of the rights of Parliament, and a high crime and misdemeanor." This precedent has been constantly followed by the House and Senate during continuance of the Government, the earliest case being that of Duane for a libel on the Senate in 1800. Were we left unadvised by precedent the case would stand too clear for dispute upon principle. If, while in attendance or going from or returning to the House, a Member may be assaulted so that his life is endangered, insomuch that he can not attend the sessions of the House, such assault would clearly seem to be a breach of the privilege of the House, which has a right to the attendance of all its Members. So much is certain, that if one Member may be so assaulted all may be, or such a part as would interfere with a quorum of the House, and that such assaults as the one under consideration might be made for the purpose of interfering by disabling Members from attendance, and assaulting and maiming Members might become an inconvenient but sure method of changing a majority in the House in high party times, especially where that majority was not large. It can not seriously be imagined that the Constitution has left both Houses of Congress so impotent for self-protection in that regard as would be true in that case.

As to the power of punishment the committee based its recommendation on the decision in the case of Anderson v. Dunn, wherein it was laid down, "And even as to the duration of imprisonment a period is imposed by the nature of things, since the existence of the power that imprisons is indispensable to its continuance; and although the legislative power continues perpetual, the legislative body ceases to exist on the moment of its adjournment or periodical dissolution. It follows that imprisonment must terminate with the adjournment." In England in the Case of Stockdale v. Hansard, in 1839, Lord Denham, chief justice, used the following language: "However flagrant the contempt, the House of Commons can only commit till the close of the existing session. Their privilege to commit is not better known than this limitation of it. Though the party should deserve the severest penalties of it, yet his offense being committed the day before the prorogation, if the House ordered his imprisonment but for a week, every court in Westminster Hall and all the judges of all the courts would be bound to discharge him by habeas corpus."

[2] House Report No. 105, second session Forty-first Congress.

The committee therefore came to the conclusion "that the power of the House to punish for contempt of its privileges by imprisonment extends only to the terms of the Members of the then existing House. Thus, the limit of imprisonment of the offender at bar by the present House will be the 4th of March next. * * * It has been thought by some that the term of imprisonment must be limited only by the session, but your committee are satisfied that such is not the limitation either by precedent or reason. It has been early decided in England that the common law which required the release of the prisoner at the end of the session never applied to an adjournment even when it was in the nature of a prorogation." [1]

The minority views, signed by Messrs. C. A. Eldridge and M. C. Kerr, dissents from the statement of facts made by the majority, and holds that the assault had no connection with any official act of Mr. Porter, and was not made with any intention to detain him from his seat in the House, and in fact did not so detain him. The conelusion was then (1) that Congress derives no power whatever from the En&h parliamentary law; (2) that the Members of Congress are exempt only as defined in the Constitution; (3) that they have the same protection as all other citizens for their rights of person and property, no more and no less; (4) that Congress has the power to protect its free deliberation so far as it does not create any privileges in its Members or others; (5) that to give to Members of Congress a double protection to their persons or property from that enjoyed by other citizens will be to make them a privileged class, (6) and that, therefore, this House has no right to inflict punishment on Patrick Woods for assault on Mr. Porter, thus giving Porter double remedies against Woods, while Woods would only have a single one against Porter. On the question of punishment, the minority held that the prisoner could not be committed for a longer time than the adjournment of the session, and that he could not be kept until the expiration of the Congress.

For assaulting a Member returning to the House from an absence on leave, Patrick Woods was committed for a term extending beyond the adjournment of the session, but not beyond the term of the existing House.

Form of Speaker's warrant for commitment of a person in contempt, and of Sergeant-at-Arms's return thereon.

On July 7 [2] the House agreed, by a vote of 119 yeas to 57 nays, to the preamble and resolution recommended by the committee:

Whereas Patrick Woods, on the 13th day of May last past, at Richmond, did make a violent, unprovoked, and felonious assault upon Hon. Charles H. Porter, then being a Member of the House of Representatives, on his way returning thereto from a leave of absence, and did cut, bruise, and disable said Porter, being then a Member of the House, from attending to his duties therein, Woods well knowing that Mr. Porter was then Member of Congress, and on his way to Washington, and making such assault because of that knowledge; and whereas said Woods being brought to the bar of the House, and being fully heard in his defense by counsel and witnesses, before the Committee on the Judiciary, all the facts before recited fully appeared: Therefore,

[1] Woods was committed on July 8, 1870, and the second session ended July 15, 1870; but Congress did not terminate until March 3, 1871, there being a third session.

[2] Journal, pp. 1163–1168; Globe, pp. 5253, 5297.

Resolved, That Patrick Woods, now held at the bar of the House to answer for a breach of the privileges of the House for his offense, be, and hereby is, ordered to be punished by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia, as other criminals are, for three months; and that a warrant in due form, under the hand of the Speaker, be issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms, directing the execution of this order.

On July 9, 1870,[1] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms in the case of Patrick Woods; which was read, ordered to be placed upon the Journal, and is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
JULY 7, 1870.

TO NEHEMIAH G. ORDWAY, Esq., Sergeant-at-Arms.

SIR: The following resolution was this day adopted by the House of Representatives, to wit:

"Resolved, That Patrick Woods, now held at the bar of the House to answer for a breach of the privileges of the House, for his offense be, and he is hereby, ordered to be punished by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia, as other criminals are, for three months; and that a warrant be made out in form, under the hand of the Speaker, and issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms, directing the execution of this order."

Now, therefore, this is to require you, Nehemiah G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the United States, to execute the foregoing order of the House of Representatives.

Given under my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives the day and year above written.

J.G. BLAINE.
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

EDWARD MCPHERSON, Clerk.

OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS,
UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTITIVES,
July 8, 1870.

I have executed the within warrant of the House of Representatives upon Patrick Woods, by delivering him to the warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, together with an attested copy of said warrant, and with the following further order addressed to him by me, to wit:

TO THE WARDEN OF THE JAIL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

Sir: Pursuant to the order of the United States House of Representatives, a true copy of which is hereto annexed, you are hereby required to receive Patrick Woods into the jail aforesaid, and him there detain for the full term of three months named in said order of the United States House of Representatives; and you will not surrender said Woods to any authority except that issuing from said House of Representatives until the expiration of his sentence without further orders.

N. G. ORDWAY,
SERGEANT-AT-ARM U. S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.
JULY 8, 1870.

I have this day received into the jail of the District of Columbia the above-mamed Patrick Woods.

JOHN S. CROKER,
Warden United States Jail.

1629. An assault upon the clerk of a committee within the walls of the Capitol was held to be a breach of privilege.

A discussion as to the power of the House to imprison for a period after the adjournment of the session.

An instance wherein the House turned over to the jurisdiction of the courts an offender guilty of contempt.

[1] Journal, p. 1199; Globe, p. 5422.

On July 17, 1866,[1] Mr. John B. Alley, of Massachusetts, as a question of privilege, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That whereas a violent personal assault, within the walls of this Capitol, has been committed upon the person of U. H. Painter, the clerk of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads, by Benjamin B. Beveridge and Edward Towers, who are now in the custody of the police officers of the Capitol, the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to take into his custody the said assailants and to detain them until the further order of the House upon the subject, and that a committee of five Members be appointed to investigate and report upon the said assault, with power to send for persons and papers.

The Speaker[2] said:

As the Chair understands, the point is raised that this is not a question of privilege. The Chair rules that it is a question of privilege, which may properly receive the action of the House. This House has even gone so far as to bring citizens before the bar for disorder in the galleries. If this could be done then unquestionably when an officer of the House has been beaten or assailed within the walls of the Capitol the House has power to take action in the matter.

The committee were appointed, Mr. Alley being chairman. On July 18 he reported that the committee did not find evidence to show that Mr. Towers was implicated in the assault, and recommended his discharge from arrest, which was concurred in by the House.

On July 23, 1866, the committee reported as to the facts, and also in favor of turning the prisoner over to the civil authorities, because the House was about to adjourn and might not imprison him beyond the day whereon the session should end. A minority of the committee dissented from this view, holding that the House had power to imprison until the 4th of March next, when the existence of the House would expire. Mr. Alley replied by referring to the opinions of able lawyers in the House and to the commentators in support of the view that the House did not have power to imprison during a recess between two sessions of the same Congress.

Without bringing into the question the issue the House agreed to the following resolution without division:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to deliver to the custody of the civil authorities Benjamin F. Beveridge and to prosecute said Beveridge before the criminal courts of this District for his assault upon the person of Uriah H. Painter, an officer of this House, within the walls of the Capitol, and that the evidence taken in the case by the special committee of the House be delivered to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia.

1630. One reporter having assaulted another in the presence of the House, punishment for breach of privilege was inflicted.

In 1836 the House committed the examination of a breach of privilege to a select committee.

A breach of privilege which occurred during the reading of the Journal was at once disposed of, after which the reading of the Journal was concluded.

On June 11, 1836,[3] while the Clerk was reading the Journal of the last day's session of the House, an assault was committed within the Hall, and in the presence of the House, by a person admitted to a place on the floor as a reporter or stenographer, to take down the debates, upon the person of another reporter or stenographer, also admitted to a place on the floor for the same purpose; whereupon Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, submitted the following motion, which was agreed to:

That both the persons be taken into custody, to await the order of the House in the premises.

During the consideration of the resolution Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, offered a substitute proposing to turn the offenders over to the civil authorities, to be dealt with according to law, but expressly specifying that in adopting this proposition the House would not be influenced by any opinion of a deficiency of authority in the House to punish for disorderly conduct in their presence. Mx. Aaron Vanderpool, of New York, supported this substitute on the ground that, while the House could vindicate its privileges if it chose, it was not wise to do so with so much public business to dispose of. Mr. Bell withdrew his proposition after some further debate.

The resolution having been agreed to, thereupon the Sergeant-at-Arms executed the order by taking both the persons into his custody.

The reading of the Journal was then resumed and completed, and after a motion to amend the Journal had been disposed of Mr. Judson moved the following resolution, which was agreed to after debate:

Resolved, That a select committee be forthwith appointed, whose duty it shall be forthwith to inquire into an assault committed within the Hall of the House of Representatives this morning, while this House was in session, and for and on account of which two persons are now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms; and said committee are to make their report to this House; and that said committee be authorized to administer oaths and to cause the attendance of witnesses.

Messrs. Andrew T. Judson, of Connecticut; John Bell, of Tennessee; Lewis Willams, of North Carolina; Abijah Mann, jr., of New York, and James M. Mason, of Virginia, were the committee.

On June 16 the select committee reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Henry G. Wheeler has been guilty of a contempt and breach of the privileges of this House by committing the said assault in the Hall of the House of Representatives while the House was in session.

Resolved, That the said Henry G. Wheeler be excluded from any place on the floor or elsewhere in the Hall as a stenographer to take down the debates of this House.

Resolved, That the said Henry G. Wheeler be securely imprisoned by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House for the remainder of the session, and that the Speaker of this House do issue his warrant to carry into effect this resolution.

On motion made and carried, Henry G. Wheeler was placed at the bar of the House. The first resolution was then agreed to. The second resolution was amended so as to exclude the prisoner from the floor only during the present session, and as amended the resolution was agreed to. Of the third resolution, on motion of Mr. Hawes, all after the word "Resolved" was stricken out and the following was inserted:

That Henry G. Wheeler be discharged from the custody of the officer of this House.

The report [1] of the committee accompanying the resolutions shows that Wheeler acknowledged his offense readily, and thus relieved the committee of the perplexities which often accompany cases of disorder, contempt, and breach of privilege. Therefore the committee recommended that the punishment be not vindictive. Wheeler had assaulted Robert Codd with a cane in the presence of the House, and so admitted.

In the House when the resolutions were presented Mr. Judson said that the committee, in view of the precedent of 1798,[2] felt bound to report the resolution for imprisonment, but they would readily accept the amendment proposed.

1631. A resolution as to an alleged false and scandalous report of the proceedings of the House by one of its reporters presented as a matter of privilege.—On February 9, 1847,[3] Mr. Stephen A. Douglas offered the following resolution as a question of privilege: [4]

Resolved, That "James A. Houston, reporter for the Union," having published a card in that paper of last evening, assuming the responsibility in toto of the false and scandalous report of the proceedings of this House on Saturday last, be, and he is hereby, expelled from this House.

After debate, the House decided the question on agreeing to the resolution in the negative by a vote of 11 yeas to 133 nays.

1632. In 1855 the House expelled from the floor William B. Chace, a reporter, who refused to testify before a committee.

In 1855 the House declined to punish a contumacious witness.

On February 5, 1855, [5] Mr. John Letcher, of Virginia, called up, as a question of privilege, the report submitted by him on the 15th ultimo, from the Select Committee on Colt's Patent and Other Bills, on the subject of the refusal of Mr. William B. Chace to appear and testify further before the said committee. [6]

This committee was appointed to investigate alleged improper means used to influence legislation for the extension of the Colt patent. Witnesses summoned before them having refused to testify, the committee reported the fact to the House and asked action to compel the witnesses to testify. The House declined to take action at the time. On February 5 the chairman of the committee again asked for action. This led to a debate on the powers of the House in relation to contumacious witnesses . [7] It appeared that in testimony which he had given before the committee Chace had admitted that he was to receive compensation for services in behalf of the Colt patent. This was in direct violation of the nineteenth [8] rule, which provided that no person should be admitted as a reporter or stenographer who should be employed "as an agent to prosecute any claim pending before Congress." Therefore T&. Letcher considered the right of the House to expel the reporter undoubted.

Chace also questioned the right of the House to compel his attendance before the committee, and to require him to disclose facts within his knowledge affecting the conduct of Members in connection with pending legislation. Mr. Letcher took the ground that the House certainly had the right to imprison, quoting in support the precedents in the cases of Randall and Anderson. [1]

Mr. Thomas Henry Bayly, of Virginia, took the opposite view—that the House had no power to inflict punishment, since it had no criminal jurisdiction. The House had no authority which was not delegated, or which was not necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers which were delegated to it. If the House should try and convict, how would they punish? Were they to imprison, where was the jail? The decisions read on the other side merely established that the House has a right to preserve order, and to an uninterrupted deliberation with respect to public questions. That was all. If any disturber should commit a criminal offense, like entering the Hall and shooting down a Member, the House could only turn him over to the civil courts.

Mr. Joseph R. Chandler, of Pennsylvania, cited a case where the legislature of Pennsylvania, in 1835, had arrested and confined contumacious witnesses, himself among the number. It appeared from the debate that the jailer refused to receive them, however. The case of Nugent, confined by the Senate, was also cited.

Mr. Letcher having proposed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be directed to revoke the privilege under which W. B. Chace holds a reporter's desk on the floor; and that said W. B. Chace be excluded from the Hall.

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of W. B. Chace, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of this House.

The House agreed to the former of these resolutions, but laid the latter upon the table.

1633. The supposed author of an anonymous newspaper charge against a Member not named was arrested and interrogated at the bar of the House.

The House being about to examine a person at its bar, a form of procedure as to questions was agreed to.

Form of oath administered by the Speaker to a person about to be examined at the bar of the House.

A person under examination at the bar was allowed to state his reasons why he should not answer a question, and also to have entered on the Journal a statement.

A person under examination at the bar of the House withdrew while the House passed on a request made by him.

On February 12, 1838,[2] Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, by consent, moved a resolution which, after amendment, was agreed to by the House in the following form, yeas 142, nays 46:

Whereas the following publication appears in the New York Courier and Inquirer:

"Corruption in Congress.—We published yesterday a letter from 'The Spy in Washington,' directly charging a Member of Congress with corruption, and offering to prove the charge before a committee of either House, when called upon for that purpose. We republish the charge to-day, and call upon Congress promptly to institute the investigation thus challenged, both as an act of justice to itself and the country. 'The Spy in Washington,' it may be said, is not an ostensible or responsible person; but we desire at once to obviate this difficulty by stating, as we now do, that he is known to us, and that whenever called upon by a committee of Congress we pledge ourselves that he shall be forthcoming, and that he is one whose standing warrants an immediate proceeding on the part of Congress.

"Extract from yesterday's Courier and Inquirer.—The more brief my statement the better it will be understood. It is in my power, if brought to the bar of either House, or before a committee, and process allowed me to compel the attendance of witnesses, to prove, by the oath of a respectable and unimpeachable citizen as well as by written documentary evidence, that there is at least one Member of Congress who has offered to barter his services and his influence with a department or departments for compensation. 'Why, sir,' said the applicant for a contract, 'if my proposition has merit, it will be received; if it has not, I do not expect it will be accepted.' And what do you think was the answer of the honorable Member? I will give it to you in his own emphatic language. 'Merit,' said he, 'why, things do not go here by merit, but by pulling the right strings. Make it my interest, and I will pull the strings for you.'"

"THE SPY IN WASHINGTON."

Therefore

Resolved, That Matthew L. Davis be forthwith subpoenaed to the bar of the House to testify and give evidence what he may know respecting the name of the Member implicated, if a Member of this House, and the authors of his information.

This resolution and preamble were adopted only after considerable debate as to the propriety of giving attention to an anonymous charge in a newspaper publication.

In obedience to the order of the House the Speaker issued a subpoena, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms; to whom it was delivered for service.

After debate and reference to the parliamentary law, the House, on motion of Mr. Benjamin C. Howard, of Maryland, agreed to the following procedure:

Resolved, That the Speaker direct the publication in the Courier and Inquirer to be read to the witness, and then propound to him the following interrogatories:

First. Are you the author of the above letter? And, whether he declines or not to answer the above question, then the Speaker shall put the following:

Second. Do you know who is alluded to, or intended to be charged in the preceding letter? Answer yea or nay as the fact may be without giving the name.

Third. Is the person thus alluded to a Member of the House of Representatives? If the answer be in the affirmative, then,

Fourth. What is the name of that Member? And, in case the witness shall reply that a Member of the House of Representatives was not alluded to, he shall be forthwith discharged; and all proceedings under this inquiry shall cease.

The Speaker announced to the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms had made return that the subpoena for Matthew L. Davis had been served and that the witness was in attendance.

Matthew L. Davis then appeared, and was sworn [1] by the Speaker.

In pursuance of the order of the House, the publication in the Courier and Inquirer was read to the witness; and thereupon the Speaker propounded the first interrogatory agreed upon by the House, viz:

---

[1] This oath was as follows: "You do solemnly swear that the evidence you will give to the House of Representatives, touching the matter now under examination, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; so help you God." Journal, p. 388.

1. Are you the author of the above letter? Whereupon the witness requested to.be permitted to assign reason why this interrogatory should not be answered.

The Speaker stated the question to the House, and thereupon propounded the question: "Shall the witness have leave to assign reasons why the interrogatory should not be answered?"

Debate arising, the witness, by direction of the House, withdrew from the bar, and, after the House had deliberated some time upon his request, the previous question was moved by Mr. Howard; and, being demanded by a majority of the Members present, it passed in the affirmative, and the main question was put:

"Shall the witness have leave to assign reasons why the interrogatory should not be answered?"

It passed in the affirmative, yeas 103, nays 90.

The witness was then again called to the bar, and the decision of the House, on his request, was announced to him by the Speaker. He thereupon gave his reasons why the interrogatory should not be answered, and declined to answer the same, and sent up to the Clerk a paper, in writing, which he requested should be entered on the Journal; and no objection being made thereto, it is entered accordingly, and is as follows:

I deny the right of this House to ask, and therefore decline to answer the question, whether I am, or am not, the author of the Spy in Washington; or the extract from the letter referred to in the interrogatory; but at the same time respectfully state that I know the Member of Congress to whom the Spy alludes, and am prepared to name him at the bar of this House or elsewhere.

The second interrogatory, viz: "is the person thus alluded to a Member of the House of Representatives?" was propounded to and answered by the witness.

Whereupon, in pursuance of the order of the House that "in case the witness shall reply that a member of the House of Representatives was not alluded to, he shall be forthwith discharged, and all proceedings under this inquiry shall thereupon cease," the witness was forthwith discharged by the Speaker, and withdrew from the bar; and all further proceedings under this inquiry ceased.

1634. Expulsion of a reporter from the floor for improper conduct. On February 19, 1857,[1] the select committee appointed to investigate charges that Members of the House had entered into corrupt combinations, made a general report, in which they stated that James W. Simonton, the regular Washington correspondent of the New York Times, had given contradictory testimony during the progress of the investigation, and had admitted that, while occupying a seat on the floor as a reporter, he had personally aided in the passage of the Wisconsin land bill under promise of receiving a certain compensation if the bill should pass, and also that he had accepted a small compensation for assisting a friend to pass a bill through the Senate. The committee, therefore, reported this resolution:

Resolved, That James W. Simonton be expelled from the floor of this House as a reporter.

On February 28 the House amended the resolution by adding the name of F. F. C. Triplett, and as amended the resolution was agreed to.

[1] Third session Thirty-fourth Congress, House Report No. 243, pp. 32, 38; Journal p. 567; Globe, p. 952.

1635. The House arrested and arraigned at the bar a newspaper reporter for alleged statements reflecting on the integrity of a Member.

A person arraigned at the bar of the House must be dealt with in strict accordance with the terms of the resolution ordering his arrest and arraignment.

A person arraigned for contempt submitted a statement in writing which did not appear in full in the Journal.

A person being under examination at the bar, the questions propounded to him were first approved by the House.

A person being under examination at the bar, the questions and answers were recorded in the Journal.

On June 10, 1870,[1] Mr. Thomas Fitch, of Nevada, rising to a question of privilege, laid before the House certain articles in a newspaper reflecting on his integrity as a Representative, tending to show that he might have accepted bribes from those favoring the recognition of the Cuban Republic. Mr. Fitch then offered the following:

Resolved, That W. Scott Smith, the reporter of the New York Evening Post, be brought to the bar of this House to show cause, if he can, why he should not be expelled from the reporters' gallery for libellous statements reflecting upon the integrity of Members of this House.

The chairman of the committee, which investigated the matter, who had been quoted in the article as authority for the doubt cast on Mr. Fitch's integrity, having stated to the House that the evidence exonerated Mr. Fitch, the resolution was agreed to, yeas 126, nays 40.

On the same day W. Scott Smith was brought to the bar of the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and by direction of the Speaker the resolution of the House and the newspaper extracts which Mr. Fitch had presented to the House were read.

The Speaker[2] then announced to the respondent that he was at liberty to answer in accordance with the terms of the resolution.

The respondent then submitted a statement in writing, which was read to the House, but was not entered in the Journal.

It being proposed to interrogate the prisoner, and Members proposing interrogatories, the Speaker held that if a Member wished to submit a question he should propose it in writing and the question would be submitted to the House to be approved by unanimous consent without debate. The prisoner at the bar could make his answer in writing if he should choose.

A question proposed by Mr. Fitch having been approved by the House and propounded to the respondent, he returned an answer in part, and in part declined, on the ground that he could not divulge the source of his information. This question and the answer appear in the Journal. The answer was in writing.

The answer having been read, Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, offered the following:

Resolved, That all proceedings in the case of Mr. W. Scott Smith pending be suspended, and the party be, and he is hereby, discharged.

[2] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker,

Mr. Fitch, on the ground that the answer was evasive, moved that the witness be compelled to answer, by holding him in contempt of the House until he should answer.

The Speaker held in regard to this motion:

The Chair has very grave doubts about the propriety of entertaining any such motion. The resolution of the House directed that William Scott Smith, the reporter of the New York Evening Post, be brought to the bar of this House to show cause, if he can, why he should not be expelled from the reporters' gallery of the House for libelous statements reflecting on Members of the House. It has always been the practice of the House, in the prosecution of similar inquiries and investigations, carefully to limit action according to the terms of the resolution under which any respondent may be brought to the bar of the House. The Chair, therefore, does not at all agree that it is in the nature of a privileged question, after this respondent has been brought to the bar of the House, to compel him to answer inquiries not within the purview of the order which brought him here.

The question recurring on the resolution offered by Mr. Cox, the following substitute was proposed by Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California:

That W. Scott Smith, having failed to purge himself of the charge of having slandered a Member of this House, and having declined to give the sources of the information upon which he alleges he based his statement, be expelled from the reporters' gallery.

After debate, the House, on motion of Mr. John Farnsworth, of Illinois, voted to refer the subject to a select committee of five.

The Speaker then informed the respondent that he was no longer in the custody of the House.

Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, chairman of the select committee, reported, on June 22, a recommendation that the resolution referred to them be laid on the table. The report of the committee was ordered printed.

1636. For publications affecting the reputations of Members reporters have been expelled from the House.—On March 4, 1846,[1] Mr. William Sawyer, of Ohio, sent to the Clerk's table a copy of a public newspaper printed in New York, called "The New York Tribune," containing a letter purporting to have been written by a correspondent of that paper in Washington, personally abusive of Mr. Sawyer, and requested that the letter might be read by the Clerk.

The letter having been read and Mr. Sawyer having concluded his remarks, Mr. Jacob Brinkerhoff, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the reporters and letter writers for the New York Tribune be expelled from this House.

Under the operation of the previous question the resolution was agreed to, yeas 122, nays 48.

1637. On February 9, 1847,[2] Mr. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, offered the following as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That "James A. Houston, reporter for the Union," having published a card in that paper of last evening, assuming the responsibility in toto of the false and scandalous report of the proceedings of this House on Saturday last, be, and he is hereby, expelled from this House.

[2] Second session Twenty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 320.

After debate, which related principally to whether or not the report was intentionally inaccurate, the resolution was rejected, yeas 11, nays 133.[1]

1638. For improper conduct in connection with legislation reporters have been expelled from the House.—On May 17, 1860,[2] Mr. Warren Winslow, of North Carolina, from the Select Committee on the Subject of Executive Influence in the House, reported the testimony of F. W. Walker, and a portion of the testimony of C. Wendell, relating to the acceptance of money by Walker from Wendell. Walker was a newspaper correspondent and had accepted money from Wendell for furthering, in the press, the interests of Wendell before Congress. The report was accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That F. W. Walker be expelled from the reporters' gallery of the House.

This resolution was agreed to.

1639. On March 3, 1875,[3] the House agreed to the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved, That any reporter or correspondent having a seat in the gallery by permission of the Speaker who has received any fee, bribe, or reward in connection with any legislation pending in either House of Congress should be deprived of such privilege; and such conduct as disclosed before the Committee on Ways and Means is severely censured by the House.

1640. The Senate committed John Nugent for contempt in publishing a treaty pending in executive session.

In the Nugent case, in 1848, the Court held that the Senate and House were the sole judges of their own contempts.

The Senate has power, when acting in a case within its jurisdiction, to punish all contempts of its authority.

No court "may inquire directly into the correctness or propriety" of a commitment by either House, or discharge the prisoner on habeas corpus.

A warrant of commitment "need not set forth the particular facts which constitute the alleged contempt."

Form of warrant for commitment of John Nugent.

Each House has a right to hold secret sessions whenever in its judgment the proceedings should require secrecy.

In 1848 the Senate committed John Nugent, his contempt growing out of the publication of a treaty pending before the Senate in executive session. The proceedings in this case were conducted in executive session.

Nugent petitioned for discharge on writ of habeas corpus; and on May 11, 1848, Judge Cranch, of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, handed down a decision (Nugent v. Beale, Cranch's Reports, D. C.). The summary sets forth:

[1] In the Twenty-ninth Congress (1846–47) the Senate expelled from its floor and gallery the representatives of two papers which had published articles libelous on the Senate. (Smith's Digest, Senate Mis. Doc. No. 278, second session Fifty-third Congress, pp. 45–77.)

On January 27, 1848, the Senate passed a resolution readmitting to a seat in the reporters' gallery Jesse E. Dow, who was excluded by an order of the Senate of March 16, 1846. (First session Thirtieth Congress, Globe, p. 262.)

1. Every court, including the Senate and House of Representatives, is the sole judge of its own contempts; and in case of commitment for contempt, in such case, no other court can have a right to inquire directly into the correctness or propriety of the commitment, or to discharge the prisoner on habeas corpus.

2. The warrant of commitment need not set forth the particular facts which constitute the alleged contempt.

3. The Senate of the United States has power to punish for contempts of its authority in cases of which it has jurisdiction, and an inquiry whether any person, and who, had violated the rule of the Senate which requires that all treaties laid before them should be kept secret until the Senate should take off the injunction of secrecy, is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate.

4. The Senate of the United States has a right to hold secret sessions whenever in its judgment the proceeding shall require secrecy, and may pronounce judgment in secret session for a contempt which took place in secret session.

The warrant of arrest, as to which a question was raised, appears as follows in the decision:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.—

To the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, Robert Beale:

Whereas John Nugent, having been summoned, and having appeared at the bar of the Senate, and having been sworn as a witness, he answered the following interrogatories:

1. Have you any connection with or agency for the proprietor of the newspaper published in the city of New York, and called the New York Herald? If yea, state what is that connection or agency.

2. Do you know that an instrument purporting to be a copy of the treaty between the United States of America and the Mexican Republic, with the amendments made by the Senate thereto, and the proceedings of the Senate thereon, was published in that newspaper? Declare.

3. Do you know by whom the copy of the instrument, with the amendments thereto and proceedings thereon in the last preceding interrogatory specified, was furnished to the editor or publishers, or any agent of the editor or publishers of the said newspaper called the New York Herald? If yea, declare and specify such person or persons.

4. Did you copy the parts purporting to be amendments of the treaty yourself for the purpose of sending them to the editor of the New York Herald, or for any other purpose? If you answer in the negative, then say if you know by whom they were copied.

5. Where, at what place or house, and at what time, were the said amendments of the treaty copied? And having refused to answer the following interrogatories:

6. Where, in what place or what house, and at what time, did you first receive a printed copy of the confidential document containing the treaty, the President's message, and also the other confidential documents printed in the Herald?

7. In answer to the third interrogatory, you have stated that you furnished the papers therein referred to, to the editor of the New York Herald. State from whom you received the said treaty with Mexico, with the amendments and the said portion of the proceedings of the Senate.

8. In your answer to the fourth interrogatory, you state that the amendments there referred to were communicated to the Herald in your handwriting. Did you copy the same, and from whom did you procure the original from which you copied the same?

9. You say in answer to the last question that you decline to answer the same, because you can not answer it with accuracy. State why you can not answer it with accuracy. Is it because you do not recollect the facts inquired of?

10. What portion of the facts do you not recollect with accuracy; is it as to the person from whom you obtained the papers, or either of them referred to?

11. State from whom you received the treaty.

12. State from whom you received the documents.

13. State from whom you received the proceedings of the Senate heretofore inquired of.

14. Was the copy of the treaty you forwarded to the Herald a printed copy?

———has, by so refusing, committed a contempt against the Senate and has, by the Senate, been ordered into the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, there to remain until the further order of the Senate.

These are, therefore, to authorize and require you, and you are hereby authorized and required to take into your custody the body of the said John-Nugent, and him safely keep until he answers the said interrogatories, or until the further order of the Senate of the United States in this behalf, and for so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand this thirty-first day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight.

G.M. DALLAS,
Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate.

Attest:

ASBURY DICKENS,
Secretary of the Senate of the United States.

The opinion of Judge Cranch, which was supported by numerous citations and discussions of authorities, especially English, lays down the following principles:

The jurisdiction of the Senate in cases of contempt of its authority depends upon the same grounds and reasons upon which the acknowledged jurisdiction of other judicial tribunal rests, to wit, the necessity of such a jurisdiction to enable the Senate to exercise its high constitutional functions—a necessity at least equal to that which supports the like jurisdiction which has been exercised by all judicial tribunals and legislative assemblies in this country from its first settlement, and in England from time immemorial. That the Senate of the United States may punish contempts of its authority seemed to be admitted by the prisoner's counsel, provided it be in a case within their cognizance and jurisdiction; but whether admitted or not, such is the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat., 224, and in Kearney's Case, 7 Wheat., 41.

* * * * * * *

These case [cited] and authorities, we think, show conclusively that the Senate of the United States has power to punish for contempts of its authority in cases of which it has jurisdiction; that every court, including the Senate and House of Representatives, is the sole judge of its own contempts, and that in case of the commitment for contempt in such a case no other court can have a right to inquire directly into the correctness or propriety of the commitment, or to discharge the prisoner on habeas corpus, and that the warrant of commitment need not set forth the particular facts which constitute the alleged contempt.

There were many cases cited in the argument to show that when the question of privilege or contempt came incidentally before the court, the court could and must decide it; but those cases have no bearing upon this, which is a case of habeas corpus, where it is admitted on all hands that the question of contempt is brought directly before the court.

But if, upon this point, it should be thought that the majority of the judges of this court have (as it is suggested) stated the principle too broadly in respect to the conclusive effect of a judgment of contempt and if it should be deemed necessary that it should appear in the return of the hapeas corpus that at the time of the supposed contempt the Senate were acting in a matter of which they had jurisdiction—we all think it does sufficiently appear in the return that the Senate were, at that time, engaged in a matter within their jurisdiction, to wit, an inquiry whether any person, and who, had violated the rule of the Senate which requires that all treaties laid before them should be kept secret until the Senate should take off the injunction of secrecy. This appears by the interrogatories propounded to the witness (the prisoner), as stated in the return, and by the recital, in part, of the answers of the witness to a part of those interrogatories.

But it has been contended also in argument that the power of the Senate to punish for contempts is confined to their authority over their own members.

It is true that by the Constitution, Article I, Section 5, "each House may determine the rules of its proceeding, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member." But it says nothing of contempts. These were left to the operation of the common-law principle that every court has a right to protect itself from insult and contempt, without which right of self protection they could not discharge their high and important duties. It is not at all probable that the framers of the Constitution, by giving an express power to the Senate to punish its members for disorderly behavior, and even to expel a member, intended to deprive the Senate of that protection from insult, which they knew very well belonged to and was enjoyed by both Houses of Parliament and the legislatures of the former colonies and now States of this Union. The provision of the Constitution may have been intended to remove a doubt, whether a member of the Senate, appointed by and responsible to a State legislature, could be guilty of a contempt to a body of which he himself was a member; or it may have been intended to apply only to such disorderly behavior as did not amount to a contempt of the House; or to remove a doubt whether the Senate had power to expel a member. But whatever may have been the intention we think the provision does not justify an inference that their power to punish for contempts can be executed only upon members of the Senate.

It was also contended in argument that although the Senate might hold secret sessions, they could not, in secret session, punish a man for contempt. The court, however, can not perceive any reason why the Senate should not have the same power of punishing contempts in secret as in open session. In the early years of this Government the sessions of the Senate were always secret.

The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 5, requires that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy." The journal can not be kept secret unless the proceedings themselves be kept secret. Hence, each House has a right to hold secret sessions whenever in its judgment the proceedings shall require secrecy. The necessity of the power to hold secret sessions, especially of the Senate, is so obvious that no argument in its favor is required by the court.

The Senate, besides being a branch of the Legislature, is the executive council of the President, and stands in intimate communion with him in regard to all our foreign diplomatic relations. Nothing, therefore, can be more proper than that all executive sessions of the Senate, and all confidential communications relating to treaties should be with closed doors and under seal of secrecy. Hence the standing rule of the Senate (No. 38) requires that all confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be, by the members thereof, kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy. And by the standing rule of the Senate (No. 39), "All information or remarks touching or concerning the character and qualifications of any person nominated by the President to office shall be kept secret." By the fortieth rule of the Senate, "'When acting on confidential or executive business, the Senate shall be cleared of all persons. except the Secretary, the principal or executive clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper and Assistant Doorkeeper." By the forty-first rule of the Senate, "The legislative proceedings, the executive proceedings, and the confidential legislative proceedings of the Senate shall be kept in separate and distinct books."

These rules were established under the power given to the Senate by the Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 5, "To determine the rules of its proceedings, "and are, therefore, until repealed, as obligatory as if they had been inserted in the Constitution itself; so that it is not only the privilege, but the duty of the Senate to hold its executive sessions in secret. No odium, therefore, can attach to the Senate from the circumstance that the judgment for contempt was pronounced in secret session, upon a transaction which took place in secret session. It could not have been done otherwise. The offense must be punished in secret session or go unpunished; leaving the Senate exposed to all sorts of insults in the discharge of their solemn constitutional duties.

After an anxious and careful consideration of the whole case, the court is unanimously of opinion that the Senate of the United States has power, when acting in a case within its jurisdiction, to punish all contempts of its authority, and that the prisoner, having been committed by the Senate for such a contempt, and being still held and detained for that cause by their officer, this court has, upon the habeas corpus, no jurisdiction to inquire further into the cause of commitment and must remand the prisoner.[1]

Prisoner remanded.

Chapter LII.

PUNISHMENT OF MEMBERS FOR CONTEMPT.

1641. The parliamentary law as to treatment of Members between whom warm words or an assault have passed.—Chapter XVII of Jefferson's Manual provides:

Whenever warm words or an assault have passed between Members, the House, for the protection of their Members, requires them to declare in their places not to prosecute any quarrel (3 Grey, 128, 293; 5 Grey, 280); or orders them to attend the Speaker, who is to accommodate their differences and report to the House (3 Grey, 419); and they are put under restraint if they refuse or until they do. (9 Grey, 234,312.)

1642. The attack of Matthew Lyon on Roger Griswold, in 1798.

An early instance wherein a Member in secret session informed the House of a breach of privilege occurring on the floor between two other Members.

While the House was investigating a difficulty between two Members it declared that it would be considered a high breach of privilege if either should enter into a personal contest pending decision.

Instance wherein testimony as to a difficulty between two Members was heard in Committee of the Whole.

On January 30, 1798,[1] while the House was concluding balloting for managers on the impeachment of William Blount, a Member in his place, Mr. Samuel Sewall, of Massachusetts, informed the House that he had a communication to make, which he conceived ought to be kept secret. When the House had been cleared Mr. Sewall stated that he had been informed, in a manner which, in his opinion left no doubt of the truth of the fact, that, in the presence of the House, while sitting, Mr. Matthew Lyon, a Member from Vermont, did this day commit a violent attack and gross indecency upon the person of Mr. Roger Griswold, of Connecticut, another Member of this House.

The House having decided that it was not necessary to keep the matter secret the doors were opened and the House considered this resolution:

Resolved, That Matthew Lyon, a Member of this House, for a violent attack and gross indecency committed upon the person of Roger Griswold, another Member, in the presence of this House, while sitting, be, for this disorderly behavior, expelled therefrom.

[1] First session Fifth Congress, Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, Speaker; Journal, pp. 154, 185; Annals.] , pp. 961, 964, 972, 979, 1034.

It was voted—49 yeas to 44 nays—that this resolution be referred to a Committee of Privileges, with instructions to inquire into the matter and report.[1]

Messrs. Thomas Pinckney, of South Carolina; Abraham B. Venable, of Virginia; John W. Kittera, of Pennsylvania; Isaac Parker, of Massachusetts; Robert Williams, of North Carolina; James Cochran, of New York, and George Dent, of Maryland, constituted this committee.

The House also came to the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will consider it a high breach of privilege if either of the Members shall enter into any personal contest until a decision of the House shall be had thereon.

An attempt to amend by requiring Mr. Lyon to be considered in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms was defeated—62 nays to 29 yeas.

On February 1 a letter of regret, apologizing for his conduct, was received from Mr. Lyon and referred to the Committee on Privileges.

On February 5 the report of the Committee on Privileges was committed to a Committee of the Whole House. It was also voted that the Committee of the Whole House be authorized to hear the testimony of witnesses on the subject-matter of the report. The propriety of considering the case in Committee of the Whole House was considered. It was objected that the committee might come to a conclusion which two-thirds of the House might not acquiesce in, as was the case in fact. On the other hand, it was urged that the Speaker might more conveniently give his testimony in committee than in the House.

Members, testifying in the case of Matthew Lyon who was threatened with expulsion, were sworn and cross-questioned by Mr. Lyon.

The House declined to expel either Matthew Lyon or Roger Griswold for an affray on the floor of the House.

After their affray on the floor, Messrs. Lyon and Griswold were required to pledge themselves before the Speaker to keep the peace during the session.

Early instance wherein testimony in a case of breach of privilege was heard before a select committee.

On February 12 the Committee of the Whole House arose and, on rising, the chairman, by direction, reported the testimony of several Members of the House and one Member of the Senate and also their agreement to the resolution of expulsion.

The testimony related to the affray, and from it it appears that Mr. Griswold in the course of the altercation taunted Mr. Lyon with an alleged occurrence in his army record, whereupon the latter spat in his opponent's face. Each Member was put under oath, the judge of the district court administering the oath, before giving his testimony, and after he had given it was cross-questioned by Mr. Lyon. The testimony and cross-examination of each Member was reported to the House and printed in the Journal. The Speaker and one Senator were among the witnesses. The affair took place during the counting of ballots, when it was the habit of the Speaker to leave the chair and for Members to gather informally in groups, although the House was considered as in session. The Speaker, in his testimony, said he frequently left the chair for exercise during the counting of ballots and the reading of lengthy communications. Mr. Lyon based his defense on the fact that the House was apparently not in session.

[1] On April 17, 1850 (first session Thirty-first Congress, Globe, pp. 763,769) the Senate referred to a select committee the subject of an affray between Senators Benton and Foote on the floor of the Senate.

When the House came to vote, a proposition that Mr. Lyon be censured by the Speaker was defeated by a vote of 52 to 44. Then the resolution of expulsion was voted on, there being 52 yeas and 44 nays. So the resolution failed, two-thirds not voting therefor.

On February 15, after prayers, while the Speaker was in the chair and before the Journal was read, Mr. Griswold assaulted Mr. Lyon with a stout cane, the latter being seated, writing. Mr. Lyon got the tongs from the fireplace, and there was an affray, which was with difficulty stopped. The House was so excited that it adjourned presently, no notice being taken of the affair. The next day a resolution was introduced to expel both Members. Then an order was passed that both Messrs. Lyon and Griswold be required to pledge themselves to keep the peace during the session. This they did before the Speaker. The motion to expel was referred to the Committee on Privileges.

In this case the Committee on Privileges were directed to take the evidence, which they did, reporting it to the House February 20. They also reported that .the resolution expelling the two Members should be disagreed to.[1] The report of the Committee on Privileges was agreed to—73 yeas to 21 nays. A motion that the Members be censured failed.

1644. The question of privilege arising from the duel between Jonathan Cilley and William J. Graves.

A Member who had in a hostile manner sent to another Member a demand for explanation of words spoken in debate, was held by a committee of the House to have violated privilege.

A committee being directed to investigate the death of a Member in a duel, they reported resolutions for punishment of other Members concerned, although not directed by the House to proceed against them.

The House in 1836 neglected to punish by expulsion or censure the surviving principal and his seconds in a duel arising over words spoken in debate.

Members who had been concerned in a duel which resulted in the death of a Member were permitted to attend and cross-examine witnesses during the investigation.

In 1838 the principle that a question of privilege might be introduced at any time was not fully developed (footnote).

On February 28, 1838,[2] Mr. John Fairfield, of Maine, moved the following resolution:[3]

---

[1] On February 22, 1799, an attempt was made to expel Mr. Lyon, but it failed.

[2] Second session Twenty-fifth Congress, James K. Polk, of Tennessee, Speaker; Journal, pp. 501, 502, 811, 858, 860, 861; Globe, pp. 200, 201, 320, 329, 494.

[3] Mr. Fairfield brought this resolution in under a suspension of the rules. He first tried unanimous consent, and there was objection. The idea of presenting the matter as a question of privilege does not seem to have been broached (Journal, p. 501: Globe, p. 200). So, also, on April 21, the rules were suspended to enable the report to be made to the House (Journal, p. 811).

Resolved, That a committee consisting of seven Members be appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the Hon. Jonathan Cilley, late a Member of this House, and the circumstances connected therewith; and further, to inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of this House.

This resolution was adopted by a vote of 152 to 49. The following committee were appointed: Messrs. Isaac Toucey, of Connecticut; William W. Potter, of Pennsylvania; Franklin H. Elmore, of South Carolina; Andrew De W. Bruyn, James Rariden, of Indiana; George Grennell, jr., of Massachusetts, and Seaton Grantland, of Georgia.

The committee reported [1] April 21, 1838. The majority of the committee in their report recite that the late Jonathan Cilley fell by the hands of William J. Graves, a Member from Kentucky, in a duel fought with rifles, near the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland, on Saturday, the 24th of February. The New York Courier and Inquirer had published an article, vouched for by the editor, James Watson Webb, charging corruption upon a Member of Congress. Mr. Cilley, in moving for a committee of inquiry, had made statements on the floor of the House reflecting upon the character of Webb. For this the editor had sent to Mr. Cilley a note by the hand of Mr. Graves. This Mr. Cilley had refused to receive, and then, after further correspondence, a challenge was sent by Mr. Graves to Mr. Cilley.

In the examination before the committee Mr. Graves and the seconds, Messrs. Wise and Jones, as well as others concerned, were permitted to attend and examine and cross-examine witnesses. The report of the committee (as distinguished from minority views) states that the inquiry was directed to one object only, the maintenance of the privileges of the House. Then follows a long and minute analysis of the evidence, followed by the conclusion that the words spoken by Mr. Cilley in debate, his refusal to receive a demand for the explanation of those words, and his refusal to assign for this other reason than that he chose to be drawn into no difficulty upon the subject were the causes which led to the death of Mr. Cilley. Therefore the committee were of the opinion that there had been a breach of the privileges of the House in thus demanding in a hostile manner an explanation of words spoken in debate. This was the highest offense that could be committed against either of the Houses of Congress. The committee therefore reported resolutions expelling Mr. Graves from the House and censuring Messrs. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, and George W. Jones, of Tennessee, who had acted as the seconds in the duel. As it had been decided on a former occasion that it was a breach of privilege to send a challenge to a Member in attendance or to be the bearer of such a challenge, it seemed also to be equally a breach of privilege to act as a second.

Mr. Grennell and Mr. Rariden did not concur in the report, but filed their views. They took the ground that there were two objects of the investigation—an inquiry into the circumstances with a view of arousing public sentiment on the subject of dueling, and an inquiry as to whether the privileges of the House had been violated. The majority would have fulfilled the first object had they simply gathered the testimony and presented it without comment. In going beyond this to comment and argue and make deductions they had exceeded their duties. The two Members concurred with the majority in finding that a breach of the privileges had been committed both by principals and seconds, and that the offense of the surviving principal was of a high and aggravated character. But the two Members believed that the committee could not proceed to advise the House as to the sentence to be inflicted. Such a step would be like a grand jury recommending the kind of punishment in the indictment. Dueling had been frequent among Members of Congress. In 1809 a rule was proposed to the House declaring the sending of a challenge to duel by one Member to another a breach of the privileges of the House, but the rule was not adopted. The gravamen of this affair rested in the sending of the challenge and not in the fatal result, which did not change the offense against the privileges of the House. The two Members therefore recommended a law and a rule of the House against dueling, but no punishment of the offenders.

Mr. Elmore also filed his views. He took the ground that the collecting of the testimony as to the facts was the whole duty of the committee, without commenting upon those facts, except as the question of privilege was involved. The privileges of Members of Congress were not personal or private rights, but public trusts, assigned to the station and office, for great public purposes and utility. They were the privileges of a multitude of persons in whose room and place the Member is specially chosen. The privilege of a Member not being his own, but belonging to his constituents, the House, and the country, it is his duty to maintain and assert it, and if he waive or surrender it he commits himself a breach of the privileges of the House. The right of self-protection was an inherent privilege in every legislative body. Without any other authority the Revolutionary Congress punished one individual for sending a challenge to a Member of its body and compelled another to apologize for impeaching the honor of a Member in a memorial. The privilege under the Constitution which forbade a Member to be questioned in any other place for any speech or debate in either House was perhaps higher in nature than any other. It was for this privilege that the Commons of England made their memorable resistance to the tyranny of James I. In the case of the duel under consideration there could be no doubt that this privilege had been invaded. As to the punishment, the Supreme Court, in the case of Anderson v. Dunn, had affirmed the right of the House to imprison. To deprive the House of the right to punish for breach of privilege would be to deliver it over to disorder. But Mr. Elmore did not concur in recommendations for punishment, since that recommended for Mr. Graves seemed too severe. Dueling by Members of the House had been frequent and generally unnoticed and unpunished by the House. Mr. Graves had been negligent of the privileges of the House, but did not intentionally offer an indignity to it. Therefore he did not merit the heaviest punishment.

When the report and the minority views were brought in the request was made that they be printed and the consideration postponed until May 7. This precipitated a debate of considerable length. Mr. John Robertson, of Virginia, quoted Jefferson's Manual [1] in support of his contention that when the course of an investigation showed that any Member was implicated it was the duty of the committee to report that fact specially to the House, whereupon the Member is heard at the bar of the House, or a committee is specifically empowered to inquire concerning him. Mr. Elmore replied that the committee were peremptorily ordered by the House to make the investigation which they had made, and if the objection was valid it should have been made when the resolution was before the House. Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, raised the question whether it was proper for the committee to proceed against a Member without being directed to do so by name. It was replied that when the resolution was adopted it was notorious that Members were implicated. In his opinion, Jefferson's Manual referred to a case where, in an investigation, a Member was incidentally charged. Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, criticised the report and said he intended to move to strike out the resolutions and argumentative part and let the facts be considered by the House. In his opinion the committee had transcended their powers. He was for a strict construction of Jefferson's Manual, and cited the case of Hon. John Smith in the Senate.[1]

After a parliamentary struggle of considerable intensity, on May 10 the whole subject was laid on the table and the reports and testimony were ordered printed. The motion to lay it on the table passed, 103 to 78.

July 4 an attempt to take up the report failed.

1645. A resolution for the investigation of an alleged assault of one Member on another at a place outside the Capitol was admitted as of privilege.

A violation of the personal security of a Member on his way to the House to attend a session was considered by a committee of the House a breach of privilege.

On August 18, 1856,[2] Mr. George A. Simmons, of New York, presented as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the alleged assault on the Hon. Amos P. Granger, a Representative from the State of New York, by the Hon. Fayette McMullin, a Representative from the State of Virginia, on the morning of the 18th instant, and that they report their action to this House on the second Monday in December next.

Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, made the point of order that the resolution did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker[3] overruled the point of order.

The committee was composed of Messrs. Simmons; William Smith, of Virginia; John U. Pettit, of Indiana; John R. Edie, of Pennsylvania, and Thomas J. D. Fuller, of Maine.

On August 26, 1856,[4] the committee made their report.[5] This report showed that the two Members were in an omnibus on their way to the Capitol when they became involved in a controversy over the prospective failure of the army appropriation bill. There seems to have been no doubt that words led to an assault in which Mr. Granger suffered some injury. The majority of the committee, Messrs.

Simmons, Pettit, and Edie, who made the report, came to the conclusion that the assault was a breach of the privileges of a Member of the House and of the House itself. The rights of the Members to personal security in coming from their boarding houses to the sessions at the Capitol were as clear and perfect as when debating on the floor, and this, too, without regard to the question whether a Member is assaulted or beaten in his special character as a Member of Congress or otherwise. In view of the mitigating circumstances of the case, however, the report recommended that no action be taken. Both report and resolution were laid on the table in the House.

1646. From Members between whom warm words or an assault have passed on the floor, the House has exacted apologies.—On January 16, 1838,[1] Mr. William C. Dawson, of Georgia, arose and said that he had waited to hear from some older Member a proposition in regard to what had occurred at this session between two Members of the House. But none being presented, he had drafted, in accordance with parliamentary usage, a resolution to prevent the recurrence of such scenes. He then submitted the following:

The Hon. Samuel J. Gholson, a Member of this House from the State of Mississippi, and the Hon. Henry A. Wise, a Member from the State of Virginia, having spoken language subject to the censure of this House, because in violation of its rules:

Be it therefore resolved, That those gentlemen do now make submission to this body.

Messrs. Gholson and Wise then made statements, each apologizing to the House, but withdrawing none of the statements made concerning one another.

The resolution was laid on the table on motion of Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, who thereupon submitted the following:

Resolved, That Messrs. Gholson and Wise, Members of this House, between whom warm words have passed in debate, be required by the Speaker to declare in their places that they will not prosecute further the quarrel which has arisen this day between them.

This resolution was debated, and on the succeeding day was laid on the table, yeas 127, nays 63.

1647. On March 10, 1848,[2] during a vote by tellers, a personal conflict occurred between two Members, Hugh A. Haralson, of Georgia, and George W. Jones, of Tennessee. Great confusion and disorder was produced in the Hall.

Order being restored, the question was put on the pending motion.[3]

The result having been announced, Mr. Jones and Mr. Haralson severally apologized to the House for the breach of order committed by them and submitted themselves to its pleasure.

Mr. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Members be appointed, who shall inquire into and report to the House the facts in relation to the personal rencontre on the floor of the House during its sitting, today between the Members from Georgia and Tennessee, the honorable Messrs. Haralson and Jones; and, also, what proceedings in their judgment are necessary for the vindication of this dignity of the House.

[3] Mr. Alexander D. Sims, of South Carolina, raised the question that the intervention of other business would preclude the House from taking up the breach of privilege; but Mr. Speaker Winthrop decided that such would not be the case. (Globe, p. 453.)

Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, moved that the resolution be laid on the table, which motion was decided in the negative.

After debate, Messrs. Jones and Haralson severally apologized to each other, giving assurances that the quarrel should not be further prosecuted and a reconciliation took place between them in the presence of the House.

Having voted down an amendment empowering the committee to inquire what action might be taken to prevent similar occurrences, the House, by a vote of 77 yeas to 69 nays, agreed to an amendment proposed by Mr. Stephens, whereby the resolution was modified to read as follows, and the modified resolution was then agreed to:

The gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Haralson, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Jones, having apologized to the House for the breach of order committed by them during the sitting of the House today:

Resolved, That said apology be accepted by the House, and that no further proceedings be taken in relation thereto.

1648. In 1838, in case of great disorder in Committee of the Whole, the Speaker took the Chair "without order to bring the House into order."

Warm words and an assault having passed between two Members; in the Committee of the Whole, the House required them to "apologize for violating its privileges and offending its dignity."

On June 1, 1838,[1] the House, in pursuance of the order of the day before, resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. Benjamin C. Howard, of Maryland, in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, etc., and after some time spent therein, warm words and an assault passed between two Members—Messrs. John Bell, of Tennessee, and Hopkins L. Turney, of Tennessee—and great heat and confusion arising, and the committee being in great disorder, the Speaker took the chair.

Whereupon, order being restored, the Speaker[2] told the House "he had taken the chair without an order, to bring the House into order," and cited as authority for this course the parliamentary law as laid down in Jefferson's Manual, which, by a rule of the House, is made the law of the House.

And immediately thereafter Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, moved that the House do again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming consideration of the pending bill, when a motion was made by Mr. Charles F. Mercer, of Virginia, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That warm words and a, mutual assault having passed between two Members of this House, viz, John Bell and Hopkins L. Turney, of the State of Tennessee, they be called upon by the Speaker to declare in their places that they will not prosecute any quarrel.

This resolution being read, it was, on motion of Mr. William W. Potter, of Pennsylvania, laid on the table. Mr. Isaac S. Pennybacker, of Virginia, then submiited the following:

---

[1] Second session Twenty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 1013; Globe, p. 422.

[2] James K. Polk, of Tennessee, Speaker.

The Hon. Hopkins L. Turney and the Hon. John Bell having violated the privileges of this House by assaulting each other in the House whilst sitting, it is, therefore,

Resolved, That the said Hopkins L. Turney and John Bell do apologize to the House for violating its privileges and offending its dignity.[1]

A motion by Mr. Archibald Yell, of Arkansas, that this resolution do lie on the table was defeated, 155 to 21.

And thereupon, before the question was put on the resolution. Mr. Bell and Mr. Turney voluntarily and severally made submission to the House, and apologized for the breach of its order and decorum, and contempt of its authority by them committed. Thereupon, on motion of Mr. William Taylor, of New York, the resolution of Mr. Pennybacker was laid on the table. The House then went into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

1649. In 1840 great disorder occurred in Committee of the Whole, whereupon the Speaker without order took the chair and restored order.

Two Members, having assaulted one another in Committee of the Whole, the House declined to permit the Committee to resume its sitting until a committee to investigate the facts of the disorder had been appointed.

A committee appointed merely to ascertain facts, considers itself without authority to submit a recommendation to the House.

On April 21, 1840,[2] while the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, warm words and an assault passed between two Members—Mr. Rice Garland, of Louisiana, and Mr. Jesse A. Bynum, of North Carolina—and great heat and confusion arising, and the committee being in disorder, the Speaker[3] took the chair and brought the House to order.

Mr. John W. H. Underwood, of Georgia, thereupon moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the facts relative to the disorder and personal violence which has just taken place between two of its Members, viz, Rice Garland and Jesse A. Bynum, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and that said committee report with all practicable dispatch the facts of the case.

The resolution was adopted, and Messrs. Underwood, William O. Butler, of Kentucky, George N. Briggs, of Massachusetts, Nathan Clifford, of Maine, and Mark A. Cooper, of Georgia, were appointed the committee. It was ordered that the committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and that it be directed to begin its investigations forthwith.

The debate on the resolution shows that the Speaker took the chair at the request of several Members, and after order had been restored stated that the committee had not regularly risen, and called upon the chairman, Mr. Zadoc Casey, of Illinois, to resume the chair. But Members interposed and took the ground that some steps should be taken in the matter. Then Mr. Underwood presented his resolution, and in the debate which followed, the necessity of a reform in the manners of the House was strongly urged. The committee reported April 25, and on April 27 the report [1] came up in the House.

The committee examined several witnesses and found that the controversy arose over the presentation of a paper relating to the receipts and expenditures of the Treasury, and that from dissenting views and words the two Members proceeded to a violent personal encounter. The members of the committee concluded their report with the statement that under the terms of the resolution they considered that their duty was simply to ascertain the facts, and that they were without authority to make any recommendation or submit any proposition to the House. They accompanied their report with the testimony. On May 14 [2] the report was considered in the House. A diversity of opinion arose as to whether the House should consider the case and punish the two Members by censure or expulsion for breach of privilege, or confine its attention to regulations for the future punishment of such offenses. After debate the subject was recommitted to the select committee with instructions to report what further proceedings might be necessary on the part of the House, and also what the form of those proceedings should take. It does not appear that this committee ever reported again.

1650. For an assault during debate in Committee of the Whole, the House after expulsion had been suggested, exacted apologies from a Member.

Two Members having created disorder in Committee of the Whole by an encounter, the Speaker took the chair and restored order, and the House immediately referred the subject to a select committee.

On September 9, 1841,[3] in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, a rencounter took place between two Members of the House, viz, Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, and Edward Stanly, of North Carolina, and great heat and confusion arising, and the Committee being in disorder, the Speaker [4] took the chair and brought the House to order.

Both gentlemen made explanations, Mr. Wise apologizing to the House.

Thereupon Mr. Charles J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the rencounter on the floor of the House between Mr. Wise and Mr. Stanly, Members of this House, and to report thereon to the House.

This resolution being agreed to, the following were appointed the committee: Messrs. Ingersoll; Jeremiah Morrow, of Ohio; Horace Everett, of Vermont; Robert L. Caruthers, of Tennessee; Leverett Saltonstall, of Massachusetts; Isaac E. Holmes, of South Carolina, and Charles G. Ferris, of New York.

On September 11 the committee made the following report:

That they notified those gentlemen of their meeting in committee, where Mr. Wise and Mr. Stanly might attend if they thought proper, and that their respective written statements would be received by the committee.

[4] John White, of Kentucky, Speaker.

With commendable promptitude and candor both those gentlemen presented written statements not materially differing in their several accounts.

The committee, therefore, deemed it superfluous to take further testimony, and without delay, as the session is drawing to a close, present the following outline of this transaction:

During debate in Committee of the Whole, on the 9th day of the month, Mr. Stanly having said what Mr. Wise considered improper, or unkind, he left his seat, after Mr. Stanly resumed his, and went to it. Some exciting private conversation took place between them, of an angry but not insulting character, till Mr. Wise warned Mr. Stanly not to speak of him again as he said he had done; that he told him that he, Mr. Wise, but for their past relations, would scale Mr. Stanly on the floor for the first before-mentioned attack in debate. Mr. Stanly replied that he would not take Mr. Wise's warning. Mr. Wise proposed to Mr. Stanly, as Mr. Wise states for explanation, that they should go out of the House together. Mr. Stanly refused to go, saying, as he alleges, "No, sir; you have heard what I have said; you can take your own course; I have nothing more to say." Mr. Wise then applied contemptuous language to Mr. Stanly, which he cast back on Mr. Wise. The controversy thus became angry, and terms of indignity being exchanged, Mr. Wise says that he applied to Mr. Stanly terms of extreme insult, which Mr. Stanly repelled by calling Mr. Wise a liar; whereupon Mr. Wise says he struck Mr. Stanly, who says Mr. Wise struck at him. Blows were aimed, if not given, by both, at each other, in a conflict, which was put an end to by adjacent Members forcibly separating the combatants.

The proceedings of the House were entirely suspended by the tumult and confusion which ensued. Persons from without rushed in to the scene of action; the Speaker, without form, resumed the chair, and for some time tried in vain to restore order.

The committee consider it useless to dwell in mere terms of condemnation on an outrage so detrimental to the dignity of the House of Representatives and derogatory to the character of the country. Every Member must feel, as every citizen has declared, that it is high time to put an end to such destructive occurrences.

They therefore submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this report be inserted in full on the Journal of the House as a reprimand.

Resolved, That it be henceforth among the rules of this House that for any insulting word applied by Member to another in Committee of the Whole it shall be the duty of the chairman of the committee to report the same to the Speaker on his resuming the chair, whereupon the Speaker shall inflict a fine of not less than one hundred dollars on the offending Member, to be deducted from his compensation; and that for any insulting word applied by any Member to another, in the House, the Speaker shall fine him as before mentioned, as on report of such offense in the Committee of the Whole. All such proceedings subject to an appeal to the House.

Resolved further, That it be henceforth among the rules of the House that for any blow or assault inflicted by a Member of this House on another in Committee of the Whole the same shall be reported by the chairman of said committee to the Speaker; and for any blow or assault inflicted by a Member of this House on another, in the House, it shall be the duty of the Speaker in all such cases aforesaid forthwith to submit to the House a motion for the expulsion of such offending Member, which motion the House shall immediately, in priority to all other business, proceed, on the Speaker's said motion, to determine.

Debate arose on this report, in the course of which several propositions were submitted, one of them being a resolution for the expulsion of Mr. Wise.

Finally the House, by a vote of 104 yeas to 36 nays, voted to recommit the report with the following instructions, proposed by Mr. Alexander H. H. Stewart, of Virginia:

That as the Hon. Henry A. Wise, who was the assailant of the Hon. Edward Stanly on the floor of the House of Representatives on the 9th instant, has made the proper acknowledgments to the House, and as the controversy between the parties has been amicably and honorably adjusted, Resolved, therefore, That all further proceedings on the part of this House be discontinued.

The Journal does not record that the committee reported as instructed.

1651. Two Members having assaulted one another in Committee of the Whole, the House appointed a committee of inquiry, although the two Members had severally explained to the House and reconciled their quarrel.

A person who had wounded one of the police of the Capitol was by the House committed to the custody of its Sergeant-at-Arms while a committee was instructed to investigate.

In 1844 the Speaker took the chair to quell disorder which had arisen in Committee of the Whole, whereupon the Chairman stated to the House the facts as to the disorder.

On April 23, 1844,[1] on motion of Mr. James J. McKay, of North Carolina, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. George W. Hopkins, of Virginia, in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (No. 213) to modify and amend the act entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and to modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1842; and after some time spent therein warm words passed, which were followed by an assault between two Members, Messrs. George Rathbun, of the State of New York, and John White, of the State of Kentucky; and, great heat and confusion arising, and the committee being in great disorder, the Speaker[2] took the chair. Thereupon, order being restored, Mr. Hopkins, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, rose and stated to the House the facts as they occurred in the committee, when Mr. Romulus Mitchell Saunders, of North Carolina, moved a resolution, which, with amendments proposed by Messrs. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, and Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the rencontre on the floor of the House between Mr. Rathbun and Mr. White, Members of this House, and to report thereon to the House; and that the committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill or resolution providing for the exemplary punishment of any offenses within the walls of this Capitol or within the public grounds attached thereto. And that the same committee also examine into the assault made this morning upon one of the police of the Capitol by William S. Moore, and report all the facts in the case, and what, if any, connection existed between that assault and the encounter which took place between two of the Members of this House.

Mr. Saunders, Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, Mr. John J. Harding, of Illinois, and Mr. Reuben Chapman, of Alabama, were appointed on the committee.

Previously to the adoption of the resolution Mr. White and Mr. Rathbun severally explained to the House, and a reconciliation of the quarrel took place between them in the presence of the House.

After the appointment of the committee, Mr. Dromgoole moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House retain in custody William S. Moore until the further order of the House.

[2] John W. Jones, of Virginia, Speaker.

This was agreed to after the House had disagreed to an amendment proposed by Mr. William W. Payne, of Alabama, and providing that the Sergeant-at-Arms should be directed "to deliver to the civil authorities of this District, William S. Moore, charged with having fired a pistol, with the supposed intent to kill a Member of this body, and thereby, badly wounding a police officer."

In considering what course should be pursued, the Members in debate recalled the precedents in the cases of Messrs. Wise and Stanly and Messrs. Bell and Turney.

On May 13 the select committee reported that on the first branch of the subject, the rencontre between the two gentlemen, the committee had examined 34 witnesses, whose statements were sworn to. This testimony the committee reported to the House, but proposed no resolution, as they had no authority. Therefore the committee left the case with the House for its disposal. In the second branch of the case, the assault by William S. Moore, they had examined 16 witnesses, and reported all the material facts of the case. The committee expressed in distinct terms the power of this House to exclude offenders against decorum from its presence, and to punish for contempt committed within its presence, or the violation of any of its acknowledged privileges. But as it had been decided by the United States Supreme Court, in cases which the report set forth, that the House had no power to punish for contempt beyond imprisonment, which could only last during the continuance of the session of the House, the committee had thought proper to report a resolution, although they were only called upon to report the facts of the case. They had deemed it advisable to report a resolution to enable the House to act directly on the question, both as regarded the individual and themselves. And while the committee deemed it competent in this House to punish individuals for a violation of its privileges, and while such a punishment would be no bar to any future prosecution, the committee was of opinion that no such punishment should be inflicted by this House, but that the individual (Moore) should be turned over to the judicial authorities of the country. An officer would be ready to take-Moore into custody as soon as he should be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

After considerable debate and a postponement, on May 16, when a proposition to censure Messrs. White and Rathbun was pending, the whole subject was laid on the table, yeas 82, nays 73.

The report [1] of the committee held, as to the case of Moore:

> In the case of Anderson v. Dunn, arising out of an arrest of the plaintiff by the defendant, as an officer of this House, and acting under the Speaker's warrant, the Supreme Court have declared the highest power either House has to punish for contempt is that of imprisonment, and that this confinement can not extend beyond the existence of the session. So that, it follows, imprisonment must terminate with adjournment. The offense charged against the party would be that of an assault with intent to kill. If the party should be convicted of this crime, it would call for a higher degree of punishment than this House has the power to impose.

1652. An assault occurring between two Members in Committee of the Whole, the committee rose and the Speaker restored order before receiving the report.

apologized to the House, although the Chairman of the committee had made no report of the occurrence.

An apology of Members for an assault committed in Committee of the Whole was not placed in the Journal.

On March 12; 1852,[1] while the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering the resolution (S. 17) to authorize the continuance of the work on the two wings of the Capitol, an altercation arose between Messrs. Albert G. Brown, of Mississippi, and John A. Wilcox, of Mississippi, blows were exchanged, and a violent personal conflict ensued.

A motion that the committee rise was made and carried, and the Chairman reported that the committee had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (S. 17) to authorize, etc. No mention of the disorder was made in the report.

This report was not made, however, until order was restored by the Speaker, the Speaker[2] declining to receive the report until then.

A resolution was then offered to close debate on the bill before the committee; and pending consideration of this resolution, by unanimous consent Messrs. Brown and Wilcox, respectively, arose and made apology to the House for the disorder.

No further action was taken, and the Journal contains no reference to the affair.

1653. A Member having defied and insulted the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the Chairmam left the chair and, on the chair being taken by the Speaker, reported the facts to the House.

For defying and insulting the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the House declared Sherrod Williams in contempt and liable to censure.

An instance wherein, after a Member had explained, the House reconsidered its vote of censure.

In 1836 it seems to have been customary for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to count the committee to ascertain as to the presence of a quorum.

On July 2, 1836,[3] the House having gone into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, after some time spent therein, the committee rose, and Mr. Joel B. Sutherland, of Pennsylvania, reported that while in Committee of the Whole House Mr. Sherrod Williams, of Kentucky, a member of the committee, addressed the Chairman (Mr. Sutherland) while he (the Chairman) was counting the Members for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum was present, and was called to order by the Chairman and requested to take his seat. This he positively and repeatedly refused to do, and called the Chairman to order and demanded of him to take his seat; and Mr. Williams persisting in his refusal to submit to the authority of the Chair, the Chairman had left the chair, and now reported the facts which had induced the committee to rise to the Speaker, and through him to the House.

The House proceeding to consider the report, a resolution was offered by Mr. John M. Patton, of Virginia, for the appointment of a committee to consider what should be done "in vindication of the authority of the House, condemned by the violation of order." The House, however, with scarcely any dissent adopted a resolution offered by Mr. James A. Pearce, of Maryland, as follows:

Resolved, That the Member from Kentucky (Mr. Williams) having refused to take his seat when ordered so to do by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, having ordered the Chairman to take his seat, and having defied the power of the Chair and the House, has committed a contempt of this House and is justly liable to its censure.

The record of the debate shows that Mr. Williams acknowledged that he had intended to express his disrespect for the Chairman personally, the latter having ignored his demands for a division of a question. Later, after a vote by tellers had disclosed the absence of a quorum, the Chairman, instead of vacating the chair and reporting the fact to the House, had proceeded to count the committee. For this Mr. Williams had called him to order.

The Speaker [1] said that the course of the Chairman in counting the House when a quorum had not voted was strictly parliamentary.

Mr. Elisha, Whittlesey, of Ohio, said the difficulty arose because the gentleman from Kentucky did not know the rules. It had been the invariable rule (practice is evidently meant) for the Speaker and Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, whenever the question was raised whether a quorum was present or not, to proceed himself to count the Members or to ascertain in any other way he thought best to accomplish that object.

As Mr. Williams refused to make any other apology than to say that he intended to insult the Chairman without intending to insult the House, and as Mr. Sutherland refused absolutely to go back into the chair under such circumstances, the House was forced to act. The Speaker stated that the case was altogether of a novel character, and Mr. R. M. Johnson, of Kentucky, thought it was perhaps the first instance of the kind since the organization of the Government.

On July 4, explanation having been made to the House by Mr. Williams, the House reconsidered the resolution declaring Mr. Williams justly liable to censure, and then decided it in the negative.[2]

1654. Three Members of the House were ordered to the bar of the House to answer for a contempt of privilege in being present at and assisting in an assault between two other Members.—On July 17, 1866,[3] the House agreed to the following resolution, one of three reported by a select committee of investigation:

Resolved, That Charles D. Pennypacker, of Kentucky, L. B. Grigsby, of Kentucky, and John S. McGrew, of Ohio, by their presence and participation in a premeditated assault between Hon. Mr. Rousseau, of Kentucky, and Ron. Mr. Grinnell, of Iowa, on account of words spoken in debate, in which the persons, if not the lives, of Members of the House were imperiled, were guilty of a violation of its privileges, and they are hereby ordered to be brought to the bar of this House to answer for their contempt of its privilege.

1655. The case of Lovell H. Rousseau, in contempt of the House, in 1866.

An assault by one Member on another for words spoken in debate was made the subject of an investigation by a select committee.

Discussion of the offense of questioning a Member "in any other place" for words spoken in debate.

The words of a Member having been excepted to but not taken down when delivered, and having afterwards been investigated by a committee, it was held in order to propose censure of the Member.

On June 15, 1866,[1] Mr. Rufus P. Spalding, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House without debate, the previous question being ordered:

Whereas it is alleged in the public press that Hon. Lovell R. Rousseau, a Member of this House from the State of Kentucky, did, on the evening of Thursday, the 14th instant, commit an assault upon the person of Hon. Josiah B. Grinnell, a Member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter; and whereas said assault if committed, was a breach of the privileges of this House and of the Member assaulted: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject, and to report the facts, with such resolution thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its Members; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath.

The committee[2] I reported on July 2, and on July 14 the report was taken up for consideration in the House.[3] The committee found in their report that previous to the 14th of June Mr. Grinnell, on the floor of the House, in debate, had imputed cowardice to Mr. Rousseau in the latter's career as a soldier; that after the adjournment of the House on the 14th of June Mr. Rousseau assaulted Mr. Grinnell in the portico of the east front of the Capitol. The assault was made with a light cane. Three Members, each of whom was armed, as the committee found afterwards, were present as friends of Mr. Rousseau and they afterwards admitted that they should have taken part in the event of interference. The committee found no justification for the charge against the character of Mr. Rousseau for cowardice and condemned it as an infraction of the rules and usages of the House. Indeed, the minority considered the provocation so great that they dissented from the proposition of expulsion submitted by the majority. The majority of the committee found that, in spite of the provocation, there was no excuse for a resort to violence in contempt of the provision of the Constitution that "for any speech or debate in either House they (Members) shall not be questioned in any other place." Parliamentary assemblies were founded on the theory of the inviolability of the person of the Representative. An act of violence against a Member was an act of insurrection against the people whom he represented. It could not be justified by any delinquency or wrong on the part of the Representative which they have not authorized and for which they ought not to be held responsible or deprived of the rights of representation. "These prerogatives of the Representative," says the report, "are so much a matter of public concern that they can not be taken away by any act of the assembly of which he is a member, except by an order of expulsion or its equivalent, or annulled by the legislature; and, so far as they secure to him the right of attendance, it is not in the power of the Representative to waive or surrender them."

The committee recommended the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Hon. Lovell H. Rousseau, a Representative from Kentucky, by committing an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. Grinnell, a Representative from the State of Iowa, for words spoken in debate, has justly forfeited his privileges as a Member of this House, and is hereby expelled.

Resolved, That the personal reflections made by Mr. Grinnell, a Representative from the State of Iowa, in presence of the House, upon the character of Mr. Rousseau, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, were in violation of the rules regulating debate and the privileges of its Members founded thereon, and merit the disapproval of the House.

Resolved, That Charles D. Pennypacker, of Kentucky, L. B. Grigsby, of Kentucky, and John S. McGrew, of Ohio, by their presence and participation in a premeditated assault between Hon. Mr. Rousseau, of Kentucky, and Hon. Mr. Grinnell, of Iowa, on account of words spoken in debate, in which the persons, if not the lives, of Members of this House were imperiled, were guilty of a violation of its privileges, and they are hereby ordered to be brought to the bar of this House to answer for their contempt of its privileges.

Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, raised the question of order that, under the rules of the House, Mr. Grinnell might not be held to answer for words that were not at the time taken down, and also that the committee had exceeded its authority.

After debate, the Speaker [1] said:

The point raised by the gentleman involves in the first place the rules of debate and the manner of calling to order, and secondly the authority of the committee under instruction of the House.

The sixty-first rule, first read by the gentleman, was adopted, except that part in italics, by the first Congress under the Constitution, April 27, 1789. The sixty-second rule, upon which he mainly relies, is in the precise words in which it was originally introduced by John Q. Adams. The history of the sixty-second rule may perhaps show the reason for its introduction.

In 1832, Andrew Stevenson being Speaker, Mr. Stanberry, of Ohio, in the course of debate, denounced the Speaker for his political course in severe language. The chair was then occupied temporarily by James K. Polk, who was afterwards Speaker. No notice was taken by the Speaker pro tempore or by any Member of that denunciation until after the speech of Mr. Stanberry had been concluded, when exceptions were taken to it. The next day a motion was made to censure the Member for denouncing the Speaker, which was regarded as contempt of the House. After a long debate that motion prevailed by a large majority. But in the course of the debate there was a question raised as to what were the exact words used by the Member in debate. There was then no Congressional Globe; nothing but Gales & Seaton's Register of the debates, which was not a verbatim report. To settle the question, however, Mr. Stanberry repeated and reaffirmed the language. The next day John Quincy Adams offered this rule, which was immediately laid on the table. Five years afterwards it was taken up and adopted, and has since formed a part of our parliamentary law.

There are two ways to call to order. First, for irrelevant debate. That simply draws the Member back to the subject. Second, for disorderly language, transgression of the rules of the House, or indecorum of any kind. The sixty-second rule applies precisely to that. The Chair will read it. Before that, however, he Chair will read the sixty-first rule:

"If any Member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any Member may, call to order; in which case the Member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain."

[1] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker. Globe, p. 3820.

Under this, the oldest rule, the primary responsibility of ca1ling to order seemed to be devolved upon the Speaker, but under the sixty-second rule, and this has been the usage since its adoption, the primary responsibility of calling to order devolves upon the Members of the House, as will be seen.

"If a Member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table, and no Member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other Member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

The inference is plain that some Member calls to order, and the Speaker then rules upon the point. In "personal" explanations, which every Speaker dislikes, out of which grow so much of the trouble, discord, and strife there is in Congress, the Speaker is the only Member who is not asked to give his consent to it. It is the unanimous consent of the other Members of the House that is required. It is generally understood that the Member who asks this consent intends to make some "personal" remarks in review of remarks made in Congress, in the press, or elsewhere in which he claims to have been misrepresented. And the uniform usage of Speakers has been, with scarcely a single exception, searching far back in our parliamentary history, that when the House grants unanimous consent for a Member to make "a personal explanation," the Speaker, who does not give his consent, whose consent is not asked, waits until some Member rises to a question of order, when he promptly decides it. There have been very few exceptions, which, indeed, only prove the general rule. One was by the present occupant of the Chair, upon the occasion involved in this report, who, after the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Grinnell] had been twice called to order by Members on the floor, and the points had been sustained, stated that if this line of remark was continued, he should himself check him, and did so.

This sixty-second rule is divided in the middle by a semicolon, and the Chair asks the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] to the language of that rule, as it settles the whole question:

"62. If a Member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to"—

That is, the "calling to order" is "excepting" to words spoken in debate—"and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table; and no Member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other Member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

The first part of this rule declares that "calling to order" is "excepting to words spoken in debate." The second part of the rule declares that a Member shall not be held subject to censure for words spoken in debate if other business has intervened after the words have been spoken and before "exception" to them has been taken. Exception to the words of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Grinnell] was taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Harding], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Rousseau], and also by the Speaker of the House, as the records of the Congressional Globe will show. The distinction is obvious between the two parts of the rule. In the first part it speaks of a Member excepting to language of another and having the words taken down. In the last part of the rule it says he shall not be censured thereafter unless exception to his words were taken; but it omits to add as an essential condition that the words must also have been taken down. The substantial point, indeed the only point, required in the latter part of the rule is, that exception to the objectionable words must have been taken.

These rules, the sixty-first and sixty-second, are not always carried out to their full extent; it is not always required that the words excepted to shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk, as we have the Congressional Globe, in which are printed all the words spoken as taken down by the reporters in full. Sometimes, indeed quite often, the Chair rules upon the question of order as soon as it is raised, without the words excepted to being required by anyone to be taken down in writing and read. Sometimes, as today, in the debate upon the bridge bill, a Member calls another to order, and requires the words to be taken down in writing, when the Speaker rules upon the question of order. Sometimes the rule is carried a step further, and the demand is made that the Member called to order shall take his seat until leave is granted by the House for him to proceed in order. Sometimes, but rarely, the House goes beyond this and carries out the rule to its fullest extent and rigor by censuring the offending Member upon the spot.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] read a precedent of Mr. Speaker Grow, from the Thirty-seventh Congress. But he did not read the language of the Manual, which was quoted by the Speaker at that time. The language of Mr. Vallandigham was uttered in Committee of the Whole, when the Speaker was not in the chair and could not be. The Manual lays down a specific rule regulating debate in Committee of the Whole, and this is the rule:

"Disorderly words spoken in a committee must be written down as in the House, but the committee can only report them to the House for animadversion."

The only way the House could have taken notice of the words excepted to in that case was by having them written down in Committee of the Whole, to be reported to the House. The Committee of the Whole is a different body entirely from the House; it is presided over by a different person and is governed by different rules, as members are all aware. It has no power to censure a member for disorderly words, but must report them specifically to the House for its action.

The Chair is of the opinion, therefore, that under the sixty-second rule, which is composed of two parts, separated by a semicolon, it is distinctly shown by the first part that "calling to order" is excepting to words spoken in debate, and that can be pursued further, if any member sees fit to do so; that any member can demand that the words excepted to shall be taken down in writing, or a member may demand that the person called to order shall take his seat until the Speaker decides the point. But even if the decision is adverse the Speaker can not compel him to stop his speech, while any single member on the floor can, by demanding that he shall not proceed further unless by consent of a majority of the House. As this may seem strange to members, the Chair will read from the sixty-first rule:

"If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House."

It is for any member to object to another against whom a point of order has been successfully made, going on without the leave of the House. And the rule seems to be predicated on the presumption that if, out of all the members who heard the objectionable words and the Speaker's ruling against them, no one objects to his proceeding further, they are willing that he shall continue his speech. No such action was had in the House on the 11th of June, when this debate occurred. The Speaker promptly ruled upon every point of order which was raised. He ruled against the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Grinnell] upon every point. Any gentleman upon either side had the right to insist that the gentleman should resume his seat and should not proceed until the House had given him permission to proceed in order. But no one raised that point, and thereby the right to raise it was waived. But that does not interfere with the operation of the last part of this rule, which states (inverting the language) that a member can be censured if exceptions to the words spoken by him were taken at the time.

But this case is also settled by the resolution adopted by the House. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Spalding] rose to a question of privilege, and submitted the resolution which has been read by the gentleman from Iowa. The Chair construes the preamble of that resolution somewhat differently from the gentleman from Iowa. That gentleman emphasized the latter part of the preamble, while the Chair thinks that the portion narrating the affair is the substantial part. The Chair will read the preamble and resolution, so that the House may judge whether his construction of them is correct. It may be remarked, in passing, that no gentleman moved to amend them, and they were unanimously agreed to by the House as instructions to this committee:

"Whereas it is alleged in the public press that Hon. Lovell H. Rousseau, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, did, on the evening of Thursday, the 14th instant, commit an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. Grinnell, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter; and whereas said assault, if committed, was a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject and to report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath."

The resolution referring to the preamble, which states that the member from Kentucky did "commit an assault upon the person of Hon. J.B. Grinnell, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter," and holding such assault to be a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted, instructs this committee to "investigate the subject and to report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members."

The Chair thinks that this gave the committee full jurisdiction in the case, by the unanimous order of the House, no one proposing to limit their resolutions, but conferring on them full power to report whatever, on the facts ascertained by them, they deemed proper and necessary for the double object of vindicating the privileges of the House and the protection of its members.

Now, in the case cited by the gentleman from Iowa, in which Mr. Vallandigham used language reflecting upon Senator "Wade, if the latter had been in the Hall at the time and when so offensively denounced, had immediately committed a personal assault upon the former, and if a committee had been appointed with instructions to investigate the matter as a violation of the privileges of a member of the House, is it not evident that the House would have expected the committee to report with reference to the whole controversy, even if an immediate collision had prevented the words from being excepted to, taken down and read at the Clerk's table, and ruled on by the Speaker; that the committee should at least have embraced in their report anything closely connected with the transaction—bearing the relation, it might be said, of cause to effect? Certainly this would have been expected by the House. In accordance with this principle was the action of the select committee upon the case which arose in the Thirty-fourth Congress, when a member from South Carolina, aided by another standing near by, assaulted a Senator from Massachusetts in his seat for words spoken in debate. In that case the committee reported upon the entire subject, including everything out of which the assault grew.

The Chair, therefore, is of opinion that under the instructions unanimously given in this case to the committee by this House the committee had authority to report upon the whole controversy, in accordance with the specific language of the preamble of the resolution providing for the appointment of the committee to investigate in assault caused by words spoken in debate. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

The House, after declining to expel, censured a Member for contempt in assaulting another Member for words spoken in debate.

A committee having general authority to examine and recommend in relation to an assault between two Members, was held to have authority also to recommend censure of other Members implicated.

The House having ordered a Member to be censured, he was allowed, by unanimous consent, to make explanation before the execution of the order.

A Member, for whom the House had voted censure, announced that he had sent his resignation to the Governor of his State; but the House nevertheless voted to inflict the punishment.

Censure inducted on a Member by the Speaker, by order of the House, appears in full in the Journal.

Where a two-thirds vote is required, a Member voting on the prevailing side may move to reconsider, even though he be one of an actual minority.

A majority is required to reconsider a vote taken under conditions requiring two-thirds for affirmative action.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, made the further point of order that the committee had no jurisdiction over the three Members mentioned in the third resolution, and that at most it could only report the facts in the case.

The Speaker said: [1]

The Chair overrules the point of order, for the reasons already stated by him in his decision just made. The committee were authorized and instructed—

"To investigate the subject and to report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and. the protection of its Members."

[1] Globe, p. 3821.

It was a large authority, and if they had evidence that these gentlemen were connected in any way as accessories to the assault they had the right to report. Citizens have often been brought to the bar of the House for breach of its privileges. In the Fourth Congress the House of Representatives committed Randall and Whitney, two citizens, for attempting to corrupt the integrity of certain Members of Congress, which the House decided to be a contempt and breach of its privilege. In the same Congress it was decided that a challenge given by a citizen to a Member of Congress was a breach of privilege; and it was also decided to be a breach of privilege for the official printer (elected under the old law) to publish paragraphs defamatory of Congress in the official organ. The Chair thinks the committee had the right to report the third resolution as well as the second, and therefore overrules the point of order.

On July 16 and 17,[1] the report was debated in the House. Mr. Robert S. Hale, of New York, offered a proposition declaring that the House reported both personal reflections in debate and acts of violence toward Members, and declaring further the power and authority of the House to protect the privileges of its Members, but expressing the opinion that under the circumstances it was inexpedient to take further action. This proposition was decided in the negative.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, submitted in the form of an amendment a proposition to adopt in place of all the resolutions reported by the committee the following:

Resolved, That Hon. Lovell H. Rousseau be summoned to the bar of the House, and he there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Hon. J.B. Grinnell for words spoken in debate.

This proposition was decided in the negative, yeas 35, nays 94.

The question was then taken on the proposition of the minority, submitted by Mr. Raymond, to substitute the following for the first resolution reported by the committee:

Resolved, That Hon. Lovell H. Rousseau be, and he is hereby, reprimanded for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Ron. J. B. Grinnell, for words spoken in debate.

This proposition was decided in the negative, yeas 59, nays 69.

Then the question was taken on the first resolution of the committee, expelling Mr. Rousseau. And there appeared 73 yeas and 51 nays. So the resolution of expulsion was not agreed to. Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, who had voted in the negative, which was the prevailing side, entered a motion to reconsider. The Speaker ruled that a Member voting on the prevailing side might move to reconsider, and that a majority vote would be required to reconsider.

The House next laid on the table the second resolution of the committee, that of censuring Mr. Grinnell.

The third resolution, censuring the three Members who had witnessed the affair, was agreed to.

Then the motion of Mr. Banks to reconsider was called up, and being agreed to, the question recurred on the resolution of expulsion.

Mr. Banks thereupon moved to amend it by striking out all after the word Resolved and inserting:

That Hon. Lovell H. Rousseau, a Member of this House from the State of Kentucky, be summoned to the bar of this House, and be there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for the violation of its rights and privileges, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon the person of Hon. J. B. Grinnell, a Member of this House from the State of Iowa, for words spoken in debate.

This amendment was agreed to, and then the resolution, as amended, was agreed to, yeas 89, nays 30.

On July 21,[1] the chairman of the select committee demanded that the order of the House be executed. Thereupon Mr. Rousseau, who had not spoken during the proceedings, asked the privilege of making a personal explanation, and by unanimous consent this request was granted. In the course of the explanation Mr. Rousseau announced that he had sent his resignation to the Governor of Kentucky.

A question at once arose as to the propriety of carrying out the order of the House under these circumstances. After debate as to the right of the Member to resign, and after the point had been made that the House had the same right to censure a citizen who had invaded its privileges that it had to censure a Member, the House declined to postpone the execution of the order, by a vote of 43 yeas to 62 nays.

Then Mr. Rousseau presented himself at the bar of the House, and the Speaker inflicted on him the censure of the House. This censure appears in full in the Journal.

On July 24, by unanimous consent, it was—Ordered, That the execution of the order of the House in the case of those implicated in the assault upon Ron. Mr. Grinnell be dispensed with.[2]

1657. Two Members having created disorder in Committee of the Whole, the Speaker took the Chair and restored order, whereupon the Committee rose, and the House adjourned before taking action on the disorder.

Although a breach of privilege occur in Committee of the Whole, it yet relates to the dignity of the House and is so treated

The rule requiring words spoken out of order to be taken down at once does not apply to an occurrence of disorder constituting a breach of privilege.

For an assault during debate in Committee of the Whole the House, after expulsion had been suggested, exacted apologies from two Members.

On December 21, 1880,[3] in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, a scene of great disorder occurred between Messrs. James B. Weaver, of Iowa, and William A. J. Sparks, of Illinois. The Speaker took the Chair and restored order, and immediately thereafter the Committee arose and the House adjourned.

Immediately upon the assembling of the House on December 22,[4] Mr. Selwyn Z.

Bowman, of Massachusetts, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the reading of the Journal would be such intervening business as was referred to in the words of the rule:

He (the Member) shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair is of the opinion that the reading of the Journal does not take from the House any privilege that it now possesses.

The Journal having been read and approved, Mr. Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, referred to the scene of disorder the day before.

Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, made the point of order that the occurrence was in Committee of the Whole, and that the House had no knowledge of it.

The Speaker said:

The Chair would state that whatever might have been his decision touching that part of the rules to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has directed the attention of the Chair—clauses 4 and 5 of Rule XIV—the Chair finds warrant for the recognition of the gentleman from Maryland in the terms of Rule IX, which declares:

"Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings."

This matter, in the opinion of the Chair, relates, beyond controversy, to the dignity of the House. The Chair therefore rules the question one of privilege.

Mr. McLane then, after remarks, submitted the following:

Resolved, That the gentlemen from Iowa and Illinois be required to now apologize to this House for their conduct yesterday in this House.

In the course of the debate two other propositions were submitted, the first by Mr. Bowman, as follows:

Resolved, That, for gross breach of the privileges, rules, and decorum of this House, James B. Weaver, of Iowa, and William A. J. Sparks, of Illinois, be, and they hereby are, expelled from the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States.

The second proposition, submitted by Mr. Thomas M. Browne, of Indiana, proposed the investigation of the occurrence by a special committee.[2]

In the course of the debate the point was raised that the House might not take cognizance of the affair, because the words were not taken down at the time, and it was in reply urged that when the rule was framed the House did not have sworn reporters, and therefore it was necessary that spoken words be taken down at the time. The Speaker adhered to his ruling that the subject came as a question of privilege, and not under the rule providing for taking down of words. As to whether or not the words of the Congressional Record might be made a basis of action by the House, the same as words taken down under the rule, the Speaker declined to rule.

The House had by vote agreed to the proposition of Mr. Browne as an amendment, when Messrs. Weaver and Sparks, by unanimous consent, made personal explanations, apologizing to the House for their conduct.

Thereupon, by a vote of yeas 105, nays 44, the House laid the whole subject on the table.

1658. The House has frequently allowed personal difficulties arising in debate and even violent assaults to pass without notice, the Members concerned making apologies either personally or through other Members.

When Members apologize for disorderly proceedings which the House has allowed to pass without taking action, the apology has not usually been entered on the Journal.

On March 25, 1834,[1] Mr. Seaborn Jones, of Georgia, arose and explained that a difficulty which had arisen a few days before on the floor between Messrs. James Blair and Henry L. Pinckney, of South Carolina, had been settled by an adjustment "amicable, satisfactory, and honorable." As the occurrence had taken place in the House it was the desire of those gentlemen that the House should know that it had been adjusted.

1659. On December 19, 1849,[2] Mr. Thomas H. Bayly, of Virginia, presented to the House a written explanation of a difficulty that had occurred between Messrs. William Duer, of New York, and Richard K. Meade, of Virginia, in debate on a previous day. This explanation was signed by Mr. Bayly, on behalf of Mr. Meade, and by Mr. C. M. Conrad, of Louisiana, on behalf of Mr. Duer.

No reference to this appears in the Journal.

1660. On March 22, 1852,[3] Mr. Robert W. Johnson, of Arkansas, arose and stated that the unpleasant misunderstanding between Messrs. Cyrus L. Dunham, of Indiana, and Graham N. Fitch, of Indiana, which occurred on the 17th, had been referred to Mr. John C. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, and himself, and it was now in his power to state that all difference had been justly and honorably settled.

No mention of this occurrence appears in the Journal.

1661. On August 25, 1852,[4] Mr. Robert W. Johnson, of Arkansas, announced to the House the settlement of the "unpleasant difficulty" which had occurred on the floor of the House on the preceding day between Messrs. Addison White, of Kentucky, and William H. Polk, of Tennessee.

The Journal makes no mention of this explanation.

1662. On February 5 1858,[5] during dilatory proceedings pending the reference of the message of the President relating to the Lecompton constitution of Kansas, a violent personal conflict occurred between Messrs. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, and Lawrence M. Keitt, of South Carolina; Members crowded about and several participated. No mention of this occurs in the journal and no subsequent action seems to have been taken by the House. But on February 8 Messrs. Keitt and Grow severally apologized to the House for their breach of its order and decorum. No notice of this appears on the Journal.

1663. In early and infrequent instances of misunderstanding and disorder in the Senate no action was taken beyond investigation.—On March 2, 1833,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, arose and made remarks in explanation and reconciliation of a misunderstanding that had taken place in debate between Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, and Mr. George Poindexter, Of Mississippi.

1664. In 1850[2] occurred an episode between Messrs. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, and Henry S. Foote, of Mississippi, in the Senate, in which the latter menaced the former with a pistol. The subject was referred to a select committee, who made a report giving the facts in the case, and condemning the practice of carrying arms in the Senate as well as regretting the flagrant breach of order. The report further stated that this was the first instance of disorder of this kind in the Senate. There was no recommendation for action and no action was taken by the Senate.

1665. For unparliamentary language and an assault two Senators were declared in contempt and later were censured.

Two Senators having been declared in contempt a question was raised as to the right to suspend their functions as Senators, including the right to vote, but was not decided.

The President pro tempore of the Senate declined to take the responsibility of directing the Secretary to omit from the call of the yeas and nays the names of two Senators who had been declared in contempt.

Two Senators, declared by the Senate to be in contempt, were allowed to speak only after permission had been given by the Senate.

On a resolution in the Senate censuring two Senators the names of both were called, but neither voted.

On February 22, 1902,[3] while the Senate was considering the bill (H.R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, Mr. John L. McLaurin, of South Carolina, referring to a certain statement made in debate by Mr. Benjamin R. Tillman, of South Carolina, said:

"I now say that that statement is a willful, malicious, and deliberate lie."

At this point Mr. Tillman advanced to Mr. McLaurin, of South Carolina, and the two Senators met in a personal encounter, when they were separated by Mr. Layton, the acting assistant doorkeeper, assisted by several Senators sitting near.

The Senate at once went into executive session, and after some time spent therein the executive session was terminated and the injunction of secrecy was removed from the following, which had been agreed to:

Ordered, That the two Senators from the State of South Carolina be declared in contempt of the Senate on account of the altercation and personal encounter between them this day in open session, and that the matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with instructions to report what action shall be taken by the Senate in regard thereto.

Thereupon Mr. J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky, asked whether or not Mr. Tillman would be entitled to recognition to make a statement.

After debate the President pro tempore [1] said:

While these two Senators are declared to be in contempt the Chair could not recognize either if he should rise and address the Chair; but on motion made by any Senator that they be heard the Chair would recognize the Senator making the motion, and would hold that the motion was in order. In the ordinary transgression of the rules or violation of order the Senator violating must take his chair, and he can not be recognized by the presiding officer again until the Senate has relieved him of that by motion. Of course, the Senators from South Carolina can be relieved from the condition in which they are now, so far as recognition by the Chair is concerned, by a motion and by a majority vote of the Senate.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Blackburn, the Senate voted to allow the two Senators to be heard in order that they might purge themselves of contempt.

And Messrs. Tillman and McLaurin thereupon addressed the Senate apologizing for the occurrence.

On February 24,[2] a vote being taken on the pending bill, Mr. George Turner, of Washington, called attention to the fact that the name of neither Senator from South Carolina had been called.

The President pro tempore declined to entertain the question of order until the roll call had been completed and the result announced.

The result of the vote having been announced, Mr. Turner, rising to a question of privilege, stated that the State of South Carolina had been deprived of its rights under the Constitution, which declared that the Senate should "be composed of two Senators from each State," that "each Senator shall have one vote," and that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

In the course of the debate, Mr. Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, read the following from Cushing:

The power to expel also includes in it a power to discharge a Member, for good cause, without inflicting upon him the censure and disgrace implied in the term "expulsion;" and this has accordingly been done, in some instances, by the House of Commons.

Analogous to the right of expulsion is that of suspending a Member from the exercise of his functions as such, for a longer or shorter period; which is a sentence of a milder character than the former, though attended with somewhat different effects; for during the suspension the electors are deprived of the services of their representative, without power to supply his place; but the rights of the electors are no more infringed by this proceeding than by an exercise of the power to imprison.

And Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, denying the applicability of the law of Parliament, read the following from the American and English Encyclopedia of Law:

The same inherent power of punishing for contempt belongs to Parliament in England. The House of Commons has it, not because it is a representative body with legislative functions, but because it is a part of the high court of Parliament, the highest court in the realm.

A legislative assembly of an English colony, not being a judicial body, has no inherent right to punish for contempt, and, except in those cases where Parliament has invested them with it, they can not exercise it.

In the United States the judicial power is vested by the various constitutions in the courts created by the constitutions and such others as may be created. Neither Congress nor the State legislatures succeeded to those inherent and unlimited powers of punishing for contempt possessed by the English Parliament.

[1] William P. Frye, of Maine, President pro tempore.

[2] Record, pp. 2124–2130.

The Senate having passed to other business without disposing of the question, on February 27,1 the President pro tempore made this statement to the Senate:

The Chair desires to say that on Monday last he requested the clerks not to call the names of the two Senators from South Carolina, they being by a resolution of the Senate in contempt of the body. On Tuesday he requested the clerks to read the names in the event there was a roll call. He did this not because he doubted in the least the propriety of the action he took on Monday. He did it because he recognized that it was a grave question, and he preferred to be in a position where, if it again arose, it could be by him submitted to the decision of the Senate and thus relieve the Chair from the responsibility.

On February 28, Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, made a report which, after reciting the circumstances of the encounter, proceeded:

We thus present to the Senate the entire record bearing upon this unfortunate occurrence, and no examination or investigation by your committee could possibly throw any additional light upon the transaction, which occurred in open session and in the presence of the membership of this body. That the conduct of the two Senators was an infringement of the privileges of the Senate, a violation of its rules, and derogatory to its high character, tending to bring the body itself into public contempt, can not be questioned or denied. Indeed, the Senate by a unanimous vote has already placed on record its condemnation of the Senators by declaring both guilty of contempt.

The majority of the committee are of the opinion that the legal effect of adjudging these Senators in contempt of the Senate was to suspend their functions as Senators, and that such a punishment for disorderly behavior is clearly within the power of the Senate, but the conclusion they have reached makes it unnecessary to discuss this question.

The offenses committed by the two Senators were not, in the opinion of a majority of the committee, of equal gravity. The charge made by Mr. Tillman had been once before in the Senate specifically denied in parliamentary language by Mr. McLaurin. The offense charged against Mr. McLaurin was among the most reprehensible a Senator could commit. He could not ignore it or fail to refute it and hope to be longer respected as either a man or a Senator.

Mr. McLaurin did not commence the encounter, but only stood in his place at his desk, where he was speaking, and resisted the attack that was made upon him.

In other words, his offense was confined to the use of unparliamentary language, for which he had unusual provocation.

Nevertheless, his offense was a violation of the rules of the Senate of so serious a character that, in the opinion of the committee, it should be condemned.

In the case of Mr. Tillman the record shows that the altercation was commenced by the charge he made against Mr. McLaurin. Such a charge is inexcusable, except in connection with a resolution to investigate. Mr. Tillman not only made the charge without any avowal of a purpose to investigate, but also disclaiming knowledge of evidence to establish the offense; and this he did after the charge had been specifically and unqualifiedly denied by Mr. McLaurin.

Such a charge under any circumstances would be resented by any man worthy to be a Senator, but, made as it was in this instance, its offensiveness was greatly intensified, and the result must have been foreseen by Mr. Tillman if he took any thought, as he should, of the consequences of his statements. This feature of his offense, coupled with the fact that he also commenced the encounter by quitting his seat some distance away from Mr. McLaurin, and, rushing violently upon him, struck him in the face, makes the case one of such exceptional misbehavior that a majority of the committee are of the opinion that his offense was of much greater gravity than that of Mr. McLaurin.

The penalty of a censure by the Senate, in the nature of things, must vary in actual severity in proportion to the public sense of the gravity of the offense of which the offender has been adjudged guilty. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that, in the opinion of a majority of the committee, there is a difference in the gravity of the offenses under consideration, your committee are of the opinion that public good and the dignity of the Senate will be alike best promoted and protected, so far as this particular case is concerned, by imposing upon each Senator, by formal vote, the censure of the Senate for the offense by him committed; and therefore the committee recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the judgment of the Senate that the Senators from South Carolina, Benjamin R. Tillman and John L. McLaurin, for disorderly behavior and flagrant violation of the rules of the Senate during the open session of the Senate on the 22d day of February, instant, deserve the censure of the Senate, and they are hereby so censured for their breach of the privileges and dignity of this body, and from and after the adoption of this resolution the order adjudging them in contempt of the Senate shall be no longer in force and effect."

A minority of the committee, Messrs. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, E. W. Pettus, of Alabama, Jo. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky, Fred. T. Dubois, of Idaho, and Murphy J. Foster, of Louisiana, presented the following dissenting views:

We dissent from so much of the report of the committee as asserts the power of the Senate to suspend a Senator and thus deprive a State of its vote, and so much as describes the offenses of the Senators as of different gravity; but we approve the resolution reported.

A portion of the majority, Messrs. L. E. McComas, of Maryland, Albert J. Beveridge, of Indiana, and J. C. Pritchard, of North Carolina, submitted views in favor of suspension of the two Senators. After discussing the power to punish generally, they submitted:

Since punishment for disorderly behavior may be inflicted by a majority vote in the Senate, what sorts of punishment may be imposed upon a Senator?

In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 189) Justice Miller says: "We see no reason to doubt that this punishment may in a proper case be imprisonment, and that it may be for refusal to obey some rule on that subject made by the House for the preservation of order."

Later, in In re Chapman (166 U. S., 668), Chief Justice Fuller says of the Senate: "It necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection" (Ib., 671); "Congress could not divest itself or either of its Houses of the essential and inherent power to punish for contempt in cases to which the power of either House extended."

While the Supreme Court has said that it does not concede that the Houses of Congress possess the general power of punishing for contempt analogous to that exercised by courts of justice, it had admitted that there are cues in which the Houses of Congress have such power of punishing for contempt, and points out the source of this power.

In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U.S., 201) the court said: "We may, perhaps, find some aid * * * if we can find out its source, and fortunately in this there is no difficulty. For, while the framers of the Constitution did not adopt the law and custom of the English Parliament as a whole, they did incorporate such parts of it and with it such privileges of Parliament as they thought proper to be applied to the two Houses of Congress."

Among these privileges, says the court, is the right to make rules and to punish members for disorderly behavior. The Senate has not like power with Parliament in punishing citizens for contempt, but it has like power with Parliament in punishing Senators for contempt or for any disorderly behavior or for certain like offenses. Like Parliament, it may imprison or expel a member for offenses."The suspension of members from the service of the House is another form of punishment." (May's Parliamentary Practice, 53.) This author gives instances of suspension in the seventeenth century and shows the frequent suspension of members under a standing order of the House of Commons, passed February 23, 1880.

Says Cushing, section 280: "Members may also be suspended by way of punishment, from their functions as such, either in whole or in part or for a limited time. This is a sentence of a milder character than expulsion."

"During the suspension," says Cushing, section 627, "the electors are deprived of the services of their representative without power to supply his place, but the rights of the electors are no more infringed by this proceeding than by an exercise of the power to imprison."

The Senate may punish the Senators from South Carolina by fine, by reprimand, by imprisonment, by suspension by a majority vote, or by expulsion with the concurrence of two-thirds of its members.

The offense is well stated in the majority report. It is not grave enough to require expulsion. A reprimand would be too slight a punishment. The Senate by a yea-and-nay vote has unanimously resolved that the said Senators are in contempt. A reprimand is in effect only a more formal reiteration of that vote. It is not sufficiently severe upon consideration of the facts.

The resolution proposed by the committee was agreed to, yeas 54; nays 12.

The names of both Senators from South Carolina were called on this vote, but neither voted, Mr. McLaurin stating that for obvious reasons he would refrain from voting.
