

justice for all,” and with responsibilities to each other as well as to ourselves. And right now we’ve got to meet those responsibilities in this time of great challenge.

There’s some folks in Congress who may think, well, you know what, we’ll just settle this all in next year’s election. I’ve got news for them, the next election is 13 months away. The American people don’t want to sit and wait. They need help now. There are folks living paycheck to paycheck. There are folks living week to week. They need action. They need action now.

So I need you to lift up your voices, help us out. Tell Congress: Pass this bill. And once we get this bill passed—and we’re just going to stay on it. And if they don’t vote for it today, we’re going to stay on it until they vote for something. We’re going to keep pushing.

And I’m going to need you to help us finish what we started in 2008. Let’s keep building an America that we can be assured gives everybody opportunity. Everybody gets a fair shake. Everybody gets their fair share.

Audience member. Si, se puede!

The President. Si, se puede! We’re not people who just sit there and watch things happen; we make things happen. We’re Americans. We are tougher than the times we live in, and we’re sure a lot better than the politics we’ve been seeing.

We’re a people who can write our own destiny. And we can do it again, as long as all of you have that same sense of urgency we had in 2008. Let’s meet this moment. Let’s get to work. Let’s remind everybody all around the world just why it is that the United States of America is the greatest country on Earth.

God bless you. God bless the United States of America. Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 6:03 p.m. at the Sheraton Orlando Downtown Hotel. In his remarks, he referred to Alan H. Ginsberg, chief executive officer, the CED Companies; Mark NeJame, founder and senior partner, NeJame, LaFay, Jancha, Ahmed, Barker, Joshi and Moreno, P.A.; Dwight D. Howard, Jr., center, National Basketball Association’s Orlando Magic; President Lee Myung-bak of South Korea; and Warren E. Buffett, chief executive officer and chairman, Berkshire Hathaway Inc.

Remarks at a Democratic National Committee Fundraiser in Orlando October 11, 2011

The President. Hello, everybody! Oh, it is good to see all of you, although I can’t see much with that light. First of all, I am just so grateful to John and Ultima for opening up their extraordinary home. Give them a big round of applause.

I want to thank your outstanding mayor, Buddy Dyer, who’s in the house. I want to thank all the cohorts of this extraordinary event. We also have Congresswoman Corrine Brown who is here. Thank you, Corrine.

Now, the reason I came here is because I’m trying to resolve the NBA lockout. [Laughter] So I don’t know who I need to talk to. [Inaudible]—I don’t know if you’ve got some clout or who it is, but we need our basketball. [Laughter]

The last time that John and Ultima hosted me, I was actually still in the United States

Senate. And they could not have been more gracious at that time, and I’ve been in love with Orlando ever since. But obviously, this area, like the rest of the country, is going through some very challenging times right now. We have just gone through the worst recession since the Great Depression, the worst financial crisis since the 1930s. And as a result, there are a whole bunch of folks who are hurting out there. Before I came here, I was actually at a little pub downtown—

Audience member. Amen.

The President. —right across—[laughter]—I saw you in there too. [Laughter] And I was with a group of plumbers and pipefitters, construction workers. They had worked on the Amway Center. They had worked on the new veterans hospital that’s going up. But a lot of them now were out of work, and one of them had lost their home. A couple of them were in the process of losing their health care, because it turns out if you don't work enough hours, even if you're in a union, that you end up losing your health care benefits, and you—or at least you have to pay for them yourself, and a lot of these guys couldn't afford it.

And it was a good reminder: As blessed as so many of us are, that there's a big chunk of the country right now that's hurting. And I hear from them every day, and I see folks all across the country who have had to close down a business that had been in their family for years or somebody has lost their home and they're trying to figure out how long they can stay with their brother or their sister, with their whole family. And people who send out résumé after résumé for months now, and they're still not able to find a job.

And so for those of us who, I think, in 2008, decided that we needed to bring about change, I want everybody here to understand that 2008 was just the beginning and we now have to finish what we started in 2008. We have to finish what we started. We knew then that the challenges were immense, that we had gone through a decade in which ordinary people's wages and incomes hadn't gone up while the cost of everything from college to health care had risen. We knew then that the health care system was broken and we had millions of people without health care. We knew then that we didn't have an energy policy in this country. We knew then that too many jobs were being shipped overseas and not enough were taking root here in the United States of America. We knew then that our education system wasn't where it needed to be. We knew then that we were in a war in Iraq that we probably shouldn't have been in in the first place.

And so we, over the last 3 years, have tried to address some of those challenges that we understood existed back in 2008. And we knew that just as those problems weren't created overnight, we weren't going to solve them overnight. But we've made extraordinary progress. The war in Iraq has come to a close, and we've already brought 100,000 troops back.

Audience member. Awesome!

The President. We have finally gotten a health care law in place that promises not only to provide 30 million more people insurance across this country, but also makes sure that the insurance you have is more secure.

We ended a practice where huge Government subsidies were going to the banks for student loans, took $60 billion out of that subsidy to apply to make sure that college was more affordable for young people all across the country.

We have appointed judges all across the country who understand the importance of keeping the doors of justice open to everybody who is—[applause—and by the way, the most diverse Federal appointees that we've ever seen. That includes, by the way, two outstanding women on the Supreme Court.

Audience member. [Inaudible]

The President. He would have to take a really big pay cut. [Laughter]

We've been able to pass Wall Street reform to make sure that we don't get caught in the same kind of crisis that occurred back in 2008 when Lehman went under, and we aren't going to see taxpayer-funded bailouts of the sort that we've seen in the past.

And so we've made enormous progress, but we've got a lot more work to do. And the only way we're going to be able to make that progress is if I've got your support.

Audience member. Four more years!

The President. If I've got your support. Now, keep in mind, the election is 13 months away. And in the meantime, the American people can't wait for action. And that's why for the last month what I've been spending most of my time on is trying to nudge, cajole, push, shove Congress to do its job and to pass a jobs bill that can start putting construction workers back to work and put teachers back in the classroom and rebuild our infrastructure—our roads, our bridges, our water mains, our sewer systems—rebuild our schools so that we've got the best education possible for us kids.

This is a bill that is paid for. I won't lie to you. It asks some of you to do a little bit more than you've done in the past. But here is the extraordinary thing. When you talk to people who have been incredibly blessed by this country, and there are a lot of people here who started out with not much—and I’m in that category—except good parents and folks who push you, and somehow, we’ve ended up achieving the American Dream. I think every one of us is willing to do a little bit more to make sure that America is the kind of place where the next generation is going to enjoy the same opportunities we did.

And so what we’ve said is, look, we can bring down the deficit. We can put people back to work. We’re going to make some cuts in programs that don’t work so that we can fund the things that do. We can rebuild this country. We can invest in basic research and science that will lead to the kind of innovations that have always made this country great. And we can maintain a social safety net so that our seniors are secure and their Medicare is still in place and Social Security is still available. We can do all those things, but what we need is not a “no, we can’t” attitude. We need a “yes, we can” attitude.

And there are some folks in Congress right now who seem to believe that their job is to figure out how to keep their job, instead of spending time thinking about how more Americans can get a job. And that attitude that sees everything through the lens of the next election, that puts party ahead of country, that attitude has to end. And that’s people are so frustrated about when they think about Washington.

So the challenge we have now is to maintain the same kind of energy, the same kind of enthusiasm, the same hopefulness that we had in 2008. And that’s not always going to be easy because, let’s face it, back in 2008, it was sort of lightning in a bottle. There was huge excitement, and I wasn’t as gray. Everybody had those “Hope” posters and all that stuff. And it was cool to be an Obama supporter, because it was new and fresh. And now everybody looks and says: “We see him on TV all the time. He is looking old and worn out.” Everybody still loves Michelle, though, the First Lady of the United States.

Audience member. And the girls.

The President. And the girls, and Bo—and Bo.

Audience member. And you.

Audience member. And you!

The President. But the point is that in 2008, I hope you got involved not just because it was trendy, but because you shared with me a vision of an America in which everybody has a fair shot and everybody does their fair share, an America in which the middle class was not out of reach or people weren’t worried about falling out of it, but it was the glue that held this country together. The idea that if you worked hard and you were responsible, that you showed up at your job every day and you looked after your family and you looked after your community, that that meant that you could pay your bills and send your kids to college and take a vacation once in a while and have a home and retire with some dignity and respect. That if you played by the rules, that you were rewarded. And those values are what we’ve been fighting for. That’s what this whole process has been about.

And we’re not there yet. Too many folks are doing the right thing and still falling behind. And that’s what they’re frustrated by. And that’s what they’re worried about. That’s what they’re scared about and anxious about. And so I just want everybody here to understand that that goal, my belief in those values is unwavering. I am absolutely confident that there is no problem we have in this country that cannot be solved if we are working together, if we stick to it, if we are determined, if we don’t lose hope.

And I’m going to need all of you to spread that message as you go to your workplaces and you talk to your friends and your neighbors and your churches, your synagogues. I need all of you to insist that that vision we have, an America that is fair and just, where everybody is included, that that vision is still possible. It’s not that far away, but we’re going to have to work hard to achieve it.

Now, I was mentioning to some of the basketball players who were here that this is like the second quarter, maybe the third, and we’ve still got a lot of work to do. But I want everybody to know I'm a fourth-quarter player. So I don't miss my shots in the fourth quarter. So as long as we've got a strong team and everybody is committed and engaged and involved, we're not just going to win this election, we are going to win this election, and then we are also going to make sure that we rebuild this country.

We're also going to make sure that our infrastructure is the best in the world once again. We are once again going to have the most—the highest rate of college graduates in the world. We're also going to make sure that we are the most competitive nation in the world. We are also going to make sure that we fix a broken immigration system. We are also going to make sure that we deal with neighborhoods all across the country that are impoverished and where too many kids are giving up hope. We are also going to make sure that we are respected around the world not just for our military might, but for our values and for the things that we stand for.

We have a lot of work to do, but if you're with me, I guarantee you we're going to make it happen. So God bless you. God bless the United States of America, everybody. Thank you. Thank you very much.

Remarks at the White House Forum on American Latino Heritage October 12, 2011

Hello, everybody! Thank you so much. Thank you, everybody. Everybody, please have a seat. Well, welcome to Washington. It is an honor to be here with so many leaders and thinkers who've come together for one reason: to celebrate Latino culture and honor the contributions that so many Latinos have made—and continue to make—to our Nation.

I want to begin by thanking Sergeant First Class Petry for that introduction. Three months ago, I was honored to present Sergeant Petry with our Nation's highest military decoration, the Medal of Honor. And we are so proud of him. He is an inspiration to all of us. And he is the latest in a long line of Latino heroes to wear America's uniform. So I was mentioning to him that I went to Walter Reed this week and—to visit some of our wounded warriors, and a number of them remarked on how they had had a chance to meet Sergeant Petry. He had gone by to talk to some of those guys. And seeing him in uniform, proud, doing what he does, inspired them and made them certain that they were going to pull through. And so that's the kind of effect he's having on people each and every day. And we're really proud of him. So thank you very much. Thank you.

I also want to recognize the Members of Congress who are here. I want to thank my dear friend and outstanding Secretary of the Interior, Ken Salazar, for organizing this forum. Whenever Ken is asked how long his ancestors have been in this country, he says, "Oh, about 400 years." [Laughter] So his roots go way back, just like I know many of yours do.

And that's what today is all about. Diversity has always been America's strength. We are richer because of the men and women and children who've come to our shores and joined our Union. And we are better off because of the ideas that they've brought and the difference that they've made and the impact they've had on our lives.

And nowhere is that more true than with the Latino community. Right now there are 54 million Americans of Latino descent, one-sixth of our population: our neighbors, our coworkers, our family, our friends. You've helped us build our cities, grow our economy, defend our country. And today, for the first time in history, there is a Latina in my Cabinet and a Latina on the bench of the highest court in the land. Hilda Solis is doing an outstanding job.

Now, this forum is about celebrating that heritage, because too often the achievements of Latinos go unrecognized. And there are achievements that have been hard won. We know life hasn't always been easy for Latinos in
