Brathwaite v. Garland

IN THE

United States Court of Appeals
For the Second Circuit

AUGUST TERM 2020

ARGUED: JANUARY 5, 2021

DECIDED: JULY 1, 2021

No. 20-27

BYER,

Petitioner,

v.

MERRICK B. GARLAND,
UNITED STATES ATTORNEY GENERAL,

*Respondent.

Petition for Review of a Decision by the Board of Immigration Appeals
A036-668-868

* Pursuant to Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 43(c)(2), Attorney General Merrick B. Garland is automatically substituted for former Attorney General William P. Barr as Respondent.

Brathwaite v. Garland

Before: CALABRESI, RAGGI, AND CHIN, Circuit Judges.

Petitioner Aldwin Junior Brathwaite petitions for review of an order of removability, entered by the Honorable Joy A. Merriman, U.S. Immigration Judge (“IJ”), on June 11, 2019, and approved by the Board of Immigration Appeals (“BIA”) on December 11, 2019. Because the BIA’s decision is premised on an unreasonable construction of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (“IIRIRA”), we GRANT the petition for review and REMAND the matter to the BIA for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CALABRESI, Circuit Judge:

Under the Immigration and Nationality Act (“INA”), a noncitizen may be ordered removed on the basis of a qualifying “conviction.” See 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2). Before 1996, the INA did not define “conviction.” But for decades, federal courts and the BIA followed the principle, first set forth by the Supreme Court in Pino v. Landon, 349 U.S. 901 (1955), that noncitizens cannot be removed until their convictions have attained a sufficient degree of finality—that is, until direct appellate review of their convictions has been exhausted or waived. When Congress defined “conviction” in the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 (“IIRIRA”), it generally followed what courts had held “conviction” meant, but it said nothing about the well-established finality requirement. See 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(48)(A).

In a recent precedential decision, Matter of J.M. Acosta, 27 I. & N. Dec. 420 (BIA 2018), the BIA interpreted the IIRIRA’s definition of “conviction” and reaffirmed the principle that a conviction cannot trigger deportation until direct

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 appellate review is exhausted or waived. But the BIA put new limits on this 2 principle. Specifically, in cases where the state’s initial period for filing a direct 3 appeal has expired, the BIA devised a burden-shifting framework: once the initial 4 time period for filing an appeal expires, a “presumption” of finality attaches, and 5 the noncitizen bears the burden of proving that (1) the appeal has been filed and 6 is pending, and (2) “the appeal relates to the issue of guilt or innocence or concerns 7 a substantive defect in the criminal proceedings.” 27 I. & N. Dec. at 432. Under this 8 presumption of finality, “[a]ppeals, including direct appeals, . . . that do not relate 9 to the underlying merits of the conviction will not be given effect to eliminate the 10 finality of the conviction.” Id. at 433.²

11 Petitioner Aldwin Junior Brathwaite (“Brathwaite” or “Petitioner”) seeks 12 review of a BIA decision ordering his removal on the basis that Brathwaite failed 13 to offer sufficient evidence that the appeal of his criminal conviction—filed after 14 the initial period for filing a direct appeal expired—goes to the merits of his

² The Government suggested at oral argument that the merits-based showing applies to all appeals, see Oral Arg. at 30:00–32:00, both those timely filed and those for which leave is granted to file out of time. In this case we are required to address only the latter appeal and, thus, we express no view as to what, if any, requirements the Government might impose on the former to defer the identification of a “conviction.”

conviction. His case raises three issues. First, whether the IIRIRA's definition of "conviction" is ambiguous. Second, if so, whether the BIA's interpretation of the statute is reasonable, that is, (a) whether the finality requirement persists; and (b) if so, whether the BIA may put limits on it. Third, and finally, whether the limits imposed by the BIA in J.M. Acosta are reasonable.

We hold that the IIRIRA's definition of "conviction" is ambiguous. We also hold that the BIA reasonably determined that the finality requirement persists. We need not determine whether the BIA may put limits on the finality requirement, however, as even assuming it may, we hold that the limitations the BIA imposed in J.M. Acosta are unreasonable. Accordingly, we VACATE the BIA's decision and REMAND this matter to the BIA for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

BACKGROUND

Brathwaite is a citizen of Trinidad and Tobago who entered the United States in 1979 as a lawful permanent resident. In January 2018, Brathwaite pleaded guilty to several identity theft and grand larceny charges. He was sentenced to two to four years of imprisonment, with the sentences to run concurrently.

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 In October 2018, while Brathwaite was incarcerated, the Department of 2 Homeland Security (“DHS”) initiated removal proceedings against him. DHS 3 charged that Brathwaite was removable based on his conviction for aggravated 4 felonies as defined by 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(43)(G), (M), (U), and for a crime involving 5 moral turpitude under 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(ii).

6 Several months later, Brathwaite filed a motion with the First Judicial 7 Department of the New York Appellate Division pursuant to New York Criminal 8 Procedure Law (“NYCPL”) § 460.30 for an extension of time to appeal his 9 conviction. The Appellate Division granted his motion, “deeming the moving 10 papers as a timely filed notice of appeal.” People v. Brathwaite, 2019 N.Y. Slip Op.
11 71042(U) (1st Dep’t May 23, 2019) (unpublished order). Armed with the now 12 timely filed notice of appeal, Brathwaite moved to terminate removal proceedings, 13 asserting that, as his conviction was under appeal, it was not final—and, thus, not 14 a “conviction”—for immigration purposes. DHS argued in opposition that 15 Brathwaite’s conviction was final when removal proceedings began, and that 16 Brathwaite had failed to submit adequate evidence establishing that his appeal 17 went to the merits.

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 The IJ denied Brathwaite's motion to terminate removal proceedings. In 2 doing so, it adopted and incorporated the reasoning of the BIA's precedential 3 decision Matter of J.M. Acosta, 27 I. & N. Dec. 420 (BIA 2018). As stated earlier, in 4 J.M. Acosta, the BIA (a) concluded that the definition of "conviction" in the IIRIRA 5 is ambiguous, and (b) interpreted the statute to retain the principle that "a 6 conviction does not attain a sufficient degree of finality for immigration purposes 7 until the right to direct appellate review on the merits of the conviction has been 8 exhausted or waived." 27 I. & N. Dec. at 432. The BIA, however, then went further.
9 In cases where "the time for filing an initial direct appeal has expired under the 10 laws of the applicable jurisdiction," it determined that a noncitizen's conviction 11 should be presumed to be final. Id. To rebut this presumption of finality, the BIA 12 held that the noncitizen must both "come forward with evidence that an appeal 13 has been filed within the prescribed deadline, including any extensions or 14 permissive filings granted by the appellate court" and "present evidence that the 15 appeal relates to the issue of guilt or innocence or concerns a substantive defect in 16 the criminal proceedings." Id.

17 Applying J.M. Acosta to Brathwaite's case, the IJ held that the evidence he 18 submitted to rebut the presumption of finality—the Appellate Division order

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 granting Brathwaite's motion to late file his appeal—was “legally insufficient.” 2 Special App'x at 8.

3 Brathwaite appealed to the BIA, which issued a single-member unpublished 4 decision dismissing the appeal. The BIA noted that at the time Brathwaite was 5 placed in removal proceedings in October 2018, the thirty-day appeal period 6 provided by NYCPL § 460.10(1)(a) had already passed. As a result, the BIA
7 concluded that the IJ properly relied on J.M. Acosta to find that Brathwaite's 8 conviction must be presumed to be final for immigration purposes. Moreover, the 9 BIA held that Brathwaite had not carried his burden of showing non-finality.
10 While the Appellate Division had granted him leave to file a late notice of appeal, 11 the BIA stated that Brathwaite had not submitted evidence that established that he 12 had perfected an appeal “relating to the issue of guilt or innocence, or concerning 13 a substantive defect in the criminal proceedings,” and had not otherwise “show[n] 14 what argument he was pursuing” on appeal. Special App'x at 5. This timely 15 petition for review of the BIA's decision followed.

16 Before this court, Brathwaite argues, inter alia, that the statutory text, history, 17 and context of the IIRIRA establish that Congress unambiguously retained the 18 requirement that a conviction challenged on direct appeal is not final for 20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 immigration purposes, and that the J.M. Acosta framework therefore imposes 2 impermissible new limitations on finality. In Brathwaite's view, J.M. Acosta 3 violates finality because it allows a conviction to become a predicate for removal 4 before appellate review has been exhausted. He also argues that the agency's 5 interpretation in J.M. Acosta is impermissible because it undermines the due 6 process rights of noncitizens and interferes with the states' ability to administer 7 their criminal justice systems.

8 The Government contends that J.M. Acosta is a reasonable interpretation of 9 an ambiguous statutory phrase, and hence, that the BIA's interpretation is entitled 10 to Chevron deference. See Chevron, U.S.A., Inc. v. Nat. Res. Def. Council, Inc., 467 U.S.
11 837, 843 (1984). As the Government sees it, the framework set forth in J.M. Acosta 12 appropriately prevents noncitizen defendants from forestalling their removal 13 while they appeal non-substantive defects in their criminal proceedings.

14 DISCUSSION

15 A. Standard of Review

16 Where, as here, the BIA adopts the IJ's reasoning and offers additional 17 commentary, we review the decision of the IJ as supplemented by the BIA. See Yan

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 Chen v. Gonzales, 417 F.3d 268, 271 (2d Cir. 2005). We review the BIA’s legal 2 conclusions de novo, but we afford deference to the agency’s interpretations of the 3 INA when appropriate under Chevron. Oppedisano v. Holder, 769 F.3d 147, 150 (2d 4 Cir. 2014). “[I]f the statute is silent or ambiguous with respect to the specific issue, 5 the question for the court is whether the agency’s answer is based on a permissible 6 construction of the statute.” Chevron, 467 U.S. at 843. Where the BIA’s 7 interpretation is “arbitrary, capricious, or manifestly contrary to the statute,” it 8 merits no deference. Singh v. Gonzales, 468 F.3d 135, 139 (2d Cir. 2006) (quoting 9 Evangelista v. Ashcroft, 359 F.3d 145, 150 (2d Cir. 2004) (internal quotation marks 10 omitted)). And where, as here, the court reviews an unpublished BIA decision that 11 relies on a binding published decision, Chevron deference extends to any 12 “reasonable resolution of statutory ambiguity” that was established in the earlier 13 decision. Higgins v. Holder, 677 F.3d 97, 103 (2d Cir. 2012).

14 B. Whether the IIRIRA’s definition of “conviction” is ambiguous

15 “The plainness or ambiguity of statutory language is determined by 16 reference to the language itself, the specific context in which that language is used, 17 and the broader context of the statute as a whole.” Kar Onn Lee v. Holder, 701 F.3d 18 931, 936 (2d Cir. 2012) (quoting Robinson v. Shell Oil Co., 519 U.S. 337, 341 (1997)).

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 “In interpreting the statute at issue, we consider not only the bare meaning of the 2 critical word or phrase but also its placement and purpose in the statutory 3 scheme.” Id. (quoting Holloway v. United States, 526 U.S. 1, 6 (1999)).

4 The IIRIRA defines the term “conviction,” as used in the INA, as:

5 a formal judgment of guilt of the alien entered by a court or, if 6 adjudication of guilt has been withheld, where . . .

7 (i) a judge or jury has found the alien guilty or the alien has 8 entered a plea of guilty or nolo contendere or has admitted 9 sufficient facts to warrant a finding of guilt, and 10 (ii) the judge has ordered some form of punishment, penalty, or 11 restraint on the alien’s liberty to be imposed.

12 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(48)(A).

13 On its face, the provision says nothing about whether a conviction must be 14 “final” in order to predicate removal. Congressional silence typically suggests 15 ambiguity under step one of the Chevron analysis. See Barnhart v. Walton, 535 U.S.
16 212, 218 (2002) (“[S]ilence . . . normally creates ambiguity.”).

17 Brathwaite, nevertheless, argues that traditional tools of statutory 18 construction compel the conclusion that the IIRIRA’s definition of conviction 19 contains a finality requirement. His argument relies on statutory context as well as 20 legislative history.

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 He first observes that the IIRIRA’s definition of “conviction” was drafted
2 against the backdrop of a longstanding finality requirement. Prior to the IIRIRA, 3 the INA did not provide a statutory definition of “conviction.” See Griffiths v. INS, 4 243 F.3d 45, 49 (1st Cir. 2001). But in 1955, the Supreme Court implicitly recognized 5 that a “conviction” for immigration purposes requires finality. See Pino, 349 U.S.
6 at 901 (holding record evidence was insufficient to show that “conviction has 7 attained such finality as to support an order of deportation within the 8 contemplation of [former Section] 241 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 9 U.S.C.A. § 1251 [(1952)]”). Thereafter, the rule universally accepted by the federal 10 courts was that a conviction had to be “final” before it could trigger removal. See, 11 e.g., Marino v. INS, 537 F.2d 686, 691–92 (2d Cir. 1976). Moreover, “finality d[id] 12 not occur unless and until direct appellate review of the conviction (as contrasted 13 with collateral attack) ha[d] been exhausted or waived.” Id.; see White v. INS, 17 14 F.3d 475, 479 (1st Cir. 1994); Martinez-Montoya v. INS, 904 F.2d 1018, 1025 (5th Cir.
15 1990); Morales-Alvarado v. INS, 655 F.2d 172, 174–75 (9th Cir. 1981); Aguilera- 16 Enriquez v. INS, 516 F.2d 565, 570 (6th Cir. 1975); Will v. INS, 447 F.2d 529, 532–33 17 (7th Cir. 1971).

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 After Pino v. Landon, the BIA, like the courts, consistently interpreted 2 “conviction” in the removal context to require finality. See Matter of Thomas, 21 I.
3 & N. Dec. 20, 21 n.1 (BIA 1995); Matter of Polanco, 20 I. & N. Dec. 894, 895–96 (BIA 4 1994); Matter of Ozkok, 19 I. & N. Dec. 546, 552 n.7 (BIA 1988).

5 In Ozkok, a pre-IIRIRA case, the BIA noted that a person was convicted if 6 “the court has adjudicated him guilty or has entered a formal judgment of guilt.”
7 19 I. & N. Dec. at 551. The BIA then wrestled with how to identify a “conviction” 8 in cases of “deferred adjudication,” in which defendants pleaded guilty or no 9 contest to criminal charges in exchange for meeting certain requirements laid out 10 by the court, the completion of which would allow defendants to avoid formal 11 conviction. The BIA stated that in these deferred adjudication cases, a “conviction” 12 was evident when all of the following elements were present:

13 (1) a judge or jury has found the alien guilty or he has entered a plea 14 of guilty or nolo contendere or has admitted sufficient facts to warrant 15 a finding of guilty;

16 (2) the judge has ordered some form of punishment, penalty, or 17 restraint on the person’s liberty to be imposed (including but not 18 limited to incarceration, probation, a fine or restitution, or 19 community-based sanctions such as a rehabilitation program, a work-20 release or study-release program, revocation or suspension of a 21 driver’s license, deprivation of nonessential activities or privileges, or 22 community service); and 20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

(3) a judgment or adjudication of guilt may be entered if the person violates the terms of his probation or fails to comply with the requirements of the court's order, without availability of further proceedings regarding the person's guilt or innocence of the original charge.

Id. at 551–52 (footnote omitted).

Significantly, in a footnote to the third element, the BIA made clear that Ozkok did not disturb the longstanding finality requirement. It is “well established,” the BIA explained, “that a conviction does not attain a sufficient degree of finality for immigration purposes until direct appellate review of the conviction has been exhausted or waived.” Id. at 552 n.7 (citing Marino, 537 F.2d at 686).

When in 1996 Congress enacted the current definition of “conviction” as part of the IIRIRA, it derived this definition almost verbatim from Ozkok, but it omitted the third prong and with it the footnote referencing finality. Compare id. at 551–52 with 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(48)(A). The IIRIRA House Conference Report explains that legislators removed the third prong concerning deferred adjudications in a deliberate attempt to “broaden[] the scope of the definition of ‘conviction’” because Ozkok did “not go far enough to address situations where a judgment of guilt or imposition of sentence is suspended, conditioned upon the

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 alien’s future good behavior.” H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 104-828, at 224 (1996). The 2 amended definition thus “clarifie[d] Congressional intent that even in cases where 3 adjudication is ‘deferred,’ the original finding or confession of guilt is sufficient to 4 establish a ‘conviction’ for purposes of the immigration laws.” Id.; see also H.R.
 5 Rep. No. 104-879, at 123 (1997) (Letter of Transmittal) (stating that IIRIRA “make[s] 6 it easier to remove criminal aliens, regardless of specific procedures in States for 7 deferred adjudication or suspension of sentences”).

8 Brathwaite argues that by adopting nearly verbatim the Ozkok definition of 9 “conviction,” Congress imported Ozkok’s finality requirement. He asserts that the 10 only change made went to deferred adjudications. And he points out that “when 11 judicial interpretations have settled the meaning of an existing statutory provision, 12 repetition of the same language in a new statute indicates, as a general matter, the 13 intent to incorporate its . . . judicial interpretations as well.” Merrill Lynch, Pierce, 14 Fenner & Smith Inc. v. Dabit, 547 U.S. 71, 85–86 (2006) (internal quotation marks 15 omitted) (quoting Bragdon v. Abbott, 524 U.S. 624, 645 (1998)).

16 Brathwaite further insists that Congress would be expected to speak clearly 17 and directly if it intended to modify a long-established judicial interpretation of 18 an important legal question. Cf. Food & Drug Admin. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 Corp., 529 U.S. 120, 159 (2000) (“Congress is more likely to have focused upon, and 2 answered, major questions, while leaving interstitial matters to answer themselves 3 in the course of the statute’s daily administration.” (internal quotation marks 4 omitted)); see also Saxbe v. Bustos, 419 U.S. 65, 74–75 (1974) (“[L]ongstanding 5 administrative construction [of an INA provision was] entitled to great weight” 6 and was not “repealed sub silentio” by Congress).

7 The Government contends, however, that the IIRIRA’s definition of 8 “conviction,” which includes no discussion of finality, is neither plain nor subject 9 to an ordinary meaning analysis. It argues that the term is therefore ambiguous.
10 And, in support of its arguments, it points to disparate interpretations of that term 11 employed by our sister circuits.

12 The various courts of appeals, including our own, have indeed differed on 13 the meaning of “conviction” in the IIRIRA. We conclude that the relevant IIRIRA 14 provision, which defines “conviction” as “a formal judgment of guilt of the alien 15 entered by a court,” 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(48)(A), is sufficiently ambiguous to warrant 16 Chevron analysis. On the one hand, the word “entered” might be understood to 17 indicate that a “conviction” occurs when the trial court enters its judgment of 18 conviction in the record, i.e., before the defendant files any notice of appeal. See,

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 e.g., Planes v. Holder, 652 F.3d 991, 995 (9th Cir. 2011) (reasoning that, “as a matter 2 of logic, a defendant cannot appeal a conviction until after the entry of a judgment 3 of guilt” and, therefore, that “a ‘conviction’ . . . exists once the district court enters 4 judgment, notwithstanding the availability of an appeal as of right”). On the other 5 hand, such a conclusion seems, in the immigration context, absurd, if not at least 6 fundamentally unfair, because a direct appeal—at least one on the merits—could 7 result in reversal or vacatur of the judgment of conviction, thus eliminating the 8 basis for removal. See Gibbons v. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., 919 F.3d 699, 705 (2d Cir.
9 2019) (observing that courts seek to avoid constructions yielding absurd or 10 fundamentally unfair results). Thus, the text alone does not permit us to conclude 11 confidently that Congress intended a district court’s entry of judgment to identify 12 a “conviction” for purposes of immigration law when the validity of that judgment 13 of conviction could be challenged on direct appeal.

14 Indeed, that uncertainty is reinforced by the recognition that Congress 15 derived § 1101(a)(48)(A)’s definition of “conviction” almost verbatim from Ozkok, 16 a decision that clearly preserves the longstanding exhaustion/waiver of direct 17 appeal requirement for the identification of a conviction. See 19 I. & N. Dec. at 552 18 n.7 (“It is well established that a conviction does not attain a sufficient degree of

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 finality for immigration purposes until direct appellate review of the conviction
2 has been exhausted or waived.”). In such circumstances, canons of construction 3 counsel that the statute incorporates existing case law. “When the words of” an 4 adjudicative body “are used in a later statute governing the same subject matter, 5 it is respectful of Congress and of” that body’s “own processes to give the words 6 the same meaning in the absence of specific direction to the contrary.” Williams v.
7 Taylor, 529 U.S. 420, 434 (2000); see also, e.g., New York v. U.S. Dep’t of Homeland Sec., 8 969 F.3d 42, 71 (2d Cir. 2020) (applying a similar ratification canon).

9 Further, legislative history reveals that, to the extent Congress departed 10 from Ozkok’s definition of conviction, it did so only to close a specific loophole: 11 preventing convicted noncitizens from avoiding removal indefinitely if they had 12 been subject to a deferred adjudication proceeding in certain states whose deferred 13 adjudication procedures required “an additional proceeding regarding the alien’s 14 guilt or innocence” in the event of a violation. H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-828, at 224 15 (1996) (emphasis added) (observing that “[i]n such cases, the third prong of the 16 Ozkok definition prevents the original finding or confession of guilt to be 17 considered a ‘conviction’ for deportation purposes” and expressing 18 “Congressional intent that even in cases where adjudication is ‘deferred,’ the 20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 original finding or confession of guilt is sufficient to establish a ‘conviction’ for 2 purposes of the immigration laws”). Further, the legislation that became 3 § 1101(a)(48)(A), both as initially proposed and as passed by both chambers, kept 4 Ozkok’s definition virtually intact; only in conference did Congress amend the 5 definition by removing Ozkok’s third prong. Compare H.R. 2202, 104th Cong. § 351 6 (as introduced Aug. 4, 1995); H.R. 2202, 104th Cong. § 351 (as engrossed in House 7 Mar. 21, 1996) with H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-828, at 84 (1996). Looking to the text, 8 structure, and purpose of the statute, therefore, we would find—as the BIA has 9 and as the Government urges—ambiguity as to whether Congress intended the 10 term “conviction” in § 1101(a)(48)(A) to incorporate an exhaustion/waiver 11 requirement.

12 We recognize that, since 1996, several of our sister circuits to consider the 13 question have held that the IIRIRA unambiguously eliminated the 14 exhaustion/waiver requirement for all forms of convictions. In so finding, these 15 courts have relied primarily on the fact that Congress (1) enacted a definition of 16 “conviction” that did not expressly reference exhaustion, waiver, or finality; and 17 (2) eliminated the third prong of Ozkok’s deferred adjudication test. See, e.g., 18 Siddiqui v. Holder, 670 F.3d 736, 751 (7th Cir. 2012); Planes, 652 F.3d at 996; Waugh

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 v. Holder, 642 F.3d 1279, 1284 (10th Cir. 2011). For reasons already stated, we do 2 not find these observations conclusive on the question of Congress’s intent. In 3 addition, some of these cases apparently relied on dicta from earlier cases 4 involving deferred adjudications, where the exhaustion/waiver requirement was 5 merely an alternative argument and was admittedly not dispositive of the petition 6 for review. See, e.g., Moosa v. INS, 171 F.3d 994, 1009 n.8 (5th Cir. 1999).

7 At the same time, we cannot join those of our sister circuits that have 8 concluded that the IIRIRA unambiguously retains the exhaustion/waiver 9 requirement. See, e.g., Orabi v. Att’y Gen. of the U.S., 738 F.3d 535, 540 (3d Cir. 2014)
 10 (emphasizing that Ozkok was designed to address, specifically, discrepancies 11 following “the subject alien[’s] . . . violat[ion of] a term or condition of probation” 12 in a deferred adjudication procedure); Griffiths v. INS, 243 F.3d 45, 54 (1st Cir. 2001) 13 (concluding “statutory language and . . . legislative history reflect a determination 14 that a distinct mode of treatment for deferred adjudications is appropriate”).

15 Our own Circuit has noted in a related context that the “IIRIRA . . .
 16 eliminate[d] the requirement that all direct appeals be exhausted or waived before 17 a conviction is considered final under the statute.” Puello v. Bureau of Citizenship &
 18 Immigr. Servs., 511 F.3d 324, 332 (2d Cir. 2007). That case concerned whether a 20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 petitioner could use the earlier date of his plea as the date of his “conviction,” 2 thereby avoiding application of the IIRIRA to his petition. See id. at 331 (concluding 3 that “‘conviction’ refers to the date on which judgment is entered on the docket, 4 not the date on which a court accepts a guilty plea”). The Puello court thus had no 5 occasion to resolve whether Congress had unambiguously abrogated the 6 exhaustion/waiver requirement. Accordingly, this court’s statement in Puello has 7 generally been treated as nonbinding dicta. See, e.g., Matter of J.M. Acosta, 27 I. & 8 N. Dec. at 429 (observing Puello “presented [one] conflicting view[] in dicta”); see 9 also Mohamed v. Sessions, 727 F. App’x 32, 34 (2d Cir. 2018) (summary order) (same); 10 Orabi, 738 F.3d at 542 (same); Planes, 686 F.3d at 1039 n. 4 (9th Cir. 2012) (Reinhardt, 11 J., dissenting from denial of reh’g en banc) (same). Indeed, other precedential cases 12 in this Circuit have continued to assume that the INA retained the finality 13 requirement. See, e.g., Adams v. Holder, 692 F.3d 91, 94 (2d Cir. 2012) (“Upon 14 realizing that the drug conviction was not final for purposes of the INA in light of 15 a pending appeal, DHS amended the Notice to Appear” (citations omitted)); 16 Walcott v. Chertoff, 517 F.3d 149, 154 (2d Cir. 2008) (“Petitioner’s March 1996 17 conviction was not deemed final for immigration purposes until July 1, 1998, when 18 direct appellate review of it was exhausted.”). And, in Abreu v. Holder, 378 F. App’x

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

59 (2d Cir. 2010) (unpublished summary order), we remanded the issue of the finality requirement to the BIA as a question of first impression. This array of interpretations suggests that at least the language of the statute—by its silence—is ambiguous. And so, despite the legislative history, which does suggest that Congress departed from Ozkok's definition of conviction only in order to close a specific loophole that permitted noncitizens to avoid removal in the context of deferred adjudications, we find some ambiguity as to just how much Congress intended the term “conviction” to incorporate the longstanding finality requirement.

C. Whether the BIA's interpretation of “conviction” is reasonable

Having determined the IIRIRA's definition of “conviction” is ambiguous, we turn to the second inquiry—whether the BIA's interpretation is reasonable. We must defer to an agency's “permissible construction of the statute.” Chevron, 467 U.S. at 843; see also Oppedisano, 769 F.3d at 150 (“Even where we would reach an alternate interpretation de novo, we are without authority to impose it if the agency's ruling is permissible.” (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Xia Fan Huang v. Holder, 591 F.3d 124, 129 (2d Cir. 2010))). But no deference, under Chevron or otherwise, is due to agency interpretations that are “arbitrary,

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 capricious, or manifestly contrary to the statute.” Adams, 692 F.3d at 95 (quoting
2 Chevron, 467 U.S. at 844). Our analysis focuses on J.M. Acosta, the precedential 3 decision on which the IJ and the BIA relied in the case before us.

4 In J.M. Acosta, the BIA reviewed the text of Section 1101(a)(48)(A), the 5 legislative history, and traditional rules of statutory construction and concluded 6 that, “in incorporating the language of the Board’s precedent in Ozkok to define 7 the term ‘conviction,’ Congress did not intend to abandon the prior interpretation 8 regarding the finality requirement.” 27 I. & N. Dec. at 431. We believe that, in this 9 respect, the BIA’s reading of Section 1101(a)(48)(A) is eminently reasonable. As 10 explained, Congress derived the IIRIRA’s definition of “conviction” almost 11 verbatim from Ozkok. See 19 I. & N. Dec. at 552 n.7. This is powerful evidence that 12 Congress intended to preserve the finality requirement. See Taylor, 529 U.S. at 434 13 (“When the words of [an adjudicative body] are used in a later statute governing 14 the same subject matter, it is respectful of Congress and of the [body’s] own 15 processes to give the words the same meaning in the absence of specific direction 16 to the contrary.”). And the legislative history, which focuses exclusively on the 17 deferred adjudication process in explaining its modification of the Ozkok 18 definition, supports that conclusion as well. See H.R. Conf. Rep. 104-828, at 224;

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 H.R. Rep. No. 104-879, at 123. Accordingly, we readily defer to the BIA's 2 interpretation that, as a general matter, a conviction may not trigger deportation 3 until it is final; that is, until appellate review is waived or exhausted.

4 D. Whether the limits imposed by the BIA in J.M. Acosta are reasonable

5 We reach a different conclusion, however, with respect to the BIA's 6 implementation of the finality requirement. As recounted earlier, after concluding 7 that the IIRIRA requires that a conviction be final before removal, the BIA crafted 8 a specific framework governing all instances where a criminal appeal is filed late.
9 See J.M. Acosta, 27 I. & N. Dec. at 432.

10 In these cases, once the initial time to appeal has passed, a presumption of 11 finality attaches. Id. To rebut that presumption, the noncitizen defendant must both 12 “come forward with evidence that an appeal has been filed within the prescribed 13 deadline, including any extensions or permissive filings granted by the appellate 14 court,” and “present evidence that the appeal relates to the issue of guilt or 15 innocence or concerns a substantive defect in the criminal proceedings.” Id. The 16 BIA justified this gloss on the IIRIRA by arguing that some appeals—those 17 “relat[ing] only to the [noncitizen’s] sentence or that seek to reduce the charges, to 18 ameliorate the conviction for rehabilitative purposes, or to alleviate immigration

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 hardships” —should not affect the finality of the conviction for removal purposes.

2 Id. at 433.

3 It may be permissible for the BIA to establish some limits on the finality 4 requirement. After all, appeals challenging the length of a sentence or seeking 5 other relief that would alter but not overturn a defendant’s conviction—even if 6 successful—might reasonably be understood in the immigration context not to 7 render a conviction non-final. In that context, the principal reason not to construe 8 “conviction” to mean the district court’s entry of a judgment of conviction but, 9 rather, to require finality, is the possibility that the judgment will be reversed or 10 vacated and, thus, no longer support removal. Accordingly, it may be reasonable 11 to conclude that in the immigration context a conviction is not final upon entry of 12 judgment only if an appeal could yield that relief. See, e.g., Matter of Marquez Conde, 13 27 I. & N. Dec. 251, 255 (BIA 2018) (interpreting the IIRIRA’s “definition of a 14 ‘conviction’ to include convictions that have been vacated as a form of post-

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland conviction relief” but not those “that have been vacated based on procedural and substantive defects in the underlying criminal proceeding”).³

We need not here decide whether some limits on the finality requirement may appropriately be read into the IIRIRA, because we conclude that the specific burden-shifting regime and evidentiary standard demanded by the BIA to show a merits-based appeal is not reasonable. Specifically, the BIA requires a non-citizen to make a merits-based showing at the notice stage, often before he is able to review the record or identify his arguments on appeal. The BIA points to nothing in the statutory text or legislative history indicating that this requirement reflects Congressional intent. Moreover, the requirement ignores the realities of appellate practice.

In New York, for example, a defendant may file a written notice of appeal with the clerk of the criminal court within 30 days of the judgment from which an appeal is sought. See NYCPL § 450.10. Or, should that initial time period expire, a

³ At oral argument, Brathwaite’s counsel conceded that it would not be unreasonable for the BIA to require a petitioner to show that an appeal was merits-based to defer identifying a “conviction,” so long as the noncitizen is afforded the opportunity to secure counsel, review the trial record, and identify his appellate arguments before making that showing.

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 defendant may seek the permission of an intermediate appellate court to file a late 2 notice of appeal. See NYCPL § 460.30(1). A motion for a late notice of appeal may 3 be filed within one year and thirty days of the criminal judgment. See id.

4 Such late filings are a matter of course in New York. Perhaps for this reason, 5 New York courts treat appeals taken by written notice of appeal and those taken 6 by a granted § 460.30 motion as identical. See People v. Corso, 40 N.Y.2d 578, 580– 7 81 (N.Y. 1976); see also Abreu, 378 F. App'x at 61 (“[A]n appeal . . . pursuant to . . .
8 § 460.30 is equivalent to any other direct appeal . . .”).

9 Once the deadline for appeal as of right has passed, however, the BIA 10 requires a respondent to offer evidence both that a timely (or timely reinstated) 11 appeal is pending and that the appeal “relates to the issue of guilt or innocence or 12 concerns a substantive defect.” Matter of J.M. Acosta, 27 I. & N. Dec. at 432.

13 Meeting this requirement at the notice of appeal stage creates significant 14 practical problems. Most notably, the criminal appeals process in New York 15 proceeds at a different pace than federal removal proceedings. It can take 16 considerable time for appellate counsel to be appointed for an indigent defendant.
17 And even when appellate counsel is appointed, counsel’s ability to identify 18 substantive defects turns on another frequently delayed process: the production

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 of the criminal court record, which can “take anywhere from two months to two 2 years.” See N.Y.C. Bar Comm. on Crim. Just. Operations, Comm. on Crim. Advoc., 3 and Comm. on Crim. Cts., Delays Associated with Compiling the Record on Appeal in 4 Criminal Cases: Letter 1 (2020), <https://perma.cc/6XDD-7D5S> (detailing the various 5 obstacles to the timely receipt of the criminal court record by appellate counsel).
6 And this says nothing of the time required for counsel to review and analyze the 7 trial record once it is obtained.

8 As a result, meeting the BIA’s requirement to show at the notice of appeal 9 stage that a pending appeal relates to the issue of guilt or concerns a substantive 10 defect is frequently impossible. See Garza v. Idaho, 139 S. Ct. 738, 745 (2019) 11 (observing that, at notice of appeal stage, defendant may lack “important 12 documents from the trial court,” and claims are “likely to be ill-defined or 13 unknown”). And this means that noncitizen criminal defendants pursuing late-14 filed appeals risk deportation even while pursuing state-approved challenges to 15 criminal convictions.

16 The problem is compounded further by the BIA’s apparent evidentiary 17 requirements for showing that a late-filed criminal appeal goes to the merits of the 18 conviction. In at least one recent, non-precedential decision, the BIA held that a 20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 letter from appellate counsel describing the anticipated merits-based grounds for 2 appeal did not satisfy the J.M. Acosta standard. See In re Mohamed Jumale, File No.
3 AXXX-XX4-237, 2019 WL 7859276, at *2-3 (BIA Dec. 9, 2019); see also In Re: Rubben
4 Gregorio Mejia Peralta, File. No. AXXX-XX5-437, 2019 WL 7168746, at *2 (BIA Sept.
5 27, 2019) (noting DHS’s argument that “an Immigration Judge cannot definitively 6 discern the basis of a criminal appeal until the perfected appellate filing is 7 reviewed”). It appears, then, that the BIA expects noncitizen defendants who have 8 late-filed appeals challenging convictions supporting their removal to submit their 9 appellate brief filed in state court to show that their challenge is merits-based and, 10 thus, to rebut the presumption that their convictions are final. Doing so is 11 manifestly impossible for most criminal defendants in New York (and, likely, 12 many other states). Thus, even under the BIA’s own interpretation of the statute, 13 requiring some showing that a late-filed appeal is merits-based, the agency’s 14 demand for that showing to be made at the notice stage and, presumably, with a 15 copy of the filed appellate brief, is unreasonable.

16 Brathwaite’s own case illustrates the problems with the BIA’s finality 17 requirements. Brathwaite was convicted on January 31, 2018, and timely moved 18 for permission to file a late appeal on February 15, 2019. The Appellate Division,

20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 First Department, granted his § 460.30 motion on May 23, 2019. But the New York 2 court did not grant Brathwaite poor person relief, assign appellate counsel, and 3 order production of the criminal record until April 2, 2020, nearly a year after his 4 motion to late-file the appeal and over two years after his conviction. People v.
 5 Brathwaite, 2020 N.Y. Slip Op. 65271 (1st Dep’t Apr. 2, 2020) (unpublished order).
 6 By that time, the IJ had already ordered Brathwaite removed, the BIA had affirmed 7 the IJ’s removal order, and the appeal process before this court was well under 8 way. The IJ, in other words, had required Brathwaite to submit evidence—9 presumably in the form of a perfected appellate brief—before he had been 10 appointed appellate counsel or even received the record in his case.

11 * * * *

12 Given that the BIA itself concluded that Congress intended to preserve the 13 finality requirement for criminal convictions, J.M. Acosta, 27 I. & N. Dec. at 431, we 14 think “it is quite impossible that Congress could have intended” this result, Catskill
 15 Mountains Chapter of Trout Unlimited, Inc. v. EPA, 846 F.3d 492, 517 (2d Cir. 2017)
 16 (quoting Pub. Citizen v. U.S. Dep’t of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 470-71 (1989) (Kennedy, 17 J., concurring in the judgment)). We therefore conclude that the BIA’s 18 interpretation of the IIRIRA to require a noncitizen pursuing a late-filed appeal to 20-27

Brathwaite v. Garland

1 show the BIA that the appeal is merits-based at the time the appeal is noticed and 2 by the production of a filed appellate brief is arbitrary and unreasonable.

3 CONCLUSION

4 The BIA's burden-shifting scheme and its accompanying evidentiary 5 requirement amounts to an unreasonable and arbitrary interpretation of the 6 IIRIRA. We therefore GRANT Brathwaite's petition and REMAND the matter to 7 the BIA for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.
