On Appeal from the United States District Court

Savoca v. United States

CALABRESI, Circuit Judge:

Lawrence Savoca, an inmate incarcerated for a 2004 conviction for conspiratorial and attempted Hobbs Act robbery, see 18 U.S.C. § 1951(a); discharging a firearm during a crime of violence, see id. § 924(c); and being a felon in possession of a firearm, see id. § 922(g)(1), contends that his fifteen-year sentence for the last crime was based on a provision of the Armed Career Criminal Act, see 18 U.S.C. § 924(e), that the Supreme Court later found unconstitutional. See Johnson v. United States, 576 U.S. 591 (2015). He therefore claims he should be able to challenge his punishment through a “successive motion” for habeas corpus. See 28 U.S.C. § 2255(h). The district court disagreed. After a careful review of Mr. Savoca’s case, it concluded that the sentencing court had grounded the challenged punishment on a different statutory provision, which remains constitutionally sound. Mr. Savoca therefore can, at most, challenge statutory errors. This, the district court found, barred Mr. Savoca’s successive habeas petition.

We cannot say the district court’s determination as to the grounds that the original sentencing court relied on — essentially, a determination of historical fact — was reversible error. As for Mr. Savoca’s other claim for relief, which questions whether attempted Hobbs Act robbery is a crime of violence under 18 U.S.C. §

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

924(c), it is both barred procedurally and fails on the merits in light of our recent decision in United States v. McCoy, 995 F.3d 32, 57 (2d Cir. 2021). We, therefore, affirm the district court’s dismissal of Mr. Savoca’s petition.

BACKGROUND

In 2004, Lawrence Savoca was convicted after trial for various crimes based on his role in the June 2001 armed robbery of a tavern owner. At issue on appeal are Mr. Savoca’s habeas challenges to the sentences imposed for two counts of conviction, specifically, the fifteen-year term imposed under the Armed Career Criminal Act (ACCA) for being a felon in possession of a firearm, 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), and the consecutive ten-year term for discharging a firearm while committing a “crime of violence” (namely, attempted Hobbs Act robbery), id. § 924(c)(1)(A)(iii).¹

In February of 2005, the trial court (Stephen C. Robinson, Judge) sentenced Mr. Savoca. While Mr. Savoca’s counsel made several objections to the Presentence Investigation Report (PSR), none are relevant to this appeal. The PSR listed Mr.

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 Savoca's prior convictions. Among these were three New York State burglary
2 convictions from 1991. In each case, according to descriptions drawn from police 3 reports and from state PSRs, Mr. Savoca entered a residence and stole jewelry or 4 cash. For each of these three convictions, he received concurrent sentences of eight 5 years to life.²

6 After considering the PSR, the government's sentencing briefs and oral 7 argument, and other materials, the trial court imposed a total thirty-year sentence.
8 This term included ten years for discharging a weapon during a crime of violence 9 (specifically, attempted Hobbs Act robbery). It also included fifteen years for being 10 a felon in possession of a firearm, a period set by the court's determination that 11 Mr. Savoca fell within the so-called "career criminal" provision of the ACCA. See 12 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(1).

13 On direct appeal, this Court affirmed both Mr. Savoca's conviction and 14 sentence. United States v. Savoca, 151 F. App'x 28 (2d Cir. 2005). He then filed his 15 first motion for habeas corpus relief pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2255 ("Section 2255"),
16 which the district court dismissed. Savoca v. United States, Nos. 07-CV-2524 &

² Mr. Savoca served these sentences from August 1991 to June 2001, at which time he was released on parole.

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 10-CV-5750, 2013 WL 10054624 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 8, 2013). Neither that initial appeal
2 nor Mr. Savoca’s first habeas petition raised the issues presented here.

3 In 2015, the Supreme Court held that part of the ACCA’s career-criminal 4 provision — its “residual clause” for defining “violent felonies” — was 5 unconstitutionally vague. Johnson, 576 U.S. at 606.³ At that point, Mr. Savoca filed 6 a second habeas petition pursuant to Section 2255, claiming his sentence had been 7 partly based on the “residual clause” that Johnson eliminated, and so must be 8 vacated and corrected. He also challenged his sentence for discharging a firearm 9 in a “crime of violence,” arguing the predicate crime of attempted Hobbs Act 10 robbery was not such an offense.

11 In July 2018, upon a timely request, we granted Mr. Savoca leave to file this 12 successive Section 2255 motion, finding he had made the statutorily required 13 “prima facie showing” that his claim implicated a law the Supreme Court had 14 found unconstitutional (the ACCA’s residual clause). Mot. Order at 1, Savoca v.
15 United States, No. 18-1328 (2d Cir. July 5, 2018), ECF No. 28 (quoting Blow v. United 16 States, 829 F.3d 170, 172 (2d Cir. 2016)). We then transferred Mr. Savoca’s petition

³ The Supreme Court later accorded this rule retroactive force for purposes of collateral review. Welch v. United States, 578 U.S. 120 (2016).

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 to the district court, id., to consider, on the merits, if that petition indeed relied on 2 a new rule of constitutional law (such that Mr. Savoca could present a successive 3 Section 2255 motion).

4 Ultimately, the district court dismissed Mr. Savoca's motion. Reviewing the 5 sentencing record, it found that the original sentencing court's career-criminal 6 determination had been based not on the ACCA's now-unconstitutional residual 7 clause, but on a different ACCA provision (one not at issue in Johnson). The district 8 court also rejected Mr. Savoca's contention that attempted Hobbs Act robbery was 9 not a "crime of violence," finding this argument both procedurally barred and 10 substantively incorrect. It did, however, grant Mr. Savoca a certificate of 11 appealability under 28 U.S.C. § 2253(c), by which he brings the instant appeal.

12 DISCUSSION

13 On appeal, Mr. Savoca argues that the district court erroneously rejected his 14 claim that attempted Hobbs Act robbery is not a "crime of violence" for purposes 15 of 18 U.S.C. § 924(c). He also argues that the district court reversibly erred when it 16 found his sentence had not been grounded in the residual clause that Johnson held 17 was unconstitutional (and, by extension, that the court erred in holding that he 18 could not overcome the gatekeeping requirement of a successive habeas petition).

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 We review each claim in turn.

2 I. Discharge of a Weapon During a “Crime of Violence”

3 Ten years of Mr. Savoca’s sentence were imposed for a violation of 18 U.S.C.
4 § 924(c) — discharging a firearm during a “crime of violence.” The predicate 5 “crime of violence” was attempted Hobbs Act robbery. Mr. Savoca contends that 6 attempted Hobbs Act robbery is not, for purposes of Section 924(c), such a crime, 7 making this part of his sentence improper. The district court rejected this 8 argument, finding that Mr. Savoca’s claim does not satisfy the procedural 9 gatekeeping requirements of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 10 1996 (AEDPA), and that even if it did, it would fail on the merits.

11 After briefing was completed in this appeal, our Court issued United States
12 v. McCoy, 995 F.3d at 32. There, we held that “Hobbs Act attempted robbery 13 qualifies as a crime of violence under § 924(c).” Id. at 57. Thus, not only does 14 AEDPA procedurally bar Mr. Savoca from raising this argument, but McCoy also 15 forecloses it on the merits. Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s decision to 16 deny habeas relief on this claim.

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

II. ACCA “Career Criminal” Status

Mr. Savoca also challenges the portion of his punishment stemming from the original sentencing court’s finding that he fell within the ACCA’s “career criminal” provision. He argues that the sentencing court relied on the ACCA’s residual clause, a provision the Supreme Court later held was unconstitutional, in making this determination. And this, he claims, permits him to challenge his sentence collaterally through a second or successive habeas corpus petition. The district court disagreed; it found that Mr. Savoca’s sentence was grounded in a different ACCA provision, one the Court had not found unconstitutional. It therefore dismissed his petition.

The district court’s conclusion was not reversible error. To show why, we first outline the statutory framework of (1) second or successive habeas petitions under AEDPA, and (2) the ACCA’s definitional provisions for career-criminal status. We then explain why, in assessing a district court’s determinations of which ACCA clause a particular sentencing court relied on when deeming a particular defendant a career criminal, we generally employ the deferential “clear error” standard of review. Finally, applying this standard, we conclude that the district court did not reversibly err in dismissing Mr. Savoca’s petition.

Savoca v. United States

1 A. Statutory Framework

2 1. AEDPA and Second or Successive Habeas Petitions

3 Under AEDPA, inmates who have already filed one habeas petition (as has 4 Mr. Savoca) face “stringent” limits in bringing a “second or successive application 5 for a writ of habeas corpus.” Adams v. United States, 155 F.3d 582, 583 (2d Cir. 1998).
 6 One path through these limits, and the one Mr. Savoca asserts, is to “show[] that 7 [one’s] claim relies on a new rule of constitutional law, made retroactive to cases on 8 collateral review by the Supreme Court, that was previously unavailable.” 28 9 U.S.C. § 2244(b)(2)(A) (emphasis added); accord id. § 2255(h)(2).

10 To make this showing, inmates must clear two hurdles. First, and usually 11 on a transfer from a district court, an inmate must obtain an order from a court of 12 appeals authorizing the district court to consider the application. See id.
 13 §§ 2244(b)(3), 2255(h). By statute, this review is limited; the court of appeals must 14 complete it within 30 days of the time the motion is filed, and in doing so asks only 15 if an applicant made a “prima facie showing that the application satisfies the 16 requirements” of Section 2244. Id. § 2244(b)(3)(C)–(D); see also Bell v. United States, 17 296 F.3d 127, 128 (2d Cir. 2002) (“A prima facie showing is not a particularly high 18 standard. An application need only show sufficient likelihood of satisfying the

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 strict standards of § 2255 to warrant a fuller exploration by the district court.”
 2 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted)).

3 If the court of appeals grants this preliminary authorization, the petition 4 returns to the district court, which must then independently consider if the motion 5 in fact relies on a “new rule of constitutional law,” 28 U.S.C. § 2244(b)(3), or can 6 otherwise satisfy AEDPA’s strictures, id. § 2244(b)(4). Unlike the earlier, prima 7 facie assessment by the court of appeals, the district court must engage in a 8 searching inquiry, pursuant to which it “shall dismiss any claim presented in a 9 second or successive application . . . unless the applicant shows that the claim 10 satisfies [AEDPA’s] requirements.” Id. (emphases added).

11 2. ACCA Career Criminal Definitional Provisions

12 The other main statute at issue is the ACCA and its definitional provisions 13 for so-called career criminals, a class of offenders subject to harsher sentences. Both 14 at the time of Mr. Savoca’s sentencing and today, career criminals include, among 15 others, those convicted of at least three “violent felon[ies].” 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(1).
 16 The ACCA sets out three discrete circumstances under which a conviction 17 constitutes a “violent felony.” These are known as (1) the “elements/force” clause; 18 (2) the “enumerated” clause; and (3) the “residual” clause. For purposes of ACCA

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 career-criminal status, a “violent felony” is defined as “any crime punishable by 2 imprisonment for a term exceeding one year” that:

3 (i) has as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of 4 physical force against the person of another [elements/force clause]; or

6 (ii) is burglary, arson, or extortion, involves use of explosives 7 [enumerated clause], or

9 otherwise involves conduct that presents a serious potential risk of 10 physical injury to another[.] [residual clause]
11

12 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(B)(i)–(ii).

13 Notably, at the time Mr. Savoca was initially sentenced, the then-applicable 14 federal Sentencing Guidelines paralleled this tripartite structure. Specifically, the 15 Guidelines defined a “career offender,” for sentencing purposes, as one who had 16 committed at least three “crime[s] of violence.” U.S.S.G. § 4B1.1(a) (U.S. Sentencing 17 Comm’n Nov. 2004).⁴ In turn, such a crime was defined as one that:

18 (1) has as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of 19 physical force against the person of another [elements/force clause], or

⁴ With exceptions not relevant here, courts sentencing defendants must consider the Guidelines in effect on the date of sentencing. 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)(4)(A)(ii); United States v. Jones, 878 F.3d 10, 15 n.3 (2d Cir. 2017). Thus, all references to the federal Sentencing Guidelines are to the November 1, 2004 version, in effect at the time of Mr. Savoca’s sentencing in February 2005.

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 (2) is burglary of a dwelling, arson, or extortion, involves use of 2 explosives [enumerated clause], or

4 otherwise involves conduct that presents a serious potential risk of 5 physical injury to another. [residual clause]

7 Id. § 4B1.2(a)(1)–(2).

8 In 2015, the Supreme Court held that the ACCA’s residual clause was 9 unconstitutionally vague in Johnson v. United States, 576 U.S. at 606. The Court then 10 made this rule retroactive on collateral review, such that second or successive 11 Johnson-based habeas challenges could satisfy AEDPA. See Welch, 578 U.S. at 135.
12 The ACCA’s other two violent felony clauses (elements/force and enumerated), 13 however, remain in effect. Johnson, 576 U.S. at 606.

14 Mr. Savoca now argues that the original sentencing court found his 15 “felonies” to have been “violent” based on the ACCA’s residual clause, the clause 16 Johnson subsequently held unconstitutional. He therefore asserts that AEDPA 17 permits him to bring a successive habeas petition to challenge his sentence.
18 Conversely, the government argues, and the district court agreed, that Mr. Savoca 19 was, in fact, originally sentenced under the ACCA’s enumerated clause, which was

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

not held unconstitutional by Johnson, and hence that AEDPA bars his successive petition.⁵

It is to this dispute that we turn.

B. Standard of Review

The parties disagree as to the standard under which we should review the district court's finding that Mr. Savoca had, in fact, been sentenced under the enumerated, as opposed to the residual, clause. Mr. Savoca suggests that we should review the district court's determinations de novo, including that court's assessment of sentence-record materials like the sentencing hearing transcript and the PSR.

The government counters that we should treat the district court's assessment of the sentencing court's reasoning as, essentially, a question of fact, reviewed under the deferential standard of "clear error." On this standard, we will only reverse a district court's findings if "on the entire evidence [we are] left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Ark. Tchr.

⁵ Neither party claims Mr. Savoca's sentence relied on the ACCA's elements/force clause.

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 Ret. Sys. v. Goldman Sachs Grp., Inc., 11 F.4th 138, 142 (2d Cir. 2021) (internal 2 quotation marks omitted).

3 We agree with the government. It is well-established that while we 4 “review[] de novo the legal conclusions underlying a district court’s denial of a 5 motion for relief under 28 U.S.C. § 2255,” we “defer . . . to a district court’s findings 6 of fact unless they are clearly erroneous.” Massey v. United States, 895 F.3d 248, 7 251 n.7 (2d Cir. 2018) (internal quotation marks omitted, ellipses in original); see 8 also Rivera v. United States, 716 F.3d 685, 687 (2d Cir. 2013) (same); Ponnapula v.
9 Spitzer, 297 F.3d 172, 179 (2d Cir. 2002) (similar). And the question of whether a 10 particular sentencing record reflects a particular court’s reliance on a particular 11 ACCA clause is, at base, a question of historical fact. Cf. Walker v. United States, 900 12 F.3d 1012, 1015 (8th Cir. 2018) (“Whether the residual clause provided the basis for 13 an ACCA enhancement is a factual question for the district court.”); United States 14 v. Driscoll, 892 F.3d 1127, 1132–33 (10th Cir. 2018) (when considering if sentencing 15 court relied on the ACCA’s residual clause, “factual determinations about the 16 sentencing record [are reviewed] for clear error and the legal conclusions about 17 the relevant background legal environment [are reviewed] de novo”).

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 The aptness of clear error review is reflected by the sorts of factors and 2 sources a district court needs to consider — factors the district court rightly 3 considered in this case — when determining which ACCA clause an original 4 sentencing court had, in fact, relied on. In conducting this inquiry, a district court 5 must look to a wide range of materials, including the parties’ oral and written 6 sentencing arguments, sentencing hearing transcripts, PSRs, and similar parts of 7 the sentencing record.

8 Of course, this precise list of materials need not be robotically reviewed by 9 the district court in every case (and, indeed, may not be present in all cases). But, 10 in any event, such review is manifestly a fact-specific undertaking and thus 11 constitutes an inquiry for which we are rightly deferential to the district court’s 12 findings.

13 Moreover, deferential, clear error review at this stage coheres with AEDPA’s 14 statutory structure. In AEDPA, Congress set up a division of labor for reviewing 15 successive habeas petitions. With respect to second or successive habeas petitions, 16 courts of appeals are tasked with making initial, prima facie assessments as to 17 whether a petition might overcome AEDPA’s stringencies. 28 U.S.C.
18 § 2244(b)(3)(C). But after this review, the law shifts responsibility to the district

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 courts, which are tasked with assessing, on the merits, each petition's substantive 2 compliance with AEDPA. Id. § 2244(b)(4). This review necessarily entails a detailed 3 focus on the factual circumstances underlying the sentencing court's decision.
4 Accordingly, if, as Mr. Savoca proposes, courts of appeals reviewed the district 5 courts' factual determinations informing their merits determinations de novo, 6 then courts of appeals would act as both prima facie gatekeepers and full merits 7 adjudicators, and would do so at highly separate times. It seems unlikely that 8 Congress intended that result.

9 Mr. Savoca's responses are unavailing. He argues that because the original 10 sentencing judge in his case was a different person than the habeas district court 11 judge, less deference is required. Some courts, admittedly, treat identity between 12 sentencing judge and habeas judge as a factor justifying deference. See, e.g., Dimott
13 v. United States, 881 F.3d 232, 237 (1st Cir. 2018) (according "due weight" to district 14 court's determination of ACCA clause because "habeas judge was describing his 15 own decisions at sentencing"). But Mr. Savoca offers no authority from this Court, 16 and we could find none, to suggest such identity is a prerequisite for the 17 deferential clear error standard. To the contrary, our Court has endorsed clear 18 error review of district court fact-finding on a habeas petition even where the

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 underlying sentence was imposed not just by a different court, but by a wholly 2 different court system. Cf. Jenkins v. Greene, 630 F.3d 298, 302 (2d Cir. 2010) (in 3 habeas context, court of appeals reviews district court’s “factual finding[s]” as to 4 circumstances of original state court sentencing “for clear error”).

5 Mr. Savoca’s reference to Kaminski v. United States is likewise unpersuasive.
6 339 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 2003). There, we stated, in a single sentence, that “[w]e review 7 de novo a district court’s denial of a 28 U.S.C. § 2255 petition.” Id. at 86. But 8 Kaminski turned on the pure legal question of whether restitution orders imposed 9 “custody” for habeas purposes. See id. at 85. As such, it presented no reason to 10 consider the standard for reviewing district court factual findings and is 11 inapposite. By contrast, when presented with such factual findings, as our more 12 recent habeas cases show, we consistently review district court conclusions for 13 clear error. See, e.g., Massey, 895 F.3d at 251 n.7; Rivera, 716 F.3d at 687.

14 Mr. Savoca further argues that de novo review is appropriate because the 15 instant dispute is predominantly legal, not factual. This is so, he claims, because 16 the outcome turns not on the specific words the sentencing record contains, as to 17 which there is no “factual dispute,” but on the “legal significance” of those words.
18 Appellant’s Br. 19–20. But the only Second Circuit case Mr. Savoca cites for this

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 proposition, United States v. Haak, involved a dramatically different situation: a 2 suppression motion where an arrestee's non-custodial interview had been fully 3 videotaped, and where there were "no disputes of fact as to the actions taken, 4 words spoken, or demeanor displayed" — in other words, where the only dispute 5 concerned the "legal significance of certain words spoken." 884 F.3d 400, 408 (2d 6 Cir. 2018). Here, by contrast, the parties essentially agree on the legal rules: if Mr.
7 Savoca were sentenced under the residual clause, he may collaterally challenge his 8 sentence; if he were sentenced under the enumerated clause, he may not. Instead, 9 the parties' disagreement, unlike that in Haak, is a factual one: whether, as a matter 10 of historical fact, the sentencing court relied on the ACCA's residual clause, or on 11 its enumerated clause.⁶

⁶ Mr. Savoca argues that the district court erred in failing to grant a hearing before deciding these facts. Hearings, to be sure, are often desirable in aid of such district court fact-finding. But our Court has never made them a requirement for clear error deference, and we decline to do so now. See, e.g., Scanio v. United States, 37 F.3d 858, 859–60 (2d Cir. 1994) (applying clear error standard, without imposing any district court hearing requirement, to review of a district court's Section 2255 factual determinations); but see United States v. Copeland, 921 F.3d 1233, 1242 (10th Cir. 2019) ("[O]ur review of a district court's denial of a § 2255 Johnson claim is de novo unless the court conducted an evidentiary hearing from which it made findings.").

20-1502-pr

*Savoca v. United StatesC. Application

Applying this deferential standard, we cannot say the district court clearly erred in finding that the original sentencing court’s ACCA career-criminal determination was grounded in the enumerated clause, as opposed to the (now-unconstitutional) residual clause.

1. The Sentencing Record

Under the ACCA’s enumerated clause, one type of “violent felony” is “burglary.” 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(B)(ii). The district court found that the original sentencing court had based Mr. Savoca’s ACCA punishment on this provision, stating that the “only fair reading of the record as a whole is that the government” — and the sentencing court — “w[ere] relying on the [ACCA’s] enumerated offenses clause, not the residual or force clauses.” App’x at 229. We cannot say this finding was clear error.⁷

⁷ As Mr. Savoca notes, there is currently a circuit split as to a petitioner’s burden of proof where the sentencing record is “unclear” as to which ACCA clause an original sentencing court relied on. Some circuits, like the Fourth and Ninth, have adopted a “may have relied” approach, under which, if the record shows a sentencing court “may have” relied on the residual clause, inmates can bring a successive habeas petition on Johnson grounds. See, e.g., United States v. Winston, 850 F.3d 677, 682 (4th Cir. 2017), abrogated on other grounds by Stokeling v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 544 (2019); United States

1 As the district court observed, the government, in its written and oral 2 original-sentencing arguments, consistently focused on the “burglary” nature of 3 Mr. Savoca’s crimes. At the sentencing hearing, for instance, prosecutors stated, in 4 discussing the application of the Guidelines, that “if you’ve been convicted of three 5 prior violent felonies — and a residential burglary is one — in the past and then 6 you’re convicted of [Section] 922(g), you are an armed career criminal.” App’x at 7 87 (emphasis added). Likewise, in its sentencing memorandum, the government 8 specifically emphasized that Mr. Savoca had committed, and been convicted of, 9 “three residential burglaries,” further underscoring this point. App’x at 130 10 (emphasis in original).

11 The government’s repeated mentions of “burglary” were, of course, 12 references to the ACCA’s enumerated clause. But they also strongly evoked the 13 parallel enumerated clause of the federal Sentencing Guidelines. Specifically, the

v. Geozos, 870 F.3d 890, 896 (9th Cir. 2017), overruled on other grounds by Stokeling, 139 S. Ct. at 544. Others adopt a more stringent standard, requiring petitioners to show that it is “more likely than not” that a sentencing court relied on the ACCA’s residual clause before granting relief. See, e.g., United States v. Clay, 921 F.3d 550, 558–59 (5th Cir. 2019), as revised (Apr. 25, 2019); Dimott, 881 F.3d at 243. But, because the district court did not find the record in the instant case to be unclear, and because that determination was not clearly erroneous, we have no reason to weigh in on this dispute.

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 Guidelines' enumerated clause for "career offender" status included, at the time
2 of Mr. Savoca's sentencing, "burglary of a dwelling." U.S.S.G. § 4B1.2(a)(2)
3 (emphasis added). That the government's sentencing arguments focused so 4 squarely on the residential nature of Mr. Savoca's burglary offenses therefore 5 indicates that it sought (and that the sentencing court subsequently applied) an 6 enhancement flowing from the enumerated clause of the relevant Guideline, a 7 provision mirroring the ACCA's own enumerated clause.

8 By contrast, in its review of the original sentencing record, the habeas 9 district court did not (nor could we) find any reference at all to the ACCA's 10 residual clause. Nor did the district court (nor could we) find any suggestion that 11 the sentencing court engaged in the sort of analysis that would have been expected 12 if the residual clause were being applied. This might, for example, have entailed 13 assessing the degree to which Mr. Savoca's conduct "present[ed] a serious 14 potential risk of physical injury." 18 U.S.C. § 924(e)(2)(B)(ii).

15 Against this, Mr. Savoca points us to a footnote in the government's 16 sentencing memorandum, which stated:

17 Because of its potential for violence, because it robs the victim of a sense 18 of security in the place where he or she should be most secure, and 19 because it violates the most personal space of a victim, the crime of

Savoca v. United States

1 residential burglary is categorized as a violent felony at both state and 2 federal law.

4 App'x at 130 n.6 (emphasis added).

5 This reference to “potential for violence,” Mr. Savoca suggests, invokes the 6 residual clause’s mention of “serious potential risk.” Appellant’s Br. 40–41. But as 7 the district court found, “construed in context, the footnote’s reference to 8 burglary’s ‘potential for violence’ is a reference to just one of several factors that 9 make burglary such a serious offense.” App’x at 229. Indeed, if anything, the 10 footnote supports the government’s position on Mr. Savoca’s habeas petition, for it 11 closely tracks language that the ACCA’s sponsors used to justify adding 12 “burglary” to the enumerated clause. See Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 581 13 (1990) (recounting Senate sponsor’s statement that “burglary” was added to 14 enumerated clause “because [burglary] involves invasion of victim’s homes or 15 workplaces, violation of their privacy, and loss of their most personal and valued 16 possessions” (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted)).

17 To be sure, as Mr. Savoca notes, neither the original sentencing court nor the 18 government at sentencing explicitly discussed the enumerated clause. But the 19 district court was aware of this fact, took it into consideration, and found it did not

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 outweigh the other factors that it considered. In such a fact-specific balancing 2 situation, we again discern no clear error.

3 2. Background Legal Conditions

4 Apart from the sentencing record, Mr. Savoca argues that background legal 5 conditions at the time of sentencing in February 2005 would have made it legal 6 error to apply the enumerated clause to his case, while making it relatively simple 7 to apply the residual clause. This, he says, means the original sentencing court 8 most likely relied on the latter.

9 Background legal conditions are, in addition to the sentencing record 10 discussed above, a factor that district courts may appropriately consider when 11 determining the ACCA grounds on which an original sentencing court relied. See, 12 e.g., Geozos, 870 F.3d at 896. But the role of such conditions is limited, for, as we 13 have outlined, the district court's principal inquiry is discerning on which ACCA 14 clause, as a matter of historical fact, a particular sentencing court relied. To 15 illustrate, if review of a sentencing record clearly showed that a sentencing court 16 sought to impose punishment under the enumerated clause (e.g., by a statement 17 to that effect), then the fact that application of that clause would have been legally 18 erroneous (say, by misreading the statutory definition of "burglary" or "arson")

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 would not, without more, allow for Section 2255 review, as the underlying error
2 would have been of statutory, not constitutional, dimension. See, e.g., Massey, 895
3 F.3d at 252 (Section 2255 review unavailable for successive habeas petition 4 claiming sentencing court committed statutory error in application of ACCA's 5 elements/force clause).

6 Where, however, the sentencing record is unclear as to the clause on which 7 an original sentencing court had, in fact, relied, habeas district courts should 8 consider the likelihood that applying a given clause would have been legal error 9 at the time of sentencing, and should not assume sentencing courts would have 10 chosen a legally erroneous clause over a legally permissible one. Cf. United States 11 v. Snyder, 871 F.3d 1122, 1128–30 (10th Cir. 2017). This conclusion follows from the 12 familiar principle that, absent countervailing evidence, reviewing courts should 13 assume that sentencing courts “knew and applied the law correctly.” United States
14 v. Broxmeyer, 699 F.3d 265, 287 (2d Cir. 2012) (citation omitted).

15 But that is not this case. Here, the district court found, based on the 16 sentencing record, that the original sentencing court, as a matter of historical fact, 17 clearly relied on the enumerated clause in determining Mr. Savoca's ACCA career

20-1502-pr

Savoca v. United States

1 criminal status, obviating the need to resort to background legal conditions to 2 resolve an ambiguity.⁸

⁸ Incidentally, even if we were to look to contemporaneous background legal conditions, Mr. Savoca has failed to show that, in his case, such conditions would have barred, or even hampered, the original sentencing court's use of the enumerated clause. Instead, as the district court found, nothing in the legal background in February 2005 precluded, or even greatly complicated, the classification of Mr. Savoca's 1991 felony burglaries as "violent felonies" under ACCA's enumerated clause. In particular, the three 1991 felony burglary convictions at issue in the instant case were obtained by guilty pleas. While the Supreme Court in Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. at 602, addressed the ACCA treatment of "nongeneric-burglary" convictions obtained at trial, it left open the issue of how such convictions should be analyzed following a guilty plea, as well as whether such convictions could fit within the enumerated clause. Thus, as of the date of Mr. Savoca's sentencing, February 2005, the original sentencing court would not have committed legal error by using the information in Mr. Savoca's PSR — itself composed of unobjected-to facts relayed from police reports and earlier, state PSRs — to determine that each such burglary had in fact been a "violent felony" for purposes of the ACCA's enumerated clause. Indeed, it was only after Mr. Savoca's sentencing that the contours of this issue came to be defined. See Shepard v. United States, 544 U.S. 13, 26 (2005) (March 2005 decision, issued one month after Mr. Savoca's sentencing, setting out limits on materials that courts could consider when assessing if convictions obtained by guilty pleas were violent felonies for ACCA purposes); United States v. Rosa, 507 F.3d 142, 151–52 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Shepard addressed a question [previously] left open by Taylor: What may a district court consider to determine whether the offense of conviction following a guilty plea, rather than trial, qualifies as [an ACCA] 'violent felony'?" (emphasis added)); id. at 156 (recognizing then-open question as to whether, if a defendant failed to object to a PSR's findings (as happened here), "a sentencing court may look to [that] PSR . . . to determine [if] the underlying facts of a previous conviction" constituted an ACCA "violent felony").

Savoca v. United States

1 CONCLUSION

2 We cannot say, given the circumstances of this case, that the district court 3 clearly erred in determining that the original sentencing court had based Mr.
4 Savoca's punishment on the ACCA's enumerated clause, rather than the residual 5 clause that Johnson held was unconstitutional. Therefore, AEDPA bars Mr. Savoca 6 from filing a second, successive habeas petition. 28 U.S.C. §§ 2244(b)(2), 2255(h).
7 Accordingly, the district court's dismissal of Mr. Savoca's petition under 28 U.S.C.
8 § 2255 is AFFIRMED.
