

and a court more ready to the purposes of the Fourth Amendment would insist on greater restraints on society before depriving the citizen of his liberty. Alexander Bickel recently wrote that "many actions of government have the effect of curtailing the individual's freedom of movement, and their purpose is to protect the public interest. The Court's insistence on a high standard of proof in such cases is a commendable one, though the government's burden is not too heavy. The Court's insistence on a high standard of proof in such cases is a commendable one, though the government's burden is not too heavy."

REPORTER'S NOTE

The text here is supposed to be numbered 101. The number between 101 and 102 was intentionally omitted, in order to make it possible to publish the entire text without page numbers, thus making the official version available upon publication of the preliminary draft of the United States Reports.

It is of course true that the government has a right to search for and seize evidence which it deems to be necessary for the prosecution of a crime. It is also true that the government has a right to search for and seize evidence which it deems to be necessary for the prosecution of a crime. It is also true that the government has a right to search for and seize evidence which it deems to be necessary for the prosecution of a crime.