

third is math. Again these are the percent of children receiving grades of satisfactory or above. And the Even Start youngsters, in good programs, the 30 that were chosen for this study, are doing exceptionally well.

Mr. Speaker, the next chart deals with percent of children having test scores at the level of average or above. Again, reading, language is almost off the chart, and math is way up.

Now some statistics about the children and their successes in their classes and the parents that are engaged in the schooling of their children. The percentage of the Even Start children rated average or above in their class by their current grade school teacher: 65 percent on overall academic performance, 77 percent on motivation to learn, 82 percent on support from parents, 87 percent on relations with other children, 88 percent on attendance, 82 percent on classroom behavior, 71 percent on self-confidence, 74 percent on probable success in school.

After participating in high quality Even Start family literacy programs, we have some good statistics about the adults, the parents who are participating: 62 percent of those parents that received their GED or some other high school equivalency certificate; 50 percent obtained a job or a better job; 40 percent are enrolled in some form of higher education or training; 45 percent reduced the amount of public assistance they received because of their improved employment; 3 percent no longer receive any public assistance.

What else have we found out about the adults that have participated in the program? Keep in mind, I mentioned these were parents and adults who were very reluctant to participate in anything in the community or participate at all in any school programs. What they have found among their accomplishments frequently identified through the interviews are, membership on school advisory committees, leadership roles in PTA or other school parent organization. They obtained their citizenship, they volunteer in schools. They volunteer in community libraries. They are teaching church classes. They register to vote and are voting. They are using community resources more effectively. They have established neighborhood development organizations and work actively in neighborhood improvement projects. They are tutoring other adults in programs or others who are seeking citizenship. They are helping the Even Start programs with recruitment. And they are practicing family planning. Those are the positive events or the positive results that we are finding in the Even Start programs that work.

So many times, we are quick to judge particularly public education and quick to badmouth public education.

Mr. Speaker, I want everyone to understand that the teachers did not ask for a prohibition to deal with unruly students. As a principal, I would last 30 seconds today, because everyone knew in the school that I was the authority figure. It was not the teachers who broke down the discipline that we once had in all schools. It was the parents. It was not the teachers who reduced or dumbed down academic achievement. Again, it was the parents.

Now my colleagues say: You have a lot of courage to make those kinds of statements. I also have a lot of experience. I saw my most talented teachers become very disillusioned. Why? Because parent after parent of a capable child would come to me, come to the teacher and say: Do you not realize my child is in football, basketball, a drum majorette, chorus, band and everything under the sun; and, therefore, they do not have time to do what you expect as a teacher.

A very demanding teacher, a teacher who believes that we must secure excellence from our students becomes very disillusioned when that happens.

It was not the teacher that brought that about. It was not the teacher or the administrator who brought about the decline in discipline in the schools. We should all recognize that, and we should all see whether there is not some way that we can join together and bring about a return to demanding quality, to demanding excellence and demanding behavior that is fitting for a public setting such as a school.

Even Start is a program, as I indicated, that apparently is working. The research is showing that to be true, if the program is run properly, if they demand excellence, and if they expect participation of parents and students.

I take my hat off during this week, which I am not allowed to wear on the floor of the House, incidentally, to those who are out there in the field doing their very best under very trying conditions to make sure that our children are ready for the 21st century so we can be a very competitive Nation; because what was will not be good enough in the 21st century. Those teachers and those administrators cannot do it alone. They need all parents, they need the community support, they need everybody pulling together.

NAFTA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JENKINS). Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 7, 1997, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] is recognized for 60 minutes as the designee of the minority leader.

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, a lot of attention has been focused on our relationship with Mexico, especially these last couple of days as the President prepared for his trip to visit Mexico and during his trip yesterday and today and his trip with Latin leaders in Central America, I believe tomorrow. He is in Mexico, the President, as we speak, meeting with President Zedillo on a number of important issues. They will be discussing drugs, they will be discussing immigration, and those are both very serious problems facing both of our countries. I wish them the best in trying to move a step or two closer to resolving those very difficult issues.

The drug issue, of course, is particularly disturbing, and it is a two-way street. We are both to blame for the problem with drugs affecting both of our people. Mexico is shipping it here. Seventy percent of the cocaine and 25 percent of the heroin coming into the United States comes through Mexico. We have created this insatiable unfortunate demand for it in this country. We need to work on both sides of the border to get this under control.

One of the problems with controlling it coming over here, of course, is the open border policy that we have with Mexico that was put into place during the North American Free Trade Agreement. And, of course, this open border policy allows trucks to pass over the border almost unimpeded, without inspection. In Texas there are about 11,000 trucks that will cross the border each and every single day from Mexico. One out of 200 get looked at, inspected, and one can read stories daily in the press of police finding trucks coming over the border once they are here, there was one story the other day in New York City where they opened up a truck that was carrying bananas and as they got into the cargo, they found cocaine, and it happens almost on a daily basis here in the United States. So this drug issue is a very serious one and we wish them all the best.

We had a serious debate as some of my colleagues may recall in this Chamber not too very long ago about drugs. There will be a serious discussion, as I say, in Mexico City. But one issue that is being just glossed over, just mentioned in passing, is the performance of the North American Free Trade Agreement, better known as NAFTA. We had, as my colleagues all remember, a very vigorous and a healthy and a strong and a deliberative debate on this issue 4 years ago. We are now into the 40th month of NAFTA. It was this same agreement that in effect economically married our two nations. We became almost one, because we broke down the barriers of trade. That is what free trade is all about, breaking down the barriers completely. I believe that this agreement deserves more than just a passing reference by our colleagues, by the national media, and by our two leaders.

I want to discuss on this floor tonight the issue of NAFTA and the prospects of expanding NAFTA, which by the way includes not only Mexico but Canada, expanding it to other Latin American countries, or the Caribbean Basin or most immediate and most discussed is expanding it to Chile.

I want to discuss in just a minute or two some of the things that NAFTA has done, some of the devastating things that NAFTA has done to the workers in this Nation. But before I do that, let me mention a few things that it has not done, because my colleagues will hear none of this in the talks they have in Mexico this week or the media coverage of the President's trip. Above all else, the supporters of NAFTA said, 40 months ago, that it would create 200,000 jobs in the United States and, more importantly, they said, it would create this huge consumer market in Mexico, a country of approaching 100 million people. That is what NAFTA would do, create this market where we could ship all these goods to Mexico, because they would have a strong and vibrant and prosperous middle class.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who have examined closely NAFTA for 40 months know these claims just do not pass the test of time, and you know what? We have a right. We knew that you could not create a consumer market in the Nation where workers make a dollar an hour, in a Nation where business and Government and the official union annually agree to suppress wages through something called el pacto. It is an agreement between business, the government and the unions to keep wages low. Actually it is a broader agreement than just that. It is an agreement that the Government gives the business, the multinational corporations that come down to Mexico, that it will guarantee their investment by keeping wages low, by not leveling any taxes against these corporations, which by the way are needed in order to develop the infrastructure so that the people who live near the plant and work at the plant can live with clean air and clean water, which they do not now, and I will talk about that in a second.

So the corporations pay no taxes, they pay very low wages to people, but it is an agreement, it is a strategy that was put together by the Government and the leaders of the unions in the business community. And we knew that the multinational corporations wanted to use Mexico as a labor market, not as a consumer market. And what do I mean by a labor market?

Mr. Speaker, they wanted to use the inexpensive labor of a dollar an hour or less, and it is less now. It was a dollar an hour when we were discussing NAFTA. It is down to about 70 cents an hour or about five or six dollars a day for an 8-hour day, a productive day, by the way, because the Mexican workers are hard workers and good people. They have just got everybody against them. They have got the Government against them, they have got this phony union that works with the Government in the business community, and of course they have the multinationals against them, and they are all by themselves looking for someone to stand up and say:

We deserve the right to earn a decent wage, we deserve the right to assemble, we deserve the right to bargain for our bread, we deserve the right to collectively bargain, the right to strike, to withhold our work. But they do not have that right.

Now there is something called the maquiladora, and people when they hear that term used, "What is a maquiladora?" It is an area along the Mexican-American border from Texas to California. On each side of the border there is a strip of land. Maquiladoras refer to the Mexican area just across the American border in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California because workers in those maquiladora factories that line this border today, as I said, are no longer making a dollar an hour. They are making 70 cents an hour.

Mr. Speaker, the multinational corporations took full advantage of the economic crisis in Mexico which contributed to this drop in the wages. Some of you may recall when we argued NAFTA the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] and myself and others got up and we said the peso is overvalued, it is going to crash, and when it crashes, the wages of the workers in Mexico will fall through the floor, there will be a financial crisis, and someone is going to have to bail out all these investors, these big shooters that invested because of NAFTA. Someone is going to have to take care of these big financial institutions.

And so we did; we guaranteed the money. We saved a collapse, a total collapse, which may or may not happen in the future because I think the peso is starting to be overvalued again. But nonetheless, the peso crashed, and we said it would crash, and it was one of the reasons we said we did not like that NAFTA because it was overvalued.

It was a huge financial crisis in Mexico, and people all over the country overnight had the value of their labor and their savings diminished by 40 percent. Now if you could imagine that, waking up tomorrow and knowing your life's savings, what you were earning that week, what you had saved, what you invested was 40 percent less, and that is what happened.

These corporations have expanded employment in the maquiladora by over 40 percent since NAFTA took effect, 40 percent. In Mexico the workers are not buying more consumer goods. On those wages it takes nearly a half a day's work to buy a carton of milk, and they work. They work hard. They do not last too long.

I visited 2 months ago the maquiladora down in Tijuana, and I went to the Hyundai plant and the Samsung plant and the Panasonic plant. You have got all these multinational large facilities, modern facilities. A lot. But you know you do not see any automobiles parked near there. Workers do not have the money to buy automobiles. You got an automobile factory in the maquiladora area. There are not any cars there. People do not have money to buy a car. What Henry FORD did in the early part of this century was say I am going to pay my workers a decent wage so they can buy the automobiles that they produce, and he dramatically increased their wages to $5 an hour.

Mr. Speaker, they take the opposite approach, the multinationals in Mexico. They keep wages at 70 cents an hour so you make five or six dollars a day. Try to buy milk on that because the milk is not any more expensive or any less expensive than it is here, believe me.

And you know, this is a remarkable fact. We sell more consumer goods to the small Nation of Switzerland, which is in the center of western Europe, small little country, a mountainous country, Switzerland, about 6 million people. We sell more goods to Switzerland than we do to the almost hundred million people in Mexico. But they are making more goods in Mexico and shipping them here. That is exactly what the maquiladoras in NAFTA were designed to do.

A surge in imports since NAFTA has exploded our trade deficit with Mexico. Before NAFTA, we were running about a $2 billion trade surplus with Mexico. We were selling them more, $2 billion worth more, of goods than they were selling us. Since NAFTA it is a $16 billion deficit.

One of the reasons are obvious. They do not have a class of people that can buy our goods if the value of their peso devaluated 40 percent and they are making 70 cents an hour. What are they going to buy? And the other reason of course is that these corporations are establishing their businesses right across the border and taking advantage of this inexpensive labor and then shipping the products right back here, right back here, and it does not take a PHD in economics to figure out that when you are buying things from Mexico that used to be made here you are losing jobs.

No, those 2,100 jobs have not materialized here as the NAFTA supporters said. What we do know is that nearly 120,000 American workers have been certified by the Government as losing their jobs as a result of NAFTA, and using the same formula that NAFTA proponents used to estimate jobs gained in 1993 some people have suggested that we have lost up to 600,000 jobs.

So that is what NAFTA has done, and let me just say something about the people who lost their jobs because this is an interesting story.

People say, "Well, you know you are talking about these job losses. I mean isn't the economy doing well, BONIOR? I mean the unemployment rate is down to 4.9 percent. I mean the economy and consumer confidence is up."

Well, the fact of the matter is that those people who lost those jobs, they found other jobs here in this country, but studies that I have seen show that they have found those jobs at about two-thirds of what they were earning in their former jobs.

So what happens when that occurs? Well, they work a second job, or the other spouse goes to work, or they are working two or three jobs, and what happens when that occurs? The parents are not home when their children come home from school. They are not there to see them play soccer. They are not there to go to their school activities. And then the whole social fabric of our society starts to unravel a little bit.

So wages have an impact not only on what you can take home and what you purchase and what you have in terms of security for yourself and your family, but they have a social consequence as well.

The sad thing is what NAFTA has done.

Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this before on this floor, and I want to discuss it again tonight. It is the issue of using NAFTA as a weapon, and I choose that word carefully, "as a weapon," to dampen the efforts of workers here in America to earn a decent wage and seek the right to organize and collectively bargain, and I really want to focus on it tonight because I believe that this was the intention of NAFTA all along, to give corporations a license, in effect to pursue a race to the bottom strategy to drive down wages to bust unions and to move the living standard of Americans to a lower level.

And of course, as I say, Americans resist that. They will work two and three jobs in order to maintain that standard of living, but when they do that, they give up something else that is very precious to them, and that is time with their families. They give up their family life. They give up part of their spiritual life. They give up other things that create an atmosphere of community and caring and loving.

And I can tell you right now that we should not stand for this because our fathers and our mothers and our grandparents and our ancestors, they fought too hard and they fought too long over these past 100 years for the right to assemble, the right to organize, the right to collectively bargain, the right to earn a decent wage, the right to work in safe working conditions and on, and on, and on.

Corporations are now using NAFTA to erode these rights, not by changing the law in this case, but by pitting workers against each other and by threatening to move jobs to the lowest cost labor market available, and NAFTA gives them a license to do that because it protects their investment in Mexico. It does not require them to raise Mexican standards up to ours. It practically guarantees them that they will not be caught because NAFTA does not give workers a real voice in this decision. All it does is it says, "Let's talk." If corporations are violating worker rights, no sanctions, no fines, no consequences; if you are lucky, maybe a little discussion.

NAFTA put a stamp of approval on all of this behavior, and it should be a crime what some of these corporations are doing since NAFTA took effect.

Downward pressure on wages; look at this chart right here. NAFTA puts downward pressure on U.S. wages. Sixty-two percent of U.S. employers threaten to close plants rather than negotiate with or recognize a union, implying or explicitly threatening to move jobs to Mexico.

This was a study that was done at Cornell University. Sixty-two percent, a study that was done which the Department of Labor refused to release, and you can understand why when you see these numbers.

Basically this says that the corporations were going to the workers and saying, and I will demonstrate this vividly in just a second, you do not take a freeze in wages or a cut in wages or a cut in your health care benefits or your pension benefits; we are going south and you are not going to have any job at all. Yet, when workers in Mexico try to organize and try to form unions and try to fight for better pay and to try to take away this bargaining chip that the multinationals and corporations in this country are using on workers, what happens? I will tell my colleagues what happens. They get thrown in jail.

I was witness to a discussion with one of the leaders of the colonia, which is a village of workers who work in the Maquiladora in Tijuana, who told me that he got the line at this factory to stop. The workers protested because people were losing their fingers and their hands, and as a result of that, he got fired for organizing this work stoppage. And when he tried to organize an independent union because the union that was there is in cahoots with the government and the company, as are 95 percent of the unions in Mexico, when he tried to form an independent union he was arrested and thrown in jail.

Four years ago, we put our stamp of approval on the whole schematic that I have just developed here.

Mr. Speaker, let me read a passage from this Cornell study, because it will show our colleagues just exactly what NAFTA has done. This passage I am going to read discusses why companies, after an effort by workers to organize in the United States, have fled to Mexico at double the rates since NAFTA took effect than before NAFTA. I quote the study: The fact that the post-election plant closing rate has more than doubled, that is here, since NAFTA was ratified, suggests that NAFTA has both increased the credibility and the effectiveness of the plant closing threat for employers and embolden increasing numbers of employers to act upon that threat.

In fact, it goes on to say, in several campaigns the employer used the media coverage of NAFTA debate to threaten the workers. It threatened the workers with moving their plant to Mexico if the workers were to organize. In several campaigns the employers used the media coverage of NAFTA debate to threaten the workers that they were going to move their plant if the workers were to organize.

Mr. Speaker, let me now turn to a few examples of how corporations have used NAFTA to drive down wages in the United States, to do exactly what this Cornell study has suggested. Last week the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KUCINICH] reminded us that one of the most dramatic examples took place in Michigan.

In 1994 workers were attempting to organize an ITT automotive plant in Michigan. The company was resisting. The company used the threat of moving to Mexico in a very blatant fashion. During the organizing campaign the management took apart an assembly line in the plant, shrink-wrapped it and loaded it on 13 flatbed trucks with bright pink signs that read, "Mexico transfer jobs." Mexico transfer jobs.

The same company drew employees from the Mexican facility to videotape Michigan workers on a production line which the supervisor claimed they were considering moving to Mexico. So they bring these Mexican workers up here, they videotape the American workers working on the line. The American workers say, "What is going on?" They say, "Well, we are videotaping the line because this production line is going to move to Mexico."

That type of threat is still going on today, and of course, needless to say, the union lost the election in that plant.

Let me show my colleagues another chart here. Companies use NAFTA to drive down wages for American workers. Just 2 months ago, a company called NTN Bauer used this same exact flyer which can be seen trying to undermine an organizing drive in McComb, IL.

As my colleagues can see, the flyer makes a blatant threat. It says if the worker decides to join the UAW, their jobs may go south for more than just the winter. The leaflet notes there are Mexicans willing to do their job for $3 and $4 an hour. The free trade treaty allows this.

The fact of the matter is, these jobs are being done not for $3 or $4 an hour, they are being done for 70 cents an hour. This is perhaps one of the most blatant example of how companies are using NAFTA to stop the wages from going up, and benefits. It is happening every day and 62 percent of employers are doing the same thing.

The author of the Cornell study, professor Kate Rothenbrenner, concluded the following, and I quote. This is her conclusion: NAFTA has created a climate that has emboldened employers and terrified workers. I want to repeat that again: NAFTA has created a climate that has emboldened employers and terrified workers.

These same companies that promised to create jobs under NAFTA, but who are instead using it as a threat to drive down wages in this country, now want to expand into other nations without any protection for workers. This problem will only get worse because it is not only Mexico that is being used as a bargaining chip. NAFTA supporters, as I said earlier, would like to add next Chile to NAFTA, but the nation of Chile is being used as a bargaining chip as well.

Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues may be familiar with a recent strike of workers at Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. More than 12,500 workers went on strike to demand decent wages and benefits and limiting outsourcing. That is when the company decided to produce parts in another country, and pretty soon we have this part and that part and we have the whole thing being produced elsewhere. Outsourcing of course is a major concern of workers in this country, especially in the manufacturing sector, in the industrial manufacturing sector.

Well, as I said, one of the major issues of that strike was the announcement by Goodyear that it was transferring production from its Akron, OH plant to Santiago, Chile, resulting in 150 lost jobs in order to lower labor costs. So this is a trend that will continue on and on and on unless we seriously address the issues of wages and workers' rights in our trade agreements.

People suggest to me, well, we cannot do that. We cannot address the environment and workers' wages and workers' rights in these agreements, and the reason we cannot do that is because the other countries that we are bargaining with will not allow it. If we just go along with them, and we improve their economies or we help improve their economies and their people become more prosperous and middle class, that will bring with it the freedoms that we cherish and have worked so hard for in this country. That is the other argument against the position that I and others take.

The fact of the matter is that history has shown that if we do not address these things in these agreements, they just do not get addressed at all; that there is no countervailing force in Mexico or in some of these countries to bring prosperity and to bring a rising middle class, and there is no historical proof that when this is done, democratization flourishes.

Democratization flourishes when people are allowed to assemble and bargain for their own bread and their own rights. The unions have brought depth and dignity to democracy in this country and in Western Europe and they can do it in Latin America, they can do it in Asia, as they are doing it now in Korea, by the way, they can do it in Africa and they can do it in other places, other developing countries. But they have to have the ability to come together without having the fear of being thrown in jail.

All we are asking our Government to do is to take these principles that made us so strong, that made us the envy of the world, that gave rise because of organized labor to the largest and most prosperous middle class the world has ever known, to allow those principles, those democratic principles to be used in Mexico and other developing countries in the world. That is what we are after, so that workers there and workers here can benefit. Not this insatiable race to the bottom, to the lowest standard.

NAFTA is a flawed agreement. It is not just about Mexico. It is about giving corporations a license to do this to workers.

It is unconscionable what they are doing on the border and the Maquiladora area, these multinational corporations, dumping their sewage and their plant effluents into the rivers that the people live right next to, bathe in, drink out of. The American Medical Association said that these corporations have created a cesspool of infectious disease. That is their words. They refuse to be taxed in order to provide an infrastructure to clean up this pollution.

These manufacturing jobs that pay a decent wage, allow workers to send their kids to college, talking about the jobs that we have here, buy a home, take a nice vacation, have a secure retirement with good health care, they are going to be gone unless the country wakes up and decides that it wants to export our worker values and principles, not our jobs, so that the workers in Mexico and in other places can have lives like we have developed over the last 100 years.

We are creating jobs in this Nation, but they are not the types of jobs that can sustain this economy. We are going to wake up one morning and we are going to hit a hollowed bottom, a hollowed bottom, where the top 20 percent or the top 25 percent in America are doing very, very well, but then they are going to discover the folks below them, their earning power is slipping and slipping and slipping and slipping, and they pretty soon will not have the wherewithal to purchase the products that they once made. In the not so distant future, clearly this is going to catch up to us.

Mr. Speaker, this debate we are engaged in tonight is not simply about tariffs, investment rules, and trade agreements, it is in essence about our economic future. It is about whether or not we as a nation will go forward with the bright and wonderful hope of exporting our principles of democracy and our right to organize and the right to collective bargaining, and all of those things that helped make us prosperous, or we are going to go backward and we are going to export greed that denies people the ability to come together in a community to better their own lives.

This is nothing more than a masquerade for greed. That is what we are dealing with here. I do not say that flippantly. I have thought about this and I have tried to rationalize it from the perspective of those who argue on the other side, and I have looked at the data and I have talked to the workers, both here and there, and I have come to the conclusion it is about greed.

Nobody will say no to the rapacious and inexorable march of the multinational corporations today, and it is very, very scary. There is no countervailing force. We have indifferent government, we have weakened, if nonexistent labor, and we have an economic, how should I describe it, intertwined media with the economic powers that be in this country, the multinationals, so that that independent message is very, very difficult to penetrate.

I must say, though, that I have sensed a little bit of hope. As we all remember during the NAFTA debate, at least I certainly remember, I suspect a lot of people do, but I certainly do, the New York Times was unabashedly in favor of NAFTA. There was an editorial board and a columnist there that I respect very much for their integrity, for their depth, their knowledge, but I really had a serious disagreement over this issue. I remember coming to the floor and railing against the New York Times, I was so mad one evening, and taking off on a little box they have in the left-hand top corner of the front page every day that says, "All the news that is fit to print."

But in the last several months, I have noticed that a few editorials in the Times are starting to address indirectly, not directly but indirectly, the question of poverty in Latin America.

There was one, I think, that was just this morning that talked about how the wealth is not reaching them because of the growth in Latin America, which needs to grow. It needs to grow at a 6 or 7 percent clip to keep up with its population growth. But the wealth has been going to a select few. As I just described, in Mexico we have huge numbers of people, huge numbers of people that are falling further and further behind, who are working harder and harder to make ends meet.

So the wealth is just moving to the top, and we are exacerbating the problems of the poor and the working poor. I would take that argument a step further. The New York Times, in an editorial today, came up with a series of formulas to try to eradicate this problem and focus attention on the poor and working poor. But my suggestion to you is that until you get the governments and the multinational corporations dealing fairly and honestly and with integrity with the workers, that is not going to happen. It will not happen. They have enslaved, they have enslaved a generation of workers.

I hope they keep examining and looking at this, because I do not think that they can come to any other conclusion than that. There are a couple of people at the Times, Abe Rosenthal, Bob Herbert, wonderful people, Duke Collins, who I think share my view with respect to these trade agreements: That we need to have them, that they are helpful to all concerned if done well, but that what we have been doing is taking us back to the 19th century and not forward.

I regret to say that my President, who I respect so much on so many other different issues, we have such a difference of opinion on this one. I would like for him to go down to a maquiladora area. I would like for him to talk to the workers in those colonias, to see for himself what we are talking about here, to see the pollution, to see the despair, to see the hopelessness and the alienation.

Someone is going to have to lead an international effort, Mr. President, on wages, on labor rights, on environmental rights. It might as well be us. We have benefited more than anyone else in the world. We have, and our European cousins. We need to share that with the workers in Asia and Africa and Latin America and the Caribbean Basin. We have to hold the multinational-transnational corporations responsible.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me again at the end of my comments here wish President Zedillo and President Clinton and all the Latin leaders in Costa Rica tomorrow well in their discussions, and I look forward to a vigorous debate as we proceed to discuss this fast-track trade authority. With China, which will, I assume, follow that, or precede it, but certainly will be before us within the next 4 or 5 months, these trade issues are terribly, terribly important because of the globalization efforts underway, and tearing down borders, marrying our countries to each other economically, and creating a situation in which workers will have hopefully a fair and a decent ability to compete.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. REYES (at the request of Mr. GEPHARDT) for today and tomorrow, Wednesday, May 7.

Mr. SCHIFF (at the request of Mr. ARMEY) for today and the balance of the week on account of medical reasons.

Mr. KOLBE (at the request of Mr. ARMEY) for today and tomorrow on account of traveling to Mexico with the President.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. PALLONE) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. PALLONE, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. VISCLOSKEY, for 5 minutes, today.
