

He proposed accomplishing this through accountability, through more school choice, and through flexibility, and I regret to say that the Congress really denied the President two of those three objectives in the education bill that the President proposed. All we passed was the accountability, or the national testing provisions. The President is committed to continue fighting and moving forward on the school choice components of his education vision.

This tax credit proposal is really the next step in accomplishing that for the President, so I am grateful for his passion and commitment to these children in America. I am grateful for his commitment to the education tax credit proposal that we have developed. I am grateful for our Speaker and our majority leader, and our leadership here in the House, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce for all of their help and support in making this tax credit proposal a reality, because it will allow us to bypass this bureaucracy with just a small amount of money to begin to show in America how making the connection between taxpayer and school child will improve education dramatically throughout the country and begin to treat children like they matter, and also begin to expose American education to more of a free market approach.

Mr. HOEKSTRA. Mr. Speaker, the end result is the shared vision that we have with the President, that we have with our Speaker, and with the chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce to make sure we leave no child behind; that every child in America gets a first class education, and that they can compete on a worldwide basis.
