

The United States remains the world's most dominant economy and scientific powerhouse. The rest of the world, however, is catching up and challenging our competitiveness. Fundamentally, there has been a significant increase in the quality and quantity of science and engineering (S&E) capacity around the globe. At the same time, America has grown complacent in her position as innovation leaders. Without adequate support at home, the impact of these two factors has been not only a decline in science and engineering professionals, but also the movement of corporate high tech investments and jobs to other countries.

The Republican Congress has made great strides in funding research and development. We have met and exceed our goal of doubling the National Institutes of Health (NIH) medical research funding, we have made necessary reforms to streamline the Patent and Trademark Office and FDA processes, and we have promoted nanotechnology, broadband dissemination, and a myriad of other important high tech investment. Similarly President Bush has focused on evaluating the scale, quality, and effectiveness of the Federal effort in science and technology.

Research and development investments are still the keys to our nation's future competitiveness, and thus we must increase our efforts to spur innovation. This week, as part of the ongoing 8 week kickoff to the Careers for a 21st Century America competitiveness agenda, the House is focusing on efforts to spur the innovative, creative and entrepreneurial spirit that has always driven America toward phenomenal achievement.

Democrats constantly lament our declining dominance in the sciences, yet offer no solutions. "You need a partnership," says NSF Deputy Director, Josh Bordogna. "You need new knowledge out of universities and labs, new processes from industry, and a government willing to enable it all through appropriate R&D policy and frontier research and education investment, by and for the citizenry." That is the challenge House Republicans have taken to heart.

Instead of political rhetoric, Republicans are offering real solutions. We invite our colleagues to join us in moving America forward.
