

magnitude of savings and the significant boost to new drug innovation that this bill has delivered.

According to a May 2009 report of IMS data, the use of FDA-approved generic medicines has saved the U.S. healthcare system approximately $734 billion over the past 10 years.

Moreover, patients around the world can get needed medication that they would not be able to afford except for access to lower-cost generics.

At the same time, price competition from generics has acted to spur a dramatic increase in new drug research and development.

In short, the Hatch-Waxman Act has delivered above and beyond the intended result.

I urge my colleagues to view the success of this landmark legislation as an indicator of what we can accomplish in the field of biologic medicines.

Biologics are the most promising treatments available for diseases such as cancer, multiple sclerosis, and Alzheimer's, but they are expensive, often costing between $20,000 and $100,000 a year.

There is no explicit pathway for Food and Drug Administration approval of generic versions of these medicines under the Hatch-Waxman law; however, there is bipartisan agreement that we need to create one. To do that, we need to focus on our goals and bridge our differences.

The time to do that is now.

Biologic drugs are the fast growing component of prescription drug spending.

These drugs are expected to make up 50 percent of the pharmaceutical marketplace by 2020, but their high prices keep them out of reach for far too many patients and place an increasingly heavy financial burden on consumers, on businesses, and on taxpayers.

In 2007, the top six biologics accounted for more than $7 billion of the nearly $17 billion in direct prescription drug spending by Medicare.

That figure will continue to grow, and the amount taxpayers pay depends on whether Medicare can access lower-priced biogenerics or is forced to pay brand-name prices year after year after year.

Biogenerics hold the promise of making life-saving medicines available to all patients at an affordable cost.

With the explosion in biologics, we have a new generation of lifesaving medicines—and a new opportunity to reprise the historic victory Senator ORRIN HATCH and Representative HENRY WAXMAN achieved 25 years ago today.

With biologic use and prices spiraling upward, we have no: time to lose.
