

In the 1970s, P.J. moved to New York. There, he became editor of the legendary satirical magazine "National Lampoon," then in its prime. After the Lampoon came stints at "Rolling Stone," the "Atlantic Monthly," and many other magazines, as well as 20 books known for their energy and wit.

Frequently, he turned his attention to American politics. Some here in Washington can still feel the sting. He even found humor in the world's trouble spots; He was in Beirut in the 1980s, Somalia and Afghanistan in the 1990s, Iraq in the 2000s.

One of my favorite P.J. O'Rourke quotes is: "Politics is a necessary evil, a necessary annoyance, a necessary conundrum." His tone was always one of mischievous irreverence, tempered by an abiding sympathy for our common humanity.

And he was never far from Toledo or from Ohio. "No Toledoan ever outgrows Toledo," he wrote several years ago, in a tribute to his hometown. He was clear-eyed about the charms of a Midwestern upbringing and blind to any imperfections.

"Toledo is better than exciting," he went on, "it's happy. Nothing is more conducive to unhappiness than taking yourself seriously, and taking yourself seriously is difficult when your baseball team is called the Mud Hens."

In truth, P.J. O'Rourke, while not taking himself too seriously, achieved much success in life—best-selling books, packed lecture halls in America and Europe, a journalistic career that took him to every corner of the world. But he never forgot he was from Toledo, from Ohio, from the heart of the country. And the country's heart always beat within him.

My fellow Buckeyes join me in bidding farewell and offering our thanks to a treasured native son.●
